

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Per. 2705 d. $\frac{234}{1-2}$

HEDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

OF

INSTRUCTIVE AND ENTERTAINING LITERATURE.

HEDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

OF

INSTRUCTIVE AND ENTERTAINING LITERATURE.

EDITED BY

JAMES HEDDERWICK,

AUTHOR OF "LAYS OF MIDDLE AGE," &c.

VOLUME I

OCTOBER 1862—MARCH 1863.

SES: RED LION-COURT, FLEET-STREET, LONDON,
D ST. ENOCH-SQUARE, GLASGOW.

MDCCCLXIII.

PREFACE.

IN presenting the First half-yearly Volume of 'HEDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY,' the Publisher begs to thank the many friends who have interested themselves in its circulation and success. He desires, likewise, to acknowledge his obligations to those who, by their contributions, have afforded valuable assistance in the literary department.

The Publisher is, at the same time, conscious that the 'MISCELLANY' has hitherto exhibited some of the imperfections which usually attach to new enterprises. These he hopes to remedy, if not all at once, by slow and sure degrees; so as to render the work, in its future career, increasingly worthy of the support which it has all along received.

Among the new features contemplated, is the introduction of Serial Stories of somewhat greater length than any which have yet appeared in the 'MISCELLANY.' It is also proposed to make certain alterations in the plan and appearance of the periodical; which the Publisher hopes will prove acceptable to its readers.

APRIL 1863.

INDEX.

	PAGE		PAGE
LEVEL Hand, The. By Allan Park Paton, -	49	LITERARY Mishaps, -	65
Aunt Rachel's Story. By Ellen E. Guthrie, 76, 84, 105, 122, 132	132	Lighthouse Ghost, The, -	151
All I dare tell about it. By Allan Park Paton, -	194	Light Ray, The, -	209, 225
Adventure, A Kentucky, -	233	Lodger in the Attic, The, -	300
African Hunting: From Natal to the Zambesi, -	241	Little Children, -	305
Art of Quotation, The, -	332	Love versus Fame, -	315
Asent the Deciphering of an Ancient Inscription, -	585
Among the Gods, -	394	MAMMOTH Trees of California, The, -	26
BEAT Brummell, -	16	My Riding Lessons. By W. Black, -	90
Balloon Ascent, The last Scientific. By Allan Park Paton, -	93	Modern English History, -	185
British Colonies, The, -	103	Mysterious, -	187
Bute, A Royal Visit to, -	269	Mrs. Spokeshave and her Letters, -	250
		Mustache, Concerning a, -	265
CARDIPHONIA, A Young Lady's. By Jane C. Simpson, 29, 39, 60, 74	74	Mary Gordon's First Days at School, -	378, 388, 406
Cromies of Burns, The. By the late David Gray, -	43	NEWSTEAD in October, -	113
Children, Of, -	101	Natal, -	169
Christopher North. By William Black, -	129	Notes of the Rambles of an Amateur Naturalist, -	318
Chateau de Villemar, The, -	166
Cinderella, A Musical. By William Freeland, -	201	OTHER Half, The, -	81
Circumstantial Evidence, -	231	Our Voyage. By the Editor, -	121
Chinese Tale, A, -	248	Our Early Posts, -	153
Cheap Publications. By Jane C. Simpson, -	353	Only an Artist, -	217
Criminal Trials by Jury, -	385	Olla Podrida, -	252
DOUBT and Faith: An Apologue, -	33	PARVENU, Perplexities of a, -	4
Dredging Days, -	53	Players, A Plea for the. By R. L. Gentles, -	126
Dreams, A Brace of, -	118	Popular Songs of the Highlands. By Thomas Pattison, 149, 163, 190, 215, 238, 254, 263, 277, 297, 312, 324, 382	382
Dmy's Rabbit Shooting, A, -	341	Portraits in Outline. By William Freeland, -	281
Delphi of Stourton, A Visit to the, -	359	Printing, Rudimentary Ideas of, -	293
Drawing from the Life. By the Editor, -	401	Poetical Conception, -	395
ESSENTIAL Principles of the Drama, -	111	ROMANCE of a Sun Picture, The. By R. L. Gentles, -	218
English Classic Reviewed, An, -	223	Round a Tuft of Moss, -	279
'Eep! 'Eep! By Allan Park Paton, -	236	Rifles and Rifle Practice, -	329
FAMILY, The Friend of the. By the Editor, -	17	SCOTTISH Pulpit, The. By Professor Blackie, -	8
Familiar Phrases. By the Editor, -	34	Seen at the Time, -	46
Fashion, -	56	Solitary Walk in Paris, A, -	141
Furniture Sales. By the Editor, -	89	Prague, A, -	154, 183
Fred Harper's Legacy, -	145, 161, 177	Nuremberg, A, -	245
Faeries of Bygone Art, -	346	Furth, A, -	303
		Munich, A, -	335
GENERAL Reading, -	213	Shams, -	143
Geological Reveries in Rain, -	369	Sub-Editorial Philosophy. By R. L. Gentles, -	172
		Weary of Breath, -	273
HERMETICS. By Louis Blanc, -	45	On Some Popular Juggernauts, -	337
Holding up the Mirror at Foggyton, -	57	On an India-Rubber Ball, -	412
Hangers-on: Public-house Hangers-on. By R. L. Gentles, -	108	On Some Impostors of my Youth, -	174
Literary, or Bohemians. By R. L. Gentles, -	140	Sacred Poetry. By the Editor, -	193
How he Won Her. By William Black, -	286	Suited for the Season. By the Editor, -	257
		Slightly Mistaken, -	289, 308
INVENTURE of the Hose, The. By William Freeland, -	63	Seer's Prediction, The. By Ellen Emma Guthrie, -	321
Italian Notes, -	97	Sin and Crime. By William Freeland, -
JOTTINGS about the Insane, -	406

	PAGE		PAGE
Shadow of a Story, The, - - - - -	349	VICTIM of Confidence, - - - - -	41
Skelmorly, A Pleasant Story of, - - - - -	353	WHAT does the Age Mean? By the Editor, - - - - -	1
Story of Three Dances, The, - - - - -	374	Walker's Narrative, Mr. - - - - -	10
TWINS, The: An Apologue. By William Freeland, - - - - -	138	Washington Irving at Seville, - - - - -	32
Troubadours, The. By W. Black, - - - - -	212	Will Murder Out? By the Editor, - - - - -	62
Too many Rows in the Pock, - - - - -	349	Wordsworth's 'Lucy,' On. By S. F. Williams, - - - - -	317
Tributes of Loyalty, On Certain, - - - - -	393	Intimations of Immortality. By S. F. Williams, - - - - -	345
UNPUNCTUAL, The, - - - - -	25	Wayside Thoughts. By the late James Macfarlane, 164, 176, 320
Uncle Nathan. By A. N. M. Young, - - - - -	155	YANKEE Philology, - - - - -	206

POETRY.

	PAGE		PAGE
AULD Ash Tree, The, - - - - -	352	Lily F—, To. By W. Black, - - - - -	272
BELLA! Horrida Bella! By the Editor, - - - - -	16	MEMORIES, - - - - -	144
CARRY your ain Sunshine wi' ye. By James Ballantine, - - - - -	48	Monody for a Beloved Daughter. By James Ballantine, - - - - -	224
Critic, To a. By W. Black, - - - - -	64	Mohammedan's Song, A, - - - - -	304
Child's Rhymes, - - - - -	137	Mother's Room, The. By Jessie Edmondston Saxby, - - - - -	374
Christmas, - - - - -	208	No Witness, - - - - -	153
Coming Hour, The, - - - - -	392	Night of the Marriage. By the Editor, - - - - -	377
DAYBREAK, - - - - -	112	OUR Little Maid, - - - - -	7
Dead, - - - - -	304	Old Desk, The, - - - - -	160
Distress, - - - - -	368	Our Native Tongue. By E. Peel, - - - - -	336
ELIZA, - - - - -	32	On the Sands, - - - - -	400
Eylomel. By W. Black, - - - - -	176	PRISON Van, The. By the Editor, - - - - -	31
FLOWER o' the May, The, - - - - -	340	RIVERS. By Mrs. Newton Croaland, - - - - -	96
GARIBALDI at Spezzia. By Allan Park Paton, - - - - -	24	SUMMER and Winter, - - - - -	100
Good Angels. By Jane C. Simpson, - - - - -	320	Sonnet, A, - - - - -	359
HAREBELL, The. By the late David Gray, - - - - -	4	Sickness and Health, - - - - -	405
High Water Mark, - - - - -	120	THREE Scenes, - - - - -	55
Hameless Laddie, The. By J. Thomson, - - - - -	288	Truth, - - - - -	80
LOVE Legacy, The, - - - - -	36	Tower, The. By William Freeland, - - - - -	230
Lost, - - - - -	83	VACANT Corner, The, - - - - -	169
Little Willie, - - - - -	128	Victor and Vanquished, - - - - -	185
Love and the Musician, - - - - -	247

ENDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 1.]

SATURDAY, OCT. 4, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

WHAT DOES THE AGE MEAN?

BY THE EDITOR.

A DISTINGUISHED literary friend, whom we are proud to rank among our contributors, has written to us, quaintly and frankly, that he does not understand what the age means by the multiplication of cheap periodicals. If we may be allowed the confidential ear of our readers, neither do we ourselves quite understand the age's meaning; and yet, strange to tell, we are in no way discouraged either by the knowledge of our friend's obtuseness, or by the consciousness of our own. The age is incomprehensible to us and to all men in many things; and if Sir Oracle—by whom we mean not the kind and brilliant friend who has warned us mildly and helped us powerfully, but that other ubiquitous and “— good-natured friend” whom everybody knows, and who is certain to tell everybody what he thinks of us,—if Sir Oracle, we say, is only a little wise—although he may delude himself with the notion that millstones are transparent bodies, and that the Thames is a combustible stream—he will not be forward to predict the precise or even probable solution of a good many of the age's problems. Instead of getting into the “wandering mazes” of Milton's lost angels, we prefer, for our own part, to let the darker purposes of the age and of Providence alone. That our poor maligned age is, on the whole, competent to take care of itself, may be fairly and philosophically surmised.

We are always alarmed for any individual who takes upon himself the burden of the age's sorrow. Let the friends of such—if he has any—look after him, with a view to cool diet, a padded room, and the exclusion of a world that has lost its way, and is wandering, bewildered and forlorn, among the twilights of gathering disaster. It is all very well for an Elizabeth Barrett Browning to hear “the crying of the children” through all the medley-chorus of the world's mercantile chaffering, and happy, homely laughs; or for a Thomas Hood to shudder at the spectre of the sick sempstress behind the many-coloured braveries of fashion. From such fine ears and sensitive-seeing eyes as theirs comes the poetry which ministers to the tender and unselfish humanities, and without which this world would be something less of a beautiful garden-world than it is now. But idle and perilous is the madness which lies outside the thin wall which separates madness from genius. The class of small philosophers who go raking about the perils of society with the noses of sanitary commissioners, and who are always in a state of fussy and prolix alarm about some awful tendency of the age—some hideous, impending ruin—some miraculous “Mene, mene, tekel, Upharsin,” flaming before their startled vision,—we hold to be in a decidedly bad way. If the restless and unfortunate beings to whom we refer—and whose mission in life seems to be to push forward the pettiest of peddling projects with menace of the hugest of earthly thunders—would only be content to leave a little good work for poor, unemployed posterity to do, it might be better for their own ease of mind, as it would certainly be better for the tranquillity and happiness of their neighbours.

Whence all the perverse questioning, the monstrous metaphysical riddle-making, which is so much the vice of our time? The mistake of it consists in the supposition that the present age is one whit more at sea, adrift, and in peril of shipwreck, than the ages which have gone down to Hades. Inspired prophecy comes up to us only from remote and luminous ages of the past. Out of the Scottish Highlands, there is no such thing in our nineteenth century world as second sight. There is only one preacher in all England who professes to see as far as the Millennium, and onward, from that stage, to “the crack of doom.” It is simply absurd, therefore, for men to go howling to their gods that they are not seers or soothsayers—that they cannot look through brick walls—that they may not lift the veil which mercifully hides the future from their perplexed eyes. Men who do this we take to be in process of rapid graduation as spirit-rappers or table-turners. Soft crawling creatures may mourn that they have not legs; and ridiculous long-eared quadrupeds may hee-haw lamentingly that they have not been gifted with wings; but we expect men to be pleased and proud that they are men, and not to fret themselves to death that they are not higher spiritual intelligences.

We pray our readers, then, not to expect from us an explanation of what the age means, even in so simple a matter as the multiplication of cheap periodicals. Do the age justice, good Sir Oracle! and you will find it a well-meaning age enough. But, Heaven forfend that we should put ourselves forward as its special interpreters. The fact of cheap periodicalism having recently burst its flood-gates, and spread itself over an incomparably wider area, suffices for our present purpose. Turn wheresoever we will, that fact confronts us in strange varieties of shape. It is blazoned, pictorially and otherwise, in innumerable shop windows all up and down the kingdom—often in multifarious combination with toys, tapes, and lollypops. We see it on purple-faced cab-stands and the benches of bow-backed porters. Its white and black insignia gleam through under-arc iron stanchions. From the pockets of precocious juveniles it peeps, the holiday copper being gone. Whether we understand the said fact or not, there it is, broadly and unmistakably visible. It demonstrates itself in the lighting of innumerable pipes, and the prophecies of infatuated wittlings that it will all end in smoke. Our poor nervous Sir Oracle, indeed, talks as if this growth of periodicalism was like the growth of a parasitical plant, insidiously clasping, enveloping, concealing, and killing that noble old English literature which is greater in depth of root and magnificence of foliage than the utmost Hellenic grandeur. But the quickness of vitality and extreme tropical luxuriance, so noticeable in that direction, is, after all, no special and exceptional development. If we have too many cheap periodicals, have we not, also, too many books, cheap as well as dear? Then, again, do even books increase at a greater ratio than other products of human industry—such, for example, as are exhibited, from decade to decade, under metropolitan acres of crystal ceiling? If any churlish mercantile man, with no margin of soul beyond his “red-lined accounts,” asserts that “we have already too many periodicals,” we picture him at this moment sitting, Marius-like, among piles of his own unsold goods, and ask him, deferentially of course, if we have not too many power-looms? Oh ye who are so deeply in the dark as to see no stars, the very blind walls of our great cities should give you eyes! Lo! there—placarded in every eye-catching variety of ink, how everything is selling off at “immense sacrifices,” as if everything existed in excess—the supply far outrunning the demand! Be honest, lawyer! and say whether we have not too many of your craft? The dentists we know to be knocking out each other's teeth in the fierceness of their competition. Advertise for a man-servant to be a lay-figure for your livery, or for an all-accomplished reduced gentlewoman to make your squalling nursery sedate, scientific, clean-nosed, and polyglot, and ten to one but the postman will, before many hours are over, dilapidate both your bell-handle and your nerves. It would almost seem that Dr. Malthus was right when he fell into gloomy arithmetical prophecies concerning the existence of too many mouths—mouths, alas! some of them at least, with more poor breath for clamour than fresh and wholesome food for mastication.

There is perhaps no department of human labour or enterprise in which the terrible activity of the age takes, on the whole, more wholesome shape than in that of cheap periodicalism. It does something to prevent the progress of our civilization from becoming degradingly gross and material. Even admitting that much of the literature thus provided is not of the most exalted kind, it is yet better than no literature.

"Angelina, or the Blighted One," may be a very ramby-ramby and trashy tale; but better take an interest in the life, love, moonshine, and impossible fortunes of that model heroine, than be wholly engrossed with ourselves. Look even at the thrilling illustrative wood-cuts;—the unhappy Angelina, for example, with hair of the thrown-back head in the grasp of that grim-visaged ruffian; or, with limp figure pendent over the black, yawning gulf, the while the strong rescuing arm of Orlando the Brave—the hero of "her ev-er-y dream"—is like a vice about her poor panting waist! Is there no stimulus to the chivalrous pulses in such crises of distressed maidenhood? The tendency of all literature, even the humblest, is to take people out of their narrow and enslaving routine of life; to open up to them new spheres of thought; and to render them less groveling and selfish, through the wider expansion of their sympathies. No doubt there is some writing afloat the effect of which may be to render the unwary other instead of better than what they are. This has probably arisen from the temptation furnished by our now untaxed press to write down to the tastes and capacities of the multitude, whose pence are as good as the shillings of those who demand change back. Hence, we apprehend, the too great prevalence of that red-light and blue-fire description of fiction to which the epithet "sensational" has been attached. Mean what it may, indeed, we take the age to be much too sensational—not only in its literary, but in its scientific, industrial, and even fashionable developments. But lo! as regards literature, a new thing has happened under the sun. Periodical circulations—or, to speak more accurately, the circulations of periodicals—have mounted up, in some instances, to hundreds of thousands. This has made quarter-farthings of profit result in golden aggregates of recompense. The cheap has been found, in short, to be more remunerative than the dear. It has long been so in calicoes, and it is now proved to be so in periodicals, and even in books. The consequence is that some of our proud peers of literature have been tempted down to the humbler periodical levels, and into the sixpenny and shilling classics. Now, it is of the supreme essence of really great minds to be incapable of wholly shaking off their greatness. Alfred in the peasant's cottage was still a king. How the blood of Douglas gleamed through the peasant's garb! The magnates of the new and wider arena have accordingly brought with them something of their elevated tone and state, and imparted an unwonted dignity, importance, and glory to the cheap periodical press of this kingdom.

Well, then, the question arises—Will this multiplication of cheap periodicals go on; and where will it end? That it will go on is certain; and that it will result in the improvement of literature is, we think, probable. Independently of the wider fields of intellect which it will irrigate, and the new growths of genius which it may nourish, it is not unlikely that it may operate ultimately as a check on the publication of worthless books. Hasty and frivolous writing, and superficial and desultory reading, it may—and no doubt does—in the meantime, produce. So long as instances occur of vanity overmastering judgment, there will be no lack of literature for the trunk-makers—those immemorial sextons of defunct epics and sermons—those devout closers down of the mute, everlasting lids of oblivion on vain and vision-haunted names. In proportion, however, as the cheap periodical press becomes the medium of high authorship, the more, perhaps, will the entrances to it become guarded against base intrusion. To authors—and, above all, to young authors—the gain must be considerable. A book is a serious venture—apt to transform a dream of fame into a deep humiliation and a heavy loss; but periodicalism provides a vast, and, so to speak, ready-made audience, and makes the reward certain and immediate of him who addresses it with power and effect. If it be contended that the applause of the moment will be apt to induce ephemeral composition, we answer that ears attuned for the celestial harmonies will never be content with less than the longer reverberations awakened by immortal achievement. Writers rightly great can never lose their great impulses. Not for transient shoutings are their deeper and grander ambitions stirred. If such brilliant men as Leigh Hunt and the late Professor Wilson of Edinburgh suffered themselves to be engrossed by periodicalism, we fear it was because it afforded them best scope for their bright and sparkling fancies; and because, with all their genius, they were unfitted for any opus magnum endued with a vitality for all time. Hunt is happiest in his brief occasional poems and papers. His "Story of Rimini" is fine, but its merit is not that of greatness. Then, with regard to Wilson, how much more fascinating is he in his "Sporting Jacket" than in his mawkish "Trials of Margaret Lindsay," or his ghastly "City of the Plague"! The nearest approach which the latter made to a great work was in his famous "Noctes." But its publication in the pages of a magazine did it no harm; it did not prevent it from being gathered into volumes afterwards; nor would its first piecemeal form of issue have prevented it from taking permanent shape into volumes had it been more truly dramatic—had it been less the outpouring, under slender disguises, of the one exuberant soul—had it, in short, been better fitted, as a work of creative genius, to live. Any writer, provided he can bear the expense, or get up a sufficient subscription list, may publish his effusions in a book; but their periodical publication—with responsible editorial staff to satisfy in the first instance—affords a tolerable guarantee of merit. Their subsequent issue in the book form implies some measure of public acceptance and approval; and thus the demands of the hour are satisfied, not merely without detriment, but with positive advantage to their claims as enduring performances. In the office, indeed, which periodicalism must more and more assume, of guarding the gateways of literature, rescuing genius from early struggle and disappointment, and imposing a wholesome restraint on conceit, assumption, and mistake, we recognise its ennoblement and its salvation. Already some of our best writers are seeking immediate audience through magazines, and even through humbler periodical sheets; but, while enjoying the weighty authority and influence thus furnished, we deny that they are forfeiting their high claim to illustrate the genius of their age, and make good their footing among the immortals.

Holding these views, we can contemplate without alarm—without even anxiety—the present and increasing multiplicity of cheap periodicals. The appearance of this work is an evidence that we hesitate not to add to their number. We enter upon our task with good heart, with some literary experience, and not without able and brilliant coadjutors. Numerous as are the periodicals already in existence, it is presumable that scores of new ones will yet be started, and that of these some will live to be a light and an enjoyment in many homes. We desire that our Miscellany may take rank among the more-favoured and fortunate of its class—although not without an oppressive consciousness of how much this must depend upon ourselves. That the age has any particular or far-thoughted purpose to serve through our own humble labours, in this department, we are not now, alas! so young as to suppose. Independently of us, or of any man, the age will hold steadily on its course. We are but as shells upon the sea-shore in front of the advancing tide. The ebb or the flow of that tide we cannot influence; but the least of us may give an added lustre to its wave. Let it not grudge to us, then, its passing murmur of applause, in so far as we deserve well; nor yet its casual moan of lamentation should we be doomed early to disappear.

THE HAREBELL.

[Selected from the unpublished MSS. of the late DAVID GRAY,
Author of "The Luggie".]

BENEATH a hedge of thorn, and near Where Bothin steals through light and shadow,
I saw its bell, so blue and clear—
That little beauty of the meadow.

It was a modest, tender flower—
So clearly blue, so sweetly tender;
No simpler offspring of the shower
And sunshine may July engender.

The 'azure harebell,' Shakspeare says—
And such a half-transparent azure—
Was never seen in country ways
By poet in creative leisure.

But chiefly the beloved song—
The patriot ballad, fresh and olden—
The 'Scottish Blue Bells,' rose among
Some other memories, pure and golden.

And chiming o'er one verse of power,
While in the chalice fondly peering,
A teardrop fell upon the flower—
My blessing earnest and endearing.

The prize was mine!—but no, ah! no—
To spare it was a poet's duty;
So in that spot I let it blow,
And left it in its lonely beauty.

PERPLEXITIES OF A PARVENU.

WITH A FEW AUTHENTIC ANECDOTES.

If the "gentle" reader will please to imagine that I am a "vulgar" person—lately lifted into a position of affluence and influence through the unexpected bequest of a distant kinsman—he will perhaps be able to understand some of the perplexities which distress me; and will sympathise with the troubles of an individual really anxious to discriminate between right and wrong, and to ascertain the exact meaning of words which, though in daily use, seem to be constantly misapplied and miscomprehended. Perhaps I ought to have said I was a vulgar person six months ago; for more recently I have been assured by several of my friends that I only need a little more self-assertion to pass for "a perfect gentleman." I am not so sure on this point myself.

You must know that when I belonged to the working classes I was in the cabinet and upholstery line, and, though I say it that shouldn't, was as good a judge of a bit of wood as any lad in the trade. My master owned as much over and over again. Now, to make a "perfect" piece of goods, you want something more, I can tell you, than thin slices of veneer and French polish. In the first place, the timber must be sound throughout—no worm at the core or dry-rot existing; then, it must have been seasoned by many sorts of weather trials, and come out only the closer and firmer for them. And now, if you find that it is beautifully grained, set to work with a will, and shape your block with delicate carvings; and polish it up, if you like, to mirror-like brightness; finally, you will have what people call a "perfect" piece of work, fit for the Queen's palace.

But counterfeits are being turned out of hand every hour in the day; veneers that blister and curl off in the sunshine, notwithstanding the radiance of their polish; and rotten or unseasoned wood that is not worth the varnish which is bestowed upon it. Better the plain deal that the kitchen-maid scrubs clean every morning. I apply my trade experience to the examination of human nature, and have come to the conclusion that "a perfect gentleman" is not easily made. I do know one, though—the young M.A. who reads with me, and explains history, geography, and grammar to me for two hours every morning, though the more I learn the more ashamed I feel. He does not flatter me about becoming "a perfect gentleman," just because his lips could not shape themselves to the utterance of a falsehood, and he sees into my heart just as if there were a glass window to it. I told him so one day; and he said something about the power of sympathy, and that circumstances had made the difference of seeming between us—that was all. It was the executor to my great uncle's will who recommended my tutor to me, and called him a Christian philosopher. I rather like the phrase, and am beginning to understand the meaning of it. What distresses me about my tutor is that he is poor. I know it, though he never told me so; but I understand all about poverty, and have my little faculty of "clear seeing" on that point. Now, if I were the "perfect gentleman" they make out, I should know at once how to help my friend; but I do not. He wrote to me "My dear friend," the other day; so, perhaps, I may dare to call him so. I feel myself blush when I order up luncheon in the middle of the lesson—having breakfasted slightly on purpose to be ready for a hot outlet—and could not press a third glass of wine on him for the world. How, then, could I offer his money? Clearly I do not know the right way to do it. Only one resource for me that I see. There is a Church-living in my gift, and the present incumbent is nearly eighty. I know where my heart of oak, beautifully polished—my Christian philosopher—would be in the right place.

The other night I was invited to a very grand party. I should not have had the courage to go if my tutor had not promised to be there and to stand by me. There were numbers of beautiful and elegant ladies, several of them very kind and condescending to me; and, of course, the gentlemen were very stylish and stately. One of them, handsome and young, who seemed a great favourite—in fact, evidently a popular person—had the title of "Honourable" affixed to his name; but I happened to know that of him which stamped him as dishonourable in my eyes; and, when somebody asked me if I would like to be introduced to him, I said abruptly—"No, thank you; I'd rather not." This was very rude of me, I know—just a proof that I am not a gentleman yet; but I really could not help it.

The fact is, this "Honourable" personage is neither more nor less than a cruel man. He once had a horse—a noble animal, famous for its magacity, docility, and speed. The beautiful dumb creature lent all its great gifts freely to its master; but the more it yielded the more was required from it, till at last the impossible was demanded, & the feat possible only at the life-price. The brutal owner laid a wicked wager that he would ride his horse twenty miles side by side with an express train. The merchant won his wager; and the nobler animal died two hours afterwards in intolerable agony. I insist upon it that this man cannot be a gentleman—no, not if the blood of twenty generations of kings coursed in his veins.

By way of contrast to this savage action, let me tell a little story about a very humble individual whom nobody ever dreamed of calling a gentleman.

Our beloved Queen's coronation was a very important event to a certain ragged little boy then twelve years old. He was the child of indigent parents—belonging to the very substratum of the social pyramid, as my tutor would say—and was glad to be employed as a donkey-driver in Hyde Park, when all the world was holiday-making and rejoicing. Such a run was there for donkey-riding among the little short-frocked and small-trousered people of that day, that young Tom Williams earned between three and four pounds in the course of that festive week—a sum appearing to the poor boy nearly inexhaustible, but which would have quickly melted in the grasp of his only remaining parent: as, in fact, it did, all but thirty shillings, which the child contrived to hold fast as the nucleus of his future fortune. With this sum he purchased a donkey, and started in life on his own account. With the exception of a sad term in an hospital, in consequence of a fever, aggravated by exposure and hard living, Tom, from that day to this, has never been indebted to any one for his living; he has had his ups and downs—his "losses," like other people of consideration; but at present, I am happy to say, he is well to do—has savings for a rainy day, and a wife and two children whom, in a neat little house, he supports with comfort. In fact, though only a "donkey-driver" in a suburban neighbourhood, his occupation is on rather a superior scale. I have known Tom intimately for many years, and can conceive how he has risen in popular estimation. I remember how the drivers of flies used to look at the poor little man, and almost insult any lady who could degrade herself by riding in a donkey-chair. I recollect, also, when he wooed and won a respectable servant, how ineffably shocked the smart housemaids of the district were to think of a "girl like that" demeaning herself by marrying "a donkey-man." But the happy couple seem to have lived down that sort of contempt; the wife receives an occasional visitor to tea; has her old mother for a guest for a month at a time; and Tom is more often called Mr. Williams than spoken of more familiarly.

But one of the bright and noticeable points in Tom Williams' character is the humanity he shows to his animals. There is no mistake on this subject; you can judge for yourself by the evident love they bear him. In fact, you must be acquainted with his donkeys to know the docility and capabilities of these much-abused creatures. His donkeys, instead of being exposed to the severities by which hundreds of these poor brutes perish every winter, are stabled and groomed by Williams' own hands. No matter how tired he may be—and he often walks twenty miles a day—he attends to their needs before resting himself. Every morning he washes out the well-paved stable, and has it rubbed dry; every night the poor beasts are indulged with a clean straw bed "up to their knees."

Now, as may be imagined, Tom Williams' patronesses—for he has little or nothing to do with the sterner sex—belong chiefly to the class of genteel people of small means; invalid ladies, many of them, who feel they can afford the airing which costs but a shilling an hour, but would turn over half-a-crown in their purse several times before expending it on a fly. This class of ladies indulge in the temperate excitement and sober festivities of friendly tea-parties—festivities which usually terminate at nine or ten o'clock; and it is no unusual thing for Tom Williams' donkey-chair, hood up and German window closed, to be engaged on these occasions. In fact, Tom begins his day by calling on his lady patronesses for orders, then making his arrangements accordingly; for Tom has an assistant, who plagues him much and cannot lead or drive the animals, as Tom himself does, by a tone of the voice or the touch of his bare hand, and who is never a favourite with the ladies; accordingly, it is considered a sort of obligation when Mr. Williams promises to "go himself"—a favour he usually accords to those who are first on his list.

But, lately, a scene of alarming dissipation must have taken place. Whether it was the occasion of a wedding, or christening, or birth-day party, I do not know; but an elderly lady absolutely ordered the donkey-chair to take her home at the midnight hour! It was a bleak November night; but Tom being prudent and thrifty, and always ready to earn an honest penny, roused himself from heavy slumber about half-past eleven o'clock, and prepared to get his carriage in order to fetch the lady. Lanthorn in hand, he proceeded to the stable, where reclined in peaceful slumber a donkey and a mule. The straw that had been "up to their knees" now rose shelteringly above their heads, and Tom Williams paused from indecision which beast to arouse. Each had done his fair day's work, and received his fair day's wage of food and shelter; and both were snoozing so cosily and comfortably, that they were not aroused by their master's presence. Donkey had, perhaps, done a little the more work that day; but mule was arranged on his couch in a peculiar and favourite attitude, of the comic order, that always made Tom laugh to contemplate. Could it be that the cunning creatures knew the softness of his heart, and feigned deep sleep in this pathetic manner? If it was a pretence, it answered perfectly, for Williams had not the heart to disturb them; and, treading gently, he left the two creatures to darkness and repose.

But did he disappoint the dissipated patroness? By no means.

Once Tom Williams had been distressed by a case of conscience, which I must describe. He loves, as I have said, to earn an honest penny; but he loves still more his sacred Sabbath, and its devotional services—joining in the psalm-singing with such loud earnestness that he once received a hint from the clerical authorities to be more gently musical. The case of conscience was this:—An infirm lady wished to be taken to church every Sunday in the donkey-chair. The temptation to earn the honest penny was considerable; but Tom resisted it, on the plea that it was a sin to make his animals toil on that day. The lady argued—Surely it was a work of necessity? Tom pondered the question, and hit upon an expedient that satisfied both parties. He bought a handle for his donkey-chair, and made the shafts to be removable; so, every Sunday, he drags the old lady to church himself, and when she has alighted he enters the sacred edifice, and performs his morning devotions, leaving the chair at the church porch. Now, on the cold winter evening when he had not the heart to disturb a sleeping mule or donkey—in his own words, “couldn’t abear to do it”—he put the handle to the chair, and making of himself a draught animal, drew the lady to her home, a distance of a mile and a-half, up and down hill.

Now, Tom Williams never was and never will be a gentleman; and yet, I maintain that there is a beautiful vein of “gentleness” in his heart, which purifies and ennobles his whole nature. There is not an inch of veneer or a particle of polish about the man; but the native wood—is not that fine? Just remember the poor donkey-boy and donkey-man, who has never begged or owed what he could not pay; whose devotions were, till checked, too boisterous; to whom, I should add, music is the dream of heaven; and who could not “abear” to awaken for fresh labour a tired donkey. And then contrast the fine dandy, with “Honourable” before his name, who rode his noble horse to a cruel death. I see—I cannot help seeing—something hideous beneath the showy veneer and French polish; something black and rotten that has an evil odour about it, and that is dangerous to touch or use.

I often think of such things and get puzzled about the use of words; for the more my tutor explains to me the derivation and right meaning of them, the more I perceive how words have got twisted out of their true sense. I think if people tried to twist them right again there would be some good done.

I know another instance of “gentleness” in a poor, illiterate, and altogether very humble person. A certain fishmonger—not a tradesman who would be selected to supply costly turbot or delicate mullet for a State dinner, but a perpetually individual, who, day after day, whatever the season or whatever the contents of his basket, invites purchasers by the cry of “Live soles!” Not that he intends to deceive you if he has no soles; but he considers that phrase the generic term for whatever finny produce he may have to sell. Five years ago he had a rival who did more than sell fish by day—he cried “Sprats!” on winter nights. Sprat-seller shall be called B., the other fish-seller A.

B. died of consumption—from catching cold on wet winter nights, it was said—leaving a widow to struggle on, with four young children, as best she might. Widow sought and gained scanty out-door parish relief, and the little boys earned odd pence in many curious ways. Old customers declared they would still buy fish if the widow would sell it. Widow was quite equal to hawking fish about the little suburban place in which she dwelt; but Widow could not trudge five miles to Billingsgate market to buy fish, as her husband had done, and also look after her little home and children. Hearing of which promised patronage, A. volunteers to drive Widow B. to Billingsgate every morning on which she desires to buy fish. A. must take the cart up for his own purposes—not his cart, by the way, but a cart shared with a greengrocer and others in a very unimportant way—and he can give the widow a seat quite easily. A. has a wife and some little ones of his own; and hopes, if he should be taken away, friends will rise up for them. So Widow B. sometimes sells fish, and often does charring. Parish allowance is stopped now—one boy being dead, and the others gone out to service; and though one or other is often on her hands, she manages to keep out of the workhouse.

Fishmonger A. driving his rival to market—who could not be his rival without his aid—is a pleasant picture to me, and contrasts curiously with some of the sharp-dealing and overreaching, the hard selfishness and cruel cunning, which are too often exercised in high places, and among those who are called gentlemen.

I believe that “whatever is, is right;” and that, when we come to see the right side of the tapestry at which we are all working—it often seems so confusedly—we shall perceive how beautiful is the Almighty plan and purpose. Obviously it is part of that plan and purpose that mean souls should sometimes be in high places, and great souls be of lowly estate; and this reflection reminds me of an anecdote a little illustrative of what I mean. When Mendelssohn the philosopher—grandfather of musical Mendelssohn—was a youth, he was clerk or some sort of servant to a very rich but exceedingly commonplace, in fact stupid, employer. An acquaintance commiserated the clever lad on his position, saying—“What a pity it is that you are not the master, and he your clerk!”

“Oh, my friend!” returned Mendelssohn, “do not say that; if he were my clerk, what on earth could I do with him?”

Not respectful language, I admit; but, perhaps, under the circumstances, to be pardoned.

I perceive there may be a curious difference between noble-men or gentle-men written as one word, or divided into adjective and noun; and, perhaps, I had better give up troubling myself about the derivation of words. Perhaps it is that I am incapable of high polish, and that the rough edges of my character are apt to catch in silken sophistries, and fray and fret without being able quite to unravel them. At one conclusion, however, I have certainly arrived, and that is that the “gentle churl” is something better than the “churlish gentleman.”

Then, again, I said a little while ago “when I belonged to the working classes;” but it seems to me there is no fair way of getting out of that community. All one can do is to get out of one class into another—higher or lower as the case may be; but an honest man will always find plenty of work, and hard work too, laid ready for his hand somewhere on this fair earth, and waiting and asking, as it were, to be done. There is a sort of work that makes the check pale, instead of the hand horny; a stern, steady fighting with invisible legions of evil, the wages of which are not paid weekly in current coin, nor is the promotion obtained always evident to men's senses here below. Taking the phrase in the comprehensive sense, the social fabric is certainly held together by—and, I humbly believe, for—the Working Classes; and I for one mean to stick by my order. Whether tutors and tailors will succeed in making me “a gentleman,” I am not quite clear; and, indeed, the case is not very promising, for I shocked a lady the other day by telling her that I hoped always to belong to some one or other of the Working Classes! C. C.

OUR LITTLE MAID.

Our little maid was a girlish thing

With red, ripe lips, and a soft, dark eye;
A smile or a frown was enough to bring
Sunshine or showers to her April sky.

And oh! 'twas amusing the court that was paid
To the childish charms of our little maid.

Our little maid had one true love—

Charlie the cooper, with lint-white hair;
And so short, that he scarce could be seen above
The stiff, straight back of her kitchen chair.

But to measure his girth was a difficult task:
He was strong, firm, and round, like a porter cask!

Charlie the cooper was brave and true;

His faults, like his stature, were wonderfu' wee;
But his great, warm heart was as big, we knew,
As his breadth—and that was a sight to see!
They had courted since Charlie in petticoats play'd
On the same door-step with our little maid.

That Charlie loved her, we could not doubt—

He was fain at her slightest beck to run;
While she flirted with all who came hanging about,
Then told the poor cooper “’Twas only for fun,
It was welcome to leave her if he was afraid.”
A petulant gipsy was our little maid.

The cooper was fond, but the cooper was wise;

He would try the effects of a voyage to sea.
The little one wept till her big, black eyes
Were swollen and red; and she wou'd that he
Such cruel desertion would live to regret,
For she'd marry the very first man that she met!

He left her. But oh! how his great heart burn'd!

He “knew she would miss him—his poor, little pot.”
No sooner was Charlie's broad back turn'd
Than she came, so demurely, to ask—“Might she get
To visit her mother?” That night she was late;
And she came on the arm of a tall Yankee mate!

Next day she was merry as maid could be—

She laugh'd and she sang till evening came;
When—just like a dandy invited to tea—
Up walk'd the Yankee! his breast aflame
With glowing studs! and his finger-ring
For glitter and weight was a wonderful thing!

He stalk'd to the kitchen, and sat himself down

On the chair where poor Charlie had squatted so oft;
But his back was so long that his big, black crown
Seem'd quite out of place as it tower'd up aloft:
The Yankee was taller—who sat on his seat—
Than our little maid when she stood on her feet!

That night, we boys had capital fun

Watching the Yankee. I guess that he Did not get much of his courting done;
For some of us still peep'd in to see
The studs! and the ring! and the great watch-chain!
And we hoped he would come very often again.

Our little maid had got into a scrape.

Her mistress was angry, and lectured her well.
The poor baby-face was in every shape;
But she promised amendment. “The great Yankee swell!
He was just like a lamp-post—so long and so slim;
Poor Charlie was worth half-a-dozen like him.”

Our little maid got a present that night—

A parcel tied neatly with tarry twine!
’Twas a great, yellow shawl, so glaring and bright;
Each corner relieved by a crimson plin!
It happ'd her all over, with lots to spare—
Like a gay table-cover spread out on a chair!

Next came a beautiful gilded brooch,

With a crystal stone like the Koh-i-noor!
Her master thought it was quite too much;
So he happen'd to meet him outside of the door,
Where he gave this tall Yankee a bit of his mind;
Who turn'd on his heel, and—just went in behind!

We reason'd with her; it was all in vain.

We spoke of poor Charlie; she hung her head.
Long Yankee Doodle had turn'd her brain
By his gorgeous presents of yellow and red.
The balance still waver'd; when in he threw
A beautiful bonnet of brilliant blue!

The poor little maid could not marry them both.

When she thought of the cooper, she sobb'd and sigh'd.
But the Yankee swore a terrible oath,
That the very next night he would make her his bride;
And told the poor child to prepare for her fitting—
He should have said, “Wind and weather permitting!”

But wind and weather did no such thing.

They had made little Charlie's ship their sport,
Till the people on board were fain to bring
Their vessel, dismasted, back to port;
And, first on shore, poor Charlie paid
A joyful visit to our little maid.

Our little maid was deak'd so gay,

With shawl of yellow and bonnet of blue,
When we saw the wee cooper come over the way;
And, what do you think did the gipsy do?
She ran to meet him in all her charms,
And threw herself, bodily, into his arms!

Poor Charlie sat down in his stiff-back'd chair,

And heard the whole tale, from beginning to end;
Ten minutes would bring the tall Yankee there,
Then—“What would become of her? Who would defend
Her dear little Charlie?” But Charlie said—“Whew!
I've only to double the fellow in two!

Then Yankees are nothing but bluster and boah!

So, poor little foolish one, don't be afraid.”
Then, clapping his hands—“I have it, by goah!
The way for to tickle the Yankee's beard,
And turn his complexion from yellow to blue,
Is—for us to get married without more ado!

So, off wi' them gewgaws, and let us be gone!”

But the poor little maiden look'd into her glass;
She was vain of her dress; and “The things she had on Became her so much.” “Very well, let it pass,”
Said magnanimous Charlie; “we won't have no strife:
I'm obleeged to the Yankee for dressing my wife!”

They let themselves quietly out by the back,

Just as the Yankee drove up to the gate!
He was dress'd—oh, so gay! and the cabman's back
Had white gloves on its ears! But “the gallant came late;”
And he look'd rather blackish, as Charlie had said,
When he found he was jilted by our little maid!

J. P. H.

THE SCOTTISH PULPIT.

BY PROFESSOR BLACKIE.

Nobody denies that we Caledonians are famous preachers. No doubt it may please Mr. Buckle—molliter ossa quiescant!—and certain wittings of a lighter sort, to sneer at Calvinism, and to find its genesis, not in the God-stirred heart of the ancient Hebrews, but in the frowning cliffs of Glencoe, and the broad, brown, treeless heights of Uamvar. But John Knox and Edward Irving and Thomas Chalmers are Scots who can afford to be sneered at—just as any pert or petulant tourist, sent into the sulks by a rainy day and a cloudy sky, might sneer at Ben-Lomond, or Ben-Ledi, or Ben-Voirlich, or any other reputable Ben from Campbeltown to Cape Wrath. For, whatever may be said against Calvinism, it is quite certain that Thomas Guthrie is one of the lions of Edinburgh now, just as prominently as Chalmers was of Glasgow in the days of the astronomical discourses, and Irving of London in the days of the famous orations. That Scotchmen are great preachers may be therefore assumed as an intellectual fact, as notable as that no Scotchman has ever been a great tragic actor or has ever written a great epic poem. On this notable fact we propose making a few practical observations.

In what does the great excellence of Scottish preaching consist? Chiefly, we imagine, in one thing—in its thorough earnestness. There has been a considerable amount of cant lately vented about earnest men, both in prose and verse; but, after all, earnestness is the grand quality of mind by which all great things are done in this world; and as to talking, who cares much for any sort of talk that is evidently only half meant, or, like the talk of diplomatists, meant only in the contrary sense to what appears? The first charm of all talk is earnestness, the second is playfulness. Between these two qualities there is no contradiction; the second, to be efficient, always supposes a deep substratum of the first. In the pulpit, of course, there is no room for sport—there, to be in earnest is the one thing needful; and a careless, sleepy, and indifferent manner is the unpardonable offence. The old Latin adage—Si vis me flere, &c., If you wish me to weep, first show your own tears—finds its application nowhere so strongly as in the pulpit. Mr. Buckle, in the curious and amusing notes to his second volume, has a story about a certain Reverend Mr. Thomson, whose sermons used to last commonly for two hours; and in whose praise it was said, by one of his admiring auditors,—“Our minister has an awfu' pour o' water; for he grat, and he swat, and he spat, quite extraordinar!” Such an exhibition, no doubt, would be grossly offensive to persons of refined taste, and they might prefer an extremely “dry” discourse to humoral eloquence of this description. But, in such matters, sound philosophy is not exactly at one with refined taste. It is better to be affected with the briny secretion a little too potently, than to talk, on the most important of all subjects, with dry eyes and a weak accentuation.

Dr. Guthrie is strong in tears. With all his broad, rough manhood, he has a most womanly heart; and he who has not something of this will never be either poet or preacher with any remarkable result. But the Scotch preacher does not exhibit his earnestness always, or for the most part, in this pathetic way. He deals rather in the stern, emphatic decision, and the direct, glowing attack, than in the tender, tear-mov-ing appeal. You see plainly he is no sentimentalist. There is no tricking-out or dressing-up of dainty sensibilities. He brings you directly into contact—in a very decisive military sort of fashion—with the Divine decrees. He makes you understand very shortly and concisely that they are an immovable sort of thing, that will not bend either this way or that way to favour your fancies or to amuse your feelings.

“Desine fata Deum flecti sperare precando.”

You may think it severe, but there it is. The Divine law and the Divine will admit no questioning and tolerate no objection. Acknowledge them or be ruined. Unquestionably, this style of eloquence in the mouth of a fool—and there are, of course, fools enough in Geneva gowns as in other costumes—may often be very foolish; but that this tone is the proper and natural tone for the rhetoric of the pulpit is quite plain. All morality and all religion have necessarily an element of severe sternness in them, which not to receive is to deny the whole matter, and to turn worship into a mere piece of form, and human life into an insignificant sport. The Scottish preacher is not a mere spiritual man-milliner, with a pair of tongs to curl the locks of true believers, that they may look well before men and angels. He is a hard, determined fellow, with a hammer, or a lash, or, like Baillie Nicol Jarvie if need be, with a glowing red-hot poker in his hand; in any case, he is no trifler, no skin-deep dealer in superficial lotions and unctions. He will insist on your going vigorously to the root of the disease. You must believe before you can act. You must start on a right principle, or all your acting will be vain.

Another peculiar feature in Scottish pulpit eloquence is its naturalness, and freedom from academic, courtly, fashionable, or other conventionalities. Who ever heard Guthrie preach—when Guthrie was most like himself—and, if he had any soul for Nature, did not feel a salutary infection from the fresh, breezy movement of a soul utterly unencumbered with artificial proprieties? It is as if a cloud of fragrance from birchen trees and purple heather were suddenly sweeping across the nostrils of a man accustomed for months to the atmosphere of west-end saloons or Oxford congregations. Your genuine Scottish preacher—like stout John Knox—fears nothing and nobody. He will be altogether and decidedly himself—not straitened by any artificial training imposed on him by academic lecture-rooms or episcopal waiting-rooms. You may not be inclined to admit that he is a lion in any sense except the vulgar one—that is, a thing to be stared at and talked about; you may call him a cur; you may call him a bear; but you must admit that he carries a certain rough vigour with him which is intensely natural. He is a dog that can both bark and bite; or, to take another simile, you may say that he is dark and horrid, like his own mountain pine. You may much prefer your own smooth, English beech; but you cannot deny that he has a certain sturdy lustihood about him that inspires respect, and that he looks well on his native hills. You may lament very unfeignedly that he does not possess the profound Greek learning of Jowett, or the subtle and thoughtful originality of Robertson of Brighton; but still, in Auld Reekie, there is something about a Guthrie or a Chalmers—and even the close, iron logic of a Cunningham—that you like. These men are brimming over and bristling round with free nature—with free, Scotch nature; and that is exactly the sort of thing that one loves to find in Scotland;—just as the tourist does not come to Callander to see Richmond, but to see the Trossachs. The rough country may be rough enough for tender feet; but it is precisely this roughness which gives it not only its strength, but also that solid sort of beauty which is so different from the rich softness and the drooping gentleness of Petersham and Twickenham.

So much by way of praise. The good of a thing, indeed, is the soul by which it exists; and the man who does not start by seeing and acknowledging that, had better let the evil alone. The faults of nations, as of individuals, can never be understood without comprehending their virtues—our most prominent vices being, for the most part, only exaggerations, or misapplications, or despotic assertions of our virtues. Now, what are the main defects of Scottish pulpit eloquence? To our seeming they are principally four. We want grace; we want learning; we want pliability; and we want practicality. We want grace—that is, a certain gentleness and dignity in the midst of our force and earnestness. Dr. Guthrie is one of the very few famous Scottish preachers who has known to unite dignity and grace of manner with force and fervour. Irving also, we believe, had dignity; Chalmers certainly had not. To hear Chalmers was to run a steeple-chase, or to be dragged furiously in the career of a rattling battle-car, amid dust and breathlessness. The astronomical Doctor was too impetuous and too ardent to be graceful. A want of grace is the fault which most naturally flows from a superabundance of vigour; and it is a fault which, it must be confessed, our Scottish pulpit orators exhibit in great amplitude. What bellowing and braying, what thumping and beating, what wriggling and twisting, what writhing and wrenching, what wrestling and sweating, have we not witnessed in those who either were or wished to appear vigorous in the Geneva gown! Herein lies a great evil. Not only really vigorous men will often overbray and overbellow themselves, as if a certain amount of pulmonary noise were absolutely necessary for the exhibition of Calvinistic thunder; but small and weak men—of whom there is always a fair proportion—will mist on tramping about like very bulls of Baaham; and then the very little Skye terrier, with his repeated plunges after imaginary otters and water-rats, does appear ludicrous! It were seemly that men who have naturally no great weight of thought, or volume of language, should adapt themselves to a quiet style of utterance, which might compensate by delicacy and grace for what it wants in power. But the tyrannous fashion, which shapes sermons as well as crinolines, will not allow this; and the vigour which does not exist must be assumed, in order to please the views of critics, who are slow to discern the existence of quiet power, unless when accompanied with a certain amount of sounding external demonstration. Herein the Scottish preacher belongs to the same natural class as the popular demagogue; if he does not please merely by virtue of lusty lungs and much breath, he finds it very difficult to please without them. If St. Paul were to rise from the grave, and go about preaching, the Scotch people probably would listen to him eagerly; for, though he was dignified and gentlemanly in his manner, he was also full of fitful vehemence and overflowing passion. But if St. John or St. James were to appear in the same character, it is much to be feared that their Caledonian experience of audiences would be far from satisfactory. We should be apt to call the former very tame, and the latter extremely moderate.

Our second great fault as preachers arises from a want of learning. By learning, we mean all those materials of intellectual discourse that are derived from written records; that is, in other words, an accurate knowledge of the past history of man—political, intellectual, and moral. Such materials stand in the same relation to eloquence that the stones of the quarryman do to the architectural plan of the builder. And as the edifice will ever be poor for the erection of which the materials are few and of inferior quality, so the discourse will be comparatively meagre and ineffective for which the materials have been derived from a narrow or superficial survey of human history. No doubt the most important thing for all men to know, in the first place, is the living world before them and around them; and here the Scottish preacher, with his native sagacity and his appetite for the facts of tangible science, has often, with no external aids, proved himself fully a match for his more favoured competitors beyond the Tweed. But for a Christian divine, with all possible sagacity and general intelligence, it must ever be a great source of weakness not to have made a serious study of the history of human thought, and especially of the history of religious thought and religious life in the revolutions of the Christian Church. The acknowledged weakness of Scottish divines in this province deprives their utterances of all authority, whenever they venture beyond the narrow field of strictly Scottish Christianity, and quite modern Presbyterianism. One seldom or never hears from the Scottish pulpit any remark that indicates the slightest familiarity with the history of Christian thought and feeling during the first three centuries. Our native caution generally prevents us from blundering into regions of which we are entirely ignorant; but an intelligent Scotch hearer, after many a confessedly eloquent discourse, often feels a sad blank; and an intelligent foreigner will often be forced to the criticism—Well, all this is very fine, and rattled off in a grand thundering style; but the admirable preacher seems to know nothing of Christianity before John Knox, and nothing after him! In a word, your Scottish Boanerges is often a very eloquent Presbyterian, but a very ignorant Christian.

Closely connected with our want of learning—indeed, resulting out of it, as an effect from a cause, though not the only cause—is our want of pliability. We are too rigid and unbending in our scheme of theological thought. The minds of our preachers, even the most famous, seem often formed in a mould the very reverse of the Book from which they preach. For of all books the Bible is the most various and the most many-sided. It is, in fact, not a book but a literature, not a volume but a library. But that many and significant sides and aspects of this wonderful Book are never looked at, much less comprehended, by our Scottish preachers, seems quite plain. They have never been taught the habit of wandering free and at large through these celestial gardens; but love rather to confine themselves to a certain small corner of it, where the trees are all clipped into obelisks or other odd figures, to please the artificial taste of some church-gardener. Or, to use another simile,—as Dryden accused Milton of having looked at Nature only through the spectacles of books, so we may justly accuse many a notable preacher of having looked at the Bible only through the spectacles of the "Confession of Faith." The evil of this is not only a certain narrow and conventional style of handling Christian truth, but the erection of a very effective barrier between the Church and men of original thought and independent character; for not only is the form of clerical thought stereotyped on a narrow model, but free and fresh spirits, who, with an ardent love for Christian truth and a noble spirit of apostleship, are unwilling to allow this model to come betwixt them and the Bible, are summarily ejected from the Scottish Church, and refused the brotherhood of our local Christianity. It is a difficult thing for any Church to maintain its position in an intelligent age, when with the one hand it does not promote learning, and with the other discourages that liberty of prophesying, which is as essential to the healthy state of any Christian Church as a certain liberty of the press is essential to a sound political constitution. The only result of such a suicidal policy must be to establish an irrational divorce between the intellect of the age and the faith of the age; and to make orthodoxy—which, to be of any value, should always be free—synonymous with slavish fear and stereotyped stupidity.

One other word we have done. Our Scottish pulpit discourses are often lamentably deficient in practicality. We have often listened patiently for an hour to a laboriously-detailed doctrinal exposition of truths having not the remotest relation to the actual experience or the actual need of the hearers; while at the end was knocked off, in a single minute, the so-called practical application of the discourse, which in truth is the only important matter. The great truths of religion are sufficiently familiar to most church-goers. The fundamental principles of human and Christian ethics are now part of the familiar intellectual inheritance of all educated persons. But how these truths are to be realised, and how these principles are to be worked out in the complex problems which modern society presents, and amid the sophistical juggleries which inborn selfishness in all classes, and under all disguises, is constantly playing off—herein lies the real difficult business of Christian preaching; and precisely herein do we find the most famous Scottish sermons oftentimes a great blank. We could mention some scores of texts, of the New Testament and the Old, full of practical wisdom and rich in social suggestiveness, which are never preached on—one would think, almost, because it is the fashion in Presbyterian pulpits not to be too moral, and not to be too practical. Because the Popish Church has, on various occasions, given too great prominence to certain ceremonial works enjoined by the priests, we therefore will fight shy of works altogether, and turn away from a "moral discourse" as something not a whit less essentially heathenish than the worship of the Virgin Mary! No doubt, a string of precepts without principles will be as vain as a set of well-cut wheels in machinery without steam or water to set them in motion; but the steam requires the wheels as much as the wheels require the steam. Our rising young preachers should make it their main business to address themselves to the moral problems and the moral struggles actually presented to thinking individuals by society at the present day; otherwise the constant general declaiming about so-called Evangelical doctrines will be apt to become as unproductive and as wearisome a mannerism as the "Moderate preaching" of the last century. A sermon should as much as possible be a piece of practical business, not a mere exhibition of pious talk.

MR. WALKER'S NARRATIVE.

A STRANGE STORY.

ON a calm evening, in the month of June, Frank Marshall and I got into a second-class carriage on the Great Northern Railway—off on our month's annual vacation. I was in the pen-wiper and desk-duster department of Somerset House; and Frank was in the habit of transporting his anatomy regularly every morning at eleven o'clock from his residence in Pimlico to his office in London Wall, and at a quarter-past three o'clock from his office in London Wall to his residence at Pimlico—a daily pilgrimage which he made for the purpose of burning incense at the shrine of appearances, and "practising with the gloves" at a breathing lay-figure—his office-boy. What business Frank did in his office, or out of it, no one could conjecture; nor could he have told himself, I believe, even if called before a jury of his countrymen to furnish the information, in order to balance their judgment in an important case. Frank's father, in his lifetime, had kept an office—the consequence of which was that on his death he left Frank quite independent of doing anything except amusing himself, which he accomplished to his own satisfaction, by the aforementioned pilgrimages between Pimlico and London Wall; and, in his spare time, trying all the new inventions for furthering the development of the muscles of the human body. We were en route for Scotland. Frank being a lineal descendant of Roderick Dhu, and an intense admirer of Sir Walter Scott, was anxious to visit the scenes made so famous by his brave ancestor and favourite author.

We thought we were going to have the carriage to ourselves; and, after we had fairly got started and out into the blue darkness, we proceeded to make ourselves comfortable, by taking off our boots and substituting slippers, drawing our caps over our ears, and lighting our pipes.

"Don't swear, old chap; it's not proper," said Frank, bending over to get a light at my pipe.

"What do you mean?" I asked, astonished. "I didn't swear."

"Come now, old boy; don't deny it. I heard you when you struck that Vesuvian—burned your fingers, I suppose. Vestas are better for pipes. Never mind."

"Halloo! there again."

Frank turned his head and I did the same—both of us becoming immediately sensible of the presence of a third party sitting at the other corner of the compartment. He was a tall, thin gentleman, wrapped in an Inverness cape, and with a small leather bag on his knee, which he was endeavouring to unlock—apparently a work of some difficulty, from the manner in which he was wrenching, turning, and bullying both the key and the bag. At last he succeeded in opening it; and, turning to us, begged pardon if his hasty temper had got the better of him.

Frank smiled, and asked him if he objected to smoking.

"Not in the least, my dear young gentlemen—not in the least. I suppose you are astonished at my appearance here. The fact is, I got in a quarter of an hour before the time, and fell asleep under the seat. I am a bit of a traveller, gentlemen, and suffered from sleeplessness very much in early youth—making up for it now. Never too late to mend, you know—as the saying is. I shall crawl in again presently. I only rose up to get my nightcap; and to inquire if you will be kind enough to favour me with a kick on arriving at Sheffield! Thank you; much obliged, I'm sure. On the crown of the head, please, with the heel of your boot, or on the nape of the neck with the toe; either will do!"

Frank had obligingly acceded to his request to favour him with a kick on the train's arrival at Sheffield.

He was a queer-looking man, with a long beard, a winter-apple bloom on his cheeks, and rather sparkling black eyes. He sat in our company half-an-hour, partaking of some brandy, and sniffing the smoke with manifest enjoyment. His heart warmed gradually, and after some general conversation, he said—"I'm an eccentric character, gentlemen; you'll have found that out by this time, no doubt. I've had a good deal of knocking about in my day. Would you like to hear my life?"

"By all means," we both said simultaneously. "If you will be good enough to relate it, we shall feel extremely interested and obliged."

After a few preliminary hems and haws, putting himself in a comfortable position, clearing his throat, &c. the strange gentleman went on as follows—only stopping now and then to take a sip of brandy, cough, and exclaim "Ah, dear; how strong!"

"My name, gentlemen, is Walker; and I am a native of Farnham, in Surrey. My mother died in giving me birth; and my father removed to London shortly after that melancholy event. Whether it was in the iron line, or the coal line, or the ham and beef line, or the muffin and crumpet line, that my father made his money, I am unprepared to state; certain it is, however, that he lost it in the tin-mine line, and left me, at the early age of four years, an orphan. Not that he carried his money about with him in a bag, and dropped it accidentally down the mine; but that he conceived a sudden and violent affection for a person of the name of Grabber, who prevailed upon him to embark his money in an undertaking which, to describe it mildly, turned out a bad speculation.

"My earliest recollections are associated, strange to say, with a blank wall and the bill-sticking line. Awakening to consciousness, I find myself in the act of flattening my nose against a window-pane, and riveting my gaze on the observation of a very tall and remarkably Spiky Young Man, who, with painful consciousness of the illegality of his actions, was affixing, on the dead wall opposite—and on the precise spot where was painted, in white letters, 'Bill-sticking prohibited'—a tri-coloured placard, commanding the British public, with no less than six inter-junctional dashes, to 'Buy their trousers at Skifter's!'

"I may mention here, that, at a tender age, I had the misfortune to fall a victim to occasional day-dreams or reveries, which day-dreams or reveries lasted indefinite periods of time, and were brought on principally by too earnest gazing at any particular object—the handle of a fork, a picture on the wall, &c. &c.

"I must have fallen into one of those day-dreams or reveries at this time; for I can remember wondering who Skifter was; where he got his trousers; if he were married or otherwise; if he had any brothers; if he were partial to toasted cheese; if the young man then engaged in affixing the placard was connected with him by any ties of consanguinity—a foster-brother, for instance (his, the Spiky Young Man's, mother having nursed Skifter in infancy); if Skifter had luxuriant, curly locks, or was bald-headed; and if he meditated bringing up his eldest son (always supposing he had such a relative) to the trouser business. These reflections were passing through my brain, when I was startled by observing that the Spiky Young Man had finished his job, and was performing a series of wild pas d'allégresse on the pavement, in which the ladder was brought into use as a valuable auxiliary; now circling and whirling round his head in the manner peculiar to the aborigines of North America; now laid on the pavement, forming, with the assistance of the flapping-stick, a correct representation of the principal article of worship in use at the present day amongst the members of the Roman Catholic Church; and serving as a centre round which the Spiky Young Man was skipping and leaping in the ancient Caledonian style (except that the ancient Caledonians generally preferred swords to ladders—as showing off, in bolder relief, the originality and daring of the achievement). This continued for about ten minutes, when suddenly the Spiky Young Man seemed to be smitten with the most intense remorse at the levity of his conduct; and, picking up his ladder and flapping-stick, put them against the wall, and burst into a passionate flood of anguish—standing over and allowing the tears to flow into a dish which he had with him, and stirring the contents about, first with his right and then with his left hand. (I may mention here, in deference to your wish for exactitude in my narration, that the contents of the dish or can seemed to be paste.) Naturally of a sympathetic temperament, I could not resist being moved to tears at the unhappy condition of the Spiky Young Man, and accordingly commenced sobbing bitterly, and drying my eyes with a plumber's apron, which was hanging at the back of a chair in the room. I had just wrung out the apron for the third time, and had cleared my eyes from the blinding sobs, when I was sensible that the Spiky Young Man had ceased weeping, and was seated on the top of his ladder (which was balanced on the pavement in a most extraordinary manner), and gazing at me with a sort of frenzied earnestness. I was no sooner conscious of this fact, than I felt irresistibly impelled to return the staring with a considerable deal more than double-compound interest—the consequence of which was that I immediately jumped into another train of reflections, in which I continued till I was brought to the ground by a tremendous blow on the back of the head; and, on looking up, saw the Spiky Young Man bending over me—his eyes starting in their sockets—the sweat standing in large beads on his forehead—and his teeth chattering like a baboon.

"'Halloo, vampire!' shouted out the Spiky Young Man; 'wot d'ye mean by larfin at me in that manner? Come.'

"After I had recovered my astonishment, I explained to the Spiky Young Man that, so far from indulging in any unbecoming levity, I had been moved to tears of sympathetic sorrow at his condition.

"The Spiky Young Man laughed incredulously.

"'Powder me blue!' he said. 'I saw you, unhappy boy! Deny it not. Name your reason for doing it. Quick—spit it out.'

"He seized me by the ears, and shook me—shook me till the roof spun round, the chairs and tables performed somersaults, myself and the Spiky Young Man stood on our heads on the roof, and saw Napoleon crossing the Alps tumbling head over heels, and threatening to fall upon and crush the three Apostles on the mantelpiece, who were plunging and diving about in a most unapostolic manner. Gradually and slowly the roof, the chairs and tables, the first Emperor of the French, the cream-coloured horse, the snow-covered Alps, and the three Apostles recovered their centre of gravity, and discovered the Spiky Young Man standing opposite me—his head inclined to one side, and a sad, melancholy expression in his eyes. 'Hear you, air,' he began, addressing me; 'what is the reason that you use me thus? I loved you ever;—but it is no matter—let Hercules himself do what he may, the cat will mew and dog will have his day.' I felt hurt at this unmerited reproach, and hinted to him, as gently as possible, that I might with a great deal more consistency put the query to him; as a little reflection would serve to convince him that, metaphorically speaking, the boot was on the other leg. I had no sooner made this candid confession, than suddenly the apartment became brilliantly illuminated with ten thousand electric lights—the Spiky Young Man had struck me a severe blow between the eyes. On recovering consciousness, I observed that he was standing back from me about a yard, with his hands clenched and his sleeves tucked up. A wild expression about his eyes made me fear that he meditated murdering me; and, under the influence of that supposition, I seized upon St. John the Apostle, and aimed straight at the Spiky Young Man's forehead. It was cast-iron, and struck with a hollow thud on his brow, bringing him with a leaden sound to the ground, where he lay senseless. The blood flowing in two distinct streams from his mouth, and forming a little puddle on the hearth, made me wonder whether the Spiky Young Man would ever again stick Skifter's bills on the walls in defiance of the police regulations, or indulge in wild revels on the pavement in the glimmering twilight."

At this stage of the narrative, Mr. Walker took another sip of brandy; and Frank, who had been listening breathlessly, took occasion to ask if Mr. Walker had a twin-brother, as he knew a Mr. Walker who bore a very great resemblance to him. He forgot his Christian name. It was peculiar, and Frank rather thought commenced with H., although not Henry or Harry. Mr. Walker, however, informed us that he was an only child, and consequently had neither brother nor sister—a circumstance which was not to be regretted, considering his father's unlucky connection with the party of the name of Grabber. Mr. Walker then cleared his throat, and went on as follows:—

"After having prostrated the Spiky Young Man, I must have wandered about the streets; for I can distinctly remember (my recollections from this point are distinct) finding myself in the neighbourhood of Tower-Hill, and, in a narrow passage, struck all of a heap by the apparition of a child of tender age hanging by the neck from a pole protruding from a cellar. This ghastly spectacle was nearly the means of throwing me into violent convulsions, and would assuredly have done so, had not a man passing at that moment illuminated the lamp on the opposite side of the way, and revealed to my astonished gaze that what I at first supposed to be a dead infant, black in the face from strangulation, was only a correct representation of a negro baby, dressed in a dirty calico shirt, a pipe in its mouth, one of its eyes knocked out, and its arms stretched frantically forth, as if in momentary expectation of being taken up in its mother's arms and kissed.

"'Halloo! young glowworm!' cried a voice from the cellar; and I felt myself grasped by the arm, dragged into darkness, and thrown on to something which crackled like a large packet of bones, and emitted a cloud of powdery dust, which, forcing itself into my nose, mouth, and ears, nearly choked me. After having been unconscious for about ten minutes, I looked round. I was in a large, low-roofed cellar, and surrounded by bales, empty barrels, ropes, pieces of old iron, rusty anchors and cables, tow, broken furniture, dusty old ledgers and day-books, and the skeleton of a small boat, keel upwards, on which a figure was crouching, holding a candle and peering at me in the face. He was a short man, dressed something like a sailor or river pilot, with small twinkling eyes, buried deep in a shrubbery of dark, bushy eyebrows,—a man with a low brow, large Roman nose, large under jaw, no space between the eyebrows worth talking about—a man with bushy, unkempt hair on his head, thick, stubby hair on his cheeks, chin, and upper lip, and extending far down his throat—a man with a huge cavern between his nose and chin, which mouthed out, showing a row of fangy teeth, 'So, young alligator! you've come after the place, have you?'

"'I'm not an alligator, and I've not come after the place; so let me go,' I answered, rising. I thought that possibly he had fallen into arrears with his rent, that his landlord was endeavouring to let the place over his head, and that he mistook me for a tenant in perspective, or hanging about the place in order to report its appearance to a tenant in perspective.

"He pushed me back on to the bale, and I had again to undergo strong symptoms of death by suffocation.

"'Sit down,' he resumed; 'don't be a young fool; nobody aint going to hurt you. Came after the place, and are frightened, and want to go back; I can see that.'

"I again strongly deprecated any intention of having come after the place; and even hinted that, judging from its appearance, I should be inclined to think that the rent could not be very much after all; that, although he was a little behind at the present time, there were a great many men in a much larger way of business in the same predicament as himself; and that either a personal interview with, or a well-worded epistle to, the landlord would have the effect, I doubted not, of inducing him to extend the time of grace a little.

"This conciliatory speech had only the effect of making him burst into a loud fit of laughter, in which the large red cavern, with the candle before it, was so painfully and horribly conspicuous, that I had to shut my eyes in positive horror, only to open them again on encountering the pale face of the Spiky Young Man staring at me, and pointing significantly at a coffin which was floating in the air beside him.

"'Ha, ha, ha!' laughed the man, till I thought that his jaws were going to part asunder. 'Ha, ha! you're a green young dolphin! and no mistake you are.' His jaws shut with a click, and his face suddenly assumed its usual grimness, as he said, holding his forefinger within an inch of my nose—'Here; look you here, young salamander! I want a boy, and you're just the sort of chap to suit me. I'm a griffinish-looking chap myself; but I won't be to you if you serve me well, which I've no doubt you will. What you've been up to I don't know, nor want to know; at all events, you're safe with me. Is it a bargain? Come.'

"I don't know what was the reason, but I certainly liked the griffinish-looking man better the more I regarded him. Visions of the Spiky Young Man rose up before me, followed to the grave by his mourning relatives; and myself before a jury of my countrymen on a charge of murder. I accepted the offer.

"I need not recount to you, gentlemen, my life with Calfalver (that was the griffinish-looking man's name) for ten years. We were in the old rope, rag, old iron, and bone line. During those ten years, the Spiky Young Man's face was not absent from me in imagination for one hour. I was a prey to the most intense remorse. I was a mur-derer! I had not the slightest doubt about it, because the occurrence had been advertised in the papers, and a reward of two hundred pounds was offered for my apprehension. Calfaliver knew my secret; but he did not give me up to justice, and he had no cause to regret it. I worked—I worked hard—I worked desperately. Work, incessant work, was my only relief from thought. I elevated the petty rag and bone huxtering into respectable and legitimate commerce. We purchased stores and warehouses; and I established agencies in almost every continental city in Europe. At the end of ten years we were worth sixty thousand pounds. (I was made a partner at the end of three years.) I travelled; and visited, in a business capacity, every city of any importance in Europe. Gradually and slowly I began to get more comfort and peace of mind. I reflected that it was in pure self-defence that I threw St. John the Apostle at the Spiky Young Man; and it was with no intention of murdering him. I wondered why I had not thought of that before; and at last I was happy. Yes, gentlemen, I was happy.

"It was at a ball at Madame St. Omer's, St. Petersburg, that I first became acquainted with Amelia D—. She was the daughter of a West India planter, deceased; and she was under the guardianship of her uncle, Sir Benjamin Parkins Bogtrotter (eminent sugar-refiner in Whitechapel). I was about twenty-four years of age at that time, and, I may say, handsome. My beard and mustache were grown; and I had an interesting, melancholy expression peculiarly fascinating. My hair and eyes were jet black—so decidedly black as almost to border on blue.

"I loved, and was loved.

"I left St. Petersburg, but kept up a correspondence till her return to London, when I made an offer of my heart and hand. She clasped me to her throbbing bosom, and referred me to Bogtrotter.

"Young man!" said the pompous Bogtrotter, who was proud of his blood, 'the manes of my brother would rise up and curse me if I allowed his daughter to marry a rag-merchant. In all other respects you are eligible. Change your trade to another—as profitable, remember—and she is yours.'

"I asked a year's time, which was granted.

"I went straight to Calfaliver, and immediately assented to a proposal, which he had made a year before, to give up the rag business, and commence monster clothing establishments all over London and the provinces. In a year's time we were fully established. We spent several thousands a-year in advertising; and our names became as household words. Amelia consented to be mine. Bogtrotter and Calfaliver were introduced to each other, and became fast friends. I could hardly believe in my prospective felicity. We were to be married in a month.

"About a fortnight before the appointed time, I was standing in the sale-room of our east-end warehouse at nine o'clock in the morning. I was in the glass counting-house at the end, through the window of which I could see all that went on in the sale-room. Mr. Simmons, our manager, was counting out a parcel of bills, and distributing them among the bill-stickers. About the last to step up for his share was a very tall figure, dressed in mole-skin trousers, and with a short shell jacket. His back was towards me; but I could hear his voice, which I thought sounded familiar to me. 'Mr. Simmons,' his words were, 'what I was again to observe is this here, that if you would allow two or three of the hands to accompany me—one to hold the ladder whilst I stuck up the bills, the other two to watch the pulice—I might manage it. I don't bind myself as to certainty, Mr. Simmons; but I might manage to get them up.'

"The conversation related to the advertizing of a patent style of braces which I had invented, and which we were anxious to have stuck up on a tempting black wall at the corner of Farringdon-street and Ludgate-Hill. The police regulations were strict, however; and it could only be managed at midnight. Of course, it would be taken down again, but it would have attracted the attention of a great many clerks and others who pass that busy thoroughfare in the morning.

"The speaker turned his face; and there—gracious heavens! before me, in the flesh, stood the SPIKY YOUNG MAN! I pricked my ear with a pen till the blood flowed, to make certain that I was not dreaming. It was substantial reality. I could not mistake those features—features that had been familiar to me in imagination for ten years. Ten thousand different emotions struggled in my head. I was not a murderer after all. I could have laughed, danced, wept. I hurried out, called a hansom, was driven to my own private house, locked myself in my bed-room, and gave way to a passionate flood of tears. I wept for an hour and a quarter; got up, cleared the table from the middle of the room, and danced a good imitation of a plantation break-down—danced till the sweat was pouring off me, and until I had so alarmed the house that I stood in danger of being taken off as a dangerous lunatic. I became calmer; partook of three chops, with kidneys, and a bottle of sherry; and hurried back to the warehouse. I questioned Simmons as to the Spiky Young Man, whom I instructed to be sent to me the next day at four o'clock.

"At three o'clock next day, I was seated in my private room at our west-end establishment. It wanted an hour till the Spiky Young Man was due. I took a bottle of brandy from the cupboard, drank a glass, and seated myself before the fire. The hum of business from the great hive surged into the room with a monotonous moaning sound. There was a French clock above the mantelpiece—the ticking of which sounded to me like the blows of a hammer on an anvil. I fell into a reverie—the whole events of my past life seeming to pass in a panorama before me. My betrothed had called to see me in the course of the day, looking lovelier than ever. My imagination dwelt, in fond anticipation, on the bliss which was soon in store for me. The ticking of the clock and the beating of my heart struck faster and in unison. I looked up; it wanted five minutes to four o'clock. In a few moments, although I had heard no one entering, I was conscious that some one was in the room. I turned slowly round, and the SPIKY YOUNG MAN stood before me. He had his cap in his hand, and stood beside the door, which he had left half open. I requested him to shut it, and motioned him to a seat. He shut the door, edged slowly and timidly to the arm-chair, stood for a moment, made a motion as if about to sit down, then, recovering himself, said—'If you please, sir, it seems more natural to stand.' I poured out a glass of brandy, which I offered to him. He drank it to the dregs, gave a long-drawn sigh, and deposited the glass, turned downwards, on the edge of the consulting-table. I poured out another, which he again drank, and then yielded to my request to sit down. I did not speak for five minutes, during which time he occupied himself by twirling his cap, whistling inwardly to himself, and then surveying the cornices of the room, as if lost in admiration of their architectural proportions.

"Your name is —?" I stopped, hesitatingly.

"Dokkerty, sir," he answered, dropping his cap and picking it up again.

"How old might you be?" I asked.

"Thirty-four years."

"How long have you been a bill-sticker?" I turned round and looked him steadily in the face. He did not recognise me.

"Put it at fifteen year."

"Did you ever work to a gentleman of the name of Skifter?"

"His face became pale, and he moved uneasily in his seat."

"Which 'ave since died? I did, sir."

"How long did you work for him?"

"He laid down his cap on the floor; closed his left eye; gazed meditatively at the north-west cornice of the room; with the right hand slowly counted over the fingers of the left hand, then vice versa, stopping at the third finger—"Eight years, sir."

"Could you undertake to perform the Caledonian Sword Dance, if called upon?"

"Dance it agin any man—any day of the year."

"That was sufficient. I started up and clasped him in my arms, hugging him rapturously to my heart."

"Wot's all this here game about?" he asked, disengaging himself, and flushing deeply.

"I could restrain my speech no longer. I gazed into his eyes, pushed back the hair from my brow, and shouted out—"Dokkerty! injured Dokkerty! Behold he who has supposed for many, many years that he was a murderer, and the murderer of yourself! Know that it was I that threw St. John the Apostle at your head—hurting you severely, no doubt, but not, as I supposed, murdering you. I will recompense you well—handsomely—for those hurts. You shall be a junior partner; no more a bill-sticker, Dokkerty! You have given me fresh life, a new existence." I again strained him to my breast in ecstasy.

"Suddenly, I felt myself clutched by the throat, almost to strangulation. His breath came hot and burning on my face. He clutched tighter, and hissed out—"Wretch! Murderer!—it was not me you threw St. John the Apostle at, but my brother. You are my brother's murderer; but you are now in my grasp. You shall hang for it yet. I, the poor despised bill-sticker, refuse your proffered gold. You shall swing, sir;—swing—swing!"

"All the horror of my position flashed upon me at once; but my presence of mind did not desert me. Calfaliver had taught me wrestling. I twisted my legs about his, pushed him, and both came to the floor—he undermost. I was a younger and stronger man, and released myself from his clutches; then, giving him a blow on the mouth to stop his screams, fled down stairs."

"Mr. Lintie," said I, to our astonished head warehouseman, "run up stairs, with two of the porters, and secure that madman, Dokkerty;—he is foaming at the mouth."

"I fled out into the cool air."

"I recovered consciousness in a house in a narrow street in the Jews' quarter of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. How I came there I know not. I was again an outlaw from my country, and the price of blood was on my head. I was again advertised in the Hue and Cry; and, had it not been for my effectual disguise, I should have been dragged back to justice. Detectives from England and foreign spies visited the house where I lay, and even insisted upon my getting out of bed to finish their search properly. I could not account for their not recognising me, till I got a looking-glass and surveyed my appearance. Merciful fates! what a change! My hair was gray, my eyes were scarcely visible, and short, stubbly hair covered my face; my cheeks were sunk in, showing painfully the outline of my jaws and cheek-bones. I lay ill for a month, and at the end of that time was able to walk out. My cash was exhausted in another week, and I commenced life again as an itinerant rag-marchant; travelled over the Continent for a time; and then fixed my quarters permanently in Paris. For five years I pursued this avocation, and saved a little money. Was I happy? No. Was I unhappy because I was still conscious of being a murderer? No. I was unhappy, miserable, because Amelia was lost to me for ever. Sipping a cup of chocolate one morning, in a low cabaret in the Rue Montmartre, I observed an English workman reading a copy of the Times. I asked permission to have a look at it when he had finished, which he courteously granted. Almost the first words which caught my eye was an announcement of Amelia's marriage with Calfaliver! I returned the paper and rushed out into the open air. I could hardly breathe. To use the words of Edwin Elliot, in the drama of the 'Maniac of Manchester, or the Fate of Felix Fuffy of Pinsbury,' 'I was going mad. I felt my brain fissing. Ha! ha!' I rushed home to my garret. Instantly a feverish longing to see her once more took possession of my heart. I counted my money, changed my clothes, and set out for London that same evening. Everything seemed changed. My name had been erased from the firm. Calfaliver was prosperous as ever.

"For weeks and months I hung about, endeavouring to catch but a glimpse of Amelia. I lurked about the doors of the opera-houses and theatres in the season. I was unsuccessful. I remained in London, and woke one morning to find my money was done. I had not even sufficient left to take me back to Paris. I sought employment as a dock-labourer, scavenger, bill-sticker—anything that would gain me a living, however precarious; but was unsuccessful. Oh, the horrid memories of that dreadful winter! Winter in London, without money or friends! I formed one of a group who stationed themselves every morning outside the gates of the London Docks, waiting for casual employment. Sometimes there were three or four men taken on for a day's work; oftener one, or none. Throw a dead sheep amongst a hundred famishing wolves, and watch the result. It is nothing to what takes place among those gaunt, emaciated men—their faces, through starvation and cold, rendered fiercer than wolves—when the porter opens the small door and intimates that a hand is wanted. I was successful once; but my ribs were nearly crushed in, and I could scarcely work after having got the job. Christmas! I forgot the panto-mines. I applied, and obtained a job to walk about between two boards as a peripatetic advertisement of the entertainment. I held this position for a month. My perambulations were in the City. Ah! little recked the passengers in the street—as they saw my pinched cheeks, blue lips, and hollow lack-lustre eyes—of the dreadful romance of my life!

"Christmas-day 18—was one of the coldest I ever experienced. I had been walking about all day, and about four o'clock was painfully toiling up Cheapside. I had got as far as Wood-street, when I became conscious that a tall figure was approaching, encased between two boards like myself, and walking with that slow, swaying motion peculiar to the profession. I began to wonder if he had as heavy an account to bring against fate as myself. He was rounding the corner of St. Paul's Church-yard when I first observed him, and we passed each other at Friday-street. I had proceeded as far as Newgate-street, when I felt some one clutch me by the hair at the back of the head. There was a clash of boards, and I fell to the ground, locked in the embrace of the advertising medium who had just passed me. The boards sounded on the pavement, and a crowd collected. We fought desperately;—I fiercely; for I could see no reason for the unprovoked assault other than the usual rivalry of trade. We were assisted to rise. I looked at my assailant—Cicuz! It was the SPIKY YOUNG MAN! He gave me into custody on a charge of murder, and I was dragged off to prison.

"I made no defence; and was sentenced to be executed in front of Newgate. Was I frightened at my dreadful fate? No! Death would be a relief to me. Destiny had done its worst. For the first time in my life I felt supremely happy. I longed impatiently for the day which would set me free—the beginning of the end. The night previous, I heard the sound of carpenters erecting the scaffold, and the gradual gathering of the crowd. The time dragged slowly on; and the dull sound of St. Sepulchre's Church tolling the hours had no terrors for me. At a quarter to eight a.m. the doors were opened, and I walked on to the scaffold, breathing the fresh air of heaven. It was a beautiful May morning; the sun was rising in the heavens, and its rays were reflected from every bright thing—from the great ball on the dome of St. Paul's—from the glazed tops of the policemen's hats, forming a circle in front of me—from the batons of a small band of those functionaries who were dispersed among the crowd, and who kept up a series of light skirmishes with a few dissatisfied men and women who elbowed and pushed for a better place—from the steel harness of long lines of cab, cart, and carriage horses, which stretched far up New Hill and Skinner-street, waiting till the 'show' was over to proceed on their way, and not sorry at the attention. I felt like a traveller about to proceed on a long journey, or a popular citizen about to leave his native place for ever, and attended to the railway station by a crowd of rough but enthusiastic supporters and admirers. I had a special train to myself. Where would I be, I reflected, when those carriages, cabs, and carts had reached their destination, and when that grim crowd had separated, and each member crawled off to its morning meal, with an appetite whetted by the spectacle!

"I looked far away over the heads of the crowd at the beautiful sea of blue, with only a few dreamy, fleecy clouds here and there, floating calmly and voluptuously about. Far in the distance, I could discern a small dark cloud, scarcely the size of a man's hand, which, as I looked, seemed to assume the form and proportions of a boat, with a figure at the prow, which I thought beckoned me. I fixed my eyes on it till the executioner approached, and laid his hand on my shoulder, adjusting the white cap. I was blindfolded; but I still saw the boat and the figure beckoning. I was put below the drop. Suddenly I heard hurried voices beside me; and the chaplain stepped forward, informing me that a party wished to say something which would be calculated to soothe my last moments. I assented, and was conscious of some one standing by my side. A warm breath came through the woollen nightcap to my cheek, and the voice of the Spiky Young Man hissed in my ears—'Idiot! fool! you are on the point of death—of a judicial murder! I always hated you; and now I have the satisfaction of murdering you. Know that I am indeed he whom you are supposed to have murdered! I never had brother nor sister! Ha! ha! your doom is fixed. Your words will now have no effect. It wants three minutes to the hour. At the first stroke of the bell you will be thrown off!'

"A wild, heart-broken shriek, and the words 'Villain!' 'Murderer!' escaped from my mouth. All my longing for life had returned. I felt a fierce, burning thirst for even a day's life. I tried to free myself from my bonds. The crowd saw me, and there was a groan like the howling of a wild beast. Pitiless monsters! I felt as if I could have thrown myself upon them, and torn them limb from limb. I hated them more than I hated my enemy. The executioner again stepped forward, and put a white handkerchief in my hand. My arms were pinioned down to the wrists, and I could only catch it nervously with my fingers.

"I was on the point of being thrown off!

"One moment of awful suspense! Another!! Another!!!

"It seemed an age!

"Boom!

"Five hundred thousand lights danced before my eyes!

"Cannons going off at my ears!

"My eyes were straining to jump out of their sockets!

"A rush of air was trying to escape from my throat, and forced back to my breast till I thought it would crack!

"Booming of cannons, and more lights!

"My brain would burst in another moment!

"My teeth sank through my tongue and my lips, and the hot blood gushed down my breast!

"A horrible, slimy reptile was clutching at my throat!

"More lights dancing before me, illuminating a rock, on which the Spiky Young Man was seated, grinning horribly, and extending his hand as if with the intention of assisting me, then drawing it back and laughing hideously! I struggled, and succeeded in reaching it, only to be launched back with a mocking yell in my ears!

"My heart had cracked—a thousand cannons going off—a rush of waters in my ears, and closing over me!!!!

"I had been out down, and was resuscitated. I was a madman for a year. The Spiky Young Man, suddenly terrified, had confessed just as I was being thrown off. I had only been suspended one moment. The shock had nearly killed me. All these sensations, and more than I could relate, had taken place in one moment. It seemed to me a year. I went abroad a miserable man. My enemy died raving mad!—

"Thanks for your attention, gentlemen. This is my station. Luggage! Por-tar! Por-tar!"

Frank and I were speechless for a quarter of an hour. The train was four miles past Sheffield before either of us spoke. "What a fearful narration!" I said; "and how he is to be pitied!" "I know him," said Frank. "It's Stilty Pollins, the eminent Sensation Novelist. He has been trying the effect of a new plot. He will go down a coal-pit to-night—sup on toasted cheese, cocoa nuts, devilled kidneys, and broiled bones—and write Calfaliver's narrative, the Spiky Young Man's narrative, Amelia's narrative, Sir Benjamin Rogtrotter's narrative, and Calcraft's diary, and the novel's complete! Your hair, old chap! is like an ill-natured hedgehog's back. Depend upon it, he is convinced that it will be a success."

R. L. G.

BEAU BRUMMELL.

CAPTAIN GRONOW, formerly of the Grenadier Guards, and M.P. for Stafford, has lately published his "Reminiscences." They are made up, for the most part, of anecdotes of the camp, the Court, and the clubs, at the close of the last war with France; and, as the familiar chit-chat of an old soldier, who has seen much good society in his time, are very interesting and pleasant. We subjoin the gallant Captain's sketch of the celebrated coxcomb and wit whose name appears at the head of this article:—

"Amongst the curious freaks of fortune, there is none more remarkable in my memory than the sudden appearance, in the highest and best society in London, of a young man whose antecedents warranted a much less conspicuous career: I refer to the famous Beau Brummell. We have innumerable instances of soldiers, lawyers, and men of letters elevating themselves from the most humble stations, and becoming the companions of princes and lawgivers; but there are comparatively few examples of men obtaining a similarly elevated position simply from their attractive personal appearance and fascinating manners. Brummell's father, who was steward to one or two large estates, sent his son George to Eton. He was endowed with a handsome person, and distinguished himself at Eton as the best scholar, the best boatman, and the best cricketer; and, more than all, he was supposed to possess the comprehensive excellences that are represented by the familiar term of 'good-fellow.' He made many friends amongst the scions of good families, by whom he was considered a sort of Crichton; and his reputation reached a circle over which reigned the celebrated Duchess of Devonshire. At a grand ball given by her Grace, George Brummell, then quite a youth, appeared for the first time in such elevated society. He immediately became a great favourite with the ladies, and was asked by all the dowagers to as many balls and soirees as he could attend.

"At last the Prince of Wales sent for Brummell, and was so much pleased with his manner and appearance, that he gave him a commission in his own regiment, the 10th Hussars. Unluckily, Brummell, soon after joining his regiment, was thrown from his horse at a grand review at Brighton, when he broke his classical Roman nose. This misfortune, however, did not affect the fame of the beau; and although his nasal organ had undergone a slight transformation, it was forgiven by his admirers, since the rest of his person remained intact. When we are prepossessed by the attractions of a favourite, it is not a trifle that will dispel the illusion; and Brummell continued to govern society, in conjunction with the Prince of Wales.

"In the zenith of his popularity, he might be seen at the bay window of White's Club, surrounded by the lions of the day, laying down the law, and occasionally indulging in those witty remarks for which he was famous. His house in Chapel-street corresponded with his personal 'get up;' the furniture was in excellent taste, and the library contained the best works of the best authors of every period of every country. His canes, his snuff-boxes, his Sèvres china, were exquisite; his horses and carriages were conspicuous for their excellence; and, in fact, the superior taste of Brummell was discoverable in everything that belonged to him.

"But the reign of the King of Fashion, like all other reigns, was not destined to continue for ever. Brummell warmly espoused the cause of Mrs. Fitzherbert, and this, of course, offended the Prince of Wales. I refer to the period when his Royal Highness had abandoned that beautiful woman for another favourite. A coldness then ensued between the Prince and his protégé; and, finally, the mirror of fashion was excluded from the royal presence.

"A curious accident brought Brummell again to the dinner-table of his royal patron: he was asked one night at White's to take a hand at whist, when he won from George Harley Drummond £20,000. This circumstance having been related by the Duke of York to the Prince of Wales, the beau was again invited to Carlton House.

At the commencement of the dinner, matters went off smoothly; but Brummell, in his joy at finding himself with his old friend, became excited, and drank too much wine. His Royal Highness—who wanted to pay off Brummell for an insult he had received at Lady Cholmondeley's ball, when the beau, turning towards the Prince, said to Lady Worcester, 'who is your fat friend?'—had invited him to dinner merely out of a desire for revenge. The Prince, therefore, pretended to be affronted with Brummell's hilarity, and said to his brother, the Duke of York, who was present, 'I think we had better order Brummell's carriage before he gets drunk.' Whereupon he rang the bell, and Brummell left the royal presence.

"The latter days of Brummell were clouded with mortifications and penury. He retired to Calais, where he kept up a ludicrous imitation of his past habits. At last he got himself named Consul at Oen; but he afterwards lost the appointment, and eventually died insane, and in abject poverty, at Calais."

BELLA! HORRIDA BELLA!

BY THE EDITOR.

THE first red hand was raised against a brother—

A brother's blood was first the earth to stain;
And at this hour the children of one mother
Are burning with the demon-thirst of Cain.

Through all the myriad moans of the Atlantic
Sedly the fratricidal cannon booms;
We hear the dying cries and curses frantic—
The louder for the silence of our looms.

Is not your country large enough to bear ye—
Ye who, beneath Columbia's crimson star,
Fight for a continent of wood and prairie,
Like shipwreck'd pirates for a sinking spar?

What of the warriors of the wilds you hunted?
Left they no lessons in their bleeding track?
Or mark'd you not when shuddering Europe pointed
From her old fields of graves to warn you back?

Yours was the new bright land of seeds and schemes,
Who deem'd our elder course of grandeur run;
Who saw your 'stars and stripes,' with eyes of dreamers,
Take dawns of splendour from our setting sun.

But, on the rising day-star of your glory,
The curse was heavy of a race enslaved;—
Oh! woe that darkest page of all your story
With tears of penitence for vengeance braved.

Now, while with patriot fire your pulse is throbbing,
The foe with equal ardour grasps his brand;
And, whichever ever bleeds, there will be sobbing
And mutter'd curses on the slayer's hand.

Then, brothers! when ye cry unto the Father—
Ask not the victory for which both appeal;
But in your death-pale camps pray meekly rather
For mutual sheathing of the murderous steel!

Enough of sacrifice, enough of sorrow—
Of wasted blood and keen-extracted tears:
Oh! for a sun to yield a sober morrow,
And a wise promise for the future years!

What need more battles? Soon a mood of sadness
Will come when you will think of these aghast—
As thinks a clear-eyed man of blows and madness
Shared in the revel of a night that's past.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St. Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 2.]

SATURDAY, OCT. 11, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

THE FRIEND OF THE FAMILY.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"Oh, if he were but ten years younger—even ten years!" said Edith Marchbank to herself one evening, as she sat gazing into the parlour fire.

Her active though delicate widowed mother was busy with domestic matters; and her strong-headed but lively and entertaining elder brother, Sydney, had not yet come home. There were no other members in the family; and Edith, with the gas unlit and the fire warm and bright, sat thinking quietly to herself, with the dreamy, perplexed air of one whose mind is pulled in two opposite directions at once.

Who was it whom she was so desirous to put into Medea's kettle and boil young again? It was Mr. Charles Rugby—a rich gentleman, who, but for his age, might not perhaps have been quite so rich. Still, she wished him younger, if only that she might consider his proposal seriously. As it was, she felt that to think of him at all was laughable. Making herself as old as she could, she was still under twenty; while her lover—she was quite sure of that—was seventy years of age at least.

Yet, somehow or other, she could not help thinking of Mr. Rugby—and thinking seriously enough too. He was a well-grown gentleman, very bald and white, bright eyed, fresh complexioned, and hale; with only a slight and scarcely perceptible stoop in his gait. Some time before, he had returned from the Continent, and found the Marchbank family reduced in circumstances, and, in short, suffering all the pangs and privations of poverty striving to be genteel. Thanks to his munificence, they were now comfortable.

Among other noble deeds, he had set up Sydney in business for himself in the city, supplying him with the necessary capital, and securing for him, through his own influential connection, a liberal amount of support. The admiration, the respect, and the gratitude of Edith were so intense that, but for what she considered his extreme age, these feelings might possibly—who can tell?—have merged into a single and very tender sentiment of regard.

A grave and deliberate offer of marriage from the venerable friend of the family had completely taken the poor girl by surprise. No doubt he had often sat with his arm round her waist, or patting her on the back as an affectionate father might pat or pet his child. These little familiarities, which she had thought nothing of at the time, suddenly took strange meanings in her eyes. But, observing her startled look and confused manner, he had not hurried her for an answer. On the contrary, he had advised her to think over it until the next morning, when he would again call. The only emphasis, indeed, with which he had enforced his suit consisted of a long, kindly, and silently-persuasive shake of the hand on leaving her to her own reflections, and to what, he hoped, would prove her auspicious dreams.

Thus it came to pass that Edith Marchbank sat in front of the parlour fire that night, staring into it as if for friendly counsel, and once more exclaiming to herself—this time almost tearfully—"Were he but ten years younger—even ten years would make a difference!"

By-and-by her mother entered, saying, "Is Mr. Rugby gone? I was preparing a bit of supper."

"He insisted I should not call you," replied Edith, "as he wished to slip away quietly. What do you think, mamma? He has actually made me an offer!"

"Of a skipping-rope?"

"Of marriage."

"Of a packet of bonbons?"

"I tell you, of marriage."

"Do you mean seriously?"

"If ever man was serious in this world."

Mrs. Marchbank was not old herself, and although in delicate health and afflicted with palpitation, was youthful in manner and showy in dress. She became quite agitated with astonishment, and at length relieved her pent up feelings with the exclamation—"Well, that really is ridiculous!"

"I am very sorry."

"But what in the name of common sense did you say to him? I never knew of anything so awkward—the old fool!"

"He did not wish an immediate reply, which was fortunate. But please don't call him a fool, mamma. Remember what he has done for us."

"You know I would go down on my knees, child, to serve him; but the idea of his marrying you, or of you marrying him, is downright infatuation. It would make the poor old gentleman a public laughing-stock."

In a short time Sydney came home, and, on learning the news, was seized with an immoderate fit of laughter, and an uncontrollable tendency to indulge in Terpsichorean exercises about the room.

"Never mind, old lady!" he at length said, clapping his mother on the shoulder, "it will be your turn next! The aly old fox!"

"Go along, stupid!"

"But come, Ede! tell us all about it. Did he get down upon his marrow-bones? Did he swear, spout poetry, and threaten suicide? Do tell us everything."

"Take care he don't make you get down upon your marrow-bones."

"Say rather on the flat of my back. No doubt I am dreadfully in his power. He might floor me at any moment."

"Therefore it is that we must play our cards with the utmost delicacy and circumspection," said the mother.

"Yes, Ede, you must contrive so to bamboozle your old beau that he may think his sour grapes sweet."

"I do not like the idea of deceiving him. You know how he has treated us. Where would we have been this day but for Mr. Rugby?"

"Surely, however, there can be no harm in trying so to shape your refusal as to avoid giving him offence," said Mrs. Marchbank.

"I shall try."

"But suppose, Ede, you should find him determined—"

"Well?"

"Would it not be better to give in?"

"Out of the question," cried the mother.

Edith only gave a slight shudder, and said, "Mr. Rugby, I have every confidence, will not press me too hard. He has always shown himself to be a gentleman."

"It wpt do, you know, for him to be calling up his money and placing me in a fix."

"Yes; but your sister shall not sacrifice herself, I'm resolved."

"Now I think on't, old lady! she might do worse. Whatever might be her prospects as a young wife, her prospects as a young widow would be superb."

"Pshaw!" cried the mother.

"Shame!" expostulated the daughter.

"For my part," continued Sydney, "I would wish the old fellow to live a thousand years for that matter; but he wont, you know; and you might do worse, Ede, than become his fortunate survivor, I can tell you."

"I wonder what his age really is?"

"Oh, turned seventy by his own confession! He remembers all the great characters in history. Only hear him talk of things a century old! It's my opinion that when he confesses to seventy he is only letting out half the truth. Why, he's a second Methuselah!"

"He certainly does not look three score and ten."

"At all events, he is much too old for you, child, both in looks and everything else," said Mrs. Marchbank.

"Heigho! it is altogether a strange affair. Who could have suspected it? The poor old man!"

And so the family talked, and debated, and sighed, and laughed, and wondered, until, all of a sudden, they remembered that it was high time to light the gas, order in their frugal little supper, and betake themselves as quickly as possible to bed.

CHAPTER II.

Next day, shortly after twelve o'clock, Mr. Rugby called, inquired if Miss Edith was at home, and was shown into the parlour as usual. With his bald benevolent head, thin silvery hair, bland pinky face, and immaculate teeth procured without regard to expense—his appearance was undoubtedly distinguit. He was dressed in black, but with a glossy buff waistcoat and coloured cravat. This was his ordinary style, and had the effect of rendering his exterior very much that of a well-to-do country gentleman.

Edith, who was expecting him, was attired in a gray dress of the quietest possible tone. Her countenance was fine, and her person conspicuously handsome. The gray dress was a device suggested by her mother, with the view of mercifully disguising her charms. It was a relic of poorer days, and was a good deal worn. Her mother called it "a dowdy thing." Yet, when Edith looked at herself in a cheval mirror—one of his gifts; turned herself now this way, now that; then walked back, as far as she could, to judge of the general effect; and forward, until quite near, in order to scrutinise details—she had a secret suspicion that she was very handsome and captivating even in her sedate attire.

Mr. Rugby was fascinated. The style of her dress he interpreted as a compliment to the gravity of his years. With her complexion midway between dark and light, her simply-braided hair, and her thoughtful gray eyes, she had all the appearance of a maiden who would fill a matronly position with tranquil good sense. He fancied he saw in her one who would avoid all objectionable extremes, and who would at all times be more eager to win respect than prone to invite admiration. And was her present absence of gay colours and finery really intended to convince him that she was no giddy girl; but a person, on the contrary, of serious tastes, and fitted to be the companion of a man considerably her senior in years? After this fashion he reasoned. The matronly device was, in short, a failure; and the dull, antiquated gown a splendid success in the direction least contemplated.

With an air of courtly grace, Mr. Rugby stopped forward on entering the room, and, taking her hand as she rose to receive him, said, in his friendliest voice, "My dear girl, how beautifully that dress becomes you! Believe me, I never before saw you look so charming."

In the society of that worthy old friend of the family, Edith Marchbank had never been accustomed to experience any restraint. She had even more than once—when a tolerably big girl too—rumped on his knee, without the idea of an impropriety entering her head for a moment. Now, however, she felt that her relationship to him was completely altered; and she could only stammer out, in reference to the compliment to her dress, "I am sure it is plain enough."

"The better to serve as a foil to your beauty," observed Mr. Rugby gallantly, at the same time taking the wonted seat on the sofa, and, with a little more gentle force than used to be necessary, drawing her down by his side.

Edith coloured, and sought, with some timid agitation, to remove the aged and wrinkled hand which had insinuated itself round her waist.

"Now, don't be alarmed, my dear, simple child!" said the old man; "it is not customary for people to seek to harm those whom they have made their pets. You were always, you know, my special little favourite."

"Oh, sir!—you have been very kind to us all. But—"

"But what? Ah! I see. You have been thinking of what I said to you last night, and are now afraid of me."

"No, no; I am not afraid. I should be very unreasonable and very ungrateful to be afraid. But—"

There was a pause; and Mr. Rugby, drawing respectfully back, and contenting himself with simply taking her hand, said, in something of a sad tone, "I understand you; and of course I am not surprised.

You think me an old fool—me to talk of marriage who might be your grandfather. It is very silly; isn't it?"

"Pardon me;"—and Edith wiped some moisture from her eyes as she spoke—"you have been so kind to us all; your kindness was so great, when we needed kindness so much, that I shall never think of you but with the deepest respect and gratitude. But—"

"Ah! still that unhappy 'but.'"

"But marriage, you know, is so serious—so dreadfully serious a thing."

"You should add, 'when the disparity of years is so great; for that, I can well believe, is your meaning. Well, well! I daresay you have some sweetheart, more suitable in point of age, to whom you have been long attached; and whom it would be very absurd in me to expect you to give up for a poor old fellow like myself.'"

Edith stretched out both her hands, which he grasped in both of his. "No," she said; "I have no sweetheart but you; only—no more of marriage, I very earnestly beseech you. I would have you still remain the dear old friend of the family, whom I shall not be afraid to sit beside, to talk to, or even, on a rare occasion, to kiss."

With that she pressed her lips to his cheek, and the two afterwards sat looking silently at each other, smiling a kind of sweet, beseeching smile; and neither feeling perfectly assured as to the conclusion at which the other had arrived.

Before any farther explanations could be given, Mrs. Marchbank—having overheard something of an osculant sound, by means of her ear (oh fie!) at the keyhole—entered the room in a flutter of gay colours, and looking as healthy as she could under the circumstances.

Mr. Rugby bowed to her, and said, in his kindly, laughing way, "I wanted your daughter to be a delightful little sweet-tempered wife to me; but she thinks me too old by half. She won't have me. So there is an end of the matter. You must therefore allow me to remain simply a friend of the family, as before."

"Well, I am sure," said the nervous lady, "you have at least paid Edith a very great compliment. No doubt she must feel that. But you, Mr. Rugby, can never long want a wife."

"Mrs. Marchbank, I am delighted to have your good opinion."

"I know you would make any woman, of suitable age, happy."

"My dear lady!"

"Oh, sir!"

"My dear Mrs. Marchbank!"

"You had better retire, Edith."

"No, no; let her remain. I was merely about to say that I could have married your daughter, but that I shall never marry any other."

"Oh!"

"Edith is no doubt right. I am too old."

"Oh, not too old, Mr. Rugby. It is only Edith that is too young."

"If too old for Edith, then too old for any one. Yet, somehow or other, my naturally buoyant heart has always kept me young in feeling, and hence, perhaps, my mistake."

There was just the least little touch of pathos in this—the reflection of a life wasted in the neglect of the domestic affections, and of an attempt to repair the error, now felt to be too late. Looking down at Edith, he saw her leaning her forehead on her hand, in tears.

"Come, come," he said; "no more of what is painful. I regret your decision, but have no right to do more. Let us try, therefore, how we can best make each other happy under the circumstances. To be moderate in moments of success, and patient and resigned under disappointment, I take to be the true philosophy of existence."

Mrs. Marchbank felt somewhat relieved, and so did Edith, as they began to bustle about and prepare the table for lunch; while the old man proceeded to discuss the topics of the day with a genial flow of humour.

CHAPTER III.

Did Miss Marchbank speak the even-down truth when she said she had no sweetheart save her aged admirer? Young ladies in general, when questioned as to their love affairs, seldom consider themselves under any obligation to be accurate. Perhaps, therefore, Edith prevaricated as little as most of her sex would have done if similarly situated. She had no declared sweetheart. Of course, those beautiful gray eyes of hers were not altogether blind. She knew well enough that certain young gentlemen delighted to dance with her at parties; to hang over the piano-forte when she played; to turn over the leaves of music when she sung; to make pretty speeches to her on picking up her glove or handkerchief; and to do all the other nameless little things which young gentlemen are in the habit of doing when they desire to render themselves agreeable. For one of them, indeed—Mr. Henry Clayton, a young and rising barrister, with clustering auburn locks—she had even a considerable regard; and this feeling, she had good reason to suspect, was mutual. It was accordingly a decided relief when dear old Mr. Rugby interpreted her denial of his addresses without putting her to the pain of pronouncing the actual words. The sense of satisfaction thus afforded was deepened by the fact that her brother Sydney's business was far from being fully established; that farther capital was almost certain to be required; and that the responsibility had not been thrown upon her of imperilling a friendship so essential still to the prosperity and happiness of the family. Mr. Rugby continued his visits as before; he was as kind and considerate as ever; and everything went on as if no little episode of a delicate and painful nature had occurred.

Edith was, beyond expression, grateful; and manifested, in a variety of ways, her appreciation of Mr. Rugby's magnanimous conduct. It was so like the dear old soul that he was! He had scorned to resent that refusal on her part, which he knew to be so natural. Not the slightest irritation had he ever, on any occasion, exhibited; and, by his noble and high-minded superiority to any petty sense of humiliation, he had placed her entirely at her ease, and prevented the awkwardness which might otherwise have attended the continuation of their intimacy. While he never once, unless in the way of a passing jest, made any allusion to the subject of marriage—his friendship, which had been pure and disinterested at the beginning, remained pure and disinterested still. It even became closer and more demonstrative; while Edith endeavoured, on her part, to show that she thoroughly understood and respected this new and peculiar manifestation of the moral beauty of his character.

Weeks and months passed on, and so open and unreserved did the intercourse of Mr. Rugby and Edith Marchbank become, that Mr. Henry Clayton took an opportunity, one day he met the latter in the Park, of shaking his auburn locks knowingly, and joking and taunting her on the subject.

"Well, Miss Marchbank," he said, after some general conversation, "how is your venerable admirer!"

"Whom do you mean?"

"Oh, then, you have more admirers than one?"

"I don't cultivate admirers."

"You have no need. In your case they grow wild."

"Wild admirers are not to be trusted."

"Pardon me, you have no cause to fear. Your intended, if I guess rightly, has reached the years of discretion. His wisdom teeth have come, and provided they be not gone——"

"If they are, you had best follow them. It would be well for you if you could pick them up."

"Thank you; I hope to be wise in spite of his teeth."

"Then you should have wisdom enough to know when to be silent."

"What everybody says must be true."

"If you listen to what everybody says, you must have long ears."

"To hear is not necessarily to believe."

"Then you don't believe all the gossip that you hear?"

"I believe in the love of young girls for old men, provided they have good estates."

"Fire away, Mr. Clayton! I know very well whom you are trying to insult."

"I never try to insult those older than myself."

"Knowing you can do it without trying. To be impudent is your forte."

"You are taking the huff."

"Well, sir! I never said you were not quite at liberty to think so. Good morning."

"Oh, well! if that is the way the wind blows! But let us meet when the sun shines. Positively, I must stipulate for the absence of clouds."

Edith felt nettled; and meeting Mr. Rugby shortly afterwards, as he came forward with his bright, benevolent face, did not refuse to take his arm. He was more than usually kind.

"I have just been calling," he remarked, "on Sydney. Matters are slightly improving with him. I have every confidence, indeed, that his business will yet do well."

"He will owe it all to you."

"Nay, nay; there are many young men to whom no help in the world could give prosperity. Sydney is steady, energetic, and straightforward."

"No doubt he has plenty of activity. His love of fun makes him a little too boisterous at times; but he is very good-hearted. I know, too, he feels most grateful to you, Mr. Rugby."

"Trust me, there is no fear of him."

As they walked on, the old gentleman talked of the gradual process by which he had himself got on in the world. "My means," said he, "have long been ample; but riches do not alone suffice for happiness. In my first love I was unfortunate. The young lady died."

"How very sad! And you never married afterwards?"

"No. I plunged heart and soul into business; became a very slave of the countinghouse; and deferred, in short, until it was too late."

"I am sure, sir, you well deserved all kinds of domestic felicity," said Edith, with a slight sigh.

A long pause ensued, during which they left the Park and turned their steps homeward. Passing a jeweller's shop, Mr. Rugby directed the attention of Miss Marchbank to a brooch of rare material and workmanship. She admired it, and he insisted that it should be hers. He might perhaps return to the Continent, and he should like her to keep it as a souvenir of their friendship. When they parted, Edith was at her own door. Mr. Rugby declined to enter, but said he would call in the evening. Edith, as soon as she reached her room, threw her bonnet on the bed, and taking the brooch from its crimson morocco case, sat gazing upon it with an air of intense thoughtfulness.

"Heigh-ho!" she at length sighed; "if he were only a little younger—even five years would be something!—I'd teach that fellow Clayton how to sneer. Impudent puppy!"

So saying, she rose, with a determined compression of her lips and a little significant scowl upon her forehead, and hastily arranged her toilet.

"Whom do you think I met?" exclaimed Edith to her mother, as she entered the parlour, "and what do you think I have got? Only look there!"

"Very beautiful," said Mrs. Marchbank; "but you should be careful from whom you accept such things."

"Surely there can't be anything to fear from an old gentleman of seventy."

"Mr. Rugby!"

"What a kind old soul! How I do wish, mamma, he would take a notion of you!"

"Nonsense! child."

"Well, I am sure you are much liker him than I am."

"I wonder what can have put such stuff into your head."

Shortly afterwards, in burst Sydney in a state of the highest glee.

"Huzza!" he cried, mounting on a footstool, and flourishing his handkerchief. "I am all right now. Huzza!"

"What in the world has occurred?" inquired his mother, nervously excited.

"I will tell you," replied the young man, coming down from his pedestal. "If I were you, Ede, I would marry old Rugby to-morrow. Without exception, he is the jolliest old brick in the universe. He has actually placed a thousand pounds at my credit, in order that my business may go on with comfort!"

"How very handsome!" exclaimed the old lady.

"Handsome? It's immense."

"And he has given me that," said Edith, holding up her beautiful new brooch to the light.

"Ho! So-ho!"

"Only as a souvenir; so don't, I pray you, misinterpret."

The gratitude of the family continued highly eloquent until the evening, when Mr. Rugby came, as he had promised, and was soon under the necessity of requesting that he might not be overwhelmed with their thanks.

During tea, the old gentleman was so genial, happy, and full of anecdote, that in Edith's eyes—and very sweet, pensive, and impassioned eyes they were—he seemed to brighten back into the semblance of merely a ripe middle age.

"You have seen a great deal of the world," she at length said, as she sat looking up with childlike wonder and admiration into his keen, fresh face.

"Thank God!" he replied, "I enjoy excellent health, and am fond of travel."

"I should so like to visit the Continent!"

"Well, when you go, Edith, just try and secure me for your guide."

Sydney had, by this time, left for some engagement of his own, and Mrs. Marchbank was abruptly summoned to visit a neighbour's child who was sick. Mr. Rugby and Edith were alone.

The kindly, white-headed old man and the young chestnut-haired girl sat on the sofa together. By degrees, the old arm was put round the young waist as formerly. Edith did not resist.

"What a pity," said Mr. Rugby smiling, "that I did not come into the world, say half a century later, in order that you might have loved me!"

Edith sighed in tender sympathy with the sentiment, and half sobbed, "There is much that a young girl may become attached to beyond mere youth. You have been very good to us all."

The old man pressed the fair maiden's head to his bosom, and said, "May I, then, even yet hope that you will make my old age happy?"

"Believe me, I would give up life itself rather than that you should be lonely or sorrowful."

"How—darling mine? Am I to interpret that as consent?"

The young girl held up her soft, dumb lips to be kissed; and, as she lay in his arms, he whispered, "Then I shall be your travelling guide after all, and our wedding-jault shall be to the Continent."

CHAPTER IV.

While the preparations were going briskly on for the marriage, Edith wore none of the looks which should belong to a happy bride. Her eyes had almost always the appearance of being newly dried, as if from long weeping in secret. She spoke little, and could not be induced to take any interest in the costumes that should be worn, or the company that should be invited. Even the well-meant jocularity of Sydney was powerless to bring a really healthy smile to her lips. She was tranquil, passive, and apparently quite indifferent to everything that was going on around.

The truth is, that she felt utterly horrified at her position. That she loved Mr. Rugby with all the best instincts of her heart, was true; but only, after all, as a daughter might love a father. He had been the benefactor of her family to an extent rare in the annals of human friendship. But was there no way short of marriage by which she could testify the depth, the devotion, the deathlessness of her gratitude? She scarcely knew how she had been betrayed into giving her consent. It was partly pique, partly esteem, partly compassion. But the issue it involved magnified itself to her imagination as something absurd, unnatural—even awful. Still, no thought of interfering with the preparations or resiling from her engagement ever crossed her mind. On the contrary, she towered to a mood in which she would have walked into the jaws of death had duty prompted. But her eye became wild, her cheek blanched, and her expression that of a martyr nerved for the stake, yet inwardly suffering from an agony of sensitiveness to pain.

Mr. Rugby was not blind to the altered appearance of the young lady whom he was about to conduct to the altar. He ascribed it, however, merely to anxiety on account of her mother's health, and to the dread which she had more than once expressed of leaving her by herself—a prey to her unfortunate nerves. Indeed, whenever Edith happened to be detected by her venerable suitor in tears, she was in the habit of feigning distress about her mother, with the view of disguising the true state of her feelings. The worthy old gentleman, therefore—partly from overjoy at his conquest, but chiefly with a benevolent anxiety to restore her cheerfulness—continued to do his wooing with a kind of briar juvenescence which he was apt to carry to excess. Sometimes he would approach her with his fine old countenance leaping with glee, and snapping his fingers and singing as one might do to a child. At other times he would glide about the room with a cautious dancing step—something between a minuet and a shuffle—and end with a strong breath or two implying over-exertion, a laugh that reddened him to the temples, and a confession that he was not quite so light on the floor as in his early days.

Although Edith was in some sense pleased to see her revered fiancé thus happy, she was yet pained and shocked at the spectacle of venerable old assuming such youthful airs. She began, in short, to take that interest in him which a proud and sensitive wife takes in a husband whose dignity she is desirous to preserve. The incongruity between poor, amiable Mr. Rugby's friskiness and his gray hairs impressed her with a degree of melancholy, which aggravated her consciousness of the sacrifice she was on the eve of making; and again and again she gently prayed him to desist.

"Tootey-pooty!" he would say, patting her cheek playfully, "what makes its little self so glum?"

"Don't tell me of your early slavery at the desk. You must have been quite a ladies' man in your time; and a notorious flirt, too."

"What! you think I know how to court, eh?"

"But, dear Mr. Rugby, I always like you best when you are quiet and sensible."

"Now, be you sensible, and cease to 'dear Mr. Rugby' me. Call me Charles, or I'll pinch its little ears."

Edith tried to please him with a smile, but, relapsing into seriousness, remarked, "You are very merry."

"And you must be merry too, my dear."

Edith pressed her hand to her eyes; whereupon Mr. Rugby looked puzzled; but immediately tried by gentle force to remove it, saying, "It musn't be mummy-dumpy when it's going to get married."

The manner of the old man during these interviews, kindly and tender as it was, appeared to Edith to become every day more ridiculous—so little was it in harmony with her own mood. She feared he was in his dotage. His mimicry of the playfulness of youth had thus only the effect in her eyes of adding to his apparent age. The brightness of his spirits caused her to see his wrinkles more clearly. She remembered the words of Clayton, and began to fancy what the world would say of her as she went languidly or jauntily to church with her old bridegroom of seventy. And yet so conspicuous were his efforts to please, even in the midst of his little senile frivolities, that she felt she could not say a word or do a thing to vex him—no, not for the whole world.

One day, as Edith sat in her misery alone, the door flew open, and in burst Henry Clayton, anxious and excited.

"What means this visit?" she asked, in a frightened manner.

"Miss Marchbank," he stammered out, "I have come to offer you my hand and heart."

For a moment or two she gazed at him steadfastly; then, quickly covering her face with her hands, groaned out, "It is too late."

"I know it," he said, and the auburn locks trembled; "but, nevertheless, to make this offer is a duty which I owe to my conscience. Of course, you reject it!"

"I do."

"Then know that if misery be your portion or mine, I at least am guiltless."

Edith wept as if her tears would have no end; while her young and handsome lover went on to contrast that which might have been with that which too obviously was. "But I do not speak thus," he continued, "in order to vex you. It is now known to me, and to the world, that you have made your choice. Upon that choice the world may perhaps smile, and attribute it to motives in which affection can have little share. It is not for me, however, to reproach you. On the contrary; that you, Edith Marchbank, may be happy, is the prayer of one who, under a light and bantering exterior, concealed a love as deep and devoted as man ever felt for woman."

"We have misunderstood each other," faltered the unhappy Edith, as if her heart would break.

Henry Clayton watched her intently, and, slowly approaching, ventured to take her hand. He then, in low fervid words, said, "Edith! there is yet time. If Mr. Rugby is really the generous man he is represented, he will release you. He will judge your engagement to him as the mere hasty mistake of your youth. Appeal to him frankly, Edith! If he should not release you, then hold him unworthy of you, and, by one brave act, vindicate the prerogative of your youth—fly with me, who am, at least your equal in years—and add one more example of the supremacy of love over the promptings of worldly policy, the coercion of mercenary friends, or even an extorted or mistaken pledge. O Edith! moments are everything. Your fate is trembling in the balance;—decide while there is yet time;—one word and you are free!"

"No more of this!" cried Edith, collecting herself, dashing back her tears, and rising to her full stature. "I appreciate, sir, the love you say you bear me; but to defer the declaration of it till now was unmanly. This instant leave me. Edith Marchbank is the affianced bride of one at whose age you have sneered; but who, let me tell you, has a virtue for every year that he is old. Go, sir!"

The unhappy youth again snatched her hand—pressed it for a moment to his lips—and hurried away, agitated and wild with sorrow for the beautiful treasure he had lost.

In a few minutes, Mr. Rugby entered, with his head turbaned fantastically with a red silk handkerchief, and with a beautiful new Spanish guitar slung by his side. He entered with the romantic glide of a stage troubadour—strumming the cords untunefully with his shaky fingers, and warbling forth, with his poor tremant of a voice, the refrain of some forgotten serenade.

The spectacle struck Edith with shame. Yet how could she suffer a solitary flash of anger to escape through her tears, when she knew that all that foolish masquerading was elaborate for her special delectation, and was really amiably meant to disguise the advanced years which so young a maiden might deem unsuitable in her bridegroom?

A ruddy laugh of returning good sense concluded the undignified exhibition. Mr. Rugby transferred his handkerchief to his pocket; and, unslinging his guitar, presented it to Miss Marchbank, saying—"There, my darling Edy! I have brought a little musical gift for you. You remember you said you thought the guitar a very graceful instrument."

"Oh, sir! you are much too mindful of every casual word of mine. I know not how to thank you. Indeed, I know not."

"What! weeping again? I hope your mamma is not worse?"

"I fear she has been worse ever since she knew I was going to be married."

"How should that be, my dear? It is not as if you were doing anything foolish—running away with some young scamp, or allowing feeling to get the better of judgment. Your marriage will at least be a prudent one."

"Perhaps she thinks, Charles—"

"Stop! I must give you a kiss for calling me Charles. It shows it is a loving little gipsy-pipsy after all."

"Perhaps she thinks your choice should have fallen upon herself."

"What! and you by; you who are a second edition of her—only revised and improved, you know? Besides, your mamma—but don't say I said so—is just a little too old."

Edith stared, until her affectionate gray eyes became filled with wonder and tears. "Do you then really think," she said, "that people should not marry when they are too old?"

"Not ladies of delicate nerves, when they are past a certain age; but with men in good health it is different."

"Oh, I see," said Edith musingly, and with an expression of vague doubt as if she did not see in the least.

Mr. Rugby observed she was unhappy, and passed a long night in continual efforts to soothe and cheer her. These, however, were all unsuccessful. The poor girl cried and cried; and yet, when Mr. Rugby, driven to despair, put the question point blank if she repented of her engagement to him, she murmured a pathetic "No, no!" and hid her eyes in his bosom.

The worthy old man kissed and blessed her at parting, and then walked slowly, very slowly, home, with a heavy, homeless feeling at his heart. Could it be that she did not really love him—that her affections were rooted elsewhere—that she repented the engagement she had formed? Not very interesting questions may these be for the world to discuss now, but they nevertheless sufficed, during that whole night long, to keep sleep from the pillow where a certain aged head rested.

CHAPTER V.

Sydney Marchbank was the male head of the house, and the natural protector of its female members. It was therefore, he thought, a duty which he owed to his position to shoot Henry Clayton. Whether he was prepared to resort to that extremity was, of course, another question; but of the deadly direction in which duty pointed he had no doubt whatever. The truth is that he had obtained some clue to what he called Clayton's surreptitious and dastardly interview with his sister; and had marked the effect which it had produced upon her health and spirits. Under these circumstances, it was at least a satisfaction to demonstrate loudly, even should matters be carried no farther; and seeing that his highly melodramatic manner, as he strode up and down the room, excited his mother's nerves and remonstrances, he continued to exclaim, with more apparent determination than ever, "I'll shoot him. I'll shoot him; I will. I'll shoot him dead."

This was shortly before the marriage-day. The table was covered with presents, and Edith had retired with her dressmaker to have her marriage-dress fitted on. Her obvious misery diffused itself to every member of the family. In vain had Sydney talked splendid nonsense; in vain had her mother enlarged on the loveliness and value of the wedding-gifts. Nothing appeared to interest her or to revive her cheerfulness in the least. Sydney's boisterous gesticulation and threat to shoot Henry Clayton were simply a last alternative of despair, all other devices having failed.

The dress was pronounced perfect; the dressmaker took her leave; and Edith sat down in her superb bridal array, but looking so utterly woe-begone that even the blithe Sydney became alarmed.

"This will never do," he said; "your manner is quite wrong. You are acting under a mistake. A marriage is not a funeral. It is altogether absurd to suppose that it is. Your dress is no doubt white, but it is not in the least essential that you should wear a face to match."

"I wish to be quiet."

"But I wish you to be noisy."

"Fool!"

"Or do you really wish the whole affair stopped?"

"Leave me alone. I mean to go through with it."

"Yes, my dear," said the mother, "but you must go through with it as if you were really going to be married."

"And not," Sydney added, "as if you were going to be hanged."

"Mr. Rugby is no doubt an old man," resumed the elder lady, "but many old men have been married, and to very young girls too. Everybody will tell you that he is much respected."

"I know that, mamma. It is to be hoped that I respect him also. God help me else!" So saying, Edith glided from the apartment to resume her usual attire.

"A nice bride for the old gentleman, truly!" exclaimed Sydney.

"It is plain to me," said the mother, "that the poor girl's heart is not in this business at all."

"Well, hang it! if it isn't, it ought to be stopped at once. It is a downright shame to deceive the old fellow."

"But how can you stop it? Would not its stoppage vex Mr. Rugby more? Might he not, besides, withdraw all his help, demand up all that is his own, and leave us to positive beggary?"

"He might play the very deuce with me, I know. Of course, he would require to be smoothed down. Halloo! that is he at the door. I'll bolt—leaving you to give him a gentle hint. It will come best from you."

The young man took refuge in his bed-room, and his mother sat down, struggling calmly with her nerves. She was even foolish enough to imagine that her efforts to compose herself were successful.

Mr. Rugby entered—it was his usual hour—with much of his fresh, healthy colour gone. He sat down, and requested he might have a glass of water, saying that the stair had affected his breathing for the first time.

There was a caraff and tumbler on a side table, to which he was immediately helped. After resting a minute or two, he appeared to be a little revived. Mrs. Marchbank was nervous in the extreme.

"How is Edith?" inquired the old man.

"Well, I am sorry to say it," replied the old lady, "but really there is no disguising it: she is not well at all; at least, she is not so happy as a young bride should be—she is certainly not."

"Poor thing!"

"But I know she respects you, Mr. Rugby. I know she does—as who does not that knows you?"

"Ay, ay,—respects me!"

"If she was only a little older—I don't mean to say as old as myself, for do you know I am actually turned forty-six?—she might even have sense enough to—to love you."

"Enough. I have suspected this. She does not love me. But I must hear it from her own lips."

Mrs. Marchbank gave a little shudder of chagrin, and, leaving the room, said, "I shall send her in. She was changing her dress, but should be ready by this time."

In a few moments the pale young bride and the still paler old bridegroom confronted each other alone.

"Edith!" said the latter, without rising from the sofa, "come here, and sit down beside me. Thank you. That is kind."

"Even if I refused, you would almost have a right to command me," said Edith, with a faint smile.

"I would not wish to command you in anything. May I put my arm round you?"

"I suppose you are entitled."

"Edith! I have lately suspected, and have now ascertained from your mother, that you do not love me, and of course have no wish to marry me. This is a serious thing for me. But before taking any step one way or other, I am naturally anxious to learn the truth from your own lips."

"Believe me, dear Charles! your suspicions are wrong. My mother, too, must be equally mistaken. I am pledged to marry you, and have no other desire than to fulfil that pledge."

"Good girl! good girl!" said the old man, shaking her hand nervously. "Somehow or other, I feel to-day as if I had walked many, many miles. May I ask you to ring the bell?"

Edith did as she was desired, and, on the servant appearing, he said, "Have the goodness to tell your mistress I should like to see her."

Mrs. Marchbank was labouring under palpitation. Supported by her son, however, she was at length induced to enter the parlour.

The old man did not rise, but said, "Sydney, too! I am glad to see you."

"If there are secrets, I'll retire," said Sydney, rather overawed by the general solemnity of the countenances.

"There are no secrets," said the old man, "at least so far as I am concerned. The matter is simply this:—I was led to understand that my very dear Edith desired that my marriage with her—even after all the preparations had been made—should proceed no farther. But I have now learned directly from herself that this is not the case. Her wish is still, it seems, to become my darling little wife. Is not that your wish, Edith?"

"It is."

"But, Edith!" said the old man, calmly resigning her hand, "it is no longer mine. I have determined that our marriage shall not go on."

"How?" exclaimed Edith with calm eagerness.

"Mr. Rugby!" cried her mother, and then commenced rubbing and thumping her very obstreperous heart.

"Has anything happened?" abruptly interrogated Sydney.

"Keep all quiet," said Mr. Rugby. "I am no longer in the foolish position in which I appeared to be placed. There is no withdrawal, on Edith's part, from her engagement. She is still faithful; and I am still happy. But—"

The emphasis with which this last word was pronounced, and the pause with which it was followed, occasioned something like a sensation in the little circle.

"But," he repeated solemnly and with a tremulous voice, "I know that she is making a sacrifice which I have no right to demand. Therefore, of my own free will, I have determined that the preparations shall cease."

All stared at the pale, aged face, and at each other, by turns.

"The situation of matters is awkward; but a solution is at hand which will save the necessity of any explanation to the world."

"Solution!" exclaimed Edith, while Mrs. Marchbank cast her eyes on the ground, and felt as if something were about to happen.

"Yes," said the old man, imprinting a kiss on Edith's forehead. "Bride of mine you shall never be in this world."

"Your language is mysterious."

"It is natural that it should be so, for it is spoken in the near presence of whatever is most mysterious to mortals. Edith! I am going to die."

The poor girl shrieked and grasped his arm; Mrs. Marchbank rocked on her seat, and rubbed her breast, in an alarmingly agitated state; while Sydney uttered a great healthy exclamation of "Oh, nonsense! Mr. Rugby."

But every one noticed, for the first time, that the countenance of the good old man was the colour of clay. It soon became evident that the hand of death was upon him. Mrs. Marchbank ran for brandy, and Sydney for medical aid. But it was too late. In the course of a few hours Mr. Rugby was no more. His last words were, as he held Edith by the hand, and looked tenderly into her wasted and weeping face, "It is a satisfaction to me to know that in my dying, as in my life, I shall have proved the Friend of the Family."

The greater part of Mr. Rugby's fortune was bequeathed to the Marchbanks; and among those who mourned him with affectionate tears, and many years afterwards described him to their children as a delightful old man whom they had once known and loved, were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Clayton.

GARIBALDI AT SPEZZIA.

BY ALLAN PARK PATON.

"DEFEATED! wounded! captured!" Ay, in sooth,
This time 'tis no lie of the venal wire.
Strange unto you and me, 'tis yet the truth—
As much as Pope or Emperor could desire.

"Defeated!" Ay. What am I but a man?
And what but men my helpers? I may err
And I may fall. God's over all, whose plan
Works clearly out, how'er He may defer.

And God loves freedom; for He freely gave Earth, light, life, His own Son; yea, made us free
To choose 'twixt Heaven and Hell! A trembling slave God never meant His creature man to be!

"Wounded!" Ay, wounded! Not this crimson scar
On thigh and foot—these are scarce worth a breath:
They're healable by air, or salves; and are,
Even at the worst, within the skill of Death.

But here! oh, wounded here! this is the place:
My heart, my cloven heart, doth ever bleed
O'er thee, Italia! seated in disgrace;
For all that's said and done—a slave indeed!

Ah! crowned, like Him, in mockery, and disgraced!
For all thy prate, nought but a slave thou art!
The monk's foul arm about thy throbbing waist;
And France's iron hand upon thy heart!

"Captured!" Ay, captured! Chains may wait these wrists
A cell this body; but, look here! the mind,
In here, triumphantly all force resists:
My thought man, saint, or devil cannot bind!
Fetter these hands and feet! shut out yon sky!
Bring in some willing priest my lips to seal!
Voiceless, still freely think and feel shall I;
And this shall still be what I think and feel:—

Italy one, and Rome the capital;
Victor Emmanuel, palantuo, King;
Freedom to all in word, and work, and soul;
And Christ's pure Gospel sunning everything!

THE UNPUNCTUAL.

SOCIETY is not so wide awake as it ought to be to the fact that it contains within its bosom a body of depredators who practise their habitual extortions without scruple or limit; who are restrained by no conscientious misgivings, and amenable to no laws; who are not even denounced by public opinion, but are in general rather favoured and caressed by their unthinking victims, who, even when suffering from their rapacity, call them "good fellows!" and "no one's enemy but their own." The worst of it is, too, that it is where civilization is farthest advanced—where population and enterprise are rifest, and where social order is in other respects most scrupulously preserved—that these depredators exact their heaviest contributions.

"Time," says an old equationary proverb, "is money." It is in this equivalent of hard cash that the class we speak of do business. The selection of a field of exertion depends on training, on accident, on necessity—sometimes on taste. One man is a horse-stealer, another a sheep-stealer, another gets at your money by forgery;—few limit their operations of this kind to pure cash transactions. The form in which the unpunctual robs you is by taking it out in time. His system is this:—In the comings and goings, the meetings and partings, of mankind, there are dropped odds and ends of time whereof every one should bear his average share. He is determined that, whatever losses there may be, none of them shall fall on him—his neighbours shall bear all. His motto is the candid one of the Border-riving Cranstouns, "Thou shalt want ere I want." The way in which he proceeds is this:—If he adjusts a meeting with you, he fixes an hour at which the chances are fifty to one that he shall be disengaged. He wants to secure the advantage of that fiftieth chance, and is totally indifferent to the forty-nine which he throws against you. If an hour of time is to be lost—and with the hour of time an equivalent amount of temper; and with the temper so much appetite, content, and health—he lays his measures so that by no possibility shall the misfortune alight on himself; it must all fall on you, or some other neighbour in the Scriptural sense of the term.

Very startling conclusions have been reached by adding up the various items consumed by a good feeder who has reached advanced life—the heads of oxen and flocks of sheep, the acres of potatoes, the stacks of grain, the lake of wine that would float a man-of-war, the rivers of beer, and rivulets of alcohol! So, if the whole value of what should have been other people's, which a hoary sinner of the kind we are describing has appropriated or destroyed in the course of his long life, were "totalled," would it not strike one dumb with amazement that such rapacity, recklessness, and cruelty can be tolerated in the midst of established law and justice, and under the influence of religion? But, so amalgamated has the sin become with the very heart of society, so utterly is all spirit of resistance or even censure towards it deadened, that a judge of the land will not be ashamed to rob the very jury with whom he is to administer the law—nay, will keep waiting the very criminal on whom they are to do common justice; and the clergyman will even, after having thus pillaged a gaping congregation of thousands, walk serenely to his pulpit, and expatiate on original sin and the frailties of mankind.

We have said that these Hostes humani generis are restrained by no qualms of conscience. In fact, they are often proud of their acts of plunder—conceiving themselves to be a sort of superior beings, entitled, like arbitrary monarchs or feudal nobles, to levy tribute on their inferior fellow-beings who tread, with due punctuality, the dusty road of duty. They satisfy themselves, in all cases of cruelty and hardship, with such a syllogism as the following—"Men of genius are apt to be unpunctual. I am apt to be unpunctual—therefore, I am a man of genius." It shows how a naturally honest conscience may be seered by continuance in this sort of evil doing, that one of Charles Lamb's renowned jests contained a boast of the manner in which he had thus despoiled a fellow-being. When charged by his employer with coming late to his desk, he answered, "But you can't deny that I go away early." So did he justify the filching of one end of the time which he had sold by abtracting the other. It is as if in justification of purloining the first shilling of a pound, he took credit for making off with the last also, and leaving a balance of even money. The principle is well expressed in the formula, "Heads I win—tails you lose."

As we have already hinted, society, instead of sternly suppressing, is rather inclined to caress this class of criminals. But there is still a Nemesis, and they do not always escape unpunished with their plunder in their possession. There was the instance of Snobbles, who lost that snug Under-Secretaryship of the Board of Plantations. His patron, the Commissioner, said he had been long suffering regarding him. Out of respect for the memory of his old friend, the youth's father, he forgave the many occasions on which elderly gentlemen of unquestionable position were preserved in a state of external silence, but internal fermentation of profane oaths struggling to be free, as they wanted dinner for that young scamp, who floundered in half-an-hour too late, and totally unconscious of the dire amount of misery, irritation, and internal blasphemy he had caused. The Commissioner forgave, too, all the pic-nics, rides, jaunts, and appointments for a little business talk in which the youth had defaulted. But, on the great occasion when the Board were all assembled to install him, it was too much—the patron could stand this sort of thing no longer. So, Snobbles was passed over, and another appointment made—considered, by all present, as likely to be more satisfactory.

There was a deal of sympathy with Snobbles, in which we could not concur. What was the loss of £500 a-year in comparison with the accumulated evils he had inflicted on society through his special defect?

What, again and again, was it to balance against the calamities he would have scattered around him had he got the appointment? After his evil achievements in his private capacity, what might not have been expected of him in office? True, on this special occasion he had been detained by a railway collision, and, indeed, had narrowly escaped with his life. But what of that? Was it not always the same story? Was it not that all railway collisions, breaking down of coaches, stoppages and heteroclitc moving of clocks, bursting of boots, cracking of braces, and other like calamities, were monopolised by himself and a few others of his class? If Providence selected them for the victims of such calamities, was it well done to attempt to transfer the consequences of their doom to those on whom it had not been laid?

There are other forms in which, fortunately, such offenders meet their reward. We can summon up just now the memory of a rubicund, easy-minded, stout, healthy sinner of this class, who devastated the nerves and tempers of all around him, yet preserved both attributes to himself in seemingly prime condition. He was in a perpetual fluster, which had no visible fruit to other people, but seemed to keep himself in health and spirits. He exemplified pretty well Horace Walpole's description of the Duke of Newcastle, who seemed always as if he had lost half-an-hour in the morning, and were running after it all day. Well, this man, to all appearance happy amid the trouble he shed around him, had a cloud on his existence. It was this:—He never could throughout his life, by planning or exertion of his own—or by any warnings, exhortations, or assistance of friends—get in time to a public conveyance. In the old coaching days, he was well known from exhibitions of his round and scarlet face, like a full moon, seen on the edge of the ascent which the mail was just leaving out of sight. When the railways came, the affair was desperate altogether, and he was unable to display to his intended fellow-passengers even this testimony to the earnestness with which he endeavoured to become their companion, and make up for lost time.

Here, now, is a perfectly fresh field for an ambitious novelist. Let him make one of these lubricious knaves, who cheat us out of our hours and half-hours, odious in the eyes of every unsophisticated reader; while the man who has gone through life with undeviating punctuality—never losing a train, never missing an appointment, never five minutes behind the dinner-hour—becomes the heroic idol of the boarding-schools. If an author succeeds in making out of such materials a successful romance—which wastes midnight's oil, and becomes bedewed with feminine tears—we shall say he is a man of genius. The fact is, that it is a trait of genius to make the picturesque out of punctuality; for it has, like truth, a simple, cold unity about it; and yet it would be a striking history could we call up all the efforts that simple, punctual, and strong-minded men have made to keep their word. Johnson, describing the old Duke of Bedford as a man to be thoroughly depended on, said that if he had promised you an acorn, and could not get one in the British dominions, he would send to Norway for it. You may laugh if you please at this, but we hold it to be significant of a high and sterling nature.

THE MAMMOTH TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

EVERYTHING in America (North and South) is on a great, or, more properly, on a tall, large, or gigantic scale. We refer especially to the physical or geographical features of the country. Had we intended to speak of the people and their characteristic environments—their manners, customs, and social and political institutions—we could even in that case have manufactured a pretty paragraph—a bit of rhetoric whose cumulative thunder would have torn "the cave where echo lies," and made her voice a thousand times more hoarse than could ever have been done by endless repetition of all the virtues in the British calendar. But in such a course there would be no absolute originality. Besides, numbers in this country would doubt our veracity and sincerity in cataloguing American merits according to the patented Columbian pattern. Who, for instance, would believe that we were not joking did we advance that great religious dogma—so devoutly credited and taught on the other side of the Atlantic—that the people of America are, in every way, the greatest that ever appeared to adorn and glorify the face of the earth? Very few hereabouts, we are afraid. Yet, far be it from us to insinuate the falsity of the dogma, or to disturb the comfortable faith of those to whom it is a pedestal or a pillow. We prefer letting our cousins break their own idols. Alas! they are doing so at a more terrific pace and in a crueller manner than our fiercest passions could ever have suggested.

But the discussion of controvertible points is beyond our province. We turn with pleasure from matters of opinion to matters of fact. In meddling with the former, we might have sunk into bottomless abysses; while, in dealing with the latter, we stand on dry ground, and lean on solid realities. No one doubts—nay, there is actually a pleasure in admitting—that the Americans have got the loftiest mountains in the world. It signifies little that we have not seen the vast altitudes, nor trod the mighty solitudes, of the Andes. Have we not read of them, and, in imagination, scaled their hellish gorges, and felt in our hearts the everlasting calm of their empire? Do not we also most ungrudgingly concede that our great friends possess by far the longest rivers going? What an immeasurable country must that be whose life is sustained by such voluminous veins as the Mississippi, the Orinoco, and the Amazon! Its heart must be a world in itself. Remember, also, the prairies—boundless in expansion, interminable in lines, rolling onward, far-undulating, until the eye is interrupted by the dome of the sky, which has stooped down and fixed its crystalline sphere among the grass. Yet, let the traveller go forward a little while, and he will see that visible wall recede before him like an impalpable vision; the broad solitude open, sphere on sphere; and at length he will feel as if he were wandering into eternity! Then, how vast are the American lakes! They are veritable oceans—multitudinous in waters and terrible in tempesta. Nor are the rapids and waterfalls less awful and stupendous in their magnitude. In the description of Niagara, what dictionaries of words, what deluges of epithets, have been split! Yet we are assured by every fresh traveller that those tumbling liquid worlds have never been adequately represented. "How puny," they exclaim, "are the pen-and-ink sketches of literary men, compared with the loud-roaring phenomenon!" At certain seasons, standing under the Horse-Shoe Fall, you can think of nothing so much as of a deadly conflict between the antagonistic elements of Heaven and Hell; or a new expulsion of devils over the crystal battlements of the Celestial City; at other times—as, under the holy witchery of moon and star—the crescent fall of water suggests nothing so intensely as the endless hallelujahs of rapturous angels! But in every physical aspect America is gigantic. Indeed, to describe those aspects with any approximation to truth and reality, geography is compelled to mount a pair of rather exalted stilts, use callipers of American manufacture, and talk in language of the tallest possible type.

Never were these stilts and callipers and that language so necessary as in measuring and describing the Mammoth Trees of California. The truth of this statement will be apparent to those who have visited Sydenham Palace, where the bark of one of those monarchs of the forest has been built up and pieced together in such a manner as to represent a portion of the tree in its originally gigantic proportions. Throughout England we possess some noble specimens of oaks, of which we are justly proud. For, besides that the oak is the great emblem of our sturdy growth and limitless power of endurance, we feel a peculiar delight in visiting these gnarled yet evergreen senators, and in quietly imbibing the wisdom of patience and silence which their regal forms have gathered through the tempests and the changes of a thousand years. Yet we are bound to confess that our highest and thickest trees—whether oak, elm, or beech—are the merest shrubs when compared with the enormous growths of the New World, of which we proceed to indicate the character and dimensions.

As far as the foot of botanical discovery has yet penetrated, two groves of Mammoth Trees have been brought to the knowledge of the world. The first of these was accidentally discovered by Mr. A. T. Dowd, a hunter, while in pursuit of a bear which he had wounded; and the other was discovered by Mr. J. E. Clayton, an engineer, while tracing out the course of a new canal. Mr. Dowd, in all his wanderings, had never before stumbled upon so mighty a phenomenon—a forest, the individual trees of which, for magnitude and grandeur, surpassed the dreams of the most leviathan dreamer. For the first time in his hunter's experience, he gave his wounded bear full liberty to carry his grease to another market. As for himself, he was caught in the trap of wonder. He stood, as might be surmised, rooted to the spot—subdued by the solemn power of an assemblage of uncorrupted and majestic forest-senators. When the hunter returned to his lodge, and reported his discovery, he was of course disbelieved; but he quickly devised means to convince the most incredulous; so that, in a very brief period after, the fame of the Mammoth Tree Grove of Calaveras was spread throughout California, and thence over the whole country.

The exact locality of the Grove may be easily ascertained by a single glance at a good map. It is situated well up among the Sierras—almost, indeed, in the milky shadow of the Sierra Nevada, or Snowy Mountains—in a splendidly wooded valley on the broad mountain ridge between the San Antonio branch of the Calaveras river and the North fork of the Stanislaus river, at an elevation of 4,370 feet above the level of the sea—or more than a thousand feet higher than Snowdon in Wales, and exactly two feet higher than Ben-Nevis, in the Highlands of Scotland. To be more particular, however, we may state that the Grove is in latitude 38° north; longitude 120° 10' west; which is about 97 miles from Sacramento City, and 87 from Stockton. The most convenient starting-point for the Mammoth Tree Grove is Murphy's Camp, the centre of an excellent mining district, about 2,800 feet below—the ascent from which is easy yet animating, and perpetually affording glimpses of the absolute greatness, variety, and splendour of the surrounding scenery.

On arriving at the Grove, according to travellers, the beholder is completely stunned into silence by the vast rotundity and magnificent height of the trees. The mere physical aspect of the stately assemblage seems to crush all power of expression down his throat; while his neck is placed in imminent jeopardy in his attempts at scanning their “starry-pointing” pinnacles. Yet this can hardly be considered tall writing. For mark! The Grove, which is not more than fifty acres in extent, contains upwards of a hundred trees, a score of which exceed twenty-five feet in diameter at the base, thus exhibiting the enormous girth or circumference of seventy-five feet! This, however, is not the greatest, as will presently appear. After the beholder has got quit of the choking sensation, and his eyes have come down from the mammoth altitudes, one of the most conspicuous objects which arrest his attention is what is called “The Big Tree Stump”—and a regular wonder-stump it is, suggesting to our mind the very probable origin of stump-oratory in America. Never did Jonathan clap his wings, and crow defiance to all the universe, from a more appropriate stump. From such a stump might the Edict of Independence have been proclaimed; and been seconded, on the same proud level, by one of those pyramidal orations for which our Andean cousins are so pre-eminently distinguished. Nor is even this stilted phraseology. For if “The Big Tree Stump” has never been used by the Transatlantic cock, from which to proclaim deliverance to mankind from the thralldom of rotten monarchies and bloated aristocracies, it has been used for more singular, perhaps wiser, purposes. Study this stump for a moment. The tree, before it was felled, stood three hundred and two feet in height, and had a circumference of ninety-six feet at the ground. Its mere skin or bark was about a foot and a-half in thickness. Well, it was felled at five feet from the base; yet neither by axes nor by saws, but by augers—it was literally bored to death. It was pierced round about by a ring of auger-holes, so closely placed, that at length, after twenty-five days' labour by five men, the mighty trunk was cleanly severed from its deep, far-branching root. What does the reader think was the result? Most likely he will say that the tree fell with a thundering crash. Not a single bit of it. He stood as majestically as ever on his bleeding stump, as if there wasn't an auger-hole in his whole body, and as if he laughed to scorn the five wretched pigmies that had taken him so treacherously under the belt. This strange fact convinces us that, in natural as in human history, it is no easy matter to undermine and hurl to the dust a long-established monarchy, however inadequately represented. Here was a forest king, whose plantation is supposed, on good authority, to have preceded a long while the plantation of Christianity! Was it rational to think that a half dozen sacrilegious Californian rats should be able to eat into his royal heart, and lay his imperial form prostrate in the dust in less than a calendar month? It was decidedly improbable, as the fact proved. How mightily astonished—shame could not touch their brazen brows—must the traitors have looked when they beheld his Samsonian majesty, whom they expected to topple over as one of their despicable selves would have done, standing upright—serene and untrembling—with the green and leafy grandeur of three thousand summers on his expanded branches gleaming in the living beams of the sympathetic sun! Yet what cannot even rats accomplish! They had recourse to wedges in the present case; until, at length, Cæsar-like, with his rich mantle of foliage wrapped around him, he fell as a king should fall—with dignity and un murmuring resignation! But the whole empire of the forest trembled as he fell!

Now that these ambitious Americans had got a stump, and did not use it oratorically—what did they do with it? It was made as perfectly smooth as the floor of a house; and, as it was equal to the stage of a theatre—being twenty-five feet across the solid wood—why, they transformed it into a dancing-saloon! On the 4th July (mark the date!) 1859, thirty-two ladies and gentlemen actually danced at one time four sets of cotillions on its surface, in presence of musicians and spectators, without experiencing the slightest inconvenience! Think of that, ye Britons! and be dumb. But the story of this mammoth tree is not yet finished. What do you think the conquerors did with the fallen trunk of three hundred feet? Perhaps they built a forest church with its splendid timber, or a school for the miners' children. No, indeed! What then? Something more imposing? Yes; something assuredly more imposing. On the upper part of this magnificent piece of wood they constructed—a double bowling-alley! But this great work was only built after some Californian Barnum had removed the bark from the fallen monarch, for purposes of exhibition among his wonder-loving countrymen and the simple-minded people of Europe.

The largest tree now standing in the Mammoth Tree Grove of Calaveras is one called "The Mother of the Forest," which some degenerate and lucre-loving son of America has actually skinned alive. There she stands, the great old Mother—so called because of two breast-like protuberances, which give her a sort of maternal appearance; there she stands, disrobed, but still majestic, eighty-four feet round the waist (she was ninety feet with her bark), and three hundred and twenty-one feet in height—truly the stature of an Amazonian empress. Some mercenary wretch has computed that this lady contains 537,000 feet of sound inch lumber. Almost at the foot of this living "Mother" lies the dead body of "The Father of the Forest," who doubtless fell, in an agony of rage and grief, at seeing his wife so horribly abused. This old monarch, still majestic in his dead ruin, measures one hundred and ten feet in circumference at the base; and, when alive, he must have shaken his ambrosial locks full four hundred and thirty-five feet into the astonished heavens! As he now lies, his vitals have been burned out of him by fire to the extent of two hundred feet, so that a man can walk upright for that space into his empty carcase. Another prostrate and disembowelled tree is so capacious inside that a man on horseback can with ease ride into the hollow a distance of sixty feet! Before its downfall, it stood three hundred and thirty feet in height, with a circumference at the root of ninety-seven feet. There is yet another ancient dethroned forest king, called by the unkingly title of "The Horseback Ride," on account of its hollow being so wide that a person can ride on horseback into it seventy-two feet!

Nearly all the trees in the forest have names, either as individuals or as groups. There are, for instance, "Husband and Wife," a magnificent pair. They lean towards each other as if going to embrace; and, so far as health is concerned, they seem well qualified to support each other in the most tempestuous weather. Then there is "Hercules," standing three hundred and twenty feet in his shoes, with a girth of ninety-five feet at the root, and every one of whose branches would make a club for Cyclops. Next comes "The Hermit," lonely, old, and grim; followed at the heel by "The Old Maid," somewhat bent and worn in her figure and attire, and quite unable to conceal her years. She is naturally succeeded by "The Old Bachelor," the scraggiest-looking tree in all the Grove; solitary and sour, as most wifeless and childless people are. We come, then, upon a pair which anybody would inevitably call—and which have, therefore, been called—"The Siamese Twins." These are the children of "The Mother of the Forest," and surely never before did mother conceive such twins. They spring from a single stem, and stand three hundred feet from the grass. Near them—designedly, we dare assert—stands a trustworthy, majestic member of the mammoth family, which could not by any possibility have escaped being christened "The Guardian." He overlooks the twins, with the air of a trustee, to the extent of twenty feet—being three hundred and twenty feet high, and eighty-one feet in circumference just above his incomparable ankle. Then follow several groups, all splendid in appearance and gigantic in stature; such as "The Pride of the Forest," "The Beauty of the Forest," "The Two Guardsmen," and "The Three Graces"—the last group being about three hundred feet in height and ninety-two feet each in girth.

The other Grove to which we have referred contains upwards of three hundred trees of the same mammoth description. One of these, "The Rambler," measured at the base no less than one hundred and two feet in girth, while its stature was two hundred and fifty feet. But the largest and most wonderful tree of the world was found in this Grove. It lies prostrate, however, and only one hundred and fifty feet of its trunk has survived the action of time and the elements. But never did eye behold such a trunk. Without its bark it actually measures thirty-three feet across the butt; and it is quite manifest that, in its days of power and upright splendour, it could not measure less than forty feet in diameter, or one hundred and twenty feet in circumference! This might truly be called the Sovereign Tree of the World! A striking peculiarity about these giants of the primeval forest is their singular perpendicularity of figure. Tempests have broken, but could not bend their mighty trunks. They shoot up into the sky like columns reared by man with the aid of plumb and line. Another equally imposing feature is the immense length of shaft they exhibit without the least protuberance. "The Mother of the Forest" and "The Father of the Forest," for instance, showed respectively one hundred and thirty-seven and two hundred feet of trunk, of matchless straightness, uninterrupted by a single bud or branch. Not less remarkable is the enormous thickness of their bark, which at the thinnest is never less than six inches, while it is often found to be as great as two feet. "The Mother of the Forest" was blessed with this thickness of skin. Big, also, as a giant's head, are the cones which grow on these trees, measuring from one to a couple of feet in length, with a corresponding thickness!

Botanically, the Mammoth Tree of California belongs to the Taxodium family. When first discovered, however, an English naturalist imagined, after due examination, that it was a new genus, and baptised it with the very appropriate title of "Wellingtonia Gigantea." But the American naturalists would not submit to this appropriation. A gentleman named Lobb set to work, and discovered its relation to the Taxodium family, whence it must be referred to the old genus, Sequoia Sempervirens, under which title (with the addition of "Gigantea") it is now known to scientific men. Then, as Wellington was a Briton, and the big tree an American, its popular British title has been superseded by an American one—"Washingtonia Gigantea."

The antiquity of these giants is decided by the well-known rule that each concentric circle is the growth of one year. On minute and careful examination, nearly three thousand of these concentric rings have been discovered in the butts of the fallen monarchs, which justify the startling conclusion that they are older than Christianity itself.

Such are specimens of the Mammoth Trees of California. In number, height, and circumference, they unquestionably surpass everything of a similar character which the Old World can exhibit. In saying this, we do not forget those trees, throughout Europe, which have become famous, either from their great size or from the strange uses to which they have been applied. We do not forget the oak at Allonville, in Normandy, which was converted into a place of worship; nor the oak at Kidlington, which long served as the village prison; nor the great oak at Salcey, which was hollowed out, and used as a cattle-fold; nor, especially, do we forget that famous oak

"Wherein the younger Charles abode
Till all the paths were dim;
And far below the Roundhead rode,
And humm'd a surly hymn."

All these do we remember, and many more, whose trunks have been scooped into the most fantastical articles—such as water-tanks, tombs, and dwelling-houses. In England, there are many extremely large and ancient yews. Two especially—one in Brabourne Church-yard in Kent, and the other in Hedsor in Bucks—are of great magnitude; and have, severally, reached the enormous age of three thousand years, and three thousand two hundred and forty years! Indeed, the latter is supposed to be the most ancient specimen of vegetation in Europe.

Yet, while freely admitting the merits and peculiarities of these European growths, truth compels us to conclude with the statement, that it is only a country like America which can produce these mammoth enormities in whole forests. We began by saying that in North and South America everything was on a gigantic scale; and we conclude by yielding the palm to our cousins for the production of big trees—reserving to ourselves, however, the right to claim the sole power of producing certain small matters which are entirely beyond even their Himalayan genius. F.

In mercantile life, a man is most esteemed who, on the first blast of ill fortune, surrenders to his creditors while there is yet much to divide. Nevertheless, I am not satisfied that the award of public opinion is, in this instance, just. In war, the highest honour is bestowed upon him who holds out to the extremity of exhaustion, because it is felt that, although unsuccessful, he has done his utmost for victory. X. X.

A YOUNG LADY'S CARDIPHONIA* IN THE LAST CENTURY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

My grandmother had an antique cabinet in her dressing-room, which used to excite many vague and fanciful notions in my childish mind. There was one drawer in which lay some very old-fashioned jewels—heir-looms, no doubt, in the family; and these my aged relative from time to time exhibited to me, with a sort of half-pleased, half-sad emotion depicted on her faded yet still handsome face and in her trembling hands, which added not a little to my natural interest in the trinkets. She would place me on a stool at her feet, and sit watching my tiny fingers dallying with the costly relics—her head slightly inclined to one side, and her thin lips moving almost imperceptibly, as if the wind of far off memories were blowing strangely about her heart; and then, as though suddenly waking from her reverie, she would snatch the treasures hastily from my lap, and, gathering them into their ebony resting-place, shut them up in silence from my bewildered gaze.

But, besides the jewels, there was another object that rendered the cabinet very memorable to my regards. This was a picture which my grandmother occasionally produced from a secret labyrinth, and showed me in those quiet hours when the child who lingered beside her seemed rather an aid than a hindrance to the play of her early recollections. It was a miniature portrait—exquisitely painted—of a lady in the first blush of womanhood. However long the intervals that might elapse between my seeing it, I could never forget that sweet, bewitching countenance. Whenever I was alone, it was before me—it haunted my very dreams. The light auburn hair was parted over a sunny brow, and fell in wavy ringlets over neck and shoulders; the eyes were large and lustrous, and showed the soul, as in a mirror, sparkling in light below. The lips were gently parted, as if to utter a song of love and hope. It was a delicious picture, on which, as you looked, you felt a breath of summer wafted to your inmost being. An ultra-critical examiner of the features might possibly have detected the least shade of pettishness or frowardness in the tournure of the tout ensemble; but in those days my artless taste saw nothing wanting—nothing amiss—nothing to desire but to feast my vision on it always.

The dress was simple—of pale-blue gauze, with a single rose of deep carnation dye peeping from the white tucker on the bosom; but the air of the whole was noble and true. I was fascinated by the fair unknown. I admired—I actually loved her. I think my grandmother delighted in me all the more for my delight in her. Yet, strange to tell, I never sought to pry into the history of my favourite. She passed between us by the name of "Laura," and had been, as I understand, an intimate companion of my old friend's girlhood.

* The word Cardiphonia is of Greek extraction, and signifies "utterance of the heart." We find it used by one or two old writers, to whom it has appeared (as to myself) more expressive of the full, spontaneous unbecoming of thought and feeling than any other term to be found in our own language.—J. C. S.

Long after the death of my venerable relative, and by my mother's decease, that antique cabinet came into my possession; and then jewels, miniature, and everything else reverted to me by rightful descent. The former I found undisturbed in the secret drawer; but on searching for the latter, I discovered a MS. traced in a round, school-girl hand, which I read with double interest, as coupled with the old associations. The pages professed to be an Autobiography, in the most literal sense of the word; and, as I went on, it became clear that the writer was no other than the original of my cherished portrait. When I had finished, I suddenly recollected that my grandmother's maiden name had been "Fanny"—"Fanny Musgrave;" and here was another link in the chain. I sat pondering a good while over the picture, and the "heart-utterance" I had just perused; and could not help recalling a remark which I heard made the other day by a very aged gentlewoman. She had sat for some time quietly sipping her coffee, while various specimens of the rising generation of both sexes were parading their modish airs around her, when she turned to a staid, elderly man standing near, and said, almost solemnly, "Ah, Doctor! there was a beautiful simplicity in the manners and in the thoughts of the young people of my early days, for which the easy indifference or the forward assumption of modern times offer but a poor exchange."

LAURA'S DIARY.

"April 11, 17—

"I am the daughter of an old and wealthy house. Aunt Stanley would say the spoiled daughter and the pet child of fortune and of too fond parents; but, then, Aunt Stanley is of the old-maid genus. I was seventeen last Friday; and mamma says, gravely, that my education may be considered as finished. Yet surely I have not learned everything which I ought to learn; and I have heard say that knowledge is interminable. Then there is that old story of Newton picking up a few shells by the sea-shore—N'importe. I have had masters and mistresses of every species of accomplishment; and my present governess is a Swiss Protestant, who was pronounced when she came, three years ago, to be exactly comme il faut for a young lady of my position. Governess! forsooth. What need have I now of such an appendage, when I am coming out into the world to think and act for myself? My aunt, Lady Harcourt, goes to a public assemblée in the city of D—, seven miles off, on the 19th of this month; and it is arranged that I am to be of her party. Properly speaking, I should have made my début in London—as the haut ton always do; but I had set my heart on having no more delays, and have carried my point. So, hey for the 19th!

"Papa says—'Laura, do not dance too much, or you will bring back your old enemy the headache.'

"Mamma says—'Laura, you shall appear in a dress of peach-coloured satin, with the same set of pearl ornaments which I wore at my first ball.'

"Ma'amselle Hortense says—'Vraiment, ma chère, je suis au désespoir de vous perdre si tôt. Je retournerai tristement à mes vallées et mes montagnes—et jamais, jamais, je ne réviendrai plus en Angleterre!'

"And Jessica—dear, good little Jessica—says, in her quiet voice, every day, while my hair is being dressed—'Ah, Miss Stanley! there is not a single silken lock here that will not one day be the chain of some manly, devoted heart.' And I laugh, of course, when my maid speaks thus; and she fancies I am pleased. Foolish Jessica! I care nothing for lovers. Perfectly happy without them, they would be only a bore and a weariness.

"What a day of beauty it is! Come Dian, Pedro, Juan, and all the rest—let us have a run on the lawn. O beautiful sky! O beautiful fields, and hills, and woods, and river! my heart bounds to behold you, and cries out, through its every throbbing pulse—How beautiful is life!

"April 13.

"All the talk to-day is about my cousin Lionel, who is hourly expected home from abroad. He is the only child of my widowed aunt Harcourt, as I am the only child of my respected parents. Novel writers would all use 'the sole hope of our two houses.' Of course, this Lionel is a paragon—a phoenix—an Apollo Belvidere. He has been everywhere, and seen everything, for the last three years. I do not suppose I should recognise him were he to walk into the room at this moment. Three years must have made a vast difference. He was but a youth, fresh from the University, when he went away, and now he is a finished 'man of the world.' Such is the term they use in speaking of him, though what is precisely meant by that expression I am somewhat at a loss to guess. However, time will show. And, meanwhile, I am summoned to a private council (of which Madame Martine, the French modiste, is president) to consult about my toilette for this approaching ball.

"I have fought a hard battle with the allied armies—that is, with mamma, Hortense, and the milliner—who all agreed that I should have gold embroidery on my satin robes; while I pled for silver trimmings instead. It was no use; my taste was voted too plain. They desired a richer and more elaborate effect; so I was vanquished in that department. But it was otherwise in regard to my coiffure, or rather no coiffure; and it is settled, as I wished and insisted, to have my ringlets wholly unadorned, save by a sprinkling of the old pearls.

"April 14.

"There is company below to-night. A few dull, middle-aged persons, picking grapes and cracking walnuts over lazy glasses of wine. How thankful I felt that a headache excused my going down stairs. Ma'amselle is in her chamber (like the Queen in the old ditty)—not eating bread and honey, though, but writing her English experiences to her cronies in Switzerland; and I am delightfully single! What shall I do? Try over this new song, with the guitar accompaniment. I see the commencement is good—a rallentando movement—like moonbeams playing on a waterfall! Some people will have it that all true melody has something sad in it. Nonsense. It may be so with some temperaments; but I rather think the melancholy must be in the heart first to perceive it in the music. As for me, I am too happy to fling a shadow on sweet sounds or on anything else.

"April 20.

"The ball is over. And, indeed—and again, indeed—it was a brilliant affair. But I have got the headache papa predicted. Perhaps I did dance rather too much; but, then, my partners were so numerous, so pressing, and so pleasant—all except my cousin Harcourt, who was most officiously disagreeable. N.B.—I cannot deny he is much improved in appearance—a handsome figure, with a peculiar tournure which none of the others had. He had just arrived in time for the ball, so I met him last night for the first time since his foreign campaign. I saw Mr. Sebright could not bear him; and poor Sir Harry Marchmont looked after me so wistfully as I was being handed down to supper by that odious Lionel! A man of the world, is he? Yes, if assurance makes one. How he rattled on to me about news at home and abroad with such a déjà vu air, and ‘cousined’ me ad libitum with his airy familiarity! I have no patience with his provoking ways. He thinks, I suppose, that he has only to talk and grin, and show his white teeth; and behold! his simple quondam playmate will immediately fall into fever fits of admiration! Oh, he little knows Laura! She is not to be wooed and won in a day. Wooed and won! what do I say? Are not the birds free? And what have I done that I should be cooped up within prison walls? At any rate, if ever I am so situated, you may rest assured, O worshipful cousin Lionel! that not with you will I share my captivity.

“My governess has just looked in to say that the hall door has been besieged all morning by my cavaliers of last night, inquiring—‘Comment je me porte ce matin?’ Several are now in the drawing-room with mamma, no doubt expecting my gracious presence. My cousin, it seems, is not among them. I think I shall go down.

“What an elegant young man Mr. Sebright is! His dark eyes beam with modest genius; he is fond of poetry, too—mayhap tunes the lyre himself. We (that is, he and I and the company generally) had got quite into a dissertation on the comparative claims of Pope and Dryden, and he was growing almost eloquent in his quaint style of talk, when lo! that forward Harcourt arrives, walks into the very centre of the dance circle, defines at a glance what we are all discussing, dashes into the subject with ready tact, and with his bravuerie and his brilliancy (as if he had been hand and glove with the Muses from infancy!) settles the whole question at issue in a moment with an irresistible coup d’état! Everybody was surprised. None of us, I believe, were foolish enough to look delighted—mamma particularly. And whenever Lionel uttered any very smart thing, I observed she stole a furtive glance at me, as though she would say, ‘See, Laura, how far your cousin transcends the rest!’

“Mamma has some meaning in this. But I have none of my own, and a will of my own. I am not inclined to see with her magnifying-glasses; and am old enough to judge of certain matters for myself.

“April 23.

“Yesterday, we had a large dinner-party at Mrs. Musgrave’s. Who could like these tedious state dinners of gastronomy, and plate, and solemn ceremonial! Is the culinary art no longer a science only, but raised to the rank of a cardinal virtue? What trivial remarks were offered in the dreary intervals of the more serious business! If we had not been dining, we should certainly have been yawning. Old Mr. Neville had the best of it, to my thinking, falling off into a doze ere the cloth was well removed!—Age and infirmity, of course, pleading his excuse. But all things have an end. The ladies are marshalled into the drawing-room; and I heave a deep sigh of relief as lovely Fanny Musgrave sits down to the piano, and sets the keys a-dancing to a fine bravura air.

“The first who forsook his wine in favour of the fair was Mr. Annealey—a tall, thin young gentleman, who skims the surface of society with a sort of indolent good breeding, and pays a lady a silly compliment as he passes along; one you scarce notice whether he comes or goes—a mere syllabub without a head. He was soon followed by Sir Henry Marchmont, Dr. Willoughby, and Mr. Sebright. The Doctor, who is quizzical, readily engaged me in conversation; Sir Harry ensconced himself near us, but could scarce get a word said for the other’s volubility; Mr. Sebright hovered about for a while on the confines of my sofa, and retired finally into a window-recess, to study a volume of engravings. Then came music; and here I was shortly summoned to play my part. Do what I would, I trembled all over when I was seated at the harp; and saw, or fancied I saw, so many eyes turned upon me. How I envied the perfect ease of the previous performers, who seemed to have no nerves, and passed as coolly through the ordeal as if they had been warbling in solitude under green leaves!

“While rehearsing the symphony, I heard some one enter the room very quietly, and was aware of a new figure standing behind me—another added to the group—a fresh pair of ears and eyes to witness my confusion! I repeated the symphony, to gain time and courage, and then began my song. I chose a simple one—an old thing I had known from childhood. Yet, simple as it was, I felt my tones quiver with an absurd agitation I could scarce control; my knees knocked against each other; my heart fluttered; and I thought I should have stopped, when a fine manly voice behind me insinuated a few accompanying notes with exquisite skill and grace. Thus encouraged, I was emboldened to proceed, and reached the conclusion—just saved, and no more, from absolute failure! Strange to tell, I was overwhelmed with compliments in spite of my bungling; and my vexation, meanwhile, was in nowise lessened by the discovery that my unknown assistant was no other than my forward cousin! Somehow, I was particularly mortified to be indebted to him, of all men; and, though he forbore speaking to or looking at me, I was provoked to have needed and involuntarily accepted his aid. Yet, had I been calm, I might have remembered that none but he could possibly have echoed that old, familiar air. One thing pleased me, however. When required to sing a second time, I plucked up a spirit, and acquitted myself decently, without extraneous help. After this, I could afford to give Lionel a civil hearing on his town news—for he was just returned from a brief sojourn in the metropolis. But oh! I hate to think of the whole affair.”

(To be continued.)

THE PRISON VAN.

BY THE EDITOR.

Often to weep and sometimes to rejoice
Is evermore the chequer’d lot of man:
“Keep up your heart!” I heard a woman’s voice
Shout to the inmate of a prison van;
And then the little group that with it ran
Prolong’d the plaintive cry—“Keep up your heart!”
“Lo! sin and weakness doing all they can,”
Sighing, I said, “to act a human part.”

Within that wheel’d receptacle of shame
My fancy drew a ruffian in tears;
Or some poor victim of a blasted name
Touch’d with the tenderness of early years:
The worst of humankind have griefs and fears
Even as the best; but, like a stroke of art,
What thrill’d me was the sympathy that endears
Utter’d in that one cry—“Keep up your heart!”

WASHINGTON IRVING AT SEVILLE.

In the "Life and Letters of Washington Irving"—at present in course of publication by his nephew, Pierre M. Irving—we find some delightful snatches from the pen of that graceful writer. The following is part of a letter written during his residence in Spain:—

"If ever you come to Seville, be sure to visit its glorious Cathedral. That, however, you will be sure to do; your good taste will not suffer you to keep away, but visit it more than once. Visit it in the evenings, when the last rays of the sun, or rather the last glimmer of the daylight, is shining through its painted windows. Visit it at night, when its various chapels are partially lighted up, its immense aisles are dimly illuminated by their rows of silver lamps, and when mass is preparing amidst gleams of gold and clouds of incense at its high altar. Visit it at those times; and, if possible, go alone, or with as few gay ladies and gentlemen as possible, for they are the worst kind of companions for a cathedral. I do not think altogether I have ever been equally delighted with any building of the kind. It is so majestic, ample, and complete; so sumptuous in all its appointments, and noble and august in its ceremonies. It is near the house where I lodged when in Seville, and was my daily resort. Indeed, I often visited it more than once in the course of the day. It is delightful to me to have a grand and solemn building of the kind near to me in a city. It is a resort where one gets rid of the noise, and nonsense, and littleness of the petty world around one, and can call up in some degree (though after all but slightly) a glow of solemn and poetical feeling—the most difficult of all sentiments to be summoned up in a city.

"A quiet saunter about a cathedral, particularly towards the evening, when the shades are deeper and the light of the painted windows more dim and vague, has the effect upon me of a walk in one of our great American forests. I cannot compare the scenes, but their sublime and solitary features produce the same dilation of the heart and swelling of the spirit; the same aspiring and longing after something exalted and indefinite; something—I know not what, but something which I feel this world cannot give me. When my eye follows up these great clustering columns until lost in the obscurity of the lofty and spacious vaults, I feel as I have done when gazing up along the trunks of our mighty trees that have stood for ages, and tracing them out to the topmost branches which tower out of the brown forest into the deep blue sky—my thoughts and feelings seem carried up with them until they expand and are lost in the immensity. I find I am running into very long tirades in this letter, and am spinning out thoughts for the want of facts to relate. But I have no domestic gossip nor the chit-chat of a circle of acquaintance to communicate, which are the lively and interesting materials for a letter; you must excuse, therefore, my prosing. Give my love to all my dear little friends of the round table, from the discreet princess down to the little blue-eyed boy. Tell la petite Marie that I still remain true to her, though surrounded by all the beauties of Seville; and that I swear (but this she must keep between ourselves) that there is not a little woman to compare with her in all Andalusia."

In a subsequent letter, Mr. Irving gives his impressions of Spanish beauty:—

"What can I tell you of Seville that you have not heard a thousand times? I know nothing of its inhabitants, for I have not mingled with them. As to the famed beauty of its women, I am inclined to set it down as one of those traditional things that has commenced in fact, and been handed down from age to age, and from traveller to traveller, though it has long since become a falsehood. There are beautiful women in Seville as (God be praised for all His mercies!) there are in all other great cities; but do not, my worthy and inquiring friend—do not come to Seville as I did, expecting a perfect beauty to be staring you in the face at every turn, or you will be awfully disappointed. Andalusia, generally speaking, derives its renown for the beauty of its women and the beauty of its landscapes, from the rare and captivating charms of individuals. The generality of its female faces are as sunburned and void of bloom and freshness as its plains. I am convinced the great fascination of Spanish women arises from their natural talent, their fire and soul, which beam through their dark, flashing eyes, and kindle up their whole countenance in the course of an interesting conversation. As I have but few opportunities of judging of them in this way, I can only criticise them with the eye of a sauntering observer. It is like judging of a fountain when it is not in play, or a fire when it lies dormant, and neither flames nor sparkles. After all, it is the divinity within which makes the divinity without; and I have been more fascinated by a woman of talent and intelligence, though deficient in personal charms, than I have been by the most regular beauty."

ELIZA.

[MARRIED, 10th August 1861.—DIED, 29th August 1862.]

A YEAR ago I married her—
My peerless angel wife;
One little year, and death hath come
To sever life from life.

A year of love! How sweet it was!
And ah, how swift it sped!
Was it a dream—her love—her life?
A dream that she is dead!

Is it a dream that words of love
Were in her latest breath?—
A dream she look'd, and smiled on me,
Even in the grasp of death?

Is it a dream the angels came
And bore her soul away;
And left me, for the wife I loved,
A form of speechless clay?

Ah, no! I wander o'er my house
In solitude and gloom,
And meet with traces of her hand
In every silent room;

And tokens of her constant love
Appear in every scene,
To tell me what my present is,
And what my past hath been.

I need not stand beside the grave
In which her ashes rest
To know that I am lone on earth,
And she is with the blest.

A thousand mem'ries, wants, regrets,
Perplexities, and fears,
Remind me of my bitter loss,
And move my frequent tears.

My tears! They flow unheeded now.
Alas! it was not so
With her who heighten'd all my joys,
And banish'd every woe.

But wherefore should my heart be sad
That she has gone before;
And woe me to a brighter home,
Where every grief is o'er?

Oh, rather let my prayers arise,
Benignant Heaven! to Thee,
For wings of faith to soar to her,
When death hath set me free!

D. G.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 S. Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

LIDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 3.]

SATURDAY, OCT. 18, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

DOUBT AND FAITH. AN APOLOGUE.

DOUBT is the father and Faith is the mother of Knowledge; and the marriage of the pair and the birth of their radiant babe came about in the following manner:—Once upon a time, Doubt roamed up and down the world, in great perplexity of spirit, seeking his friends; whom, from a slight defect in his eyes, he had some difficulty in discovering. At the same time, Faith traversed the earth in equal perturbation; but her difficulty arose from her inability to avoid her enemies, who thronged thick and fast upon her wherever she went. It chanced that Doubt and Faith met one evening, after a long day's journey, at a little inn at the foot of a mountain; and, in course of conversation, they discovered that each possessed the very power of which the other was most deficient. Ere they went to sleep they did each other essential service. Doubt, strong-handed and iron-willed, repulsed the enemies of Faith, and made her slumbers as calm as a seraph's; while Faith, most reliant in soul and spiritual in perception and speech, brought the friends of Doubt to his lonely chamber, and enabled him to spend one of the happiest nights of his life. Next day, they both rose with the lark, and their souls were full of music. They engaged in conversation; and again, during this and many succeeding days, they exchanged mutual help and became partial to each other's society. Indeed, in their sojourn at the inn, all idea of time seemed to be banished from their minds—so pleasantly and profitably did the hours grow into days, the days into weeks, the weeks into months, until the months had completed a whole year. When at last they began to think of wending their several ways, they discovered that it was utterly impossible to live apart from each other without producing a vast weakness and vacuity in their lives. Doubt could not live without Faith, nor Faith without Doubt. In the darkness of their impending separation, the star of love shone out, and revealed to both the true condition of their hearts. Marriage, they felt—and were compelled to confess—was their only possible chance of happiness. And so they were married; and, uniting their several virtues and gifts, their mutual service was rendered with endless benefit to both—Doubt unmasking and repelling the enemies of Faith; and Faith, with the golden persuasion of her seraphic tongue, attracting and retaining the truest friends of melancholy Doubt. In due season, by the smooth revolving of the sacred and inevitable laws, a beautiful broad-browed babe was born to the pair, to whom they gave the name of Knowledge. Then were they truly happy; for then only did they find out the full significance of the tie by which they had become one in purpose and one in soul. Not that they were entirely free from care. True happiness does not imply such freedom. Henceforth their united efforts were directed to the training and education of their son, who, as his name implies, was a youth of peculiar genius. At first, both his physical growth and intellectual progress were singularly unpromising; and he showed signs, occasionally, of some mysterious mental perversion. For instance, at certain seasons he would believe, as pure gospel, every story—however silly, improbable, or fantastical—which any of his schoolfellows chose to relate. At other times he would hardly believe anything, however authentic. He was now and then suspicious even of truth. It will be seen that, in the due culture and correction of these opposite qualities, the combined abilities of his parents would be called admirably into operation. This was indeed the case; and most tenderly did they fulfil the irksome yet sublime duties of teacher to their only child. Whenever the youthful Knowledge manifested signs of extreme credulity, it was the duty as well as the delight of his father, Doubt, to suggest to the open-minded student that particular statements were either partially true or wholly false; and then to teach him the method of testing every proposition maintained on what appeared to be insufficient testimony. Again, when the deep-eyed youth got into one of his sceptical or profoundly unreceptive moods, it was the great delight of Faith—his beautiful, reliant mother—to have him brought to the altar of her knee, where she smoothed down the obstinate questionings of his darker mind without sacrificing any principle of philosophy or religion. There was a divinely insinuating melody in the simplest motions of her tongue which never failed to make the young lad feel as if he were drinking in thrice-filtered music, falling from those sweet organ-alembics which are continually pouring their soft streams of harmony around the invisible throne of Heaven! Thus, by the tender watchfulness and intelligent management of his loving parents, did Knowledge grow strong in body and large in mind: and is so growing at the present hour. He never has escaped—and will not for many years to come—the troubles and dangers which are incident to his complicated career. But he will become pure and wise betimes—in proportion, indeed, as his discrimination or selective and rejective faculties ripen in breadth and precision. He is taught that to take everything on trust is to expose himself to the wildest impositions of fools, rogues, and dreamers; and that to take nothing on trust is to insult his father and mother, who are not, as the ignorant would have us believe, mere Disbelief and Credulity. Doubt is the arch-investigator, the discriminator, the enemy of falsehood, and defender of Faith; while Faith is that angel in whose radiant and capacious bosom is garnered all truth, whether as the fruit of investigation, intuition, or revelation. But as Doubt has a human pedigree and Faith a divine one, Knowledge, their only child, is related both to earth and heaven. He is, nevertheless, endowed with the power of so working and advancing, as ultimately to free himself from all gross human elements; of escaping from the trusk of materiality; and at last taking his position on high among the glorified hosts.

F.

FAMILIAR PHRASES.

A CERTAIN satirist has said that were Shakspeare now to rise, he would stare with wonder

"To find the meaning out of what he wrote."

The reference is, of course, to those clever commentators who put interpretations upon plain language beyond what the author intended. A similar amount of invention has been displayed by certain literary antiquaries in attempting to trace the origin of familiar words and phrases. The exclamations "Ge-ho!" and "Heit!" to a horse, have been dated back to classic times; while the interjection "Bo!" used to frighten children, has been traced to a ferocious general of that name under the mythic Odin. Who would have fancied that the proverb "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush" needed any explanation? Yet our antiquaries have narrated that it arose from Lord Surrey, in the reign of Henry the Eighth, having given a kingfisher to Somers, the king's jester, which he afterwards wished to have back. His lordship promised him two at some other time, if he would return the one in his possession; and was met, according to the story, with the famous answer in question. Now, if such an incident really took place, the probability is that the answer of the fool was nothing more than a happy application of the proverbial saying. True, that saying must have originated with some one; but to give it the literal origin of an actual bird in the hand being preferred to a couple of birds in prospect, is to deprive it of much of its poetic force as an exemplification of cautious policy. In like manner, the phrase, "By hook or by crook," is said to have arisen in the time of Charles I. when there were two learned judges named Hooke and Croke; and when a difficult cause would be settled by either the one or the other. But, unfortunately for this explanation, the phrase was used more than once by Spenser nearly a century earlier. In the "Faerie Queene" occurs the line—

"The which her sire had scrap't by hooke and crooke:"

and elsewhere, in the same poem—

"In hopes her to attain by hooke and crooke."

Of course, it is quite possible that the phrase might be applied by the punsters of Charles's time to the judges whose names held out such obvious temptations to their wit; but the words had in all likelihood no other origin than that which they themselves, with their quaint simi-linity of sound, suggest. To give a person "A bone to pick," is a proverbial phrase suggestive of a hard task, and is synonymous with the equally common phrase of giving such a one "A nut to crack." Yet even these words, so likely to suggest themselves to any one who had ever picked a bone or seen a bone picked, our ingenious Jonathan Oldbucks must account for by stating that they arose from an old marriage custom in Sicily—according to which the bride's father gave the bridegroom a bone, saying, "Pick this, in order to show that you can manage a wife, which is more difficult than picking a bone." This is far-fetched indeed. Almost equally absurd is it to ascribe the phrase "A feather in your cap" to the old practice of Indian warriors putting a feather in their caps for every victim they killed. A feather in the cap is a mark of distinction not peculiar to the Indians; and, to use it as a simile for any honour won, is simply a figurative way of saying that such a one is entitled to carry his head high. Again, it seems to be quite gratuitous to assert that the proverb "A dirty bird defiles its own nest" originated with John Knox, who is alleged to have used it in reference to the supposed complicity of Mary Queen of Scots in the murder of Darnley. The probability is that it is much older, and had a thousand homely applications long before it was elevated into that historical dignity. How could it occur to any one that such a phrase as "The biter bit" required to be traced back to a Lord Chancellor, who is said to have used it in allusion to the case of a certain Bishop Tonstall, who, desiring to suppress Tyndale's works, arranged to have them bought up; but at such an extravagant price that Tyndale was enabled, with the proceeds, to issue a second edition? Equally preposterous does it appear to account for the term "Skinflint"—applied to a miserly fellow—by alleging that a certain caliph named Abd-al-malek was surnamed Raschal Hednah, or "The skinner of a flint." Surely this is the very mad-gallop of archaeological research!

It is clear that such phrases as "Chip of the old block," "Diamond cut diamond," "Neither rhyme nor reason," "Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones," and the like—phrases having an obvious meaning in themselves—do not stand in need of any learned explanation whatever. Yet these are the very class of proverbial expressions on which our archaeological friends exert the greatest amount of ingenuity. Take, for example, the glass-house aphorism. It is gravely told that some of the courtiers of James I. amused themselves by squirting pebbles through a tube at the windows of the citizens; whereupon, Buckingham, the leader in this frolic, had the windows of his own mansion, which happened to be unusually numerous, attacked and smashed by the pebbles, an incident which—so at least the story goes—issued from the lips of the king the rebuke expressed in the proverb. To the same monarch is attributed the case "The proof of the pudding is the eating of it"—His Majesty having, with these words, cut short a panegyric on a certain dish at table. But what evidence is there that the phrase was not in common use at the time? In like manner, the phrase "It's an ill wind that blows nobody good" is attributed to the wreckers of Cornwall, referring to the frequency of wrecks from whatever point of the compass the wind may come—a somewhat forced derivation. To take another example, why should the verse "While the grass grows the steed starves" be traced to a traveller in Lincolnshire, who, on asking a Cornish farmer for food for his horse, was told to wait until a grew? "Shutting the stable-door when the steed is stolen" equally speaks for itself, without tracing it to an old Mayor of Chester, who caused a gate through which his daughter had been carried off to be shut up. The phrase "When rogues fall out honest men come by their own" is ascribed to Sir Matthew Hale, in reference to a couple of litigants detected in a combination to lease a ferry to the injury of the proprietor; but it is quite as likely to have been a current phrase which Sir Matthew merely quoted. "Never look a gift horse in the mouth" is a perfectly natural lesson in politeness, and does not need the tragic incident to account for it, of a Carlisle farmer having had his nose bitten off from neglect of that wholesome rule.

On the other hand, there are many familiar phrases which require explanation, and to which it would be well for the learned in this department to confine their inquiries. "Under the rose" is a phrase of this kind. It has been attributed to party secrets communicated—during the war between the rival houses of York and Lancaster—to the partisans of the Red or White Rose. But this derivation is too simple. Accordingly, it is traced back to an ancient period, when the rose was the emblem of silence. Roses were then, it seems, worn in the head at entertainments, or painted in the ceiling; and all conversation "under the rose" was understood to go no farther. "Paying too dear for one's whistle" belongs, of course, to Franklin, whose little story on the subject is among the best things in "Poor Richard's Almanac." The term "Printer's devil" might fairly have arisen from the usually inky aspect of printers' apprentices; but a couple of more abstruse derivations are given. One, that it arose from the early printers in Germany being supposed to be in league with the Evil One; and another, from the circumstance of Caxton, the first English printer, having in his employment an apprentice named De Ville. "Why don't you dun him?" was a phrase which arose in the town of Lincoln as long ago as the reign of Henry VII. It referred to a certain John Dun, a famous bailiff, whose name, like that of Burke the murderer, has added a new word to the language. "Jack Ketch," as a generic term for hangman, originated in a similar manner—one John Ketch, in 1682, having officiated with distinction in London as the Craftsman of his day. "As drunk as David's sow" is not in such common use as it was at one time. It was suggested by an incident in the life of one David Lloyd, an innkeeper at Hereford. This individual had a pig with six legs, which he was accustomed to exhibit to the curious. On one occasion, however, it happened that his wife, who was greatly addicted to inebriety, had let out the pig, and lain down in the sty herself, where she fell into a deep sleep. In this position she was discovered by a party of visitors—poor David having first pointed to the sty, and unwittingly exclaimed, "There's the sow!" The phrase "Saving one's bacon" is said to have arisen from the efforts of the country people to conceal their bacon from Cromwell's soldiers. "Not fit to hold the candle to him"—a phrase implying inferiority—is usually traced back to the time when links or torches were held, on festive occasions, by boys and menials. The description of a lazy fellow who would contribute nothing to the festivities, as one who would "Neither dance nor hold the candle," must likewise be referred back to that period. "Fitting to a T" was probably derived from the mark on the ice in the Scotch game of curling being called a tee. "That's the thing to a T!" would be exclaimed when the exact point was reached and no more. The phrase "Mind your P's and Q's" might have originated in the difficulty which children have in discriminating between the p and the q; but the usual explanation is sufficiently satisfactory—namely, that taverners were at one time in the habit of chalking P. and Q. as abbreviations for pints and quarts; in which case it would, of course, be important that bibaceous guests should mind their P's and Q's, both that they might not drink too much and that they might not be overcharged. "Hobson's choice" originated with a horse-hirer named Hobson, in Cambridge, who, when any one wanted a horse, always produced the one which had been longest in stable, saying, "This, or none." The ancient Germans drank mead—a beverage made with honey—for thirty days after every wedding; but, perhaps, the term "Honeymoon" does not stand in need of this literal explanation. To "Bear the bell" is attributed to a little golden bell having at one time been the chief prize at the York races; but it more probably arose from the leader of a team or flock "bearing the bell." "Dining with Duke Humphrey" means not dining at all. It seems that one of the aisles in St. Paul's frequented by loungers was called "Duke Humphrey's Walk;" and that gallants unable to procure a dinner were accustomed to loiter there during meal-time. "Grinning like a Cheshire cat" refers to the crest of an influential family in Cheshire. An amusing origin is ascribed to the phrase "Catching a Tartar." It is related by Capt. Grose that, in an oriental skirmish, an Irishman called out to his officer, "I have caught a Tartar!" "Bring him here, then," was the reply. "He wont let me," shouted Pat, on finding himself carried off captive!

There is something wonderful in the tenacity with which such phrases keep their place in the popular language of a country. In order, however, that they may endure, they must have some special wit or significance. As for the phrases which take hold, from time to time, of the wags of London—such as "Does your mother know you're out?" "Who's your hatter?" or, to take the newest, "How's your poor feet?"—they must pass away with the ephemeral laughers to which they give rise; probably to be succeeded by others equally destined, after a brief and uproarious career, to be forgotten.

THE LOVE LEGACY.

BY A VILLAGE DOCTOR.

I HAD seen my early boyhood
Blighted by a father's death;
Seen my gentle, widowed mother
Striving with chill poverty—
Many weary winters striving,
With pale cheek and panting breath,
Ever praying, "Keep my children
From the world's temptations free!"

I had watched that darling mother
Through long nights of wasting pain,
While I soothed my little sister
With fond hopes my heart belied;
Till one balmy April morning,
Bright with sunshine after rain,
I became that sister's guardian
At our dying mother's side.

Then she prayed that God might keep us!
Turned a fond and yearning look
On my little sister, Annie,
As she breathed her sad behest—
"Listen, darlings, and remember!
In my desk you'll find a Book;
Do as I have there directed—
'Tis your mother's last request."

Oh! the dreary separation!
Oh! the weary weight of woe,
As I led my little sister
From that sad and silent room!
Oh! the utter desolation
When I laid my mother low
In the cold, cold grave; and left her
'Mid the church-yard's ghastly gloom!

Well for me I had a sister
Waiting for me, all alone;
Trusting, clinging to her brother
As her only friend and guide.
Well my mother knew my nature,
When she gave the little one
To my charge. I fain had laid me
In the cold earth by her side;

But I thought of little Annie
Weeping in our lonely home;
And I thought upon the promise
To my dying mother given.
I would keep that promise sacred;
Poverty and want might come,
But I'd guard her little daughter
Till we met once more in heaven.

I was now fifteen; and Annie,
Little Annie, was but nine;
I was in a merchant's office,
With a salary so small
That it barely served to clothe me.
How could income such as mine
Keep us living? Thus I pondered,
Leaning on the church-yard wall.

Then those words went thrilling through me—
"In my desk you'll find a Book;"
And the weary load was lightened
Which had nearly stopped my breath.
I would go to little Annie;
And, together, we should look
At the sacred pages, written
By her hand—now cold in death.

Slowly, sadly, then I left her;
Slowly, sadly, sought my home;
At the door my little sister
Met me, with a pale, sweet face;—
Met me, with my mother's welcome;
Took my hand and bade me come—
As my mother used to lead me—
To my old, accustomed place.

I had thought to see her grieving,
As a child is wont to do;
Grieving, mourning for her mother—
Weeping, haply, till she slept.
Now, to find her grave and thoughtful,
With her table spread for two,
Quite unnerved my trembling manhood,
And I sat me down and wept.

Then the little girl—woman
Wound her arms around my neck;
Sitting on my knee, she whispered—
"I know something will remove
All your sad forebodings, Harry!
I know something that will check
Those sad tears." "What is it, darling?"
"Tis our mother's Book of Love.

"When you left, my heart was breaking,
And I wished that I was dead;
But I felt that wish was sinful:
Oh! I knew not what to do;
Till I thought of mother's death-bed—
How she looked—and what she said;
Then I read the Book she left us.
Harry! you must read it too.

"First, my boy! you'll take your dinner"
 (Twas my mother's words again);
 For she saw that I had risen
 For the Book; but that desire
 Stopped me—as if one had spoken
 From the dead; so I remain
 While she wheels her little table
 Close beside the parlour fire.

And I watch my tiny housewife;
 See her place our simple meal;
 Close the door; then, turning gravely,
 Seat her in our mother's chair.
 "Oh, my darling sister, Annie!
 I can never cease to feel
 That you were my guardian angel—
 Saving me from blank despair!"

See us, by the flickering fire-light,
 Bending o'er that blessed Book—
 All our dread anticipations
 Charmed, by mother-love, away.
 Revelations, strange and startling,
 Dawn upon us as we look;
 Years of self-imposed privations;
 Rules to guide us, day by day.

Many years before, my father
 Left his home one summer day—
 Left my mother bright and happy,
 Dreading neither grief nor pain.
 Ah! how soon dark clouds may gather!
 He was scarce an hour away
 When they brought him, pale and bleeding;
 And he never spoke again.

I was bounding through the garden,
 Chasing a wild honey-bee;
 And my mother's merry laughter
 Echoed round me, clear and gay,
 When we heard his horse returning;
 And I climbed the wall to see.
 Ah! what meant that strange procession,
 Moving slowly round the bay—

Moving slowly, 'mid the sorrow
 Of a still-increasing crowd?
 Weeping mothers clasped their infants—
 Little sick ones saved from death;
 Men, whose sunbrowned cheeks were strangers
 To a tear-drop, wept aloud;
 And the children, grouped in clusters,
 With pale cheeks and 'bated breath.

Still I think I see them moving,
 Slowly, in the summer light;
 Hear that murmur rising, falling,
 Like the sobbing of the sea;
 Gaze upon that bleeding forehead,
 And the face so ghastly white;
 Surely that is not my father—
 Oh! no, no; it cannot be!

And I saw the aged pastor
 Stop them ere they reached the gate—
 Caution them to follow slowly,
 While he hurried on before.
 Ah! kind Nature had prepared her—
 The good pastor came too late;
 For he found her pale and lifeless,
 Stretched beside the garden door.

Then I thought I must be dreaming
 As I lay upon the wall,
 For these horrors passed before me
 So unlike reality.
 But I knew the men who bore him,
 Heard their voices rise and fall;
 Smelled the heavy-honeyed fragrance
 Of my own laburnum tree.

Lying, 'mid its golden tassels,
 Listening to its whispering leaves,
 Soon I saw them moving forward—
 Guided by that gray-haired man;
 And I heard the swallows twittering
 In their nest, beneath the eaves;
 Saw the children hastening homeward,
 Breathing heavy as they ran.

And, behind them, slowly followed
 One who shunned all humankind,
 Save the friend whose hat he carried
 With a mastiff's jealous care.
 Poor lame Laurence, sad and lonely—
 Weak in body, warped in mind—
 Tolling onward, slow and weary,
 With a face of dark despair.

What to him though tens of thousands
 Cumbered still God's smiling earth?
 Only one of all the many Sought the poor deformed one's good;
 Only one had ever taught him
 What the cripple's soul was worth.
 Must he lose that friend, whose counsel
 Cheered him more than daily food?

And he scowled upon the children,
 Who, in terror, fled away;
 Scowled upon the mothers, weeping
 Tears that would be dried ere morn;
 Scowled upon the stalwart fathers
 Who had borne him round the bay,
 Who had wept soft, soothing tear-drops;—
 While his eye-balls burned with scorn.

Then he questioned them abruptly,
 "Have you left him? Is he dead?
 Breathing still? Will no one aid him—
 Him! who saved so many lives?
 When the fever raged among you,
 Who sat, fearless, by your bed?
 Who restored your dying children?
 Who relieved your suffering wives?"

"Oh, my friend! my more than brother!
 Would that I were straight of limb!
 Would to God this crooked body
 Had the power to match the will!
 I would run o'er miles of moorland
 For a friend to succour him;
 God knows he should want for neither
 Nurse's care nor surgeon's skill!"

And his burning words aroused them,
 For they hastened to the shore;
 Launched a boat; and soon I saw them
 Far across the shining bay;
 While poor Laurence sought the cottage—
 Lingered, sadly, by the door;
 Humbly prayed for leave to enter
 Where my dying father lay.

Never nurse with softer footfall
 Watched beside a bed of pain;
 Never nurse with touch more tender
 Bathed a suffering patient's head.
 Doctors from the nearest city
 Came in haste—alas! in vain:
 Ere they reached our distant village
 He was numbered with the dead.

How distinctly I remember
 Gazing, sad, across the sea,
 Watching for that boat returning;
 Sobbing, till I sank to rest;
 Sleeping 'mid the summer breezes,
 Lulled by that laburnum tree;
 Waking up, as if a millstone
 Had been laid upon my breast!

Creeping homeward, hungry, weary;
Longing, yet afraid to hear
That it really was my father

I had seen—so ghastly white!
But my home looked sad and dreary,
And I dared not venture near;
So I wandered till the twilight
Deepened down to starry night.

Then I heard I had no father;
Heard my mother was laid low—
Crushed, by suffering and sorrow.

When we met, I scarce could trace
My young mother's rosy beauty
In those features, wan with woe;
And I saw her tear-drops falling,
Slowly, on a baby's face.

Thus it was that little Annie
Dawned upon us in the night
Of our sorrow—like a sunbeam
Through dark clouds of thunder-rain;
Till her mother's tear-drops sparkled,
As they trembled in the light
Of her holy, infant beauty,
Lightening half her load of pain;

Forming there a bow of promise
That the Lord no more would bring
Such a flood of bitter anguish
As had overwhelmed her heart;
For our dove of peace had lighted,
With soft healing on her wing;
So, the weary one was strengthened
Bravely to perform her part.

And she rose up, pale and tranquil;
But her light laugh rang no more
Through the garden, in the sunshine,
As it did that fatal day
When his horse, without a rider,
Came and stood beside the door,
And we saw that sad procession
Moving round the silvery bay.

Then we left our native village;
Left our cottage by the shore;
Left poor Laurence watching sadly
Where his "friend the doctor" lay.
And our mother's Book now told us—
After many years were o'er
She received a farewell letter
From her old friend, Laurence Grey:—

"Dearest Madam,—Ere this reach you,
Laurence Grey will be no more!
Life has been a weary burden;
Death will be a glorious gain.
I shall meet my friend the doctor
On that bright and blessed shore—
Straight of limb, and tall of stature,
Fresh from suffering, free from pain.

"I bequeath unto his widow
All that I possess on earth.
I bequeath unto his children
Blessings for their father's sake.
Guide them in their father's footsteps;
Tell them of their father's worth.
Oh, to fall asleep in sorrow!
Oh, to meet him when I wake!"

Poor lame Laurence left our mother
What to her was wondrous wealth,
Raising from her heart the burden
Which had caused her panting breath.
But, alas! it could not save her—
Riches may not purchase health,
Though they lighten up the shadows
Which o'erhang the Vale of Death!

Now, our mother, too, had left us;
We were in the world alone,
Clinging fondly to each other;
Trusting that the Almighty arm—
Which upheld her faltering footsteps
Through the sorrows she had known—
Would protect us now, and keep us
Safe from suffering—free from harm!

Still we felt that she was near us,
Though we heard her voice no more;
Though Eternity's dim shadows
Hid her from our yearning sight,
She was there to guide and cheer us
As we turned those pages o'er;
As we read each kind "Good morning"—
Lingered o'er each loved "Good night."

Long we sat with arms entwining,
Smiling brightly through our tears,
Gaining strength and consolation
From those links of mother-love.
Like a golden chain it led us
Onward through the coming years;
Binding us on earth together,
Guiding us to Heaven above.

Every morning, ere we parted,
She was with us, as of yore;
Every evening found us reading
In our mother's precious Book,
Household words, whose quiet humour
Dimpled Annie's young face o'er
With the smiles on which her mother
Loved, so dearly loved, to look.

No sad thoughts were there to grieve us;
No deep cares to bow the head—
Far into the distant future
All was kindly wisely planned.
We had but to trust, and follow
Where that golden love-chain led—
Happy that we still were guided
By our gentle mother's hand.

And we passed our quiet evenings
Talking of the days gone by—
Talking of our darling mother
As I knew her long ago.
And my little sister listened,
With flushed cheek and open eye,
While I told her of the father
She was destined ne'er to know.

Years have passed, and little Annie—
Little Annie now no more,
But a tall and graceful maiden—
Like a sunbeam, lights my hearth.
I am now the village doctor,
In that cottage by the shore,
Following in my father's footsteps—
Hearing daily of his worth;

Wandering in the sunny garden
Where I chased the honey-bee;
Leaning on the wall, where sorrow
Sent the sobbing boy to rest;
Sitting, on the summer evenings,
Under the laburnum tree,
Listening to the happy twitter
Of the swallows in their nest;

Walking, on the Sabbath morning,
To the old church on the hill—
There to praise the God who kept us
"From the world's temptations free!"
There to bless the gentle mother
Who, though dead, yet speaketh still,
By her own life's pure example,
And her rare Love Legacy!

J. P. H.

A YOUNG LADY'S CARDIPHONIA IN THE LAST CENTURY (Continued).

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

"April 24.

"Mamma says I must learn to subdue emotion, for none but ignorant or silly persons ever show what they feel. This advice is for the thousandth time within the last six months. She complains to Mdlle. Hortense that I am not half precise in my sayings and doings—not sufficiently cut and squared (I suppose she means) into the ways of other young ladies. Now, my dearest mamma, and my sweet, patient governess! let me ask you one question—Do you really wish to make an automaton of your poor daughter and pupil? And will you stretch this vexed question of the proprieties so far, that a respectable puppet will be all the result of your affectionate cares? Is it for this that I have read and studied—pored over my favourite authors and nursed my rainbow dreams—merely that I might hide henceforth each thought and feeling they have engendered; and present a cold, monotonous surface to the outer world? Then birds are better than human beings; and I wish I were one of them!

"Riding out with papa this afternoon on my darling little Arabian, and bounding over the heath, we had just come to a sharp turn in the road when a sudden breeze caught my hat, and away it flew over the hedge! Poor papa's gouty habit left him powerless to recover it; Joseph was a long way behind, cantering at leisure, in total ignorance of the mishap; and there was I, a forlorn spectacle, with my hair streaming to the breeze, while I gazed woe-begone and wistful after my truant head-gear. When, all of a trice—just as if he had lighted there for the purpose—up dashes my cousin on his bay hunter, clears the hedge at a bound; and, stooping for an instant, catches my stray hat as if by magic on the end of his long riding-whip; then over the green barrier once more with another leap, and presents it to me with a bow and a smile of quiet exultation!

"Lionel! where did you drop from?" I ask, astonished.

"From the clouds, whence I am commissioned by Jupiter to watch over you unseen by night and by day." These last words almost in a whisper.

"I could not thank him, I felt so piqued by his assumption. By what right did he thus constitute himself my knight-errant elect? I did not speak, but merely put on my hat with a courteous gesture. One of the feathers was broken. I plucked off the piece and threw it from me. Harcourt caught it dexterously as it floated in mid air, and stuck it, laughingly, in front of his own hat.

"You must allow me to wear this trophy, Laura. The fashion is new, I allow; but I flatter myself it is not unbecoming."

"He looked so radiant and happy, and the piece of feather swung and nodded so comically in its novel position, that I could scarce retain my gravity.

"Fine feathers make fine birds," I said; "and, since you come from the clouds, your plumage is quite in character."

"Hereupon papa, who had stayed his horse a few paces distant during this episode, cried out, 'Good morning, Harcourt! I have a friend to visit some miles off; you can take care of Laura,' and turned down a side-path. Joseph stood waiting for orders.

"Follow your master," quoth Don Quixote, with lively readiness; and away trotted the groom; while we two were left standing vis-à-vis on the broad high road.

"Whither away?" he inquired, gaily. "North, south, east, or west? The world is all before you where to choose."

"There was something so self-satisfied in the expression of my cousin's face at this moment, that I felt my old provocation rising anew. So I spoke curtly. 'Home, I think,' and turned my steed in that direction. I expected his countenance would have fallen, but it did not. Neither did he attempt a word of dissuasion; but evinced a delighted alacrity to accompany me. This galled me; so I broke my Arabian into a saucy canter, to get the sooner to my journey's end.

"Fair and softly," cried my companion, ambling jauntily by my side. 'How long do you fancy it will take to reach your own hall-door? Perhaps you dread rain; and I must confess it does look threatening.'

"This last suggestion, seeing that the sky was purely blue and beautiful, sounded simply meaningless and absurd. Not so the arch look that attended it; and had it not been for the grotesque figure he cut, with that fragment of scarlet feather still bobbing in front of his chapeau, I could have felt half-inclined to quarrel with him. As it was, I merely looked aside to conceal my physiognomy; and, under a sudden impulse of contradiction, darted at an angle down a green lane to the left, and so regained the heath—which was certainly not on the way homeward. Of course, he continued holding on by my steps, and I led him a very pretty chase of a good hour or more, up hill and down dale; completing to the full my original intention of being a reasonable time on horseback that day. At length, as the sun was just setting, the Castle came in sight. Every window was gleaming like a fairy palace. I felt fatigued with the previous exercise, and let the reins drop on my palfrey's neck. There is something in the sight of fine old architecture that always moves me. Add to this the many sweet associations that cluster round my own dear home, and there is no marvel that I never can behold its antique towers and noble arches without indefinable feelings of romantic and admiring interest. My cousin had noted my mood. Nothing escapes his lynx-like regards. (Mem.—I hate these violently-observant people, before whom we can scarcely call our thoughts our own.) For he began trilling, in a kind of sotto voce, the air, 'O stay at home, my Phillis fair!' I silenced him with a look. I was in too grave a humour for badinage. We were riding very slowly. Neither spoke. I was gazing intently on the lovely picture before us. The coup-d'œil was superb. The venerated mansion stood forth like a magnificent queen sparkling with a thousand jewels. The old woods, just bursting into summer, encamped round about her in green and guardian pride. The river meandered in quiet beauty through the rich meadows. In lordly grandeur the blue hills stretched far away in the distance. The air was of that delicious temperature—cool but not chill, balmy but not oppressive—that ravishes the sense with its exquisite fulness. My eyes moistened; and to conceal this I stooped to stroke Fenella's mane. It was an idle ruse. He uttered not a syllable, yet I felt that Harcourt was reading my very soul. Had it been any one but he who was at my side—papa, mamma, Hortense, or even little silly Jessica—I might have relieved my throbbing heart by giving expression to my enthusiasm. But to my cousin!—the scholar, the traveller, the man of the world, the spy upon my every thought and action—how could I reveal myself to him? Impossible! So we paced on in silence—the horrid creature actually seeming to have all his pulses beating in unison with mine, under the sweet influences of the scene; till at last, just as we were entering the Castle gate, he said, in a subdued yet earnest voice—

“What wondrous pictures and poems have been in your mind for the last few minutes, Laura! And no marvel, for earth is very fair on a night like this.”

“Again I was provoked; I did not wish for his sympathy. My mood changed in an instant. I looked up at him bravely. There was the absurd morsel of red feather dangling from his hat, in ludicrous contrast with the grave face. I laughed outright.”

“You may go back now to Jupiter and your native clouds,” I said; “for here I am once more at my own sublunary dwelling.”

“Just then mamma appeared on the lawn, and advanced smiling, as if well pleased to see us together.”

“You have got Lionel with you, my darling!” she exclaimed. I left them talking; and, waving my hand gaily in token of adieu, went briskly forward towards the house. Then quickly alighting, I consigned my Arabian to a groom who was loitering about in expectation of the charge, and ran up stairs to my own apartment. Having locked my door, and thrown off my riding-habit, I walked straight to the mirror, and was mortified to see traces of the emotion I had so lately sought to subdue still visible in my glistening eyelids. Why will this forward cousin be for ever throwing himself in my way? Why do papa and mamma always make him so welcome here? Oh! I see it plain enough. There is a plot among them to promote an attachment between us. But I will not have my affections controlled in this way. I do not care to please that man;—and I won’t!

“Strong in this determination, I felt quite a heroine, and rang for my maid. She came immediately.”

“Well, Jessica; any news?”

“Yes, ma’am; a great deal of news? Mr. Sebright has been here and Dr. Willoughby; and Sir Harry Marchmont brought his sister to introduce to Mrs. Stanley; and old Lady Swinton called in her new barouche; and young Captain Swinton, who is home from Ireland with his regiment, rode by the side of it, looking so handsome in that splendid Hussar uniform! They were invited to remain at the Castle over the evening, and agreed. Then your papa arrived with your uncle Arlington.”

“And of course Mr. Harcourt stays to dinner,” added Mdlle. Hortense, who had glided into the chamber unawares—Et voilà tout!

“There, thought I, Harcourt again! and why ‘of course?’ But I will not be fooled. Swinton is an empty head; yet he may serve a purpose.”

“O Hortense! what a day of loveliness! How I wish you had been with me in my ride! My pale-blue silk, Jessica;—and please put a white rose in my hair at the left side.”

“My governess smiled. I did not quite like the character of her smile. I said nothing, however. And soon after the gong sounded, and I went down stairs.”

“May 2

“I will not submit to this any longer. Every day for the last week has Lionel been at the Castle; and now he goes in and out and over all the house almost as if it were his own;—always received, too, with open arms by my parents, and treated like one of the family! And why not? if they like his society—which I don’t. And so from this day I must begin to show him. I will not be made over to his care on all occasions as is the fashion at present. The thing is ridiculous. I cannot walk, ride, sit at home, or visit abroad, but my cousin is sure to be at my elbow. Everybody makes way for him; and I am the mere puppet of obedience. It is too bad. He claims my hand in the dance, and I give it him like a simpleton. He brings me duets, and I sing them with him. He tells me romantic anecdotes of his foreign travel, and I listen to him!

“Only last night, thinking to enjoy a few quiet moments with Hortense, we were scarce placed on our favourite garden-seat by the river, where I imagined no living being could be within sight or hearing; when suddenly we heard the plashing of an oar, and Harcourt glided into sight, steering his tiny bark to the very spot where we were stationed! The evening was so fine and the water so calm, I could not resist his invitation to step into the boat; supposing that, of course, Hortense would follow. But no. While I was settling myself in the stern, and before I could forestall her intention, she had silently stolen off, and was disappearing from view among the trees! I cried after her, but she did not hear me.”

“She is gone!” said Lionel, very complacently; and, applying himself to the oars, we were quickly skimming along in gallant style; and there was I—taken prisoner, as I may say, and borne away in triumph by this daring pirate. In one respect, however, let me do him justice—he never talks to me of love. If he did, I should dislike his companionship a thousandfold more. Query:—May not a gentleman make himself very obnoxious to a lady without ever coming on the subject of la belle passion? I think he may, decidedly.

“After a flying sail of about a couple of miles, we neared the little old-fashioned church, on the opposite bank, with its simple grave-yard, where

‘The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.’

I desired my boatman to stop here, and we disembarked. I wished to see a tablet, recently erected to a favourite gamekeeper of my father’s, shot by accident in the forest. We were soon among the gray stones of the dead. I never saw Harcourt so sedate. I suggested, ‘Are there any village Hampdens, I wonder, buried underneath these green mounds? or Cromwells, guiltless of their country’s blood?’

“Nay,” he answered; I think the poet is at fault in his suppositions there. Genius and ardour will not lie supine—cannot be hid—in whatever sphere they are found. When young Norval had only heard of battles, he longed to follow to the field some warlike lord. Flowers may, indeed, be born to bluish unseen; but the oak and the cedar tree will assert their supremacy, and be known and recognised afar off.”

“I was about to utter my concurrence in this sentiment, when my eye caught sight of a female figure kneeling on the sward a few yards distant. With one hand she was tenderly smoothing the grass of a fresh green mound, while with the other she sought to stay the tears that overflowed her cheeks. The face was deadly pale, and spoke of much suffering. My heart yearned towards the poor mourner. It was a simple picture. Harcourt had seen it too; and we both turned mechanically away, in respect for her sacred grief.”

“‘To be loved in life,’ said he, ‘is much; but to be loved in death is more. Better, far better this than worldly fame, whether for peasant or sage!’”

"I sat down on a fragment of ruined wall, under a spreading thorn. The young moon gleamed through the light foliage. I was terribly afraid of becoming sentimental. We had not yet discovered the tablet we came in search of. By good chance, there it stood, quite unexpectedly, right before me—a modest stone of chaste design, 'James Arnold, aged 29 years.' I had often beheld this young forester; and his melancholy end was fresh in my mind. Why was I not alone? Then might I have given a few tears to his memory. As it was, I only gazed at the spot stupidly for a minute or two, feeling a strange tightness at my throat. Then, suddenly starting up, I murmured something about the evening growing late; led the way quietly to the river's brink; and so into the boat, and home.

"The night was superb. Sunset and moonlight held divided sway in the sky—the gold and crimson of parting day on the one side fading into the deep serious blue of coming darkness on the other. When I went to bed, sleep long played me truant. When I came, I dreamed that an unseen hand laid a rich jewel at my feet. I passed on unheeding. But learning afterwards that it was a fairy gift, I wept bitterly at my folly in rejecting it."

(To be continued.)

A VICTIM OF CONFIDENCE.

I CAN'T do it. I knit my brow, compress my lips, and endeavour to frown; but I only burst out laughing at the reflection in the mirror. I puff out my cheeks, glare, and try to look majestic; but I immediately commence grinning, as I think of my resemblance to the clown at Asley's, when, putting on an air of stern dignity, he commands the ring-master to come back and pick up his hat, or "blowed if he don't make him."

No; Nature has chosen to make me with a frank and confidence-inviting face; and I must abide the consequences.

Why will strange people, with some particular joy or sorrow oppressing them (generally the latter), persist upon pouring it all into my ear, and making me an unwilling confidant of the most delicate and private secrets.

Why?

Because I am an easy, good-natured, benevolent, kindly-spoken, confidence-inviting gentleman. "Bless his kind heart!"

That's what they say. But it is all a mistake. I am not benevolent, good-natured, or kindly-spoken. Commercially speaking, it's a losing game. As for my countenance, I can't help myself if it is confidence-inviting.

When I ride in an omnibus, ten chances to one but some lady has forgotten her purse; and is, therefore, unable to make the necessary squaring-up with the conductor. There may be other eight male persons in the bus, who all button up their pockets, look fierce, or pretend to fall asleep; but I am invariably the victim on whom she fixes her eyes, and, with a bland smile, asks if I "would be kind enough?" &c. Now, the remarkable circumstance is this, that although I am fully determined to do nothing of the sort, or to refer her to my neighbour, or to prevail upon her to make an arrangement with the conductor, these lips of mine will insist upon parting mildly—showing a regular set of pearly teeth—and muttering, "Certainly, madam; perhaps you'd better have half-a-crown; you will require money before you reach home," and my coward fingers slip into my waistcoat pocket, and pull out the coin.

Why will Mrs. Grubbins persist in knocking me up at unseasonable hours of the night, to inform me that Grub (Grubbins) has not come home yet, and that she infers he is drinking at "The Broom-Handle"—a public-house hard by? Because she wishes me to go over and fetch him, and so takes that method of mildly hinting her desire. I, like an ass, immediately step round, and risk getting a black eye—always lots of abuse, certain—in endeavouring to get him home. "Mind your own business," Grubbins will tell me, "and leave me to attend to mine." Yet that very same Grubbins "looks me up," as he calls it, at least twice a-week, smokes in my parlour (I abhor tobacco), and wears me with long and rambling dissertations on his wife's friends, whom he designates "a stingy, mean lot," and also states that they all sprang from dirt—"dirt, sir, dirt;" whilst his ancestors were eminent city merchants, and at one time could have "bought and sold the whole beggarly lot of 'em"—I am quoting his own words. He is one of the greatest bores of my life; and yet I cannot make up my mind to say, "Grubbins, you are a humbug and a nuisance; get out!" I have often rehearsed the words with the intention of saying them to him, but I have never had the moral courage; besides, if I did, my face and appearance would give me the lie in the throat as deep as to the lungs. If I were certain he would take it as a hint, and never trouble me again, I would tell him; but he would only take it as a joke, give me a poke in the ribs, and call me a wag, a good soul, &c. At one time I was very nearly getting into a serious difficulty over Grubbins' affairs. He requested me, as a favour, to allow him house-room for a piano and a few chairs, as he was rather overstocked with furniture, and intended making a present of some to a friend who was getting married. I was weak enough to consent; and, in the dead of the night (he did not wish the neighbours to know anything about it), he removed into my house a grand square piano, sofa, chest of drawers, and a set of drawing-room chairs. Besides the inconvenience of the furniture, I was continually being annoyed by the two Miss Grubbins looking over to practise. Not long afterwards, I received an impertinent and peremptory letter from Messrs. Parchment & Foolecap, to the effect that I was to attend at their chambers, Gray's Inn, on a certain day between one and two o'clock p.m. The drift of their communication, imparted with much bullying and threatening, was that Grubbins, in consequence of a temporary inability to satisfy the demands of several tradesmen and others, had retired, for an indefinite period of time, into the Gazette; and that they, P. & F. on behalf of the injured creditors, had discovered that the statement of his property was wrong, and made up with the intention to defraud; and that I had aided and abetted him, in so far as concealing part of the furniture! My solicitor pulled me through the case, at a considerable pecuniary loss to myself.

Against my wish, I was made chairman and secretary to the "Crushy-Common Consumptive Charwomen's Friendly Fund;" the consequence of which is that I am continually being stopped in the public streets by some hideous-looking virago, who openly calls down an impressive blessing on my head. I am naturally of a very sensitive disposition, and these rencontres always cause a decided tendency of blood to the face, neck, and ears; and a general nervousness and confusion of the faculties, painful to myself, but amusing to the thoughtless passengers—especially the boys. Last week, for instance, while walking along a crowded promenade, in the fashionable end of the town, with my friend Major Bagbrains, I was pulled by the coat-tails by old Mrs. Cheeky; and in her shrill piping tones, audible to the passers-by, she informed me that the last bottle of wine which I so kindly sent had done her a world of good; and that it only wanted another to complete her recovery. She also informed me, in confidence (although Bagbrains, six yards off, could hear her), that all my kindness to Mrs. Sleekey was money thrown away; as she had discovered through a Mrs. Blinker—a friend, and, she believed, a blood relation—that Mrs. Sleekey was no more ill than the man in the moon; that she drank gin like a fish; and smoked till she was black in the face!

Bagbrains has cut my acquaintance since that eventful conversation. He was a man whom it was my greatest ambition to be seen with; and now he merely recognises me in the street by a nod.

I am also continually being waited upon (often with addressed letters of introduction) by reduced parties in great pecuniary distress, who seem to select me as the only proper medium in the town to relieve their miseries—burned-out shopkeepers, reduced merchants, frozen-out gardeners, poor men from Manchester without a farthing or a friend, &c.

It is in my adventures from home, however, that I am peculiarly unfortunate. I was once taken for a burglar, in consequence of having consented to hold a clerical-looking gentleman's bag at a railway station, whilst he pretended to go for a cup of coffee. The bag contained two hundred pounds' worth of watches and chains, which had been stolen from a west-end jeweller's shop. I was detained two days, and might have been longer, had the clerical-looking gentleman, a notorious burglar, not been captured on board a steamer bound for New-York. My appearance, however, brought me out of this difficulty, as it got me into it. The burglar grinned waggishly when confronted with me, slapped his leg, and said, "No: dashed if I do; he's a jolly sort of a chap! Yes, Mr. Inspector, I gave him the bag to hold, on discovering that you were on the scent. Shouldn't have asked him if he hadn't looked so jolly good-natured!"

I could recount a hundred other awkward situations into which I have been inadvertently drawn; but the latest will suffice. My "Old Man of the Sea Adventure" I call it, in playful allusion to the aged swindler who prevailed upon Sinbad to carry him across the stream. By-the-by, Sinbad must have been a good sort of fellow also, or he would not have been imposed upon in the manner he was.

About three weeks ago, I took a second-class ticket for my home here, at Crushy-Common, and got into a carriage beside a country-looking young lady; who, during the brief time the train was at the station, informed me that she belonged to Boston in Lincolnshire; that she was a governess in a London family; that she was treated very kindly; that she was returning home on a visit; and that she was engaged to a thriving young farmer in Hampshire, to whom she was to be married in eighteen months. Several other miscellaneous passengers got into the carriage during the recital of those interesting facts; and, just as we were going to start, a jovial sailor and an old man entered. The sailor took the seat opposite to me; and the old man, who was evidently a friend, sat by his side. The sailor was dressed in the usual nautical shore garments—pilot-cloth jacket, ditto trousers, glazed hat stuck very much on the back of the head, striped shirt loose at the neck, and a black silk handkerchief tied with the traditional sailor's knot—the ends flying about his face with the breeze entering at the carriage window. The old man was the most peculiar-looking individual that I have ever seen; and, although evidently above seventy years of age, had come all the way from Australia alone. He was tall and fat, with very little hair about his face, which was tanned to a copper-kettle colour, and literally furrowed all over with lines. He had little ferrety, fierce-looking eyes, hooked nose, bushy eyebrows, an enormous ear on the left side of the head, and a little bit of dried skin about the size of a shilling on the right side—suggesting some encounter or Lynch-law process, the probability of its loss through accident being very slight. The sailor was slightly intoxicated; the old man very much so. Immediately the train had started, the former pulled out a flask from his breast pocket, took a sip of its contents—wafting an odour of raw brandy through the carriage—and handed it to the old Australian, who took a longer sip. He then gently, but firmly, withdrew it from him, wiped the mouth on the sleeve of his jacket, looked at me, handed the flask, and said, "Here, mate! You look like one of the right sort! 'ave a drain." As I did not wish to give offence, I thanked him, made a pretence of drinking some of the liquid, and handed it back. "That's right, mate!" he continued. "Give us a tip of your flipper." I gave him my hand to shake, and he detained it fully five minutes, in a maudlin sort of manner; causing me to be the focus for the eyes of all the passengers in the carriage, and a return of my old complaint of a determination of blood to the face, neck, and ears. "I say, mate," he resumed, still grasping my hand, "you don't happen to have a brother of the name of Bill Tarryakin?" I informed him that I never had a brother, and that none of my friends were named Tarryakin. "Well, I'm jiggered," he said, "if you aint as like Bill as two peas! Ah!"—and he sighed—"he was the right sort of chap; he was!" Here he treated the company in general to an account of Tarryakin; for whom, it appeared, he had a profound regard and esteem, on account of the many amiable qualities he possessed—foremost among which was a wonderful gift of spinning yarns, and a capability of consuming an almost incredible amount of raw spirits without losing his ballast—i.e. the command of his legs.

After rambling on in this manner for some time, and analyzing the points of resemblance between myself and his friend, he informed me that he was bound for Liverpool, to join his ship; that he had picked up the old Australian at a boarding-house in the neighbourhood of Tower-Hill the evening before—just in time to prevent him giving all his money in charge to a rascally Birmingham flash jeweller; discovered that he, the old Australian, intended going to Crushy-Common; and that, as it was on his way, he took charge of him—and a precious hard job he had of it, too;—besides, he could not get properly drunk himself! It was his intention, the jolly sailor said, to give him in charge to the station-master on the arrival of the train at Crushy-Common; unless—and here he looked significantly at me—any person in the carriage got out there; when he would take it as a kindness if he, the person, would see him safe. In a rash moment, and admiring the sailor's good nature, I offered to take charge of the old gentleman till he got sober; and then send him, in a presentable state, to his friends. The sailor grasped my hand. The station was reached. The old Australian was bundled out; and I followed. His luggage—consisting of a huge sailor's chest, hammock, and a large cage with a hideous-looking monkey inside—was landed on the platform. The ruddy young lady huddled closer to Jack. The engine shrieked and passed, as if in diabolical glee at my position. The carriage doors were shut. The train crawled slowly into the tunnel; the sailor waved his cap; and I was left alone on the platform, supporting my charge, who was making ineffectual attempts to drink out of the bottle without uncering it!

They are both here yet—the man and his monkey!—and it is now a fortnight since the event! I can't find out his friends. He contrives, mysteriously, to keep himself in a perpetual state of intoxication; and labours under the hallucination that he is in the vicinity of Melbourne; that I am his son; and that I am unlawfully detaining a black and tan retriever dog of the name of Badger, his property. The monkey got out of its cage twice, and went drinking and screaming about the house—nearly sending my housekeeper into fits.

I am lying in wait to catch him sober; when I shall insist upon his giving a proper account of himself, and pack him off to his friends.

When I am out of this difficulty, I intend to persevere in frowning and grimacing till I have a stereotyped expression of the most unmistakable ill-nature; and if I can't manage that, I shall assume the cognomen of "The Spitalfields Canary;" challenge Mr. John O. Heenan, of the United States of America, to a grand international prize-fight; and get this good-humoured countenance battered out of all shape.

R. L. G.

THE "CRONIES" OF BURNS.

A FRAGMENT—BY THE LATE DAVID GRAY.

A "CRONIE," as I take him, is a mightily different fellow from a friend as the world goes. You, O married reader! (with children, I hope!) may find many a friend before death, the devouring darkness, comes; but assuredly never one "cronie" more. It is only the boon companions of the spring-time of youth—boon companions, in speaking to whom you are but thinking aloud—that can become the "cronies" of your good old age. Souter Johnny must have had many and many a raid with Tam o' Shanter through the verdant valleys of Kyle before such a praiseworthy degree of genuine brotherhood was arrived at. Praiseworthy brotherhood, and meeting unavoidable, in the circumstances! For in that auld town of Ayr, meeting suddenly beside the statue of Wallace, in his niche reader, what a host of old delights would the sight of each recall to each!—delights that must be raked up, and spoken of, and felt over again, before they parted from the blazing ingle and the clean hearth-stone. What a volume of old things they would have to read!—memories, which are the ghosts of dead feeling (according to Thackeray)—some sad, some jovial, yet all softened and smoothed down, as gazed at in doubtful wonder through the dim half-century.

"And at his elbow, Souter Johnny,
His ancient, trusty, drouthie cronie!"

says that most inspiring of all tales. Cherish, then, O married reader! the friends of thy youth. Unconsciously are they ripening into "cronies;" who alone will kindle you, in the future time, if you live, with an old reminiscence of the sowing of your wild oats—when maidenhood was a talismanic charm, and blood was in the veins.

"When the gods love die young," says some old heathen; and whom we mortals love die old, say I, a young Christian. For, after all, it requires a lifetime to know a man; and you cannot love a man till you know him. Youth is confiding—takes too many things (including friends) on trust, so to speak. But in his watching and scheming to catch that dollar—dollar almighty here below!—your quondam friend forgets all about you; nor will he hesitate to gain the sour grapes for which you both are striving by knocking you down—if he is able. That is too often the preface to his book of life;—book, written now no more to the dictation of father, guardian, or other, but to the dictates of his own prompting soul. How often is this the case? How often did you find, O married reader aforesaid!—with or without children as the case may be—how often did you find that you had nourished a scorpion in your bosom? The healthy, free-hearted fellow that sat on the same bench with you at school and college—where and what is he now? Think, if you please. Good Heaven! here am I, not very old—but beginning life, as my grandfather says—yet already having worn out the friendship of a baker's dozen. Never meant for cronies, they: rather for the mouthpieces of convention. Sworn subjects of etiquette and pag-top trousers—subjects born to cumber this earth like weeds. Is it not sad, this frittering away of the affections—this wasting of humanity? How many oiled and curled Assyrian bulls pace foolishly along the Argyle-street of our Glasgow every night, to be laughed at by all men with eyes (that can see) in their heads? Is there no way of teaching them—of making them useful? Could we not put a violent end to foppery and conventionalism? Such persons have no more fire in them than spring cabbages. They are born, grow, court, marry, produce children, die, are buried "according to the fashion of the time;" and it is my opinion (private, of course) that, when they get to the shores of Styx, they will ask Charon if he will be so kind as to row them o'er the ferry.

A "cronie," as will be seen, is rare, and equivalently invaluable. When some of them meet together, there is much story-telling, and shaking of heads, and singing of "Auld langsyne." To revive the fire of the old times, there are "reamin' swats, that drink divinely;" and, in the life of the past, the cold, harsh present is forgotten, and—the bumper toast goes round! Fine sight this, O man of buckram!—those two old cocks, shaking withered hands over the table, with mandlin tears in their eyes! Fine doings these, O nervous teetotaler!—the singing of songs, and chorussing, and thumping of tables till the glasses ring again! Put it down, O Gough, of the powerful tongue and powerless judgment! Get an Act of Parliament to put it down—it is wicked! There should be none of this; but let the "cronies" receive one another like the hermits in the Palestinian deserts—as Marcianus received Avitus—with some coarse pulse, and water eminently clear and creditably cold. What a consummation!

Robert Burns was not the man to have received his "cronie" in this way; or over a cup of tea, sancted with scandal and worldly whining. He was as devoid of namby-pambyism as Lamartine is full of it. He was all intense earnestness—every inch of him. When we think of him ploughing on the fields of Lochlea, we fancy him setting his teeth, and "holding" as if his life depended on it! His soul was all fire, and his body was all health. What a life he must have led in his youth!—a life beyond the imagination of this writer.

And knowing, as you all do, or should do, the foibles, the eccentricities, the virtues, the vices of this man; knowing that what he did he did with a will; that where he loved he loved till death; that he laughed till the tears ran over his cheeks; that he hated cant and hypocrisy worse than even Carlyle; that he was a satirist keener than the bastard Faulconbridge. Would you not like to know what sort of human beings were fellows to him in his prime of life, and whether or no they are worth the talking about in our day?

It is wonderful what a great commotion the least spark of poetry raises in a human soul. The person blessed or cursed with it is blinded to all other qualities; and, like the blind man, he holds his head higher than other people. He is not of the same mould as other men—not earthy and grovelling; but ethereal, aspiring. He consequently grows very proud of himself, and is chary of giving inferior persons the honour of his company. He despises the world—life; appears neither to eat nor drink—has no stomach but to sing. He breaks through customs like a spider's web. Shakspeare classes poets with lovers and lunatics; and I think the simpering postaster, who parts his hair down the middle, wears his collars à la Byron, has far too much of the lover and far too little of the lunatic. For your lunatic is an earnest fellow: too much earnestness, not learning, made him mad.

Now, all the "cronies" of Burns cared for by me were poets—great poets in their own opinion; not great in mine. Some of them tolerable, as you shall see, and some of them intolerable; yet all deeming the company of their neighbours too tame for them. I know not whether to praise or condemn this dissatisfaction at the ordinary round of cares and comrades. They must have had souls yearning for other things, good or bad; yet this yearning is in itself noble. Keats, with Leigh Hunt for his friend—not "cronies"—cried out against "this inhuman dearth of noble natures." Rousseau only half-lived on earth. Nay, it is said there are degrees of blessedness in heaven; and they who yearn most in God's name are nearest the cloud of His majesty. Deeming the company of their neighbours too tame for them, I say, they addressed commendatory epistles to the terrible ploughman then making such a noise about the country; which letters were answered in a quiet, noble, deathless way. And so an acquaintanceship was formed which grew to a friendship; and sometimes, mirabile dictu! ripened even to a friendship. Thus it happened with Burns in two or three instances.

Now, these persons, though not good poets, were all men of "noble touches." Burns was not the man to bother himself with the company of a fool—so I thought; and, in looking into what is recorded of those things, found that the companions of his younger days were strong men with strong feelings—interesting for themselves alone, yet far more interesting when reviewed in their free-and-easy connection with our great national singer.

About two miles from the farm-house of Lochlea, there was another farm-house called Spittleside. At the time Burns was living (and thinking in his own way) with his father in the former farm, Dainty Davie, "Ae o' Hearts," was living (and thinking in his own way) with his father in the latter. It is not at all strange that, living so near each other, they should have become staunch "cronies." Rather a fine fellow this David Sillar, as far as I can gather—fond of music, and loving a good song well sung.

"Hale be your heart, hale be your fiddle; Lang may your elbuck jink and diddle!"

writes Burns to him; and at any of the "country rockings" so frequent in those days, what invaluable concomitants would Dainty Davie and his fiddle be! A fellow of no mean intellect, either—aspiring to fame in his own way, and fighting for it. Rather strange in his opinions, too, for those orthodox times; defending the character of "Auld Nick" even, in a carelessly humorous way open to much censure; and broaching strange religious opinions in his rhyming epistle to "Bauld Lapsraik, the King of Hearts!"

When he was about twenty-one (Burns would be about twenty-two), he became a member of the Bachelors' Club established by Burns in Tarbolton, and was for some time the constant companion of the poet at kirk and market. A strange admiration of odd practices and odd principles was characteristic of this Sillar. Hearing of Burns as being rather an out-of-the-way character, then he looks after him lovingly. Here is what led to their meeting, according to Sillar:—"I recollect hearing his neighbours observe he had a great deal to say for himself, and that they suspected his principles. He wore the only tied hair in the parish; and in the church his plaid, which was of a particular colour (I think bleu), he wrapped in a peculiar manner round his shoulders. These surmises and his exterior made me solicitous of his acquaintance." Made you solicitous of his acquaintance! Very good. Neither he nor you, Dainty Davie, ever had the eccentricities, the oddities, the corners of your character rubbed off and polished in shouldering your way through society.

Yet, though you could play the fiddle, write a passable song, and verify advices to the "lasses of Irvine," in language immodest enough in all conscience;—yet, what a poor, sorry figure you cut here in the heyday of your blood! "After the commencement of my acquaintance with the bard, we frequently met upon Sundays at the church; when, between the sermons, instead of going with our friends or lasses to the inn, we often took a walk in the fields. In these walks, I have often been struck with his facility in addressing the fair sex; and many times, when I have been bashfully anxious how to express myself, he would have entered into conversation with them with the greatest ease and freedom; and it was generally a death-blow to our conversation, however agreeable, to meet a female acquaintance." What is this? Instead of going with your friends or lasses to the inn, do you say? Why, I am told by different reliable parties, my dear David, that you and the poet were well known for a liberality of sentiment and a love of pleasure not altogether in accordance with the orthodox notions of propriety entertained by your Calvinistic neighbours. I am told that, meeting at the fringes of some glen, you would set off together for many miles beneath the autumn moon, bent on rustic intrigue, and love, and love's adventures. Oh, the days you went a-courting, a long time ago! The talks you had going and returning—the rude wit, rough and ready. Did he sing "Tam Glen" on the road coming home? or, "It was upon a Lammas night," till his soul flashed through his eyes? The hide-and-seek, and tapping at back windows; the amorous whistle, and "Oh, the kiss ahint the door!" Burns acting as "blacksole" to you, and you to Burns; and when she quietly opened the door, and came blushing out; then a tumble among the fragrant hay, with idle talk and dallying—not always innocent, God knows!—and again to be up and away, as the earth rolls round from the dark, and her flowery forehead catches the sunlight! What a grand, primitive, even enviable sort of life, had there been no Bible in the world, and had virtue been what Brutus called it! Worshippers of Nature ye called yourselves—Nature "animate and inanimate;" but only the "animate" was for some time apotheosised, and your worship savoured somewhat of Mahomet. Burns said to you, "Ye love your Meg, your dearest part; and I, my darling Jean!" But this Meg (Margaret Orr) was never married to you; and Jean—her fate is well known. And yet, O Dainty Davie!—for all it came to then, and almost for all it comes to now—I would give five years of my life to have spent one long, roaring night with the great Ains and you, and the "muse-inspirin' gairnies!"

HELVETIUS.

BY LOUIS BLANC.

To any such as have been told of the enormous influence which it fell to the lot of Voltaire to exercise in the eighteenth century, it may seem strange to hear that in none of his books the least word is to be found of the French philosophic fraternity at that period. Such, however, is the case; at least in my opinion.

It is true that, in the celebrated salon of Baron d'Holbach, where the most conspicuous French philosophers of the eighteenth century—Diderot, Boulanger, Duclos, Raynal, Grimm, Marmontel, Morellet, and so forth—used to meet, Voltaire was hailed as the leading mind, and was styled "The Patriarch of the Holy Philosophical Church." But they blamed him in whispers for timidly shrinking from the logical consequences of his own principles. In fact, the true import of their teaching may be said to be faithfully and completely reflected in the book "L'Esprit," by Helvetius. That is a genuine product of the salon life as regards philosophy.

Madame de Graffigny used to say, "The book of Helvetius consists of the sweepings of my drawing-room." With far greater show of reason might d'Holbach have said the same thing in reference to his own salon, in which Helvetius was so often observed silently collecting materials for his intended book.

What is the real scope of this work—the importance of which results not so much from its intrinsic value as from the circumstance of its being a reflex?

Before answering such a question, and to prevent the answer from being misconstrued into an attack upon a historical character, I think it right to say at once that—due allowance being made for those human frailties to which every one of us is more or less subject—Helvetius was essentially a worthy man. Grimm says of him that the term of "perfect gentleman" must have been invented as a distinction exclusively his own. No warmer and more generous friend, perhaps, ever existed. On Marivany, whose violent disposition was but too well calculated to put him sometimes out of humour, he had bestowed a pension of 2,000 livres. One day in a discussion, Marivany having taken fire in the most offensive manner, Helvetius kept his temper to the last moment, and after the departure of his friend, contented himself with saying, "I would not have suffered all this were I not allowing him a pension."

A severe game-preserved he appears to have been; but it is a fact that, while preventing the peasants from poaching on his estate, he, more than once, proved very kind to them. The following is Gibbon's character of Helvetius:—"Besides being a sensible man, an agreeable companion, and the worthiest creature in the world, he has a pretty wife, a hundred thousand livres a-year, and one of the best tables in Paris."

Now for his book.

It may be thus summed up:—All our ideas, all our judgments, are mere sensations. The only kind of merit or talent on which we set any value at all is our own. It is our own image, and nothing else, that we admire or love in the person we fancy we admire or love. In physical sensibility lies the unique source of our passions. There are only two objects in life—to seek pleasure and to avoid pain. Self-interest is the sole spring of our actions; which society terms virtues or vices according as it is either benefited or injured by them.

An amusing passage of Helvetius' work is this:—"Don't you think that the insects which are living in the grass hold the sheep in abomination; and take that very animal to be the emblem of savage cruelty which is to us men the emblem of meekness? Ah! if we could understand the language of these poor insects, we should hear them say:—'Let us fly from the sheep—that voracious wild beast which devours us and our cities. Why does it not take example from the lion and the tiger? These are mild, charming, nay more, generous animals. They do not destroy our habitations; they do not drink our blood; they, on the contrary, devour as many sheep as they possibly can, and thus show themselves the avengers of the oppressed.'"

And the conclusion of Helvetius was, that men and insects reason, feel, and act exactly in the same way; that the world is ruled by one universal, exclusive, all-absorbing law, to which all living beings are equally subjected—from the man of genius and the hero to the oyster; and that there are no such things as truth, virtue, morality, self-devotion, love, unless considered as diversified forms of this essential and unique principle—self-interest.

The publication of the book "L'Esprit" occasioned much scandal. It was condemned at the same time by the "Sorbonne," the Pope, and the Parliament. It was burned by the hands of the executioner. Helvetius was compelled to retract. Speaking of him, the Queen said, "I pity his mother." Alluding to the fact that the author was a farmer-general, Buffon said, "He ought to have made a lease more and a book less." Playing on the word "l'esprit," which in French means wit as well as mind, some declared that the work "L'Esprit" only wanted that which the title promised. In short, there seldom was such general outrageous abuse.

And why? Precisely because the society of those days, looking in the mirror held out to it by Helvetius, was vexed to the very heart at seeing its image so faithfully reflected! Alas! how true, how profound, as referring to the time, this saying of Madame du Deffaud's, "The reason why Helvetius has set so many people against himself, is simply that he has revealed the secret of every one!"

SEEN AT THE TIME.

A STORY A LA MODE.

I AM a native of Ireland, and am 53 years of age; my profession is that of a clergyman of the Established Church. I am a plain and simple man in my customs; and in my creed a lover of the truth, no matter where it is sought or upon what it is based. This statement will, I trust, absolve me from a superstitious belief, and free me from the necessity of endeavouring to explain one of those mysterious incidents on which learning can throw no light, and as to the cause of which Nature is still silent.

On the 10th of September 1853, I was travelling on the Great Northern Railway to a small town in Yorkshire. The weather was miserably cold and wet, and the rain streamed down the glass of the carriage windows like a flood of tears. We had left the King's Cross Terminus at 45 minutes past 8 p.m., and it was now much past midnight. I sat listlessly with my watch in my hand, mentally calculating how long it would be ere my journey would be at an end and my mission fulfilled.

I have stated that I am a minister of the Church of England; and, amongst the sacred duties of my office, I am sometimes called upon to perform even a sadder one than that of attending the dying bed—I allude to that of bearing the tidings to the unconscious survivors. It was upon one of these mournful missions that I was then bound—the more mournful, perhaps, from the knowledge which I had that the relatives were expecting the deceased himself instead of his sad messenger. The deceased had unexpectedly been stricken with fever, and I had been summoned suddenly to attend his last moments. To my astonishment, I had recognised in his features those of an old college chum and schoolmate; and, in compliance with his latest request, I was hastening to apprise his family of the melancholy event—hoping that I might be able to add words of Divine comfort and support; and that God would be pleased to make me the humble instrument of leading them, in their first lonely hour of bereavement, to the resignation which had soothed the last hours of the departed.

My journey at length came to an end, and I stood upon the little station at Marketsbury. The guard had remounted his solitary seat; the farewell shriek of the engine had died away in the damp night air. I had watched the red, round, fiery bull's-eye at the back of the last carriage disappear behind a bend in the road; and the train had resumed its course through the chilly wind and the lonesome night, when, upon glancing round, I found I was the only passenger that had alighted at Marketsbury. The station looked gloomy enough at that hour, as I was conducted by the porter through the little office to a door at the further end of it; and still more miserable did it appear when the door had closed behind me, and I found myself on a dark and desolate heath at half-past two o'clock on a cold and rainy morning.

The town of Marketsbury presented anything but a cheering appearance—a dozen or two of gas-lamps, weak and watery in the distance, being the only indication I had of its existence. A large barren common was before me, facing the road on which I stood; and whether I should turn to the right hand or to the left, or boldly plunge across the waste, I was in doubt. The rain came down in torrents, and each moment it increased. I was already half drenched, and as to the best course to adopt I was quite undecided. To get a conveyance to Marketsbury was out of the question; and to walk to the town in such a deluge, with nothing but the distant gas-lamps to mark the way, seemed all but an impossibility. Thinking the station would probably be closed for the night, I determined to seek some shed in its vicinity, and there remain till at least the rain had abated or a conveyance could be procured.

Hopelessly I was passing the station, when I fancied I saw a small ray of light struggling through the chinks in the door. Insignificant as it appeared, it gave me confidence; and with my knuckles I rapped at the door without delay. No answer came. The sound was borne away on the night wind; and the rain dripped dimly from the leaden roof into the pools beneath. As the necessity for seeking the shelter of a shed, in which to remain for the night, became the more inevitable, so in proportion did my desire for a more comfortable resting-place increase. I knocked again—this time much louder than I had knocked before. There was a momentary pause; I then heard a shuffling of feet, a key was turned sharply, and the railway porter stood before me.

He was a broad-shouldered, thick-set man, rather above the middle height than below it, and had a red, round, good-humoured face—the features of which were, however, all but obscured by an enormous beard of sandy-coloured hair. He was also very fat; and the suit of corduroy which he wore fitted him so tightly, that when he walked he appeared in a perpetual state of bursting. I remembered his face at once, and recognised him as the man who had taken my ticket. I had also heard the policeman call him Proggles.

The man looked with an air of astonishment at receiving a visitor at so late, or rather so early, an hour; and, as he held the door partly open, began with "No train till three, sir."

I could see the office clock from where I stood. It was half-past two already; so, without hesitation, I entered the little office.

"Going up, sir?" inquired the porter, as he pushed a large, leather-backed arm-chair towards a stove, where the embers of a fire were gradually dying out.

"No; I am waiting till the rain holds up or until the mail train arrives, when I may stand a chance of getting a conveyance to Marketsbury."

"You're pretty well wet through, sir," said the man, putting more coals upon the fire, and raking out some of the ashes. "Take your coat off—a cold's more easily caught than got rid of."

Mr. Proggles having raised the gas a little, retired into a dark corner of the office, and was seen no more.

Having divested myself of my wet coat and boots, I sat down in the old-fashioned chair that the porter had drawn out; and, throwing my head back, took a survey of my temporary lodging.

It was furnished in the usual style—the customary number of life assurance prospectuses hanging upon the walls; the broad, brown desks, with the large flat-bottomed ink-stands; the pigeon-hole receptacles of the passengers' money; the invariable number of bundles, baskets, fishing-rods—left by travellers by the last train, or awaiting the arrival of those by the next;—everything bespeaking a railway station of a little Yorkshire town. A broad, white-faced office-clock was fixed above the fireplace before which the porter had placed the chair; on my right hand was the small latticed window at which the rain was beating; and on my left hand was the little door through which I had but just now passed.

Fatigued as I was, from having travelled so many hours without intermission, I imagined there would be little difficulty in gaining repose; but in this I was mistaken. A strange restlessness of mind and body pervaded me; and, try what I would, I could not bring myself to the quietude that precedes sleep.

Just by the office fire watching the coals as they dropped from one shapeless mass to another; and in their strange forms I mentally saw old faces, half forgotten; while memory conjured up many a kindly word and cherished look.

Thoughts of the past glanced rapidly through my mind; the days of boyhood dwindled into those of age; and I, a gray-haired man, sat wondering how the time had fled since I and he whose eyes I had but lately closed in death had many a college laugh and pleasant game. How far into the future my imagination might have carried me I cannot say; but my thoughts appeared gradually to resolve themselves into one strange fancy. My attention became riveted to the ticking of the office clock.

Never once in all the wanderings of my mind—while conjuring up the memories of the past or picturing what joys or sorrows looked out of the distant future—had I become entirely lost to its solitary sound; it seemed to lure my grief—to tame my thoughts; but now, as I buried my head in the thick horse hair oozing out of the back of my chair, it roused me—for its tongue appeared to tick as if uttering the word uppermost in my mind) my dead friend's name. So strong an impression did it make upon me, that I started up to assure myself I had not dreamed. All was quiet within—no sound broke the stillness but the dripping of the rain on the window-sill and the ticking of the clock; but the wind, rising, howled a mournful accompaniment over the dreary common.

We had stared at each other (I and the clock) for some time, when, chancing to look down, I found that I was not alone. Unobserved by me, Mr. Proggles the parter had come out of his obscure retreat, and, like myself, had his eyes fixed on the clock. Its broad, white face seemed to look down on us, and its long, thin-pointed hands proclaimed the hour of night.

"Can't sleep, sir?"

"You're right. I cannot."

"More can I, sir."

And having thus delivered himself, Mr. Proggles became again absorbed in the clock.

The place looked so desolate, and my restlessness so hopeless, that I thankfully seized on the chance of entering into conversation.

"You've not much rest of a night, I suppose. You are always being disturbed?"

"I've pretty much of that, sir," answered Proggles, twisting his shiny cap on one side, the better to scratch his head. "What with one thing and what with another, I never get what one may call a good night's rest."

"You have a day porter, of course, to relieve you?"

Seeing that I was inclined to converse, Mr. Proggles drew a very low wooden bench close to the fender, on which he endeavoured to seat himself. I have before remarked he was very corpulent, and that his clothes fitted him tightly. His efforts, therefore, to lower himself were painful in the extreme; and why his corduroys did not burst in his efforts, is a mystery I have never yet been able to solve. As his posture was anything but a comfortable one, either for himself or for me—his knees being on a par with his whiskers—I remarked, "You must be rather confined for room there. I am not at all tired. Turn my chair, whilst I try to warm myself by a turn up and down the room."

Mr. Proggles opened his eyes very wide, and gazed at me for some time; then shook his head, and answered, "No, thankee," most emphatically.

There was something so earnest in the man's look, and so strange a determination in his brief reply, that I felt compelled to ask him if he had any objection to the chair.

"No," he replied; "I haven't no objection; only I'd rather not."

After a short pause, he resumed—his hands in his pockets and his eyes upon the ground, "Why, you see, sir—but mind, I know you'll laugh at me; leastways, what is to say the same thing, you won't believe what I'm agoing to tell you?"

When I had set Mr. Proggles' mind at rest by assuring him that I saw no reason to doubt his veracity, and that my mood was not by any means one for laughter, he demanded,

"Do you believe in presentments?"

"In what?"

"In presentments;—a something as comes across you not of what is a-going on, but of what is a-coming on?"

"You mean presentiments?"

"Well; so long as you knows what I means, never mind what you calls it. Well, sir," continued he, nodding his head at the clock above the fireplace, "that's a presentment to me."

"That clock?"

"Yes, sir; that clock."

He stopped for the moment, as if either afraid or ashamed to go on; and, in an abrupt and hurried tone, he continued,

"Well, sir; to come back to the point, Do you or do you not believe in presentments?"

"Well," I replied, "I am inclined to think I do."

"Well, you're inclined to think you do. Well, sir, I wasn't suppositious at one time; I laughed at people who talked of presentments, but I don't now; although, mind you (here Mr. Proggles raised his forefinger impressively), all what I've seen may turn out nothing. I've had no proof as yet—as yet, mind you. Do you know anything of Marketsbury?" he inquired.

On my replying in the negative, he proceeded,

"Ah, then, of course, you don't know nothing about what I'm a-going to tell you; you didn't know the party—but, either way, that makes no difference. Well, sir, some few months ago, a young fellow came down here with his wife and a youngster. I took his ticket at that 'ere door. I didn't want no one to tell me he hadn't got too much (of what we all want more or less on) pride, nor too great a stock of (what we all think we got too little on) money; so I wasn't surprised when he asked me to find him a cheap lodging. I took him, sir, to the house of a friend of mine who'd got a room to let; and found out next morning he'd come down to one of our doctors here, to be his young man."

"A doctor's young man?" I repeated, with some degree of curiosity; for I began to feel a strange interest in the story.

"He lodged with my friend, sir; and, not that she listened, but plaster only dividing them, she couldn't help a-hearing what was talked about sometimes."

I could not understand why he did so; but as Proggles arrived at this portion of his narrative, he dropped his voice and looked around as if fearful that we had unseen listeners.

"The young man's wife warnt what she seemed to be. The cotton dress she wore on some of our coldest days warn't what she'd always worn; and my missus felt timorous of addressing sich conversation to her as she did to some that she know'd. My friend, sir, finds out it was a runaway match; and that the dad of the doctor's young man didn't do as was expected when the young man come and knuckled down, and begged him for the sake of somebody who was there, and for the sake of a little somebody who wasn't (but who'd make one of the family they thought shortly), to forgive him for having married somebody the dad didn't wish him to. The young man, sir, one morning looks a deal whiter in the face, and comes down to ask of me what time the first train started for London; and that day, sir, I heard he'd got a letter, and that his dad was dead. All that night my friend heard him a-sobbin' like a little child, for the old man was gone without forgiving him. Well, sir, next morning, bad as he was—for he'd always been weak and delicate ever since he come—he made ready for to go. With his wife and young'un he comes down to this office; and if I was to live to be a centurion—no, not for a hundred years—should I ever forget that parting. My friend says (and I thinks her fully justified in her expression) that she's certain sure that that poor girl had'got a-something on her mind—a presentment, sir, that she'd never see him again. Lor' bless you, sir! she cried as if her heart would break."

The speaker had a singular catching in his voice as he related this, and his eyes blinked as if they'd got something in them they were not used to. There was a brief silence, during which the clock kept on repeating my dead friend's name.

"I shall see you again soon," continued the porter, blinking, and looking at the fire as if that caused him to do so; "I shall be here again by Monday week," the young man said, sir; but for all this the wife didn't seem satisfied. She put her arms close round him, as if she thought once parted, parted for good and all. None of us knows, sir, what he was a-thinkin' on; but on getting into the carriage he says, 'Why, Emmy, my pet! why, what's the matter? I shan't be gone above ten days,' and then he laughs and says, 'I shan't forget you, darling! you'll never leave my mind. I'll be down by the mail on Monday night.' He asks me if it didn't come in at three. 'At 10 minutes past,' says I. 'Cheer up!' he says to his wife, as I slammed the carriage door. 'Look out for me at 10 minutes past three on Tuesday morning. I'll be with you. Good-by, Proggies; I shall see you first, before I get home. Good-by. God bless you!'"

The interest that I felt at the commencement of the story had gradually increased. The place where he lived; his occupation; his cause of leaving; the very time he started—all corresponded so minutely, that it left not a shadow of doubt upon my mind that the doctor's young man and my dead friend were one and the same!

"A few days after," Proggies went on to say, "there comes a letter from the young man a-saying that, as no will hadn't been found, he being an only child, the property was his. Monday week comes at last; that train that you come by was in, sir; and, very shortly after, the whistle of the mail train was heard. I took my place to collect the tickets; all as come down by it passed by me; but the young man wasn't among them—that I'll take my 'davy' on. Before I shut the door and looked up for the night, I looked round just to see that all was safe. I stood where I stand now, sir; that same little jet of gas was a-burning about as high as it does now—not too much light to see by, but enough for what I saw. That cheer was there, on the same spot where you are sitting; and in that cheer, as plain as I sees you and you sees me, as close as I am to you now, I sees that young man then! He said he'd see me first; and so he kept his word."

Steadily and resolutely my eyes encountered those of my companion. Our hearts beat loudly, but the clock ticked louder than them both. The almost awful stillness, broken by no sound but one—the chain of evidence that had, link by link, proved unmistakably that he who had fulfilled his promise, and had occupied the very seat in which I sat, was no other than he who had died in my arms on that same night—rendered me motionless; and, dreading the answer I should receive, I asked,

"What was his name?"

"Swinden, sir."

"Too true—too true!"

"Stop, sir, till I've told you all. I was in my sober senses when I saw all this. I knew it was the time he said he'd come. Mind what I say. I tells my story to our clerk here—he laughs at me; to the doctor—he tells me to take a cooling draught; to the clergyman—who talks about a hoverwrought imagination;—but they've changed their tone now. Mrs. Swinden, sir, was a-sitting up for him, and was a-standing at the door to meet him. A figure comes along the road, and goes straight past her in at the open door. She followed it. There, where she'd always used to see him—sitting by the fireside—she saw him then! She spoke; made up for to touch him; but a horrid thought comes across her, and she screams. When my friend brings her to, out of the faint in which she found her, his cheer was empty, as it had been since he left it. Nothing from that time to this has been heard of him; we don't know whether he's alive or dead. Since Monday night, I've scarcely closed my eyes a-thinking of what I saw. It may be fancy, sir; but I've a strange presentment, somehow, that as at that time he was seen, so at that time, sir, I shall hear of him again."

So very still—so like the silence that overhangs the dwellings of the dead—was the quiet that had crept about us, that I almost feared to break it by a word or motion. In a short time, however, my companion had learned from me the time, the manner, and the cause of my poor old school-friend's death.

I had scarcely uttered the last words, and was confronting the terror-stricken face of Proggies, as he heard them, when a shriek, loud and appalling, burst upon us.

"The mail train, sir. Look there! You remembers what I said." As he spoke, the porter pointed towards the clock—

Ten minutes past three!

W. B.

CARRY YOUR AIN SUNSHINE WI' YE.

A SONG SEEKING A TUNE.

Why need ye wander the wide warld o'er,
Seeking frae life's dreamy sorrows to free ye?
Happiness stands by your ain hallan door,
Gin ye carry your ain sunshine wi' ye.

Sorrow may come when ye're dreaming o' joy;
Friendship and love, when sair sighed for, may flee ye;
But rain cluds will pass frae your slimmer sky,
Gin ye carry your ain sunshine wi' ye.

Trust ye in Him—never trusted in vain!—
Him who has a'thing to gie and forg't ye!
Amid mirk gloamin' bright gleams ye'll gain,
Gin ye carry your ain sunshine wi' ye.

Edinburgh, Sept. 1862.

JAMES BALLANTINE.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 82 St. Knoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

and a happy one, in a minute or two. The motto to the picture is from Coventry Patmore's 'Angel in the House':—

'In dim recesses hyacinths drooped,
And breadths of primrose lit the air.'

And so it is. There is a perfect world of hyacinths and primroses; and, beside these, almost all the beautiful things of the sweet spring-time—a delicate fern on the bank before the fence, and wild violets, wild strawberries, moss, brambles, and ground-ivy everywhere;—and all painted exquisitely: indeed, they are almost growing and trembling.

'By Jove! look!' whispered my companion, after a long mutual silence, as a developing sunbeam stole across it, and its truth and beauty rushed up—a multitude of marvellous details coming out livingly.

'See that Hedger sow!' said one of a group lounging past behind us. 'Would you think it was the same we saw last night?'

'Well,' muttered my friend, 'I can believe it will lose dreadfully at night. That wonderful purple and all those delicate little tints must die down in the gas: they are only for the day. I wouldn't be surprised if it were unusually dull at night.'

'I dare say so,' I remarked; 'but think how a bank of bluebells, or a gray crag with heather about it, or a knoll embroidered with wild flowers and haunted by dreaming moths, would look if you came on them in the dark, and shed the glare of a lamp or torch on them! That the works of these fellows should lose by artificial light seems a testimony in their favour. Moonlight and starlight blanch the face of Nature. In sunlight only does she bloom and smile; and then only are our true paintings glowing and beautiful—kindling and darkening; as God's paintings, of which they are children's copies, do with the dawn and the dusk.'

We moved on reluctantly, loath to quit the quiet, sweet forest nook; but immediately found ourselves in another, as we paused before 'The Woodman's Child,' by Arthur Hughes, also appropriately framed with a wreath of ivy.

'How fond they seem of children and the woods!' I exclaimed.

'Not a bad sign, is it?' asked Hunter; and away, again, went our minds a-wandering.

The scene here, too, is in the tree world; but the trees are larger, and it is opener. The composition is reversed, in so far as the Woodman is at work far away at the back; and his wife is stooping in the middle part, gathering something. In the foreground, their child is lying sound asleep, with her back to us; and you see just a bit of the chubby upturned face, which glows with a sunbeam. She is at the base of a great tree-root—what Shakspeare calls 'an antique root'; the tree has been cut down; and, near her feet, a ruddy squirrel is peeping at her; while on the tree-root a robin is perched. A jar and her father's corduroy jacket are at her side, and a straw matting is her pillow; while about the upper part of her figure a beautiful dark-blue shawl, with wrought flowers, is wrapped. Here, again, the hyacinths were glorious; and, after our exile, we eagerly recognised many of our woodland wild-flowers.

One of two ladies, who came to it before we left, observed to her friend that 'the shawl was surely too fine for the class;' but the other told her it was cheap, and worn by working women.

We passed on, exchanging a smile, but it vanished as our eyes rested upon Wallis' 'Dead Stonebreaker;' and, for myself, I felt tears come as I read the quotation, from Carlyle's 'Sartor Resartus,' with which the painter had accompanied it. Uncouth in language they call him, and he may be; but surely the soul of pathos is here. What a thoughtful wail it is!—

'Venerable to me is the hard hand; crooked, coarse, indefeasibly royal, as of the sceptre of this planet. Venerable, too, is the rugged face, all weather-tanned, besotted, with its rude intelligence; for it is the face of a man living manlike. Oh, but the more venerable for thy rudeness, and even because we must pity as well as love thee, hardly entreated Brother! For us was thy back so bent; for us were thy straight limbs and fingers so deformed! Thou wert our conscript on whom the lot fell, and fighting our battles wert so marred; for in thee, too, lay a God-created Form, but it was not to be unfolded; encrusted must it stand, with the thick adhesions and defacements of Labour; and thy body, like thy soul, was not to know freedom.'

Here 'our hardly entreated Brother,' the Stone-breaker—old, for he is gray-haired—sits with a drooping head, dead, and dead apparently for days. There is a deathly look of decay in the blueish-pale face. He is sitting among the hard blue flints he has been breaking; his legs are separated; he has been hammering the stones between them; and the hammer lies a little before the two arms that are close to each other, and stretched out as if in the last effort. A keen-eyed weasel, tawny, and with arched back, is close to him, and gazing wonderingly. He is in a hollow behind a bank, where the body is not likely to be discovered soon. Beyond the bank there is water—a lake or something of that kind; and behind this rise dark blue mountains, over which there is a greenish sky, against which the foliage of the trees is relieved strangely.

This picture we did not like so well, but could not deny that it had the great power of touching the heart.

'You remember Quintin's description of his Chatterton?'

'Well?'

'Some things in that letter would do for himself now.'

Quintin Berwick had been our chief friend—a youth full of genius and aspiration; all who knew him had been fond and proud of him; and to us, during our sojourn in the south, one of our dearest hopes had been to take him again by the hand, to hear his clear merry voice, and to work together with him in the Arts we loved.

But that was over. He was gone. And our set duty for that day was to visit the old place where we had all been so happy, and pay our tribute of sympathy and respect to his mother and sister, from whom, we had been told, his death seemed to have taken away the half of life.

Our interest in the pictures o'ercast by the memory of our loss, we loitered on blindly till stayed by Windin's 'Too Late,' and this work only made us more sad.

'He wrote us about his "Burd Helen."'

'Yes, "a noble picture," he called it; grave and sadly—like tapestry almost, some labour of the pen done in the time of the ballad; but the subject morbid and unlikely one. He believed no man could so torture a woman; and then——'

'And here, too, seems torture,' I said.

We thought it must be scarcely worthy of him, though beautifully drawn and well grouped. The colour was flimsy and weak—indeed, the picture was unfinished looking; and besides it did not tell its story well, it gave forth 'an uncertain sound.' Still, it was full of expression; and being evidently connected with the crisis of a heart history—these hearts of ours! how the whole world feels for suffering, or disappointed love!—it possessed a fascination which drew us back to it, and would not let us easily away. We could not understand it; but we yearned to understand it. 'Too late! Too late!' we asked ourselves, and then strove again to pluck out the heart of its mystery. An acquaintance had the evening before told Hunter that the artist's own explanation was that it was the meeting of two engaged persons after a separation, during which disease had altered her appearance; and that he was repelled or shocked by the change, and could not love her. We were unable to see it in this way; and were confident of the information having been taken up wrongly. We leaned on the belief that there had been neglect on his part, which had caused her fatal illness; for the defined red on the cheeks and the lustre of the eyes told the sad tale of nearing departure—that he had returned at last, but 'too late.' He had forfeited her love and sacrificed her life.

There are four figures in the picture: she and her sister, and a little child-sister, and the returned lover. It is a garden, and a long hedge, of holly perhaps, stretches across behind the figures. She has been sitting; but on his approach has risen, supporting herself by a staff in the right hand. Her figure is thin and her features wasted; and there is the saddest, dreamy, half-wondering, half-reproachful expression on her face—with its high, flaming cheek bones, and hollow dark eyes—as she gazes past her sister (who is of about the same age, healthy, and beautiful; embracing her, and weeping on her shoulder) towards him. A handsome man—in a light-brown shooting-dress and a wide-awake hat—he stands on the left side of the picture, his head bent, and his face completely hidden by his left arm, which he has brought round it. He is filled with shame, or grief, or self-reproach; and the little child, whom he perhaps met in the happy and true time, looks up questioningly at him, and with something of sorrow for him.

'Let us go,' said my friend, pocketing his catalogue and seizing my arm; 'we'll be here again to-morrow, and musn't be "too late" in doing what is right; and, leaving the rooms and entering a cab, we were ere long set down before the nest-like cottage of our old chum.

They were out, we found; and the maid told us that, taking advantage of the fine, clear, frosty day, Miss Berwick, in an endeavour to lighten her mother's brooding grief, had coaxed her to have a short walk. She expected them back every moment; and asked us to step in and wait. But we preferred strolling about the familiar walks, which, at many a merry Christmas time, we had seen as they now were—white, as strewn with ground crystal, and glancing with stars in the sunshine; the hollies and laurels on either side breathless under their burden of dazzling snow. Then we went round to the back ground, and sauntered along, with the bank on one hand, thick with what our poor friend used to call 'Fairy Staffas;' and with the stream let on the other, grumbling within its icy prison; and by-and-by we reached and rested in the old bower.

It was little changed. There stood the small centre table which had so often glistened with our flagons of half-and-half, and on which so many funny sketches and precious designs had been 'knocked off.'

'Like bubbles blown
For summer pastime in the wanton air.'

There were the benches—as thickly charactered with dates and initials as the obelisks of old Nile—on which we three had lolled, arguing on the principles of art, criticising pictures, or enjoying pun, song, and story. There were the shelves for the pipes and matches; and there were the walls, still rejoicing in Quintin's twelve cartoons illustrative of 'The Life of a Goblin,' from its cradle, an acorn shell—to its grave, a deserted seamen's egg on the yellow sands.

As, stooping, we entered, we had mechanically taken out our 'clays;' but one memory after another of 'the days that are no more' coming back, we put them up again; and, sitting down, talked on and on till arrested by the sound of footsteps, when, looking out, we saw, arm in arm, and clothed in the deepest mourning, Miss Berwick and her mother pass in the direction of the house. The former was the nearer to us, and we were surprised at the change in her.

Minta! little Minta! the blue-eyed 'girlie' with her fair ringlets streaming to her waist and her face filled with glee and wonder! Our tiny Hebe, and pipe-filler, and occasional fire-stealer, with whom we romped and rambled; for whom we made odd drawings by the score; and to whom we told tales and trilled ditties beyond all computation! Minta! whom we used to tease morning, noon, and night—calling her our 'Peas-Blossom! Cobweb! Moth! and Mustard-Seed!' and to whom we had written dozens of foolish letters from our studio on the Pincian Hill—thinking her still a child!

Why, she was now a tall, graceful young woman; her hay-coloured hair simply braided on either side of a forehead and countenance so regular and noble in form, and so pale and spiritual, that there was brought back instantly to my mind's eye one of those glorious creations of ancient sculpture which I had gazed on almost daily for the last few years, and still with ever-growing wonder and delight!

(She has just passed, smiling proudly, and with our sleeping babe in her arms, through 'my roomful of rough blockwork.' O God! give power to these hands to fix in thy fair marble—for the good and pleasure of Thy creatures—the love, beauty, and grace wherewith Thou hast clothed her!)

We had but risen to go to the house after them, when, having learned of our being in the garden, and hurrying in search of us, she reached the bower; and, mingled gladness and grief filling her eyes as with sunny dew, clasped a hand of each, and warmly welcomed us.

Following her, we were soon seated in the old parlour; and ere long—while the bereaved widow sat beside, silent and bowed down—we had heard from his sister the touching narrative of that rapid decline under which our dear companion had paled, and withered, and died.

And with sore hearts we heard it. Poor Quintin! In that very chamber, many years ago, we three had, over maps and books, laid out all our travelling. We were to go together, and study together the most precious works of those 'Whose strong hearts beat through stone, or charged, again,

Cloth threads with fire of souls electrical.'

But while Hunter and I, in due time, were able to carry out the design, changes had occurred making others more dependent on his labour; and Berwick had to renounce his long-cherished dream, and remain behind. We had, however, been constant correspondents, although latterly his letters had been fewer, though not less cheerful. We had also heard, from himself and others, of his being ill; but he had always been strangely delicate-looking, even when at his healthiest and gayest; and, in our excited prospect of returning and reknitting the old brotherhood, we perhaps gave less weight to the mention of sickness than we should have done. We well knew what a strain, mental and bodily, there must have been to produce that glorious picture by which he so suddenly leaped into his throne—bringing the success-following fashionable and rich into his rooms; and that the corresponding reaction must have been dreadful. But, then, he would rest during the winter, and in the spring how set up would he be beside the gray mountains and blue lochs of Scotland! Ah! while we jested and schemed, he was getting those large eyes and hollow cheeks, and being shaken by those cough-gusts, of which we had just heard. While we were engrossed with life, and new subjects, and fame, and fortune, he had been looking into the other world, girding himself for the eternal duties, and thinking less of a name among men than the invisible gnat that sang in his quiet chamber. The winter had come, and he was at rest. Our light wanderings on the earth were ended. He had gone forth on that solemn and mysterious journey in which no human eye or human voice could follow him.

'I know you would like to see what he was last working at,' said Minta, as, hastily drying her tears, she led the way; and Hunter and I, rising, followed her, murmuring an apology to the silent mother.

'Here is almost everything as he left it,' continued our guide, as she opened the door of what had once been our old companion's studio; but which he had latterly slept in—as, no longer able to work there, he had the desire to be at least in the place, and surrounded by the materials, of his former labour.

'This,' said Minta, as she unfastened the sheet which had wrapped the easel and made it wraithlike, 'was to be his next picture; and, as you see, it is hardly more than half completed.'

'What is it?' Hunter asked.

'He called it "The Mons Victorialis,"' she answered; 'and if you turn it you will find a note by him on the back;—which we did. It was this:—

'There dwelt a certain nation close to the ocean, at the very extremity of the east, among whom a writing was current, inscribed with the name of Seth, concerning the Star which was to appear, and which had been handed down from father to son through the generations of learned men. For twelve of the more learned, and lovers of celestial mysteries, had elected and disposed themselves to watch for that Star. And when any of them died, his son, or one of his kindred who was found of that mind, was appointed in his place. And they were called Magi in their tongue, because they glorified God in silence and inward prayer. These, therefore, year by year, after the thrashing out of the corn, ascended into a certain mountain, called in their language Mons Victorialis, having in it a certain cave in the rock, and most grateful and pleasant with fountains and choice trees; into which ascending, and bathing themselves, they prayed and praised God in silence three days. And this they did, generation after generation, ever watching lest peradventure that Star of beatitude should arise on themselves.'

Having read this record of an old legend, we replaced the picture, and were struck with it, even in its unfinished state.

It is 'high as the highest peak' of this 'mountain over the ocean, at the very extremity of the east; and the time is early night, when the stars are just beginning to be seen. This had been so subtly managed by Berwick, that we found ourselves ere long muttering, 'Do you see any star?' and answering 'Yes, there's one,' and 'yonder's one,' and 'here's one that surely was not there before.' There are three Figures representing three of these silent hereditary watchers, who, judging by the rich robes and precious gems indicated, are of kingly, or at least princely, rank. On the left, laid in a hollow between two crags—with his head sunk on his breast, over which flows, glacier-like, a gray beard, and with his arms raised over the rocks on either side, and his shrivelled hands drooping powerless—is a very aged man, one who may be supposed to have watched there for more than half-a-century; and whom we would take to be utterly conquered by Time, save for his eyes, which still gleam through their silvery brows, fixed in a patient gaze upon one quarter of the heavens. In the centre, and with his back to us, a second—with short thick hair and strong frame, and apparently in the vigour of manhood—is seated, and, with folded arms, looks straightly on that way. And on the right hand, almost fronting us—drawn to his full height with expectation, and shading his piercing eyes with one hand, while the other arm is stretched forth with outspread fingers that seem preparing to point at some particular object—stands a youth, of noble form and features, and with long soft locks falling over his shoulders, who, as if his search had commenced that very hour, gazes eagerly and hopefully into the sky.

It is a picture inducing silence and speculation; and we stood long before it thoughtfully. At last we left it, and I was taking a glance at some new casts in the room, when Hunter called me; and, turning, I found him gazing at an object over the mantelpiece which instantly riveted my attention, and at which we both looked for a long while without any louder sound than an occasional sigh.

Within a small silver frame there seemed floating in the air, and in an offered position, a Hand—small, exquisitely shaped, and strangely instinct with feeling and even thought. As for its delicate and beautiful colour, its transparency, and its subtlety of drawing and shading, I had never seen anything approaching it, and cannot say more than that it suggested to me the most faultless marble, tinted with a faint rose tincture; but it possessed a softness and life that I could not remember even any approach to in art.

"Whose is this?" Hunter asked.

"Quintin's," answered Minta. "That was the last thing he wrought at; and he put some touches on it only a few hours before his death."

"And what is it?" I inquired.

"Well, he called it 'The Angel Hand,'" she replied, "and always held that he had seen it; but it was, we fancy, one of the results of his great weakness."

"Sit down and tell us about it, Minta," said my companion; and, resting near, while we two continued our gaze, she gave us the following explanation:—

"For a month or two he had been unable to paint more than a few minutes every day; and, when the weather was fine, he generally sat in his chair outside the window, where one or both of us kept him company with a book or our work.

"One lovely day in June, he was sitting in the sun-time; and, some visitors having called, we had left him alone, and remained away a little longer than usual. Our friends had just left, and I was passing through here to join him, when I started to catch the sound of his voice, calling, in a low earnest tone, 'Mother! Minta! quick! quick!'"

"Glancing out, I observed that he sat bent forward, his arm stretched out before him, and his thin pale face radiant with delight and surprise.

"When I reached him, however, his expression changed in an instant to one of disappointment. He sank back, his hand fell upon his knee, and he muttered,

"'Gone! It is gone! But I saw it! Oh, I saw and felt it!'"

"I dreaded fever, and asked him what he meant; and he told me that, while sitting there and thinking of his coming death and the future, his mind, even while he was surrounded by God's gifts of goodness and beauty, was beset by doubts; that the utterance on the part of the other world—the profound mystery, as it were, that the Deity and His Spirits kept towards us—perplexed him; and that, overcome by his mental trouble, he had cried out, 'Oh, that I could see or feel evidence of that other life! If angels are about, is there none to pity me?'"

"And I held out my hand, Minta," he said solemnly; "and it was taken, and clasped, and held. 'THE ANGEL HAND, my dear sister! THE ANGEL HAND!—I wish you could have seen it.'"

"Then he anxiously asked to be helped in, and took his old place at the easel. We will never forget the hopeless look he gave at his brushes and palette; but, evidently after a short prayer, he commenced that, and worked at it a little every day. As I have said, he reached it but a few hours before his death; and it was the only time we ever saw him appear satisfied with it."

Here Minta paused; and we both said, 'It is very strange!'

"It must have been a delusion induced by his great weakness, the doctor thinks."

Hunter shook his head.

"But something very singular happened connected with it, just as he was leaving us," she continued. "He had been told, and indeed felt, that his hour was come; and he called us all round his bed, and, sitting up, kissed us, and bade us farewell—shaking hands with the doctor and the servants. Then, while I supported him, he bent a little forward, and, stretching out his arm before him, held his hand for a few moments, trembling as if with expectation. Suddenly, we all saw it half close and become steady, as if it had been caught by another hand,—when his face lighted up with inexpressible satisfaction, and, sinking back, he left us!"

DREDGING DAYS.

READER! have you ever dredged? I have;—and never will I forget those joyous days. They are marked with red letters in my mind's calendar. Those dredging days came to me as little oases in the desert-like common-places of life. They came and went; but the sweet remembrances still remain with me. The oases' palm still shades, and the bubbling spring still supplies its gushing stream to refresh me in my toiling march through life. For months the city's smoke and the city's roar are about me. The morning and the evening have the same monotonous story repeated—that of a day's work begun and a day's work ended; and thus weary weeks and months pass away.

How happy is it to one so engaged to leave the moil and turmoil of business behind, and seek the pleasures of a day's dredging!

But methinks I see some reader curl the lip and ask the sneering question, 'Dredging! What's the use of it?'

To such I answer,—If you want the excitement of a gambling saloon without its sin; your body renovated without doctor's cure or apothecary's drugs; your mind lifted above the carking cares of life,—in short, if you want a day of the highest pleasure and of the noblest good, spend that day in dredging. Suppose we have a dredging excursion in each other's company, just to see if we can spend the day profitably and happily. The morning sun finds us awake and ready for our work. Snatching a hasty breakfast, and laying in a store of food as sea-stores, let us away to the boats.

The scene is magnificent. Our place for dredging is on the lovely Frith of Clyde; and yonder, opposite to us, rises the lofty Goatfell in silent grandeur and majesty. As yet the mists of morning cling to the sides of the towering giant and flood the valleys in their embrace. Away in the far distance stands, sentinel-like, the Craig of Ailes; and trending to our left is the Ayrshire coast, speckled with woods and fields. Looking over the side, we see deep down into the ocean, which appears to be absent altogether, giving us the idea that our boat is suspended in the air—so silent, calm, and transparent does the water appear.

The rocky bottom is covered with long, tangled seaweed, which waves like a miniature forest. Darting out and in may be seen the little rock-fish; while, here and there, large star-fish and urchins browse upon the sea-grass.

But we must go further from the shore; and as we slowly pull out into the bay, I will inform you of the requirements for dredging. As regards the dredge, it is about two feet long by one foot and a-half deep, and five inches wide at the mouth. In form it is like a carpet-bag, with a little alteration made to ensure strength. The cloth of the carpet-bag is replaced by the net, which is made of strong cord, wrought into close meshes. This bag-net is tied on with thongs to an iron framework, which may be represented as the mouth of the carpet-bag. In the dredge there are no hinges to shut, so that the mouth is always open; but from the ends where the hinges should be long handles are joined, which, meeting in the centre, form a ring to which the rope is attached. The edges are inclined outwards, that they may scrape the bottom. Do you wonder why we have a basket of bottles with us? They are for holding our live stock, which we hope to bring up in the dredge. As you see, they are packed in a basket for convenience of carriage, and also to keep them from knocking each other to pieces. These are the only things you need trouble yourself with when dredging. We are now a good distance from the shore; suppose we throw over the dredge. Well, then, pass up the rope, and while doing so take care you do not pass yourself over the side. Observe, I tie one end of the rope round the handle of the dredge, while the other end is passed round a seat; and now we will consign the dredge to the deep, with many hearty wishes for its success. For half-an-hour we shall have to pull about, as it will require that time before there is any chance of the dredge being filled. Bend to your oars now, and move along. You think it easy work? Wait till the dredge begins to scrape, and then you will find some difficulty in making headway. Pass out more rope; there are fifteen fathoms of water here, and we shall require about thirty fathoms before the dredge will fall into the right position for scraping. Do you not begin to feel the anchoring process of the dredge? It is now tearing up the bottom and filling its capacious maw. Pull away, therefore; and as we move along let us have a chat on Natural History.

Altogether ignorant of Natural History, say you? Yet you have been at school, and received the elements of a good education. Perhaps you may have forgotten, and been not unwilling to forget, your Latin, your Greek, and your mathematics; and possibly you may be thinking that these studies have been of little use to you. Engaged as you are, it may be so. But as a study calculated to give tenacity to the mind, combined with pleasure, and to prepare the student for the active duties of life, while gratifying his love of the grand and the good, let me recommend Natural History. Let it be taught in our schools, and made as important an element as grammar and arithmetic, and I doubt not a great advance will be made in the education of the young.

What! are you tired? 'Tis time, then, to pull up the dredge; and now pass those bottles this way, and stow these oars carefully past. By the difficulty in moving the boat, I may prophesy a good haul. Heave! ho! Hand over hand, and in comes the rope. This is the hard work; but there are glorious hopes excited. The dredge is full. There can be no doubt of that. Look! the dredge is near the top, but there is a dirty haze in the water round it. Now for our first dredgeful. Heave! ho! One last heave, and then over with it on the board; and lo! sand, and nothing but sand, is to be seen. We have struck the wrong place, and for the last half-hour have been ploughing a sand-bank. Never mind; 'better luck next time;' so again throw over the dredge; and, in the meantime, we shall have a turn at the heap of sand.

With the exception of an old shell or two and a few pieces of sea-weed, our labour has been in vain. But what old shell is this? It is the Cyprina Islandica; and, as you may see, the outer skin or epidermis is worn off. When this shell lived, our island was colder and lower in the world than it is now. By the presence of this shell and a number of others in the raised beaches around our coast, we are informed that the seas in which they lived partook of the icy coldness of the north. We do not get them living now about our shores; but they may be had in great abundance in the Arctic seas, where the bergs move their glistening peaks, and the intrepid mariner follows the whale. Along the coast you may notice bold escarpments of rocks, rising steep above the waves, presenting in some places the appearance of a flight of stairs. This is the ancient coast line, marking the height to which the sea rose when this shell lived in these waters. We conclude from the present habitat of these boreal shells that the seas which surrounded Britain at one time were covered with floating bergs, and peopled with animals peculiar to the Arctic Zone. But we cannot wait longer over this shell, though we should like to tell you of the time in which it lived. Our purpose now is to describe what living animals we may bring up. Resign the oars for a minute, and come to the stern, and assist in pulling in the dredge. Make all ready; and with a long pull bring it to the top, and with a strong pull land it on the board. Capsize it, and gaze upon the spoil. Do you see that glorious spread? Talk of sumptuous feasts and exciting scenes! Could they beat that? But be sharp. Over with the dredge and catch that moving whelk. Do you wonder at that shell working its way so rapidly across the board? You have seen the whelk moving along the sand and leaving a long trail behind it; but never did you, and never will you, see it moving so fast; for see, it is not a whelk, but a lobster-like animal that inhabits it. See how he draws in his legs and horns when you touch him. Closely examine him, and you may notice a difference in the size of the large toes. The one is much smaller than the other. What use does this serve? Just watch when he draws in his body and you will find the larger toe crossing over the mouth of the shell and protecting the smaller toes. Now, if both toes were large, they would interfere with each other. Is not this a wonderful adaptation for its protection? You want to know the animal's name? It is the Pagurus Bernhardus, or hermit crab. If you pull it out of its shell, the hinder part will be found quite soft and unprotected. By getting into a hard shell, it is free from the attacks of its enemies. When it grows too large for its shell, it looks out for another; and often, in these searches after lodgings, amusing fights take place, and very often terrible battles between rival hermits. When one hermit envies the house of another, a regular battle begins, and usually might against right triumphs. The weaker crab is pulled out; and its stronger brother, whipping its tail from the shell, pops it into its neighbour one, and then walks away with its new possession, leaving its old house for the vanquished.

There are also several star-fish among the sea-weed. Take care how you separate them; for they are very brittle, and always ready to dismember and break into pieces. Is not that a beautiful one, with the five thin rays joined on to a round centre disc? The rays are covered with fringes, which give them a graceful appearance as the animal throws itself into various forms. This is one of the Ophiocoma; and that other kind, which has very few and short fringes proceeding from the rays, is one of the Optima. Ha! here is a magnificent specimen of the Sucker. Look! it has twelve rays, while the others have only five. Place it in the water, and watch the long suckers moving on its under surface. These are the organs of locomotion; and if you watch carefully when they are moving up the sides of the glass, the small suckers may be seen taking hold, and the body is raised a little; then a few of them detach and fix higher up; and this process is continued till the animal has gained the position it desires. The two former star-fish move by their spines; but this and a number of others move by suckers. We are ready now for another haul; so, clear overboard the useless material, and put the shells into the bottles for examination at home. Here comes the dredge; and this time we have not a large assortment. Only one urchin and a tiny fish! We must go further out, however, between those two islands; and there we may hope for better success. This is the spot to heave the dredge; and now, while it is filling, we may lunch, and also examine this urchin. Hand us up that bottle, and we shall place the urchin in the water and watch its performances. 'Tis a common Echinus Sphæra. It is round in shape, flattened a little on the under surface—the whole being covered with spines. When you rub these off, you may notice that the globe may be divided into five equal parts by five ribs, which originate from the bottom of the animal. Running along the edges or joinings of these ribs are small pores, having a connection with the interior. If you watch for a few seconds when the animal is in the water, there will be protruded little thread-like bodies, having a circular disc which acts as a sucker. When they touch the side of the bottle, the animal holds fast, and is able to move and even to ascend to the top of the vessel. Is it not astonishing that these small suckers are able to support the heavy urchin? But just consider the number of them. There are five ribs having on each side a row of these pores—thus making ten rows. On each side of the ribs, from the under to the upper part, there are 186 pairs of pores, having a sucker from each pair—making in all 1,860 suckers in one animal! Thus you see what it lacks in the strength of each sucker it makes up in number.

If our time were not short, I might tell you of the wonderful mouth which this animal possesses. You will see, however, in comparing this star-fish with the urchin, that there is a close resemblance between them. Why, you might take the Asterias (one of the star-fish having suckers), and, bending the five rays backwards till they meet in the centre, imagine that the spaces between each ray were firmly joined. This would make the outline of the urchin. From the sides of the rays you may also imagine the suckers proceeding as in the urchin; and thus you have a star-fish changed to an urchin. In your study of Nature, you will find a great many examples of this recurrence to a common plan. There is seen a great unity of design pervading all classes of animals, which leads us to the belief that the great Master Builder planned the types on which all animate existence is framed. He conceived the plan, and leaving nothing to chance, wrought out all the minutest details. The type to which these star-fish and urchins belong is the Radiate, embracing those animals that have parts radiating from a centre. This fish is the Syngnathus Acanth, or pipe-fish; it belongs to the vertebrate type of animals.

Just one other pull of the dredge! But, my dear friend, what is wrong? You feel unwell? I have no doubt of that; and your lunch, taken so recently, will tell greatly against your recovery in this stiff breeze, which, heaving the boat, disturbs your stomach, and you are in for sea-sickness. But if you want ashore we must first get the dredge on board. Here it is, and a good haul this time. Eolis, Doris, Aplysia, Lima, and a number of other molluscs, with a few crabs and star-fish.

But you can stay no longer. Put them into your bottles, and now for the shore. When you get home, examine them carefully, and perhaps you may discover new beauties. You are now landed; and may I ask you how you have enjoyed yourself? Was there not healthy exercise for the body, excitement and information for the mind, and for the cares of life a brief interval of oblivion? Have you not, my friend, had a joyous day? 'Ay,' you answer dolefully, 'I have had all that—and more.' Ah! yes; you had sea-sickness. But you will get better soon, and by the time we have another excursion you may be able to stand the sea better; so, for the present, good-by.

N.

THREE SCENES.

I.

Merrily glided down the river Emily Ray and I, Each at the other a-glancing ever, laughing with love-lit eyes; Happy as life and love could make us, gliding down the stream—Thinking not aught would ever awake us out of our bright young dream.

'Emily, love! is life not bliss—joyous on every hand? Can it be better, brighter than this, even in Edenland?'

II.

Ah! sadly gliding down the river went Emily Ray and I, With eyes a-glisten and lips a-quiver, gazing into the sky—Wistfully gazing, heavily sighing, gliding along our way; Calmly the crimson eve was dying—so was Emily Ray. Carefully wrapped on a pillow, reclining, folding her hands on her knee, Sweet, good words, to a soul repining, softly she breathed to me: 'Ah, Willie, Willie! what changes come o'er us, even in one short year!

Well that we know not the trials before us during our pilgrimage here.

Only last summer, how happy were we!—pleasure on every hand. We thought ourselves blessed as the angels could be, even in Edenland!

Faded with health has the bright illusion!—maybe 'tis better so. Happiness here is a dream—a delusion; and I am willing to go. O'er the dark swellings of Jordan's billow, hopeful, my spirit shall bear,

On to the realms of the righteous, Willie! and you'll come and meet me there.

Beckoning to us, on that bright shore, loving and lost ones stand; Oh! to be with them, to sorrow no more, for ever in Edenland!

III.

Once again I was on that river, dreamily drifting on, With eyes a-glisten and lips a-quiver—Emily Ray was gone! The winds might blow and the waters roll—little it mattered now; Sorrow lay heavy on my soul—sadness was on my brow. I was so lonely; and oh, how weary! longing to be away—Life seemed a wilderness, dark and dreary, wanting my Emily Ray.

But the stars shone out, and ere I wist came peace—I know not how;

And the lady-moon looked down and kissed the sadness from my brow.

I know that my love is well and blest, safe 'mid the angel-band, With the loved and lost who have gone to rest in the happy Edenland!

J. T.

FASHION.

FASHION—frivolity, whim, caprice in modes and manners! What can be more contemptible? It originates nobody knows exactly how or where—like a fitful breeze bending for the time everything silly in one direction. Its influence is not deep, but extensive—spreading, in widening circles, from some indefinite centre. At first sight it would seem to be merely a crotchety of tailors, milliners, et hoc genus omne, and too trifling for serious consideration. It is difficult to treat with any respect the dictum which condemns as unsightly the hat or coat which last month was declared handsome and most becoming. Yet such is fashion! And though staid philosophers can see no reason in it, it may have some foundation in reason after all. One striking circumstance is to be remarked in fashion. It is an influence that affects only civilised communities, and even in them has power chiefly over the diviner sex. Savages, barbarians, and secluded races have fixed tastes. There is no fickleness of fashion—no ephemeral vagaries—among them. They deck and deport themselves in the same style, without variation, from age to age. The modes and habits are stereotyped where mind is stagnant. Progressive nations alone are votaries of fashion. Fashion, though not progressive but rotary, is closely connected with social progress. It is an instinctive, restless love of change with which, in certain circumstances, the human mind is beset, apparently to prevent it from becoming hopelessly stationary. It is, perhaps, a provisional endowment, vouchsafed to hold the place of true taste and active intelligence till these be sufficiently cultivated to secure their growth. Devotion to fashion is not a common accompaniment of taste or intelligence, though it may be in some measure a substitute for them. In fact, fashion has most influence over those whose taste is least developed, or whose intellect is not vigorous. The more fashion the less taste or sense. Good sense and taste dictate the choice of dress suitable to each individual's style of features and complexion. Fashion disregards all such considerations, and imposes a uniformity of shape and colour on all her giddy train. The full face and the thin must alike be surmounted by a bonnet monstrously large for the one or ridiculously small for the other, according as the ample or diminutive size may be the rage. Colours are used or misused with the same utter want of discrimination. If blue is fashionable, it is worn not only by the blonde, whom it becomes, but by the pea-green visaged, whom it makes frightful. If a dirty cinnamon—which suits no complexion—finds favour (as at present), everybody must display the ugly hue or be voted unfashionable.

But better far the frivolities of fashion than fossilised habits and petrified ideas. If a man has not native taste enough to keep his person, his attire, and surroundings in good order and pleasant freshness, the next best thing is that he should do so in emulation of others. If he will not cast aside seedy clothes because of their seediness, it is well that he should do it to be like his neighbours. But the truth is, most men would make few changes, either for the one reason or the other, if left to themselves. It is the 'women folk' who chiefly, for good or evil, enforce and carry out the dictates of a revolutionary spirit in matters of taste. It is they who are continually condemning capital wardrobes as rubbish not fit to be worn, only because something newer is 'out.' It is they who remorselessly consign to the broker or the pauper garments and equipments which the owner has hardly had time to get used to, for no better reason than that articles of a different style are now the vogue. How many a husband and father is teased to irritation at his own fireside about that 'frightful waistcoat' and 'horrid hat,' and implored to throw them aside before their new gloss is off! Not that they are either horrid or frightful. Quite the reverse. It was admitted on all hands, when papa got them (only a few weeks ago), that they were 'quite the thing.' But then they were fashionable; now they are out of date, for (and this is thought conclusive) shapes altogether different are now worn by stylish people—said people being, in his estimation, geese!

But all this, nevertheless, influences the old gentleman to make a change often when he would not otherwise think of it; and has also the good effect of inducing him to part with articles, while they are yet good and serviceable, for little or nothing, to rear-rank men without the means of purchasing what is new. Miss and madam, too, are instigated by fashion to make perquisites or charitable donations of many a 'love of a bonnet,' neither crushed nor faded, but only superseded by a newer 'love.' Nurse-maid and cook can thus walk in the steps of mistress, only a few steps behind, in the fantastic ways of fashion. Ever the poor char-woman and the dependent on alms can, in due course, have scientific stays, and dresses that stick out, when their betters—to be fashionable—have done with them long before they are useless.

No doubt this dispersive influence tends to extravagance more than to economy. But a propensity to extravagance may be so regulated and restrained as to produce wholesome activity; while economy is apt to degenerate into selfish parsimony, and, in the end, sink into slothful torpor. Thus, fashion, though contemptible enough in itself, is by no means contemptible in its effects. Its silly vagaries provoke the scorn of all who judge of things by strict utilitarianism, or who possess taste sufficient to distinguish between what is truly beautiful and mere novelty. The scorn is intensified when it is perceived that even real novelty can seldom be claimed for things fashionable. The broad brim and the narrow, the high crown and the low, alternate with each other in hats, just as the short waist and the long, the tight sleeve and the wide, do in coats and dresses—without any material difference at one time from another. And so of every caprice of fashion. It is but a return from the recent and familiar to the obsolete and half forgotten; and then, again, from that to the other, or something else—resuscitated, with slight change of form, from the sepulchre of buried follies. In the monster crinolines of the present day we have a reproduction—with some change but no improvement—of the hoops of our great-grandmothers. These, again, were only a restoration of an absurdity prevalent in the Tudor times; and nobody can tell how often before. High-heeled shoes are out at present; but their turn is coming—not for the first time or the last. Every such change must, per force, be borne with patience; but let us pray that we may never be tried with the intolerable affliction of hair-powder and pomatum! Even pig-tails and patches would be welcome in comparison.

Nature, in her outward aspects, gives no countenance to this incessant craving for change. From year to year, and from age to age, she presents the same forms of beauty and grandeur to human observation—the same combinations of marvellous power, wisdom, and beneficence, to move our admiration and minister to our delight. Not to speak of the splendours of sun, moon, and stars—which we may suppose to be necessarily invariable, and not specially designed to gratify our love of magnificence—there are still innumerable objects which have seemingly been created beautiful with express reference to our appreciative powers, or these to them; and yet they never change or give place to newer objects. Witness the rose budding and blowing now as it did in Sharon and the gardens of Damascus three thousand years ago! Witness the 'lilies of the field' blooming just as when it was declared, in the Sermon on the Mount, that 'Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.' The violet still displays its gold and purple in the same perfect harmony of complimentary colours, and the same clover-leaf-like form of corolla; and still, unvaryingly, its bright eye is marked off and shaded by sharply-pencilled dark eyelashes as of yore. Nature—the Supreme Intelligence working in Nature—makes perfect work; but repeats the same forms and combinations with persistent consistency. When human taste and skill advance far they become also persistent, and create forms of loveliness never abandoned from the mere desire for change. The sculpture and the architecture of ancient Greece once appreciated, are never set aside for crude novelties. They are the consummate flowers of a tasteful people's maturity of taste; and will survive all the vicissitudes of fashion and all the barbarisms of innovation.

HOLDING UP THE MIRROR AT FOGGYTON.

We in Foggyton are mostly connected with the iron and coal interests; and our amusements for a long time consisted principally of periodical matches, which used to take place between the bull-dogs of the town, occasionally diversified by matches between the masters of the dogs when the dispute as to the relative merits of the animals ran high.

Of course, we have a Mechanics' Institution; on the platform of which a reckless party—in a withered dress suit, white pocket-handkerchief, and fortified with a cane-bottomed chair, round table, and tumbler of spring water—once attempted a lecture on mesmerism and the laughing-gas. He succeeded in putting one Noah Barker, a bereaucan puddler, under the influence of the gas; and immediately afterwards fell a victim to his own experiment—the effect upon Noah being to rouse all the passion for pugilism which had before lain dormant, causing him to vent it upon the unfortunate lecturer. He (the lecturer) was rescued, leaving the tails of his dress coat and his white pocket-handkerchief behind.

I was apprenticed to Powell the surgeon-dentist at the corner of the High-street, and became acquainted with George Blythe through his attending at our consulting-room about two back teeth, which he ultimately had extracted. George's father was the manager of one of the iron mines in the neighbourhood, and George acted as book-keeper in the office at Foggyton.

'I'll tell you what it is,' said George to me one evening, as we were sitting in the consulting-room at the back of the shop—the shutters up, the door closed, a jug of beer on the table, and a 'church-warden' in our hands; 'I'll tell you what it is, old fellow! until there is some legitimate place of amusement in Foggyton, there will be no end to those disgusting rows and blackguard fights among the men. What are they to do of an evening, and especially of a Saturday evening? They go to "The Blue Pig" or "The Spittoon and Opera-Glass," sing a few songs, talk a lot of absurdity which they call politics, gradually get drunk, quarrel, and nearly kill each other. Now, what I say is this, that if they (meaning the authorities) would convert that Mechanics' Institution into a theatre, procure appropriate scenery, get a company together, and play Shakspeare and the legitimate drama, they would do a great deal more good than having a lot of half-starved lecturers raving away about mineralogy, electro-biology, botany, mesmerism, and the laughing-gas. Not that I disparage science and useful information; but what I propose is—Give 'em real amusement and instruction blended. Play "Macbeth" or "Richard the Third" on a Saturday night; protract the entertainment till the public-houses close, and "The Blue Pig" and "The Spittoon and Opera-Glass" will sell less beer; and the men, going home with more money in their pockets and with clearer brains, will be more agreeable with their families on the Sundays.'

George and I had been discussing a shameful fight, which had taken place the evening previous, between two miners, in which one of them had received serious injuries about the head.

'I quite agree with you, my dear fellow,' I answered; 'but how could it be done? There is no theatre in the town; and it is absurd to suppose that the Mechanics' Institution would be let for such a purpose; besides, we could not get a company to come once a-week; and it could not be kept up every night.'

'Look here!' said George, putting down his pipe, and laying his hand solemnly and affectionately on my shoulder. 'It can be done. You and I get up a company and make the experiment. I have thought of it; and it can be done. We can easily get the Twister Hall fitted up for a trifle. It was originally intended for a theatre; and is half finished as such.'

'Agreed,' I answered, pleased with the idea; and we drained the jug to the success of our philanthropic scheme on behalf of the unenlightened and truculent inhabitants of Foggyton.

The play was to be 'Othello'—Octavius Bradd being selected to represent the credulous Moor; and Sylvanus Togg the crafty Iago.

Bradd alias Murphy was a native of Dublin; minus an eye, and prided himself on his resemblance to his great countryman, Mr. C. V. Crook.

Togg alias Smith was born in a court off Fleet-street, and would have preferred the part of Hamlet, from the fact of his extraordinary resemblance, as his friends and admirers informed him, to the elder Kean in that character.

These were to be our two leading men. Both were shoemakers; and each felt that he had mistaken his trade, and that the delineation of leading tragedy character on the stage was his proper vocation.

Ikey or Isaac Morris—who was an authority amongst all the young patricians of Foggyton in matters concerning dress; who had a taste for genteel comedy; and who made a neat little income out of the colouring of meerschaum pipes for ambitious smokers—agreed to play Brabantio, on consideration of having a 'heavy swell' in the second piece.

John Brown, Junior, our mortar-boy, had a predilection for buffo singing, and was only restrained from 'coming out' altogether in the comic line of business, and running off to London, from fear of being followed up and captured by Mr. John Brown, Senior, who was a temperance lecturer, and had an aversion to amusements of any kind, more especially theatrical. Mr. Brown, Junior, used deeply to deplore the fact of his being a minor, and incapable of individual responsibility. To him I imparted our dramatic scheme. He jumped at the idea, offered to sing 'The maniac dustman,' and give his wonderful imitations of the cries of various domestic animals.

The principal female character was to be undertaken by Miss Murphy, Bradd's sister, who promised to bring other two ladies who assisted her during the day at the making up of babies' fancy caps.

Our next difficulty was the afterpiece. Morris, who was security for the bills and the rent of the theatre, insisted upon having his light comedy part. Togg had a drama of his own, the whole of the incidents of which were to take place in the bowels of the earth. Bradd was of opinion that an exhibition of sparring would be the thing. Togg was nearly resigning, in consequence of Blythe and I respectfully but firmly declining to have anything to do with his drama; the principal objections being its length, the hazy nature of the plot, and the impossibility of representing the chief incident or sensation scene—a fight between two of the principal characters, suspended in a basket, half way down a coal-pit.

It was at last decided that the nautical drama of 'The Midnight Bell' should be performed; which, with a proper amount of blue fire, cutlasses, long sea-boots, red cravats, and striped shirts, would be likely to go off well. It possessed this advantage, that there were two heavy characters in the piece—the amount of villainy being pretty well balanced. This was a consideration, on account of the intense rivalry which existed between Messrs. Togg and Bradd, each having the most profound contempt for the other's talents. There was a virtuous lieutenant to be played by Morris. In the last piece, Blythe was to take Scravage and Morris Yawland in the vaudeville of 'Pale Ale, or The Reason Why.' All the characters had been got together by the exertions of the last-named gentleman.

We occupied three weeks at rehearsal; and at the end of that time the dresses were ready, the proof-sheet of the bill in our possession, the theatre in order, and the scenery in capital working condition.

We had a grand dress rehearsal a week before the performance was to come off, at which the whole of the members and supernumeraries were present. Mr. Togg, as Othello, was arrayed in a long night-gown, originally of a bright red colour, but which had been reduced by repeated washing and boiling to a sickly yellow; a turban, with flashing tin diamonds, ornamented his head; and round his neck was along a broad leather belt, which looked as if it belonged to some part of a donkey's harness —suggesting the idea that Mr. Togg was in the coal trade and the proprietor of a cart. Red tights, yellow slippers manufactured by himself, and a steel chain encircling his waist, from which a basket-hilted sword was pendent, completed his attire. His face was, by means of burned cork and grease, dyed to the deepest black, and shone like a fresh-polished fire-grate.

The fair Desdemona, who was about four inches taller than her liege lord, arrayed herself in a low-bodied muslin dress, and took her hair out of paper for the occasion. She was supported by Miss Bleaky, similarly attired, with the exception that her dress, instead of being pure white, was dotted with black spots.

Mr. Bradd as Iago was immense. He aimed at originality and freedom from the traditional conventionalities of the part. He was of opinion that Iago was not the cynical ruffian he was generally thought to be; but should be represented as counterfeiting a jovial frankness of manner. Freedom and naturalness were what he said were wanted in portraying the part. Accordingly, at rehearsal, his reading was generally accompanied with profuse gesticulation, swaying of the arms, slapping on the shoulders, and elegant poesés, with his legs carelessly thrown across the back of a chair, resting on the table, or himself seated on a barrel—which he insisted should be put upon the stage to give something of reality to the out-door scenes. His decided Irish accent, and the confidential manner in which he related his meditated villainies, emphasised with profuse working of the forefinger, nods with the head, and knowing winks with his remaining eye, gave a decidedly fresh and highly original effect to the soliloquies.

He wore for the occasion an immense cakum wig, with curls flowing over his shoulders, and which he dexterously contrived should come over his cheek, so as to conceal as much as possible the physical defect of the loss of the left eye; yellow bag trousers, brought in tight at the knees, and white stockings downwards to his shoes, which were also yellow, with brass buckles; the jacket, part of a soldier's coat of the time of George the Fourth, buttoned tight to his waist; and over the left shoulder was thrown a small blue velvet cloak. He had in his possession an old naval cocked hat, which he trimmed up, and wore jauntily stuck on the side of his head. A broad black leather belt encircled his waist, and served as a rack to support an old revolver, three daggers, and an immense basket-hilted claymore which reached to a quarter of an inch from the ground. His jet-black mustache and imperial contrasted beautifully with the tarry colour of his hair.

Togg sneered at the incongruity of the costume; but Bradd only affirmed that the general effect was striking, which was all that was requisite.

The venerable Brabantio was taken in hand by Mr. Morris; and he attired himself for the part by putting on a tow wig—to represent extreme age—fierce cork mustache and whiskers, rolling up his trousers to the knee, putting on a pair of old Wellington boots, which were too large for him, and the legs of which swayed to and fro when walking. Over his ordinary dress he threw a large horse blanket; and his attire was complete.

John Brown, Junior, was to play Roderigo; and Mr. Adolphus Bullock—a friend of Bradd's—Cassio. Mr. Brown, Junior, considered that a striped racing-jacket which he possessed, blue woollen stockings drawn over the knees, lady's cloth boots, and a fire-brigade helmet, formed a correct representation of a young Venetian noble.

man of the period. His weapon was a huge brass-handled cut-throat razor; and he also carried a dagger, horse-pistol, and telescope.

Cassio was dressed by his friend Bradd. His make-up would have done better for Julius Caesar or Marc Antony—consisting of flesh-coloured tights, sandals, tunic, High-land claymore, and a jockey's cap.

George and I were to represent all the officers, soldiers, attendants, &c.; and also to look after the working of the scenery.

The only extra wardrobe required for the naval drama was a lieutenant's dress, which Morris had made new for himself, at a cost of six guineas—so zealous was he to do every justice to the part.

The last rehearsal of both pieces went off well. All were excellently posted up in their parts; and we had every prospect of a successful debut. Exactly one week before the important event, the entire dramatis personæ rapped together on the stage of the theatre—the viands being prepared at 'The Blue Pig.' After supper, Morris rose and read the proof-sheet of the bill, which was as follows:—

THEATRE-ROYAL, FOGGYTON.

(Late Twister Hall.)

THE OTWAY GENTLEMEN'S DRAMATIC AMATEUR CLUB

By to inform THE NOBILITY AND GENTRY OF FOGGYTON that their first performance will take place in the Theatre-Royal Twister Hall, on SATURDAY THE 27TH SEPTEMBER, and from the first-class amateur talent which will be brought forward, combined with

NEW SCENERY, MAGNIFICENT DRESSES & DECORATIONS, and a judicious selection of pieces, they hope to be greeted with a bumper house.

The performances will commence with Shakspeare's celebrated Tragedy of OTHELLO, OR THE MOOR OF VENICE.

Othello, Mr. Sylvanus Togg.

Iago, Mr. Octavius Bradd.

Desdemona, Miss Madeline Bradd.

After which, that rising Low Comedian, Mr. John Brown, Jun. will give his wonderful Imitations of the cries of various Domestic Animals, such as

THE PIG, THE HEN, THE ASS;

and an authentic account of the Salaries of the principal Actors and Addresses of the Metropolis; and dance his truly astounding PORTUGUESE PALE JO.

To be followed by the Nautical Drama of THE MIDNIGHT BELL.

Black Rupert of the Cliff, Mr. Togg.

Death's-Head, the Pirate, Mr. Bradd.

Lacy Power, Miss Theresa Bleaky.

Lieutenant Spitfire, Mr. J. Morris.

The whole to conclude with the interesting Vandeville of PALE ALE, OR THE REASON WHY.

Admission—Pit, 4d.; Gallery, 2d.

N. B.—No dogs or children admitted.

The next morning all the dead walls in Foggyton had broken out in a rush of our bills—in green, blue, yellow, white—in fact, all the colours of the rainbow.

Our hearts beat high as the eventful day drew nigh. At last Saturday arrived; and at half-past six o'clock the doors of the theatre are opened and admit the audience. In a quarter of an hour the house is crowded in every part. Bradd has engaged a friend of his, an ex-prizefighter, to take the money; and though there are rather more children and dogs than we calculated upon, still, we feel on the whole that it is to be a success.

Behind the scenes everything is now in readiness—the tackle in working order, the stage swept, the characters dressed and ready to go on; and, punctually at seven o'clock, the curtain is drawn up, and Messrs. Bradd and John Brown, Junior, walk on as Iago and Roderigo.

It is not a cheer or a laugh which greets them on fronting the audience; but an amalgamation of a cheer, a yell, and a laugh. The effect from the pit is good; and the audience wait patiently for the opening words.

John Brown, Junior, has evidently swallowed something, however, which seems to stick in his throat. He looks at the audience, gasps, glares at Bradd, and whispers huskily, 'My father is on the second seat from the back, and sees me. I must be off!' He actually does meditate retreating; but Bradd—with a significant clenching of the fists, and an assault-and-battery look in his eye—whispers, 'Don't mind your father. Go on. I'll murder you if you dare move!' The fright, however, has made him forget the preliminary conversation; and so, without further ado, he shouts out, 'What ho! Brabantio! Signor Brabantio! thieves, thieves!' As this contemptuous disregard for the text of the play has put Bradd out of a considerable portion of his speech, that injured individual is rather annoyed, not to say incensed; and in crossing over takes the liberty of giving him a kick on the ankle, muttering something about his being a 'murdering fool.' Mr. Brown, Junior, however, feeling that he is in the wrong, does not resent it; and as he has discovered that the party whom he thought was his father is only the editor of the Foggyton Union-Jack, he is at ease, and prepares to go cheerfully into the part.

The noble Brabantio, with praiseworthy promptitude, squeezes his head through the pigeon-hole, requesting to know the meaning of this terrible summons. 'What is the matter here?' Next follows the query as to whether his doors are locked or not. The venerable Brabantio is, however, in too distressed a state to favour them with a reply. The scene which represents the residence of that noble Venetian runs along the side of the stage, and is supported by a chair and ropes at each end. Now, whether it—Mr. Morris's head—had swelled in consequence of his superhuman attempts to restrain his merriment at the truly singular appearance of Mr. Bradd, is uncertain; but certain it is that, on making the attempt, he found it impossible to get it back. Add to this the fact that the chair, on the topmost back spar of which he was standing, threatened to overbalance from the uneasy shifting of his feet, and fancy the feelings of the parent of the gentle Desdemona. Strangulation, or at least dislocation of the neck, was almost certain. He was rapidly turning black in the face. Messrs. Bradd and Brown, Junior, were posturing on the stage, unable to account for his silence. He was just on the point of explaining, when he felt that in another moment the chair would fall. With one last frantic pull, and a 'wild, heart-broken shriek,' he succeeded in extricating his head; but, in doing so, overtoppled the chair, and down came the whole of the scene, himself on the top, striking and covering up Iago and Roderigo—like a flash of lightning, as Mr. Bradd afterwards pathetically described it.

Here follows a scene of dire confusion which threatens to dash all our hopes. The audience are on their seats, yelling and screaming with laughter, and the dogs and children join in. Mr. Bradd, in his blind wrath, and with the scene still covering him, crawls to the unfortunate Brown, and so mauls that unhappy low comedian that for a month or six weeks any attempt at executting a Portuguese prize jig would have been an act of sheer madness.

Several of the audience nearest to the stage jump up and assist in replacing the scene; and in about ten minutes everything is in order. Mr. Bradd now darts on to the stage, and makes an apology to the audience, contriving to extend it to a short speech; in which he touches upon the increasing importance of Foggyton with regard to the mineral wealth of the country, glances at the present state of European politics, and mentions the cheering fact of an early reduction in the price of the quartern loaf!

By the time he has finished, the members have got ready, and it is determined to go on with the Senate scene—Mr. Brown, Junior, having with great difficulty been appeased.

No sooner does Morris appear before the assembled potent, grave, and reverend seigniors, than a fat-faced, jolly-looking party in the pit rises up and solemnly proposes—'A cheer for Boots! Boots for ever!—escaped uninjured.' Instead of feeling grateful for this friendly interest in his welfare, Brabantio pulls his martial blanket around him, and favours the fat-faced, jolly-looking man with a most determined scowl, meant to cover him with confusion. 'The same to you,' says the fat-faced, jolly-looking man, nodding to him, and imitating the action of a person drinking a glass of wine. 'Polish yer boots!' shouts another party at the back. 'Why don't you chalk yer mustache?' cries a baker. 'Hurra! Blankets!' shouts a small boy. 'Inform his mother—he's been sent to the wash with it!'

Their attention is, however, drawn from him by the entrance of Othello. The talented Togg is greeted with a universal shout of laughter; and the epithets, 'Bones!' 'Uncle Sam!' 'Jim along Josey!' freely applied. He preserves his equanimity, however; and gradually the audience cool down, and they are allowed to proceed. Everything now goes on smoothly. The Senate scene is done well; though, strange to say, and to Mr. Togg's extreme disgust, it is not applauded—strange, because whenever Morris has finished any part of his 'talking,' the most determined and enthusiastic applause follows. It is evident that the tow wig, the blanket, and the Wellington boots have given a prestige; and the noble Moor is considered quite a subsidiary character.

Bradd's soliloquies are also listened to favourably.

Another little incident, affecting Togg in particular, threatens to seriously disturb the proceedings. The Moor—his jealousy now fully awakened through the artful insinuations of Iago—is alone on the stage, giving way to one of his wild bursts of passion, and writhing under the conviction of his wife's perfidy. He is just at the most passionate part of the speech—clasping his brow convulsively, and riveting his agonised gaze on the precise spot on the ceiling where the ventilator ought to be; when a fierce bull-dog, intentionally or accidentally escaping from his owner, with a savage yell makes a bound on to the stage and fixes its teeth in his dress. To pull out his sword is, for Othello, the work of a moment; and he is about to run it into the animal when the owner, a truculent-looking fighting man, rushes on to the stage. 'Lay a finger on the dawg and I'll choke you.' 'Take it off, then,' shouts Togg, his blood fully up, 'or I'll cut it in pieces, and you too.'

The owner at last succeeds in getting its grip loosened, by the process of putting a little snuff on its nose; and, pitching it over to a companion in the pit, tucks up his wristbands, and manifests an intention of inflicting bodily chastisement on the injured Moor; but he is kept at bay with the sword, and a threat that, if he attempts any violence, it will be run into him. The audience, however, order him (the owner) off the stage; and he thinks proper to comply with their request, assuring Togg that he will see him at the end of the performance.

Bradd again walks on and explains that unless order is preserved it will be impossible to go on. Tranquillity being once more restored, the piece goes on without interruption till it reaches that part where the great scene between Othello and Iago takes place.

In his zeal, the outraged Moor grasps rather tightly at Iago's throat; and, we are sorry to record it, that crafty individual so far forgets himself as to seize him in return by the hair of the head, and deal him a severe blow on the nose. Othello, now roused in earnest, returns the blow on Iago's mouth, which draws blood; after which they both close, fall, and roll from one end of the stage to the other, struggling desperately. The audience, thinking this part of the play, applaud fiercely. Both of the combatants are again on their feet; and Othello, with his arms in the most approved pugilistic attitude, rushes upon Iago, who, with wonderful presence of mind, whips off his wig and dashes it right into his face. This has the effect of nearly blinding him, and the opportunity is followed up by Iago butting in, headwards, at his stomach, and prostrating him on his back!

John Brown, Junior, Morris, Amelia, and the fair Desdemona now rush on to the stage, and endeavour to separate them; Othello, however, determined to be revenged, appeals to the audience to see fair play.

In mercy let us drop the curtain on the scene of dire confusion which ensued. Sufficient be it to observe that it was a decided and expensive failure. George and I are sadder and wiser men; and there has not since been another attempt, in Foggyton, 'to hold as 'twere the mirror up to Nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time its form and pressure.'

R. L. G.

A YOUNG LADY'S CARDIPHONIA IN THE LAST CENTURY (Continued).

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

'May 3.

'Why did I go on that foolish errand to the churchyard with that finished man of the world for companion? Of course, though he said little, he knew every turn of thought I experienced during the whole time; and now he dances attendance on me more closely than ever. I will not endure it any longer. This very day commences an entirely new system. What is the use of a girl who cannot assert her own will in a matter of this kind? Jessica! tell Thomas to get out the pony-chaise; I have visits to pay, and must be off immediately. Oh, the delight of feeling one's own mistress—free, completely free, to do what I like and care for whom I please!

'May 10.

'Everything goes on charmingly; and Lionel, I trust, is fast finding his level, in so far at least as I am concerned. I can see that papa and mamma demur considerably to my new line of action; but they will soon acknowledge the reasonableness of letting me take my own way.

'Meeting Fanny Musgrave the other morning at old Mrs. Swinton's, she showed me her new filly—a beautiful creature of a rare mottled gray—and begged me to make trial of her. I mounted directly, and was off at a brisk pace down the avenue towards the high road. Here I encountered Captain Swinton on his fine chestnut steed, who proposed—half jest half earnest—that I should extend my lease of the filly, and strike out through the park-gate into the adjacent country. I was just in the mood for a frolic; so through the gate we went. We had not gone far, and I was chatting very gaily with my cavalier, when, as good luck would have it, up came my cousin on foot, and on his way to the Castle. We stopped an instant to exchange civilities; and then I gave a little impatient flourish with my riding-whip, and smiling to the Captain in signal that I wanted no further delay, we were off again at a sharp trot. As for Harcourt, he looked so queer and amazed, as he stood transfixed, staring after us—oh, it was a most excellent sight! (Mem.—Stroke the first of my new policy.)

'My spirits, which were good before, rose immensely; and after making a charming detour of more than half-an-hour, we returned to Mrs. Swinton's. I restored the filly to Fanny, and drove home in the carriage with mamma—the Captain riding all the way by the side of it, and making himself appear even more silly than usual, poor man! And upon my account, too!

'Next day, we had a large dinner-party, and Lionel of course arrived among the first. Knowing his custom, I did not go down early, as I used to do—when he never failed to engage me in conversation, and so escort me to the dining-hall; but descended, after a most elaborate toilette, close upon the announcement of dinner. Thus was my cousin's old plan completely foiled; for I got involved in such a crowd of friendly salutations on my entrance, that he vainly attempted to reach me; and Mr. Sebright having made a modest proffer of his services, I accepted his arm and seated myself at table between him and Sir Harry Marchmont. (Mem.—Stroke the second.) Behold Lionel, queer and amazed again, and I superabundantly talkative and vivacious!

'Yesterday morning we had just breakfasted, and nobody in the room but papa, who was reading the newspaper, when, attracted by a bright sun, I slipped out by the parlour window, which opens on the lawn. An exquisite day! Rain had fallen in the night; and now every bush and flower and blade of grass bloomed and sparkled in fresher beauty. Enticed by the delicious air, I was strolling most agreeably along, when a quick step came up behind me; then a voice,—

"Whither away, Laura?"

'I turned and confronted my cousin. He looked provokingly satisfied at having met me. Descanting on the loveliness of the day, he got into absolute rapture with the landscape, though he allowed he had seen finer in his travels; and ended by giving me an invitation from his mother to join a party to Eltham Abbey that very afternoon. I listened courteously; taking care, however, to be slowly retracing our steps towards the Castle as we talked. Of course I could not comply with any request made through his agency, and so give him cause for triumph. "I had no leisure," I said, "for the projected excursion; engagements at home; letters to write; a hundred things to do. I was sorry I could not accompany Lady Harcourt." So I bade him a light good-by as we reached the house, and flew up stairs; determined to have a busy day without his society. (Mem.—Stroke the third.) Lionel again in perplexity, and myself happy in the thought of thus gradually slipping out of the meshes of the enemy.

'May 20.

'I think I have fairly piqued my cousin's pride at last, and driven him off the field. This is just as it should be. The schemes of the meddlers are baffled; and I am free as air! Lionel has not been here for days past;—and when I encounter him by chance, there is a quiet, grave recognition, and he moves on. What a relief!—no surveillance now; no dropping from the clouds to watch everything I do. Free! free! How delightful the change! Yet I have not gained the victory without considerable vigilance and determination. Positive opposition, indeed, I have had none. I expected remonstrance from mamma, but she says not a word; and papa is kind as ever. I thought, perhaps, Mdlle. Hortense would have observed my change of demeanour to my cousin, and dubbed me capricious; but she, too, is silent; and why? They are convinced at last that I will not be made a fool of; and they respect my spirit.

'Who dines with us to-day? Mr. Sebright among others. He will doubtless bring me the MS. song he promised me—an old Indian air—the words by himself. Shall I have flowers or jewels in my hair? N'importe. One thing is certain—I am in thrall to nobody.

My bosom's lord sits lightly on his throne!

'May 24.

'What a stupid party we had last night at Lady Annealy's. Not a single man there worth either speaking to or dancing with. The viands were delicate enough—profuse indeed—and costly to a wish; but the mind needs food too, and there was literally none of it to be had for love or money. When will people learn to be more amusing before they invite others to their houses to be amused?

'May 29.

'A strange report has just reached me, which I scarce know how to credit. Grandmamma Arlington arrived last night from her seat in Wales, on a visit to the Castle. She had passed a few days with my aunt Harcourt on her way hither. As I was seated quietly at my embroidery last night, I overheard her telling mamma the most extraordinary piece of news. It seems she strongly suspects, from various circumstances, that my cousin Lionel has formed an attachment when abroad to a German lady, highly accomplished, but without fortune. This girl, moreover, is so very young that her parents refuse to sanction the marriage just yet. So a delay of two years has been proposed. Mamma was astounded at the information. And I—what did I care about it? Not a pin. So I gently opened the casement and leaned out to inhale the sweet evening air (for certainly the room felt rather close); and upon drawing in my head a few minutes thereafter, I found that the speakers had changed their topic. Then papa came in, and read aloud a long prosy speech, made by somebody in Parliament, upon malt duties or some such nonsense; and, after partaking of biscuits and negus, we all withdrew to our chambres-au-coucher.

'June 8.

'This morning is wet, and I feel strangely out of spirits. Heigh-ho! I wish I had a new novel—anything new! I hate old things; they look so universally melancholy. Even grandmamma's visit I don't enjoy nearly so much as I expected. One day she asked, carelessly, "By-the-by, what has become of your cousin Lionel that I never see him here?" when mamma, interposing, answered for me in the same indifferent tone, "I think Laura and he have not been such good friends of late; and so he seldom comes."

'Seldom! thought I; why, he never comes. It is exactly a fortnight to-morrow since he called at the Castle; when, finding me playing over that Indian melody to Mr. Sebright, he merely exchanged the common courtesies, and disappeared. What did that look imply which he gave me on quitting the apartment? Serious it was—almost sad; sweet and kind, yet half reproachful too. A deep, earnest, indefinable look. Perhaps he deemed me whimsical, heartless. No matter; it is all over now.

'Grandmamma rallied me the other morning on the subject of lovers. She inquired the number of mine; and how many true, kind, noble hearts were among them. She never named Lionel as possible to be of the category; and though I longed to speak of him, and ask in my turn concerning his lady-love over the sea, somehow I could not. The words would not come. I wonder is she beautiful? Complexion dark or fair? Could she say of herself, as the poet hath it in his verse—

A German maid behold!
Mine eye is blue,
My hair is waving gold—
Heart warm and true!

'Heigh-ho! I guess the reason now why my cousin said he knew of fairer scenes than ours here in England. He remembered the Rhine, on whose banks the tale of love was spoken, and longed to be there once more; while I—O fool! fool!

"Are there any strangers below, Jessica?"

"Only Sir Harry Marchmont and Mr. Sebright."

"I will not go down."

"The milliner has just sent home your new bonnet, Miss Laura."

"I cannot look at it at present. My head aches, Jessica. Put some eau-de-Cologne on my temples, and leave me alone for awhile."

'Thirteen days since he was at the Castle! It is a long absence. Yet why should he come at all? Why did he ever come?

'June 11.

'Returning from the concert last night, papa fairly taxed me with flatness of spirits. I parried his remark with a joke. But how could I feel gay when I had just been listening to some of Haydn's finest airs? What an inexpressible melancholy there lies in exquisite music! The echoes of some of these symphonies (so sweet and mournful to the soul!) lingered about my heart for hours afterwards! And when I wakened up from a short sleep in the early morning, still the notes seemed wailing passionately in my ears!

'June 12.

'I love that old provençal verse of the Countess de Die. It is ever running in my mind now, though I used to count it but a wailing piece:—

Alas! alas! my song is sad.
How should it not be so,
When he who used to make me glad
Now leaves me in my woe!

The refrain is tender and touching. I can fancy well the pale, weary face looking out, day by day, and looking ever in vain! Wishing she were dead, mayhap. Oh, how truly I can sympathise with her!

'June 17.

'How long is it now since Lionel has been here?

To judge by my feelings, a year at least; but, in real point of time, about three weeks. Yet the circumstance is never remarked by anybody—his name is never mentioned in the house. Are they all turned in league against me? Did I use him ill? Was he disgusted with my caprice? No, no; I forgot. His wishes are all centred in that foreign inamorata; and I was the mere plaything of a day.

'Mamma has just left my boudoir. She says, inquiringly, "Laura! your cheek is losing its wonted bloom and your mind its native esprit. How is this, my child? Are you well? Will you go to Wales with your grandmamma when she leaves us a few days hence?"

"Mamma, I will do anything—go anywhere you please; but I am perfectly well."

"Your aunt Harcourt is to be here to-day. I will consult her about you."

'I almost started at the magic name. And oh! how I longed to say to mamma, "When is Lionel going to wed that German beauty?" But somehow I could not speak the words. So she kissed me kindly and left me.

'What strange beings we are! I cannot look at that hat of mine with the broken scarlet feather but my heart grows sick. Will Lady Harcourt come to-day, and shall I hear anything to interest me?

'My aunt has been here, and closeted with mamma and grandmamma for more than an hour. She is gone; and I have heard no news! To-morrow we are promised to dine at Mrs. Swinton's. I will not go. Captain Swinton has grown absurd and conceited beyond bearing. How unlike some men I have known, who had seen the world and profited by their experience!—men of large, liberal views—deeply versed in human nature, and yet full of poetry and romance! Heigh-ho! That is a pretty sentiment, "To be loved in life is much, but to be loved in death is more!" Hortense is soon going away back to Switzerland. Everybody seems forsaking me.'

(To be continued.)

WILL MURDER OUT?

BY THE EDITOR.

ONE would think that, of all trades going, the trade of murder is the most unprofitable, as it is undoubtedly the most perilous. It is a common saying that 'Murder will out,' and that it does come out at times, in ways the most curious and Providential, is certain. There would really seem to be few things in this world more difficult than surreptitiously to dispose of a dead body. Some years ago, a learned professor in Boston tried it and failed. Can we wonder, then, at the non-success which so often attends the efforts of less scientific murderers, on finding themselves alone with the silent victims and witnesses of their guilt? Two at least of Shakspeare's mightiest tragedies—'Macbeth' and 'Hamlet'—appear intended to illustrate the moral that murder will not hide. Godwin's novel of 'Caleb Williams' and Coleman's play of 'The Iron Chest' have apparently a like design; and the same may be said of Bulwer Lytton's story and Thomas Hood's poem of 'Eugene Aram.' Every successive murder which fills the newspapers, and is a town's talk—or, it may be, a world's wonder—seems, in like manner, to demonstrate the impossibility of concealing mangled corpses or washing out bloody stains. True, murderers often escape the hugman's noose, either through the cunning with which they have done their work, or through the tender-heartedness of juries. But murders, according to the popular notion, inevitably transpire; and with them all the enormous risks of detection and punishment for the murderers.

Yet, in spite of what appears to be the overwhelming chances against secrecy and impunity, we find 'the bloody house of life' (to quote Shakspeare's phrase) invaded with as much frequency—we had almost said as much periodical regularity—as if the chances were altogether on the other side. The public press is seldom without its engrossing murder or murders. People descant and congratulate themselves on the certainty with which crimson footsteps are tracked; and marvel at the infatuation which marks every new instance of blood-guiltiness. The question is again and again forced upon us, and upon every man who gives the matter a moment's thought—Do murders ever, in any single instance, pass unnoticed, or without awful perils and still more awful fears to the perpetrators?

We think it probable that the generally-accepted axiom, 'Murder will out,' is not of universal application. No doubt, when a man is murdered, he is likely to be missed by some one. Byron says—

'There is a tear for all who die—
A mourner o'er the humblest grave;

and it is assuredly difficult to conceive of any human being so utterly forlorn but that his disappearance will occasion inquiry. Thus, then, in addition to the chances of the body being discovered—wholly or in part—to tell its own dreadful tale, there is the still greater chance of a clue to the murder being found and followed up, from the simple fact of the murdered individual leaving a blank somewhere. Nevertheless, we cannot avoid arriving at the painful conclusion that there must be many murders perpetrated that are never found out, and never even suspected. It is of course vain to attempt to prove the occurrence of deeds incapable of proof. Steam is invisible; yet the instant we let it forth to speak for itself it becomes visible vapour, and refutes to the physical senses its invisible property. In like manner, how can we drag secret murders to the light to demonstrate that secret murders are perpetrated? The very act would be destructive of the argument. Our position is that many murders must occur, the occurrence of which is wholly unknown; and which, if known, would cease to belong to that class of murders. In the main, we admit this to be a guess; but it is at the same time a guess probable in itself, and, indeed, founded on data leading directly 'to the door of proof.' For example, how often do murders come to light which, but for some slight accident, would have remained unrevealed until the Day of Judgment! From such casual liftings-up of the curtain behind which such crimes are enacted, may we not infer the existence of a bloody interior on one side or other—perhaps near us, perhaps far off; but into which no human eye is ever permitted to penetrate?

These remarks have been suggested by a remarkable incident related in the 'Memoirs of Joseph Grimaldi,' the clown. Joe, who belonged to a theatrical family, had a younger brother named John, who manifested an early repugnance to the stage, and determined to become a sailor. The latter accordingly obtained, through the good offices of a friend, a situation in an East Indian man then lying in the river. No sooner, however, had he got on board, with everything prepared for the voyage, than his eye alighted on a man-of-war about to drop down to Gravesend with the tide, while his own vessel was not to sail for ten days. A sudden impulse seized him; he slid into the water, swam to the king's ship, entered himself as a seaman or cabin-boy under a feigned name; and went off, whither his friends knew not, leaving behind him his entire kit, which had cost upwards of £50. This was in 1789, after which fourteen years elapsed without a syllable being heard of him. He was of course supposed to be dead; and all inquiries regarding him, and all tears lamenting him, had ceased after a decent interval of time. Perhaps the runaway had been something of a scapegrace. At all events, Joe Grimaldi continued to make riddle faces, and tumble head over heels, and cry, 'Here we are!' and keep the town in a roar, and take comical short-cuts to a broken-down constitution and a premature old age, as if no mysterious family tragedy had happened!

Nor had it happened yet. The hard-working, strong-feeling, and laughter-moving son of Momus made great circles of merriment—especially as each succeeding Christmas came round—with no premonition of the startling and bewildering glimpse he was to obtain of his long-lost brother, at the end of fourteen years, prior to his vanishing again—suddenly and unaccountably—into an obscurity wholly and for ever impenetrable. It was one night towards the middle of November 1803, when Grimaldi was performing at Drury-lane, that he was told two gentlemen desired to see him at the stage-door. He was passing from the green-room to the stage at the moment; and he accordingly sent back a message that the gentlemen would require to wait. On going down, as soon as he was at leisure, to see who wanted him, he observed two young men, in fashionable and showy evening dress—consisting of a blue body-coat with gilt buttons, a white waistcoat, and tight pantaloons—one of whom, with visage bronzed by southern suns, accosted him in frank and familiar terms. A few exclamations of surprise and hurried explanations followed. It was no other than John Grimaldi, the fugitive sailor-boy; now the full-grown and seemingly thriving man. The scene of recognition and of fraternal greeting, enacted at the stage-door, would have been effective on the stage. Joe shed tears of joy; and was taking him up stairs, when the friend who accompanied him, and who had not, in the excitement of the moment, been introduced, abruptly took his leave, arranging that he should see him next morning at ten. The incomparable clown went through the remainder of his performance in an agitated state; while his brother talked freely with the other performers in the green-room, and also with Joe whenever he was off the stage. In answer to inquiries, he boasted of his success—of his riches even—and, pointing to his breast-pocket, said, 'At this moment I have six hundred pounds here!' On Joe throwing out a hint as to the danger of his carrying so much money about with him, he laughed, and said, 'We sailors know nothing about danger.' He added that even if it were all lost, he 'would not be penurious.' Subsequently, he exhibited a coarse canvas bag filled with coin, which he carefully replaced in his pocket. It likewise appeared that he had not been more than two or three hours in town, having merely tarried to get some dinner, and then hurried straight to the theatre. He expressed himself eager to see his mother, whose address he obtained; but as Joe was not to appear in the after-piece, it was arranged that they should visit the old lady together. Joe made all haste to change his dress, leaving his brother meanwhile on the stage. When, however, he emerged from his dressing-room, ready to leave, he found the latter gone. Several of the actors, of whom he inquired, had seen him 'not a minute ago.' The porter at the stage-door had observed him pass out 'not a minute back.' Joe was annoyed; but waited, expecting him every moment to return. He then walked up and down the street; came back to the stage-door; began to get uneasy; and could not understand what had become of him. The hour waxed late, and the puzzle proportionally increased. It then struck him that, as he had occupied some time in changing his dress, his brother might have stepped out in his impatience, and visited a Mr. Bowley, who lived close at hand, and with whom he had been a bosom friend in boyhood. This was a lucky guess. He had been there, but was gone. The direction in which he had proceeded was also pointed out. It was Duke-street. Grimaldi followed this clue with all speed—knocking up the family of a Mr. Bailey, their old landlord, and learning that a gentleman with 'a white waistcoat' had been there before him, knocking and ringing violently, but had not been admitted. Not without a vague feeling of apprehension, he ran back to the theatre, thinking he must surely have gone there; but he had not been seen. Again he set out to various other places in the neighbourhood which he thought it possible he might have visited. In vain. Returning once more to the theatre, he found the establishment shutting up for the night. His brother had not been there. What could such strange conduct mean?

But now the idea occurred to Grimaldi that his brother, thinking he had missed him, must have gone straight to their mother's home himself. Reassured by this notion, he lost no time in proceeding thither; but merely to throw her into a swoon with the news of her son John's reappearance, in sound health, 'and with money enough to make all their fortunes.' On recovering, she insisted on Joe going to bed—fatigued as he was with his night's performance and his fruitless chase—while she sat up alone to await the return of the wanderer. She did so; but the morning found her still alone. The wanderer did not appear. He did not appear that night. He did not appear the night after; nor the next night; nor yet the next. A week passed, and he appeared not. He never appeared again. The Admiralty instituted inquiries; the police ransacked all London; powerful friends were not wanting to aid in prosecuting the search. Vain, vain. The poor sailor was as much gone as if he had been swept overboard, in a tempest, into the seething surges of the Atlantic. Some suggested that he had been carried off by a press-gang; but the general conviction was that he had been murdered, and that the friend who accompanied him to the theatre, and could not afterwards be found, must have been privy to his fate. There could, indeed, be little doubt that John Grimaldi had been killed for his cash; and that, in fact, his ostentatious prosperity had been the occasion of his secret death.

Here, then, is an instance of a probable murder, occurring in the heart of the metropolis, and conducted, on the part of the murderer or murderers, with perfect secrecy and success. Here, in a word, was a murder which would not out. No doubt the unfortunate stranger was missed, for the city was made to ring with the sudden mystery of his disappearance. But suppose he had been entrapped, robbed, and put out of sight an hour or two earlier—before he had reached Drury-lane and been seen by his brother and by the friends of his brother at the theatre—what then? Acknowledge that possible, and we are at once furnished with a case of secret murder, with no poisoned or wounded body discovered, with no friends distracted, with no inquiries instituted, with no noise made, and with absolutely nothing of the crime known, except to that Great Eye of the Universe from which nothing whatever is hid!

Are there many such secret murders? Is it only a few of such crimes that find their way into the newspapers? Are there monsters walking about, enjoying large prosperity from anonymous sources, at whose very names the world would shudder if they knew all? We know not; we hope not. We can never know; we can only hope. But it is well, in the midst of the misgivings and the alarms and the horrors thus suggested, to cherish a generous faith in the undoubted good that is in human nature, and that seeks for vent and exercise through a thousand channels—the more honourable when they are secret; and which has, for these many years, been engaged in making the world better; and that, too, with so much practical diligence, that we are surprised there should still be a tendency, even among the inherently base and brutal, towards poisonous deadly draughts, terrific bloody knives, and savage remorseless blows.

TO A CRITIC.

Throw down, my critic! that sore-wearied pen,
And let poor rhyming devils have some peace!
What matters it that o'er and o'er again
Your pedant imitates the songs of Greece?

Or married ladies, in three volumes mild,
Propound such happy theories of right:
Or reverence a hero dark and wild—
A heroine all rose-bloom and delight:

Tearful young gentlemen murmuring of dreams,
And dewdrops glistening on their pale one's bier—
Dressing their sorrow in all moonlit gleams,
And talking vaguely of a lonely mere?

Why murder all those innocents, and bring
Voe to their tender, unreflecting hearts?
Long may they sermonise, or prose, or sing;
Nor tremble at your courteous, cutting darts.

'Twill do the men no harm—the women good—
To vent their spleen upon a sheet of white;
For anger will not long for nobler food
When but allowed its grievances to write.

Throw down then, critic! that o'er-laboured quill;
And turn to little upturned eyes of blue,
That wonder what has made papa so ill
That he don't speak to Jack, and Kate, and Sue.

Turn to the little rosy cheeks that wait
To dimple into laughter clear and sweet;
While Jack your whisker pulls, and little Kate
Climbs up your knee with scarlet-slipped feet.

Turn to the open window, where the breeze
Comes sweeping in from uplands far and wide;
And grateful perfume of the apple trees
Bears in upon you in a wavy tide.

Throw down the quill! Go leap the meadow bars,
To feel the dewy coolness of the grass!
And breathe the fragrance of the campion stars,
That shine in trembling whiteness as you pass!

W. BLACK.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK,
13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, London, E.C.; and 32 St.
Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 5.]

SATURDAY, NOV. 1, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

LITERARY MISHAPS.

AN old countryman, recently visiting a printing-office, remarked to one of the compositors that he did not understand how they all came to be such good 'spellers.' Having been told they generally considered it as easy to spell correctly as not, and that from long practice it was unusual to make a mistake, he remarked, further, that he supposed them also to be conversant with every language that they might be called upon to put in type. This fact, for it is so, is quite reconcilable with the idea of another equally verdant gentleman—that a phonetic system of spelling would be an advantage; but as this could not now be of easy introduction, and might lead to much confusion, things will have to remain as they are, on the principle of one phonetic scribbler, that 'Wat kant b kurd must b ndurd.' Others, again, are so ignorant of the actual labour required in the production of books, that they think nothing can be easier. Instance the old lady who went into a bookseller's shop in Glasgow, asking for a 'big prent' Bible. After being shown several, none of which appeared of large enough type to satisfy her, she very coolly remarked, 'I'm gaun up the toun a bit, to buy some bits o' things, an' ye can jist pit your stampin' airns in the fire, an' hae ane ready for me as I come back.' Poor old lady! her ignorance was plain enough; but there are plenty as unreasonable in their demands at the hands of the printer—the mis-spelling of a proper name or the omission of a comma throws them into a state of mental agitation, and may perhaps beget a letter animadverting in strong terms upon the mistake to the publisher or editor of the work in question. Mistakes will happen in the best works, in spite of all the care which can be taken in their getting up by the printers. Yet they are not always in fault, for the author often leads them astray, by carelessly-written 'copy,' both in punctuation and spelling. One well-known American writer recommended that all authors should work for a time in a printing-office, as a means of reforming a diffuse style and incorrect punctuation—compositors becoming critically aware, in the picking up letter by letter of a long and complex sentence, of the best means of curtailing and strengthening sentences; and quick at detecting repetitions; to say nothing of the art of nice punctuation. It is part of a proof-reader's duty to mark a note of interrogation against any passage in a book preparing for press which he does not think is right, or when a sentence is incomplete. Authors profit by these quiet estimates of their meaning; and many a weak point, which might have marred a writer's reputation, has been set right by attention being drawn to it by the unobtrusive (!) of the proof-reader. Many a good work is sadly disfigured by the negligence of the authors in correcting their proofs; and others, again, are extremely diligent in making unnecessary alterations. Cases have been where one volume has grown into two by means of corrections, and others have had their price considerably heightened in consequence. It is recorded that both Milton and Addison were solicitous regarding the correction of their works in passing through the press. The satirical poet Churchill expressed himself rather energetically on this point, when he said 'that it was like cutting away one's own flesh;' while the manuscript of Julius Scaliger was so carefully prepared that the print corresponded with it—page for page and line for line. Ben Jonson was once requested to revise a sermon full of typographical errors; but he declined the task, and recommended that it should be sent to the House of Correction. Burke, the celebrated orator, was careless in regard to his MS.; for one of his most spirited effusions received so many corrections and interlineations, that the compositors refused to correct it, but took down the types and re-set the whole.

Now, all this does not proceed only from the many who write and publish; but the few who occupy the highest status in the literary world are equally to blame for all this extra labour. Lawyers of high standing send their MS. to the printers with technical phrases and legal terms mis-spelled and abbreviated, and expect the compositor to decipher and set it up in a readable condition. Divines of known ability leave their 'copy' without points or even 'caps' to mark the beginning and end of sentences—thus giving much additional labour, and causing thereby much loss of time and temper. Were their works left in the same state in which they are frequently written, no one would attribute the fault to the author—the printers alone would be held accountable.

Most printers, however, endeavour to put forth their works in as careful a manner as possible. Stephens, a printer in Paris, of some celebrity for his classical editions, in order to secure perfect accuracy in his books, used to exhibit proof-sheets for public inspection—offering a reward to any one who could detect an error in them, so that it might be rectified before printing. Yet one of his editions of the Testament is known as the 'Pulres Edition,' from the Latin word 'plures' being mis-spelled, owing to the transposition of the letter l. In the beginning of last century, two Glasgow citizens of the name of Foulis—also distinguished for their elegant printing—were actuated by a similar spirit; and, eager to produce an immaculate edition of Horace, caused the successive proof-sheets, after revision, to be hung up at the gate of the University—offering a reward for the discovery of any error. A well-known edition of Homer, published by them in 1756, has received great praise for its beauty and accuracy. Bishop Lowth could only find one error in it, and even this was a comparatively unimportant one. Gibbon has also praised this edition for the beauty of the type with which it is printed.

Before advertent to the literary mishaps peculiar to the newspaper press, we shall notice a few that have occurred in books, some of which may as fairly be attributed to the writer as to the printer. We may premise that the similarity in the spelling of some words, others with the difference of only a letter, and the comparative resemblance of their written conformation, are the most fruitful causes—the mistakes often having a fitness of themselves which, independently of the amusement they afford, is sometimes superior to that of mere incongruity. Thomas Moore happily hits off the liability of printers to commit errors, in the 'Fudges in England,' when he makes Fanny say—

'But a week or two since, in my "Ode to the Spring"—
Which I meant to have made a most beautiful thing—
Where I talked of the "dew-drops from freshly-blown roses,"
The nasty things made it "from fleshy-brown noses."'

Mr. Pycroft relates the following conversation on this matter:—'Really,' said a printer to him, 'gentlemen should not place such unlimited confidence in the eyesight of our hard-worked and half-blinded reader of proofs; for I am ashamed to say that we utterly ruined one poet through a ludicrous misprint.'

'Indeed! And what was the unhappy line?'

'Why, sir, the poet intended to say—

"See the pale martyr in a sheet of fire!"

instead of which he was made to say—

"See the pale martyr with his shirt on fire!"

The reviewers, of course, made the most of so entertaining a blunder; and the poor poet was never heard of more in the field of literature.' The same gentleman also notices another singular error, in the passage quoted by Dr. Johnson as an authority under the verb 'to sit.' 'Asses are ye that sit in judgment' (Judges, v. 10). The verse is—'Speak! ye that rile on white asses, ye that sit in judgment, and walk by the way.'

A monkish writer of a work published in 1561—consisting of 172 pages of text and 15 of errata—attributed the mistakes to the wiles of Satan, who caused the printers to commit them; but he does not state whether it was the Gentleman in Black himself or his satellite—the printer's devil—who had his finger in the 'pie.'* The Bible itself has not escaped from these mishaps. One edition, printed many years ago, is known as the 'Vinegar Bible,' from the fact that the 'Parable of the Vineyard' is therein styled the 'Parable of the Vinegar.' Disraeli, in his 'Curiosities,' gives an account of a scandalous omission of the important negative in the Seventh Commandment. The printers were summoned before the Court of High Commission; and this 'not' served to bind them in a fine of £3,000. A prior circumstance had occurred which induced the Government at that time to be very vigilant on the Biblical press:—The learned Bishop Usher, going one day to preach at St. Paul's Church, entered a bookseller's shop and procured a Bible of the London edition. When he came to look at his text, to his astonishment and horror he discovered that the verse was altogether omitted from the copy he had got.

To which of the two, author or compositor, are we to attribute this vile misquotation of a line of Burns?

'New Tam! O Tam! had they been queens!'

Queens never were plentiful in Ayrshire, but it could turn out many a bevy of

'Queens,

A' strapping hixies in their teens!

A book was published not long ago, in which some other example of public spirit and good citizenship was brought into comparison with the conduct of Cato and Brutus. This was the end of the paragraph, and no doubt was intended to have a good training effect; but, unfortunately, the two Roman names were printed Cats and Brutes!

In Pope's notes on 'Measure for Measure,' he says the story was taken from 'Cinthio,' dec. 8, nov. 5—meaning 8th decade and 5th novel. One of the many 'amendments' of Shakspeare thought fit, however, to omit these abbreviations; and we therefore read December 8, November 5! Pope has also been misquoted on another occasion, by some prosaic compositor who sought to bring the poet's idea within the limits of his own understanding, thus—

'Who could take offence,

When pure description held the place of sence!'

Word of 'the place of sence.'

In one of the many Christmas books published these days at that festive season, there was a passage to the effect that, though young ladies sometimes objected from coyness to be kissed under the mistletoe, they did not object to it under the nose!—which we naturally understand to have meant 'under the rose.' We forget in what Radcliffian romance the following blunder occurred:—The passage was a vigorous one—well wrought up—the heroine was on the point of being sacrificed to the revenge of the villain of the story, when opportune aid arrived to rescue the fair damsel in the person of a knight riding on a warhorse! We should fancy that war horse was here meant.

The similarity of two written letters has led occasionally to awkward mistakes—as the author of a temperance novel would find to his astonishment, when he saw that where he meant to say that 'drunkenness is folly,' it was rendered 'drunkenness is jolly!' Even the want of a comma may lead to strange results, as in a bill which was presented to a farmer, which ran—'To hanging two barn-doors and myself seven hours, 4s. 6d.' A recent critique upon 'Othello' has the following, showing how much the want of a comma may mar the sense of a passage:—'The Moor, seizing a bolster full of rage and jealousy, smothers her.' This reminds us of a very Irish epitaph, which places the brother of the deceased in a very awkward position—'Erected to the memory of John Philips, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother.' A correspondent lately sent a piece of poetry to a newspaper, with these words:—'The following lines were written more than fifty years ago, by one who has for many years slept in his grave merely for his own amusement.'

* For a printer's technicality for types mixed, disarranged, and out of hand.

Audubon's 'Ornithology' contains this sentence, which shows that authors do make strange slips at times:—'The earth was rent asunder in several places; one or two islands sunk for ever; and the inhabitants fled in dismay towards the eastern shores.' And Bulwer somewhere says—'I hear the vain shadows glide.'

In all works hurriedly produced, such as newspapers, there is, of course, a greater liability to commit errors; but, all things considered, newspapers are marvels of correct typography; and it cannot be doubted that the careful and painstaking method of reading over the proof-sheets alone produces this result. These proofs frequently contain very curious errors—such as Paper-families for Paterfamilias; or, 'Eh! the Brute!' for 'Et tu Brute!' But these are generally set right, before printing, by the reader comparing the proof with the author's manuscript—supposing that this is itself correct, which is not always the case; and then it becomes the duty of a good reader to see that there are no inconsistencies in spelling, punctuation, abbreviations, &c. The hurry of production in the case of newspapers, were it not for this care, would be apt to produce many blunders. Imagine a telegram arriving at an early hour of the morning, containing important news which not only requires notice but a leading article! Two o'clock; first post at five; and country subscribers must be duly supplied. The fagged compositors—who have already about finished up the work required for the day's paper—shake up their nearly empty cases, and prepare for a hurry. Forth from the editorial room comes the MS.—two or three pages at a time—in a half-readable hand; and so on for a while till it is all out. Not a word is heard; not a sound but the low, silent whispering of the type as it is hurried into the composing-stick. When a part is ready, a proof is taken; and then the reader and his satellite are spinning over it. Corrected, it is revised by the editor; and it is then put into its place in the paper, which now is 'put to bed.' The wheels of the machine begin to revolve, and forth come the sheets; which are then folded, packed, and hurried off to the railway in nothing more than time.

Such being not unfrequently the case, the wonder is not that there are mistakes, but that there are so few. Of those which have occurred, we shall give a few specimens—premising that most of them occur from the causes already noticed. Thus, in an article upon the short-time agitation, some years ago, it was stated that a 'factory-boy was shaved to death' (slaved). Darwin may assert strange things; but the following, we imagine, does not enter into his catalogue of affinities—that 'ants reside in subterranean taverns' (caverns); or this—a live surgeon was caught in the Thames, and sold to the inhabitants (?) at sixpence the pound.' The Directors of the Indigent Old Men's Society in Edinburgh, on looking for the report of one of their annual meetings, some years ago, in the next morning's paper, were no doubt astonished to find it reported as the Indignant Old Men's Society. So with a learned bishop, who had been viewing the antiquities of an old church: he was stated to have expressed himself gratified with its iniquities. The animadversion of one newspaper upon a public officer—some parochial Bumble—which said that he had been 'tried in the balance and found panting,' was as likely to be correct as if it had been that he was 'found wanting.' A provincial paper says:—'Our account of the thunder-storm last week contained a slight mistake. Instead of hailstones as large as pullets, read bullets.' Another speaks of the excitement created by a recent highway bobbery. A gentleman was presented, according to one paper, with a silver medal, for stealing geraniums—seedling ones were meant. 'Many confusions of the limbs took place at a recent railway accident.' This same paper also stated that a lady had been cured 'by the Cheltenham waiters.' Another, again, speaks of a Mr. Miller as being a member of 'the Pease Society.'

We have perhaps said enough, though the list might be easily extended. But are such things to be wondered at? Look on this picture of their ordinary difficulties:—An important county meeting takes place to-night, and subscribers will expect a full report with the morrow's papers. Imagine, then, the reporters who have attended returning per train, in a jolting carriage, at an express rate—each busy transcribing his phonetics into long hand with a pencil. Fancy this crumpled mass of paper, only half intelligible, and blurred, put into the compositors' hands, set up, corrected, and put to press in very little more time than an ordinary person would take to read over the same! Yet this is comparatively a common case with daily papers. And there is not a public speaker who will deny that he is indebted to the reporters for the manner in which they have rounded off a sentence left incomplete in the speaker's hurry; or used the pruning-knife with skill in the excision of some twice or thrice repeated phrase. Now, is it not astonishing that such fair and correct reports are given? Of a truth it is; and the public are much beholden to them and the compositors for the correctness which in general marks the productions of the modern press; and ought to exercise a little of that charity which is not easily offended in their strictures upon all such Literary Mishaps.

D.

THE INVESTITURE OF THE HOSE.

I dedicate these songs to those
Who bore the Babe and wove the Hose.

BIRTH OF THE BABE.

It was an April morning about the middle of the month. As I lay dreaming of greening hedges, and bursting and blowing buds, I was awakened by a muffled whisper, just like the rustle of a new leaf brushed by the downy wing of a bird. Yet, in spite of the shrinking delicacy and tenderness of the voice, it possessed a subtle depth and power; and therefore I rose quickly and silently, as if on the wings of a strong instinct that seemed to anticipate volition.

The morning, although not quite dark, was yet so overshadowed by the lingering night that the indefinite streaks of silver, which the dawn was endeavouring to write on the black wall of the east, were still powerless to waken a suspicion of morning even in the soul of the lark. Cold and mystical silence, therefore, reigned over the face of the earth. As I hurried along the streets for Dr. Plato, the raw air laid its damp lips upon my face and made me shudder. Up in the chill heavens the very stars seemed to shiver, and began to assume a ghastly aspect, as if conscious of the imminent dawn. The streets and squares were shadowy, and almost soundless; there was just so much sound, indeed—and that of a dull, negative sort—as to suggest that the slumbering city was disturbed by some intrusive vision—perhaps the spirit which foreshadows the manifold troubles and labours of the day.

Dr. Plato was sound asleep when I rang his bell; but he answered quickly, and the moment he saw my face he at once guessed my mission.

'Is she very ill?' he inquired.

'I think, Doctor, that she will require your presence immediately.'

'Then,' he replied, 'as I have got several hours' undisturbed rest, I will be with you in a few minutes.'

It was always a pleasure to see Dr. Plato. There was in his manner a frankness and a sympathetic cordiality which acted on his patients like the elixir of life; and his common smile was as good as a dozen insurance office. It seems to me that a physician properly so called—this is, a physician whose primary and only object in life is not to make money, but to bring health to suffering humanity—will always approach his patients as if he could restore them to strength by his mere physical presence. This assertion will not appear obscure or ambiguous to those who know that in most men, but especially in medical men, manners are mesmeric and contagious. Dr. Plato's manners were remarkably so. I speak from experience. He never visited me but he seemed to carry his chest of restoratives in his face. His voice, too, was always so new and fresh, that I felt as if it went into my blood like the very essence of sunshine. Then, it actually seemed that the medicines he gave me were not at all like the nasty things which other doctors are reputed to prescribe to their patients. The crowning proof of Dr. Plato's moral-magnetic power lies in the fact that children do not fear him; but would have lovingly stood by his knee any length of time, as they did by the knee of that other Physician who delighted so much to tolerate and bludgeon little children. Depend upon it, a great part of a physician's success results from his manners.

Dr. Plato was as good as his word. He arrived

Myrtle Cottage almost as soon as myself; and, as if to confirm the good character which I have ascribed to him, the dawn seemed to follow at his heels. There was instant bustling in the house; and, while the Doctor entered into a whispering conversation with our middle-aged and silver-headed nurse, I just breathed a few words of sympathy and encouragement in my wife's ear, and retired to my little study—which, of course, is also my library. At this conjuncture, however, reading and reflection were entirely out of the question. There was Shakspeare, in twelve volumes; but all his immortalities were dumb, as expecting some new personage to enter immediately upon the stage. Homer, Milton, Wordsworth, and the rest of the great choral company, had not a single voice among them all. As I stood dreamily yet uneasily in front of the shelves, it seemed to me that the silence of the poets did not arise from any unwillingness to sing, but from the fact that they were all wondering whether a new voice would not soon be added to their golden number. Like Shakspeare and his splendid co-mates, the philosophers were also voiceless; but, unlike them, they were different as well as dumb, and did not appear to care a whit whether their number was augmented or diminished. I turned in disgust from their unsympathetic and unfathomable visages to contemplate the opening and many-coloured features of the dawn.

The stars were growing unmistakably pale. There was something awful in the air, the hour, and the chill, noiseless aspect of the world. I felt, as I looked abroad upon the fields and the wide heavens, as if silence were trembling on the edge of sound; or as if all the powers of Nature were hushed in the expectancy of a new revelation, and yet as if they had an absolute fear that the revelation might contain prophesies of woe and misfortune to the sons of men. A weight of unaccountable sadness was removed from my brain when the clarion of a cock from a neighbouring farm broke suddenly into the hollow silence. It was like a proclamation that there still was life in the world; and that there was also light, whose ascent from the under-world would both herald and sanction the uprising of man from his uneasy depth of dreams to the thorny throne of power and the equally jagged seat of necessary and compulsory service. Hardly had the noise of the cock died within my ear, when the challenge was taken up, by some early riser of the feathered singers, a quivering series of notes about the length of an eight-syllabled line of poetry. It was evidently a first attempt that morning, made before the chorister had wet his whistle in the shallows of Myrtle Brook—which is a favourite haunt of the whole tribe of beaked musicians. There was, nevertheless, the ring of true melody in the little preliminary quah, and the earnest of many a golden note yet to gladden the fields and woods. I was rather uncertain as to the identity of the bird. If it was not a lark, the aspiring spirit was not long in giving shrill intimation that he intended that morning to pay an early visit to the stars of heaven, there to pour out his overflowing devotion to the Power who is the authentic fountain of even melody—a melody, let me say, which contains more sensations of soul than many melodies breathed from mortal lips. At first his song came like the broken and rattling ripples of a stony brook; but at length, as the morning brightened, he mounted high upon the wing, racked his liquid throat, and flooded all space with a continuous shower of sparkling and expanding notes. So light now was the morning, that those stars which had not been wont to drop over the dim western walls were fairly caught in the rising surge of dawn, and flickered and weltered until they were completely devoured by the radiant streams which flowed in intense splendour from the east. Then the birds of earthly flight—the blackbird, the thrush, the bullfinch, and the rest—distended their various throats; and with their beaks of many hues made the woods ring, and ring again, with half-a-hundred different songs, blended into one grand confusion of melody; amid which, and at my very ear, I caught the friendly and perhaps too familiar chatter of the prince of domestic ballad-singers, the impudent sparrow.

As this timber-tuned little fellow brought home my wandering fancies, I was startled by an entirely new voice, which suddenly broke in among the choir with a singular and most pathetic treble. In a couple of seconds the voice established its identity in my ear and heart. It was not a song—it was a cry; and, most wonderful of all, as I stood listening, I imagined that the very birds were silent for awhile, as if curious to discover what was the species of the new comer. They could only guess, I fancy; while I, who was so deeply involved in the voice, felt it quiver in my inmost heart. One mysterious thing was this—the longer I listened, the voice seemed a clear repetition of my own: my own as it must have sounded at an early period of my life, and now reproduced and addressed to me in the tenderest tones of appeal. This assuredly was the highest pinnacle of the morning's music; for, although it arose from the level of the earth, it caught my soul up to the seventh heaven!

Some one opened the door of my study. 'Well, Doctor, how is my wife?'

'Very well, considering what she has endured. She is doing excellently.'

'Thank Heaven! But what is it, Doctor?'

'A daughter, fat and fair.'

'Thank Heaven again!'

'What!' cried that splendid physician, 'you don't regret that it is not a son and heir?'

'Miserable materialist! no. My name is not of such mighty importance that it need necessarily be perpetuated. Besides, to live only in name is a sort of second-hand immortality. A man may live in name and be dead indeed. Yet, if an heir is required, I have ample faith that he will come in due season, with all his father's imperfections on his head. Pray Heaven that he may possess his mother's virtues! If he does, I shall be content—for goodness is the greatness of the saints.'

At this the nurse entered and put the new-born baby into my arms. It was a baby. Shall I describe the baby? No! Shall I describe my feelings when I took the baby? No! I don't know what other fathers see in their first baby; but it seemed to me that there was only one baby in the world, and that, undoubtedly, was our baby. But let that pass. As to my feelings—those who are fathers are well acquainted with the first paternal sensations; and those who are not will make the discovery when their first baby is placed in their fatherly arms. Dr. Plato was a capital fellow. I could have kissed him that morning. But there was some one else to kiss—whom I did kiss, and right tenderly too; but whether it was baby or baby's mother I decline to inform you, gentle but inquisitive reader!

When Dr. Plato went home, and mother was righted, and baby was put to her first sleep in this world, and nurse and I—I especially—had failed in an attempt upon breakfast, I returned to my study—to the company of the poets and philosophers. The singers at least were no longer silent, but sang their divine melodies with super-emphases. Who of them it was, or if it was any of them, or whether it was all of them at once, or whether it was only a fancy of my own; certain it is that I heard, coming from the direction of the shelves, indistinctly, I confess, a lilt something like this:—

THE CONTEST.

The red cock waked ere day was born,
And feasted full on barley-corn;
And then he vaulted on the wall,
And blew a blast upon his horn,
As if to say, 'Take notice all.

I am the finest bird of morn!
Proud fool! so dingy red-and-yellow!
The blackbird was a prettier fellow!

The blackbird, from an alder nigh,
Unlock'd his golden-lidded eye,
And scan'd the silent-silvering east.

He dropp'd into the cool, green rye,
And made the early worm his feast.

Then sang he to the morning sky—
Defiant—yet, oh! clear and sweet,
As if no lark were at his feet.

The lark—the bird that dreams in dew,
And sings in heaven so dim and blue—
Ashamed that he had slept so long,

With speed despatch'd a grub or two,
Then rose on wing supreme and strong,

And sang his song divine and true.
Long, emulous, on the notes he hung,
As if there were no human tongue.

But on that very April morn
A tender human babe was born,
Whose eyelids trembled in the dawn,
Just like two lily-buds forlorn;
Whose cry went wavering o'er the lawn,
And seem'd to fill the birds with scorn.
But soon they ceased, abash'd and dumb—
They felt the soul of life had come!

THE WEAVING OF THE HOSE.

At the time of which I speak, there lived in the same town, but at the opposite end to where Myrtle Cottage stood, a very kind-hearted and excellent lady called Sibyl—a name which rumour said she inherited from her ancestors, who were Romans, and who came to this country with the Cæsars. Whether this alleged origin of name is perfectly authentic I really don't know, never having busied myself with the family affairs of the lady; but what is of much greater importance to the present purpose is, that she was quite a superior genius; for, besides being well qualified in all the graceful accomplishments of modern times, she possessed the faculty of verse; which is not an accomplishment, but a power inherited from the Heavenly Power—the Parent of every divine gift. One other thing in which she was remarkably skilful was the working or weaving of hose for little babies. As there is some occult harmony between the mental weaving of rhymes and the mechanical weaving of hose, Sibyl always span her cunningest verses while working the delicate woolly coverings for the toes of the tender infants. Now, Sibyl was one of our friendliest acquaintances; and as all babies must have hose to protect their pretty feet even from the winds of summer; and as, moreover, the investing of the little soles with their first hose is a ceremony in our town of some significance, the good lady took upon herself the responsibility of weaving, with her own fingers, the articles necessary for the investiture of our baby. This was so characteristic of Sibyl, that it did not at all astonish us; but it nevertheless gave us greater satisfaction than the mere value of the hose could account for. But the reason was this—that the slightest compliment paid or service rendered by her to any kind or degree of person, appeared to have in it greater power of blessing than similar acts done by any other individual. Indeed, Sibyl's smile was as good as another person's gold, for it seemed always to sink into the heart and create the power to smile in those who were thus shined upon by her sunny yet subtle eyes. People went even the length of saying that there was an element of mystery about Sibyl, and that she possessed, to some extent, the power of a prophetess. This was, of course, a popular fancy, with a foundation, however, which is not always expoundable by the laws of popular metaphysics. The mystery of Sibyl's power lay in her perfect goodness of heart and consequent perfection of manners. Given, natural goodness of heart, good intellectual endowments, and good education—good manners are inevitable. As, moreover, the action of good manners is generally unobtrusive and unconscious, it is little wonder that their effect, in rare and remarkable instances, should be attributed to a sort of divine magic. There is a way of doing kind actions and saying kind words which makes them really appear to be a sort of heavenly coinage. This was the mystery about Sibyl.

Having resolved to do anything, our friend went into it with energy. Into the weaving of our baby's hose, however, she put both love and energy; and while she wove them, she sang her choicest melodies, and actually created several new ones. So these pedal garments may justly be said to have been woven with music and poetry. One of these original rhymes related to the special operation in which she was engaged. It certainly was suggested by the occasion; and the crooning of it as certainly aided greatly in increasing the velocity of her twinkling fingers in handling the wires. I learned it afterwards from her own lips, and give it here—somewhat deteriorated, I am afraid, by the lapses of a treacherous memory:—

SIBYL'S WEAVING CHANT.

Ling'ring day is almost dead;
Twilight holds his feeble head;
Star-dreams break around his bed—
Lo! his soul to heaven is sped!

Light the lamp and stir the fire;
Build the pile of this gray fire;
Let the new flame, flashing higher,
Priest-like, light the solemn pyre.

Maiden! bring my wires and wool;—
Place me now my knitting-stool
Where the lamp-light falleth full,
And the fire-light waxeth cool.

Thanks! Now get thee to thy rest—
Sleep is stealing to thy breast;
Breathe a prayer, and then unvest—
Thou shalt prosper in thy nest.

Now I am alone with night,
Let me ply these spindles bright;
And subdue these balls of wool
Into something beautiful.

Fingers! ye must mend your pace,
Or the night may win the race.

Time is flowing softly past,
Each hour swifter than the last;
Every stroke a mortal dies,
Leaving tears in loving eyes.

Yet the sand is still undone,
 Dream-quick though the atoms run;
 Still, although the tide rolls out,
 Back it dances with a shout:
 For each mortal heart death-stricken,
 One is born, and others quicken:
 Every stroke a soul is sent
 From celestial banishment—
 Banishment remember'd not
 In this sense-encumber'd lot:
 Unremember'd, dimly guess'd
 Only when the soul is bless'd
 By those dreams that hither roam
 From the spirit's ancient home.

Time is flowing—let it flow;
 Souls are going—let them go:
 He that sent them shall resume them;
 Earth can never more entomb them:
 They have dropp'd their mortal robe
 In the trenches of the globe;
 It shall moulder, they shall bloom
 In the land of blissful doom,
 Where their broken lives shall be
 Finish'd to the last degree.

Therefore shall my tears be brief—
 Souls that die need no grief.
 They that linger on the stage,
 Lapsing, leaf by leaf, to age,
 Shivering by an opening tomb—
 They should wake our fear and gloom.

But to-night I cannot grieve;
 For, as now I weave and weave,
 Ever in my soul I see
 Forms of fair divinity
 Pressing round a baby-face
 In its mortal dwelling-place.
 Never from my memory
 Shall that face erased be!
 There I saw it—see it now—
 With the life-dew on its brow,
 Fresh from that eternal clime
 Whence the soul leaps into time;
 On the wings of blind desire,
 Gropping still for light and fire.

What is she for whom the rose
 In the burning desert blows?
 What is she for whom the fountain
 Gushes from the parched mountain;
 And at whom the lion's eye
 Tames its rolling majesty;
 And the tigers, while they pause,
 Sheathe the horror of their claws?
 Tell me what is she? and whence?
 Whose imperial influence
 Thus commands the homage true
 Which to Heaven alone is due?

One among ten thousand, she
 Is the Flower of Chastity;
 One in whose unspotted mind
 Earth and heaven are interblended,
 Like two melodies combined,
 Ever ending, never ended;
 Mingling in their incompleteness,
 Till they grow one perfect sweetness:

One, from whose unsmirched lip
 Never does foul slander slip;
 Nor in whose transparent heart
 Ever are false words engender'd;—
 (Brasen coin, which shameless Art
 Even to the Gods has tender'd.)

Armed with truth, she builds her story
 To the starry heights of glory.

Wander wheresoe'er she may,
 Spirits 'tend her night and day;
 'Mid the azure of her eye
 Shines a star no ill assaileth;
 In her breast, a sov'reignty
 Rules, and over all prevailleth.
 Fiends may rise in fire and thunder—
 On she passes like a wonder!

This is she to whom is given
 Secret armour wrought in heaven:
 Mother Nature knows her well,
 As she trippeth down the dell;—
 Feels her presence as she treads
 Lightly o'er the violet beds;
 When the oaten pipes are trilling
 Prophecies for her fulfilling;
 And when autumn leaves are falling,
 Or red winter brooks are brawling.
 This—the perfect one—is she,
 Mirror of maturity,
 In that age when but to be
 Virtuous shall be grandest dower—
 Virtue being the crown of power!

Such be she, sweet maiden! born
 On that holy April morn,
 When, as to the world she came,
 Heaven was bathed in amber flame;
 And the birds were smitten dumb
 As they heard her wallings come
 Wavering o'er the milky lawn,
 Like the weeping soul of dawn.
 'Tis for her I weave these hose—
 Bless her pretty heels and toes!

Deftly, softly, weave the hose
 For the baby's tender toes!
 Leave the old fleeces of the dam,
 Take the new fleeces of the lamb
 From the downs or streamy dells,
 Or from hills of heather bells—
 Shear it in the dewy morn,
 Ere the hunter winds his horn.

Wash the wool as white as snow
 In the pool where lilies blow;
 Sun it in the golden beam,
 On the bank beside the stream;
 Card it cleanly ere you spin,
 Let no envious speck get in;
 Spin it at the cottage door,
 Chanting ditties heard no more!

Weave the hose with spotless hand;
 Rim them with a crimson band;
 Sweetly think, the while you weave,
 Lest the babe have cause to grieve:
 Murmur still a holy spell,
 That may evil spirits quell:
 When at length the task's complete,
 Bless the hose and bless the feet.

Peace! the hose are woven well;
 Loose the spindles and the spell!
 Night is deepening quick above me—
 O ye Heavenly Powers that love me!
 Guard me through the solemn night
 From delusive dreams and light.
 Bless the work that I have done;
 And thrice bless the little one,
 Whose ungrateful, waxen toes
 Wait to fill these dainty hose!

Keen critics will easily perceive that the wool out of which Sibyl has spun her weaving chant is not altogether of home growth. It is very evident, indeed, that she has been wool-gathering on the pastures of certain rather celebrated personages, whom she has—unconsciously of course—contrived to fleece of several longish threads. Knowing her, however, as I do, readers may rely upon the justness of this explanation of her apparent cribbing—that, being an extremely simple-minded and free-hearted individual, she gathers the materials to build her rhymes pretty much in the same manner as the chaffinch gathers materials with which to build her nest. The quality of this latter establishment is of a singularly composite character. There are so many fine hairs interwoven in the texture of it, that you might fancy the little creature had laid the backs of the genteel mice in the country under contribution. This delicate wool forms the inner lining of the nest, from which, outward, the orbicular walls are a curious conglomeration of stuffs fetched from the four main quarters of the compass. Feathers of other birds also form part of the building materials; while, so far as you can form a judgment, the wings of the builder's self do not appear to have contributed a single quill as a spring to the luxurious couch. Yet, in spite of all this weaving and building with foreign materials, the most envious sparrow would admit that the chaffinch was both a most excellent architect and mason; and that her nest was actually the work of her own hands—that is, of her own beak and claws. If, therefore, the chaffinch isn't a thief, I must claim that Sibyl is quite as honest in the weaving of her simple ditties.

THE INVESTITURE.

In our town, babies were always invested with the hose on the night preceding the day of baptism. On that famous Saturday evening, therefore, when our baby was invested, there was a pretty gathering at Myrtle Cottage. Some errant arithmeticians would have maintained that half the town was present. But I, who should glory most in that splendid assembly, don't claim so high a figure as that. The ceremonial drama was neither very lengthened nor very complicated; and, to carry out the illusion, there were more spectators than actors. Happy am I to be able honestly to state that the artists who represented the various parts did their duty with consummate ability. Fatherly sensations of love and pride make my heart tingle in recording that, in the leading character, baby was perfect. This was the more extraordinary, as on that particular day the young and rising actress did not attend rehearsal, being affected by an unaccountable drowsiness all forenoon. Both our parental hearts were much troubled at this mishap, and we half anticipated a breakdown. But the pretty creature was evidently conscious how much was expected from her on this occasion. At all events, she went at her part in such admirable style that, so far as she was concerned, there wasn't a single hitch during the whole course of the drama. I question very much, indeed—though, perhaps, I shouldn't say it—whether even the best of the Exhibition Babies of the Great American Republic could have done the part one whit more justice. One thing at least is certain, and that is, that she gave universal satisfaction, and drew down the most enthusiastic applause from all parts of the cottage.

I need hardly state that Dr. Plato and Sibyl were, on that important evening, two of our most honoured and respected guests. Grandmamma could not, of course, be regarded as a mere guest. She was something infinitely higher, as—being one of the roots of the family—she had a supreme title to be. Naturally, she was mightily concerned for the reputation of baby; and, from the manner in which she nursed the little heroine—by kissing, and dandling, and codling (or cuddling her, as the Scotch have it), and by singing and talking to her in a thousand hieroglyphical languages—you could have seen at a glance that the ancient dame was endeavouring to keep her new grandchild well up to the scratch, or 'sticking place,' so that she might not fail on the occasion of her début before so select an assembly. Being an old stage-manager in that kind of business, she was highly successful; and to her must unquestionably be attributed a large measure of that artistic completeness and dramatic consistency which were visible in the various stages of the customary ceremonial. The lights burned brightly; the scenery moved as if on wheels of air; and, to conclude this point, the prompter's voice was scarcely heard the whole evening.

As on all similar occasions, the real proceedings of the evening commenced by each of the invited guests inquiring for baby, and giving her a preliminary kiss. Dr. Plato was appropriately the person to initiate this stage of the business; and, strange as it may seem, the little creature flung up her pearly fists, as if to claim the Doctor as an old friend. To say truth, this admirable physician actually was baby's oldest acquaintance. In a half-serious, half-humorous mood, he made an apparently professional examination of her corporeal prospects for the evening. After a brief pause, and with an aspect of due solemnity, he pronounced the diagnostics decidedly encouraging. His opinion was that she would 'go through with it bravely'; and, as he was not present in an entirely professional capacity, he finished off the highly diverting pantomime with a salute which would have done credit to the gayest gallant.

Sibyl followed the Doctor in the action of this prologue. With true feminine instinct, she took the quiescent little personage in her arms. In most ladies this is a common enough act, and, as they do it, nobody seems to wonder; but as performed by Sibyl, there was in the manner of it something new and singular. Although the popular conception regarding this lady signified nothing to me, yet I had not altogether forgotten it; and, as she took baby from grandmamma, I fancied that there was about the action an air of originality. Yet it was quite in accordance with Sibyl's real character, and did not require the popular fallacy to account for it. She took the child in her arms with the calmest, blandest, and most insinuating tenderness. Baby was slightly disturbed just after Dr. Plato's fervent salute, and exhibited symptoms of making a demonstration; but the moment she felt herself transferred to the attentions of Sibyl, she became as calm as a lamb lying under the woolly side of its mother. Sibyl's manner was decidedly mesmeric. She wound her lithe arms about the little thing with a series of supple embracements, pressures, and fondling endearments, which bore a marvellous resemblance to the subtle blandishments of the prehistoric agents of the Fairy Queen, whose great delight it was to transport the most beautiful babies to the regions of Fairyland, for reasons and purposes best known to themselves. Of course, Sibyl's well-known character and modern costume precluded all idea of suspicion. I question, however, whether even the most cunning and irresistible fairy could have insinuated herself into the good graces of our baby with more skill and ease than did our amiable friend. But much as I admired her pantomimical enchantments, I am convinced that the greater part of her influence lies in her eyes and the tones of her voice—the former having all the fascination, without the guile, of the serpent; and the latter the somnific melody of those lullabies which the angels, it is well known, murmur over the pillows of favourite infants. Be these things fancies or facts, I verily believe that the good effects of the kiss which Sibyl that evening stamped upon the lips of our baby were not worn away for a couple of months.

The other guests then saluted the incomparable creature seriatim; after which, she was returned by grandma's mamma, whose heart was quite in a flutter of excitement from the broad and unmitigated encomiums which the excellent critics present delivered in praise of the little lod of a woman with which our house had been blessed.

Dr. Plato asserted that she was as neat and pretty a piece of handiwork as ever he had helped Nature to bring into the sunlight. Sibyl was of opinion that the Doctor might very safely have dispensed with reservation altogether. She at least did not feel the slightest hesitation in declaring that a finer and more exquisite baby never had been born; and, what was better, never could, would, or even should appear on the face of the earth. Regarding the worth of these enthusiastic sentiments, mamma and myself would hardly be accepted as competent judges; but it may be sufficient to state that Sibyl's opinion commanded an overwhelming majority of votes, especially among the female electors in the assembly.

This brought us to the principal ceremony of the evening—the Investiture of the Baby with the Order of the Rose. Sibyl brought the necessary articles, wrapped in the silk paper, and tied with white silk ribbon; so that the package had a virginity of aspect which suggested ideas of purity and beauty. Preliminary to the investiture was the bathing of the baby—a piece of work demanding great tact and delicacy of handling. These qualities, I need hardly state, were found combined in the experienced hands of grandma's mamma, who went about the work with an ease and mastery of style which were admirable to behold. Then Sibyl, who is herself perfect in most domestic mysteries, was tickled at the spectacle; and, in a dream of ecstasy, wove a series of circles round the bathing group—an act which was quite in harmony with the other parts of her character. While she moved about, she hummed a fragment of verse, to the following effect.

BABY'S BATH.

Tenderly bathe her dimpled limbs,
Her toes so white and small;
Breathe in her ear those russet hymns
Whose music floods and overbrims
The human breasts of all;—
For, it is all a mother's art
To win the spirit by the heart.

Carefully bathe her brow, and clean,
As if it were her soul;
And sing those songs that come between Heroic joy and coward teen,
And keep life sweet and whole;—
For, 'tis a father's joy to find
The heart still faithful to the mind.

Then came the main ceremony. Sibyl unfolded her white package and revealed three pair of hose, which had manifestly been woven with the utmost nicety of art—a nicety, however, which did not exclude the utilitarian idea of luxurious comfort. Nothing could have been more artistically combined than these two features—if it were not, indeed, the different colours in the hose, which were blended in a manner that very clearly showed under what solemnly poetic influences they were spindled into their beautiful completeness. The art displayed in the work formed a very appropriate index to the metaphysical peculiarities of Sibyl's somewhat mysterious character; while the comfortable and massy thickness of the woolly fabric as naturally indicated the amiable tone, depth, and warmth of her human heart—which truly resembles one of those ancient hearths or fire-places still to be met with in old mansions, which usually had capacity enough to feast the whole household and any number of incidental guests.

By all present, the hose were pronounced to be perfect specimens of knitting; and, of course, Sibyl was regarded as a thorough mistress of her art. In discussing the merits of the articles, I was not in the least surprised to find that Dr. Plato was quite as deep on the various kinds of knitting as on the nature and uses of medical drugs. In truth, the great charm of the Doctor arose principally from his many-sidedness. He was a respectable theoretical architect; a good judge of horse-flesh (and the owner of a spirited nag); a shrewd politician, and therefore little of a partisan; his theological attainments were decidedly beyond mere respectability; while his acquaintance with the great literatures of the world was fully proved on the very same night when he expounded the utility and beauty of knitting in all its phases.

At length grandma's mamma, with baby on her knee, planted herself right in front of a rich, red fire, which had been got up for the occasion. While she sat fondling the little creature, who seemed as merry as a cricket on the hearth, mamma and Sibyl stood, one on each side, with a hose apiece, toasting it with great diligence, and getting it into a proper condition of warmth for the last act in the drama. It was at this juncture that the last rhyme was chanted, in the form of a short lullaby, in which all joined, to the great delight of the heroine of the evening.

LULLABY.

This is the pretty babe was born
Eight early on an April morn,
When blackbird blew his golden horn.

So, toast her ten white buds of toes,
Until they redden like the rose,
And drop into the bonny hose!

Each of these verses was chanted twice; but before the last line had died on the lips of sound, the pretty toes were snug within the cozy wool; and the ceremony of investiture was finished amid the clapping of hands and the congratulations of everybody in Myrtle Cottage. Once more was baby kissed and coddled; but, as such sweet usage was too much for her delicate training, she fell asleep with the briefest possible notice, and was forthwith planted in her little cot with such abundant carefulness that I was afraid for a while that she would never again see the light alive.

Baby being thus disposed of, an adjournment was at once made to our compact dining-room, where we found as neat and sweet a little supper as was ever before prepared by the hands of a one-year's wife. We dispatched it with a pleasant deliberation, saucing it with an animated discussion of the manner in which the drama of the evening had gone off, and of the merits of the principal artists engaged. Mother, Sibyl, and grandma's mamma were much praised. My own representation of the Young Father was set down as, on the whole, a rather quiet performance; and the discussion ended by everybody yielding the palm to OUR BABY.

F.

A YOUNG LADY'S CARDIPHONIA IN THE LAST CENTURY (Continued).

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

'June 20.

'A curious incident happened this morning:—At breakfast, papa turned suddenly round, and addressing grandmamma,

"When did you say we might expect that distinguished stranger of whom you spoke last night?"

"He ought to be here this afternoon," she answered; and then, turning briskly to me,

"Laura! you must put on your very best looks and your brightest smiles in honour of my protégé. Your name is not new to him; he longs to see you; and, if I have any skill in such matters, his is exactly the appearance, manners, and character to suit your taste."

'I felt surprised, and glanced at mamma for an explanation.

"Quite true," said she, "as far as we can estimate matters; but of course you must judge for yourself."

'I made no reply. In truth I was rather taken aback. The trio looked so easy and happy about some secret arrangement they were quietly making, that I knew not what to think. But I took little interest comparatively in the subject, and asked no questions about the future guest—at which, no doubt, they marvelled. Slipping from the room at the first opportunity, I felt it a relief to be removed from their prying eyes.

'Once in the solitude of my own chamber, I threw myself on a couch and gave way to my long pent up tears.

'Everybody comes save one! I thought in bitterness of spirit. What avails this stranger to me? Will not his presence only make the contrast deeper and sadder between himself and all his dull compeers and the princely heart I have lost—irretrievably lost? Ah! no;—not lost—rather the noble heart which I never had.

'O Lionel! Lionel! could I see you once more; could we take sweet familiar counsel together, as in days gone by, you might find me sorrowful indeed; but scornful or capricious, never!

'Let me compose myself. My eyes are red. I am bewildered, brain-sick; but I must bear up yet awhile. This stranger troubles me. I foresee new vexations in connection with his arrival. Why, why will they not let me alone in my folly and misery?

'June 21—6 o'clock a.m.

'Such a surprise! I have not closed my eyes all night; yet I have no sense of fatigue this morning. On the contrary, my soul is like the lark which, long engaged, springs exultant to meet the sun. Can it be possible? Is it not all a dream, from which I must soon be rudely awakened?

'Dinner passed over yesterday, and no appearance of the expected guest; still grandmamma (who has always assumed authority in this matter) persisted that he must and would come that night. I fancied they watched me if I appeared disappointed. I was thoroughly dispirited, and cared not whether he came or no. In the twilight, I stole into the music-room; and, taking down my mandolin, ensconced myself in a low window-seat. I commenced playing a few notes of that simple air so associated with my childish life

—the same that I sung that evening at Mrs. Musgrave's, when my nervous tremor had nearly exposed me but for him—"O willow! willow! the graves are green!" and, I am sure, just then I wished that the grass was waving green over mine. Gradually the words came to memory so vividly that I found myself rehearsing them aloud almost before I was aware. As I did so, a thousand thoughts coursed through my mind—a perfect phantasmagoria of past scenes and feelings rushed upon my inner sight—my eyes were directed towards the dusky outward landscape, which grew dimmer every moment in the fading light. And as I sat thus, I sang feebly and mournfully this old song:—

'No more, no more the world can show
For me in golden hue;
The bird I nursed so tenderly
The long dark winter through—
Whose colours pleased my eye, whose song
Beguiled the wintry day—
Has slipp'd his prison bars, and flown,
I know not where, away!
O willow! willow! the graves are green;
And my true love heart is breaking!

'Had he but whisper'd his intent,
And bid me sweet farewell;
Or said, "Perchance I may return,
Again with thee to dwell."
But no! One morn, in haste, I fell'd
To latch the tiny door;
And he was gone—my only one!—
To come, ah! never more!
O willow! willow! the graves are green;
And my true love heart is breaking!

'Oh! could I know that he had found
As loving hands as mine,
To tend him through the sunny hours,
I should the less repine!
But why should birds more wisdom own
Than men have oft confess'd,
Who, wrapp'd in pleasure's chase, forsake
The hearts that love them best?
O willow! willow! the graves are green;
And my true love heart is breaking!

'I had scarce faltered out the last lines—for my tones were unsteady by reason of my dreary mood—when there came a tap to the door, so gentle as to be just audible and no more. Ere I had leisure to respond to the summons, the door opened, and a tall figure (looking taller for the darkness) stood in the aperture.

"Laura!" said a voice that thrilled me, "pardon this intrusion. Your music has drawn me hither—your song—my song too in the dear old days that are gone!"

'I could not speak. I looked hastily away. I knew my eyes were filling fast. He advanced a few steps.

"Then do I indeed return as a stranger," I asked, "without one word of welcome? And will you not forgive me?"

'I roused myself, got up hurriedly, and, I am afraid in some trepidation, held out my hand, still without looking at him.

"I have nothing to forgive," I murmured. "never thought—" here I stopped.

"Ah, Laura! you never thought how miserable you were making me."

'Another thrill at my heart as he spoke the words—a confused mingling of joy and astonishment as I have laughed through my tears.

"Your hand is cold," he continued, detaining fully in his own, which seemed burning in contrast. "Are you perfectly well, and perfectly happy, as I—everybody wishes you?"

"Just then the glare of lights in the adjoining room (the door of which was yet ajar) streamed fitfully into ours. The servant was arranging the chandelier. My courage ebbed again. So, disengaging my hand quickly, but not unkindly, I merely said, "Lionel! I'm quite well—quite happy;" and escaped from the chamber by the opposite entrance.

"How like a vision of the night does this seem in retrospect! And what a flutter it has caused me! Is Harcourt, then, the expected guest? And had I unconsciously betrayed my secret to my watchful cousin? Or was his coming purely accidental? And after all, am I so buoyant? My cousin, doubtless, has felt sorry for my pitiful, froward humour. But what then? Does it follow of necessity that he loves me! What is become of the blue-eyed German prince! There is nothing but mystery in this affair. Yet, better mystery than lassitude;—better turmoil than inaction;—better, a thousand times better, that he has come again to the Castle—that I have seen him, spoken with him—whatever betide!

'9 o'clock a.m.

"Grandmamma has just looked in; and asks, laughing, what is my opinion of the distinguished visitor who made his appearance last night?"

"Answer, evasively, "So, that was a ruse of yours to keep me unaware."

"I felt half inclined to be angry with grandmamma, when she guessed too much.

"I doubt we shall find him rather a troublesome guest," she continued. "He is here again already, invited to breakfast;" and with this she vanished.

'7 o'clock p.m.

"When I went down stairs at the usual hour this morning, there was Lionel strolling about on the lawn in front of the windows; and, as soon as he saw me, he came.

"I fear I frightened you last night," he began, "now that I saw his face plainly for the first time since our estrangement. I could not but mark a certain alteration in it); "but my long absence from the castle had grown too painful."

"Bury the past," I answered, smiling. And the rest of the household appearing just then, we sat down to the morning meal, when the talk was on everyday matters.

"After breakfast, I again went up stairs—having given orders, however, to have Fenella ready at the door by a certain hour. When that hour came, I was not surprised to find Harcourt waiting to accompany me. I had anticipated as much. The day was fine, and we set forth. Of all species of bodily exercise, surely none can compare with equestrian. There is freedom and an exhilaration about it, compared with which every other is insipid. Yet, on the present occasion I did not experience this so keenly as I had been used to do. The light badinage, too, in which I was wont to indulge with my cousin was all gone, and I fancied that he shared my graver mood.

"I had a purpose in view in thus riding out with him; but I was sadly at a loss how to make it good. Fortunately, he himself paved the way to it. We directed our course along the bank of the river, which sparkled with intense brilliancy.

"After the Rhine," said he, "any river seems to me tame. You, Laura, who can appreciate scenery, will not find Germany."

"I believe the ladies there are beautiful as well as the landscapes," I remarked.

"Yes; they have attractions, many of them. They are very simple in habits and disposition, and much given to home enjoyments; but they lack the educated refinement and taste of my countrywomen."

"Are they not devoted to music, and usually excel in it?"

"I have thought so. Yet to my mind one great charm of music lies in association; and as they know nothing of our familiar English airs, their melodies have the less fascination to us. For example, what strain could match that delicious ballad—which, when I caught the echo of it last evening, seemed like something wafted to me from a purer state of being?"

'O willow! willow! the graves are green!'

"Here I lowered my eyes involuntarily. In a few minutes I ventured to observe, "Having loved Germany so much on a first acquaintance, you will probably return to it ere long!"

"My return will depend entirely on circumstances," was his reply. "I should like of all things to see it again; but that can be only under conditions."

"What need of more? mused I. Only show him the path clear to his lady-love's hand, and, swift as the arrow from the bow, straight he flies to the fatherland.

"After this, neither spoke for awhile.

"How delightful is kindness," he at length began, "after slight and scorn, whether real or imagined! Yet how seldom we value a privilege aright till we have both lost and regained it!"

"There was a meaning in his fine eyes as he spoke which I failed not to interpret. Yet my very consciousness kept me silent. And, while I could not affect to misunderstand him, I dared not say a word either in vindication or apology of my past waywardness.

"Your grandmamma proposes to carry you off into Wales," said my cousin at last.

"I will not go." He smiled, as if relieved to know my decision. "I should prefer a journey to Scotland," I added.

"The words were scarce uttered, when I remembered, with a certain pang of vexation, that Captain Swinton had recently gone thither with his regiment. Quick as thought, I perceived that he had followed out my idea. He said nothing, but his brow darkened; and, of course, I could not retract or even qualify my expression. We remained silent for a space; and soon after, meeting Fanny Musgrave and her father mounted and on their way to the Castle, of course we turned homewards with them; and the talk was of indifferent matters.

'June 28.

"Do love and jealousy always keep company in the human heart? We read of the highest love of all that when it is perfect "it casteth out fear." Is it not the same, in their own place, with our earthly affections?"

"I have watched Lionel closely for the last week, during which he has been at the Castle more or less every day; and the whole result of my observation is this—that there is a hesitancy in his mind strangely affecting his behaviour to me. This must spring from one of two causes: either he doubts my regard, or he is betrothed to another.

(Query.—May there not be a hesitancy in my own mind, in reference to his position with that foreign maiden, which is somehow reflected in his feelings and manner towards me?)

"When do you meditate accomplishing your Scottish tour?" he inquired of me the other night.

"About the same time you set out for Germany," I jokingly answered.

"Nay, that is impossible," he rejoined; "for ——" he seemed about to say more, yet checked himself. Yet I begin to feel sure, almost quite sure, that he—but then this foreign rival! I will bear suspense no longer. Grandmamma goes to-morrow; and I must and will speak of the matter to her before she departs. I have a strong presentiment that she is in his confidence, and she shall be in mine too.

'June 29.

'A flash of lightning—a thunder clap—the crash of an avalanche! For the wealth of kingdoms I would not write down the details of what has transpired! Let me cool my joyful agitation by a burst of passionate tears! Lionel has told me all I wished most to know. His heart is mine, and mine alone! There is no German fiancée in existence for him after all! The whole was a fabrication of my grandmamma's—as well as that other little device of the "distinguished stranger guest"—to which recourse was had to pique my curiosity and attract my slumbering interest. She saw us both unhappy in our foolish estrangement, and pitied the caprice that was slowly working its sad retribution. It turns out that to unite Harcourt and myself has been the darling wish of my parents ever since I was born. But they feared and found perversity on one side at least; so had recourse to stratagem. That is all over now, and I am happy; yes, beyond expression, happy! We are to have a probation of two years, and then comes my visit to Germany; to which it seems my cousin had vowed he would never return till he carried me thither as his bride. But oh! how many things are to take place before then! I have to go to London. I have to be presented at Court. I have to ——

'Tap, tap, at the library door. Dear, dear! shall I never get this letter finished to Fanny Musgrave? "Who waits there? What! Lionel!"

"O Laura! come out into the garden, into the sunshine, into the glory and beauty of fresh enchanting Nature!"

I rise; I shut up my writing-desk on the instant. The earnest pleading of that manly voice enters into my very soul like a spell of music!

'We are off. We are under the blue, bright sky. We are among the roses and lilies, the carnations and honeysuckles; and there is not a single thorn to be seen amid the blossoms. What is the flower of which Harcourt and I have made a mutual exchange, and hope to preserve pure and fragrant for life?

'A sweet, modest, priceless flower.

'It is called HEART'S-EASE!'

Here endeth Laura's 'Cardiphonia.' And even thus may all good and honest hearts find a happy ending to their true love's history! Verily, there is too little simplicity in our day! Feathers, and polkas, and crinoline have fairly put the bewitching goddess to flight. Old fashions, they say, are fast coming into vogue again. Oh, for a touch of the old-fashioned naïveté of mind of our grandmothers' days! I often look for sweet, genuine characters like Laura Stanley in society; but I look in vain. One word in your ear, my fair readers, ere we part—Be simple, be sincere, be yourselves.

AUNT RACHEL'S STORY.

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER I.

OH! that sad night on which my mother died! Never shall I forget the nameless horror which crept over me when informed by the sorrowing domestics that my mother—she who had loved me so tenderly—was dead, and I should never more behold her. Happiness seemed suddenly wrested from my grasp; and, weeping, I besought their permission to follow my mother.

'Why did I not see her die?' I murmured, sobbing the while as though my heart would break.

'You are too young to witness such scenes,' nurse said, in reply. 'Sorrow is not for the youthful; therefore, cease to weep. Your mother is now happy, in a beautiful land where there is neither sorrow nor care.'

So saying, dear old Marjory took me in her arms and tried to soothe me; but in vain. I kept frantically calling on my mother; until nurse, fearing my grief would prove fatal, placed me on a sofa, and hastily quitted the room. In a few minutes she returned—a tall, elderly lady accompanying her. The stranger, who was weeping bitterly, approached, and taking me in her arms said, in a sweet, trembling voice, 'My poor orphan! do not grieve. I will endeavour, with God's blessing, to replace her whom we mourn!'

There was something in the stranger's pitying tones irresistibly fascinating. My tears ceased to flow. Gazing earnestly in her face, I faltered, 'Will you, then, be to me a mother?'

'I will! I will!' she exclaimed, once more clasping me to her breast and kissing me tenderly. 'You have a right to my love—I am your mother's sister. With her latest breath she committed you to my care. Will you, therefore, accompany me to my home? Your aunt Rachel offers you a place in her lonely heart!'

My aunt Rachel! Frequently had my mother mentioned her sister Rachel—dwelling with fondest affection on her amiable qualities, and deeply regretting the family estrangement that had taken place in consequence of her (my mother's) marriage.

One by one her relations passed away without evincing any desire to see their offending and now widowed sister or transmitting her an assurance of their forgiveness; and bitterly did my mother grieve in secret over the unkindness of those towards whom her heart yearned with all the warmth of early affection. But aunt Rachel, when the shadows of evening were falling on the pathway of her solitary existence, could not endure the thought of quitting this world without once more beholding the beloved sister whose image was still cherished in her inmost heart in spite of all that had occurred to separate them. Accordingly, at the close of a lovely summer day, she ordered her carriage and set off on her journey of reconciliation.

She arrived to find the loved one dying. In the solemn chamber of death, the kiss of mutual forgiveness was exchanged; and my mother died while blessing her sister for this visit of love, and commending me to her care. In obedience to that last appeal, my aunt Rachel came to comfort me in my desolation. Again the words were repeated, 'Will you accompany me to my home?' and for answer I flung my arms around her neck, and sobbed myself to sleep upon her bosom.

On the day following that mournful one which saw my mother consigned to the tomb, aunt Rachel signified her intention of returning home. Greatly to my delight, she expressed her determination to take my old nurse into Yorkshire, provided she were inclined to accompany us. The faithful creature shed tears of gratitude when informed she was not to be separated from me, whom she loved with daily increasing affection; and joyfully hastened to make her own little arrangements prior to leaving London.

Late on the evening of the second day from that on which we quitted the metropolis, we drove up the stately avenue leading to Fenton Abbey—the venerable residence of the Sackvilles, of which ancient family aunt Rachel was the representative. Never having been in the country, I was with feelings of reverential awe I beheld the magnificent oaks lining the avenue; while, at sight of the swans sailing majestically on the lake, now gleaming through the trees, I laughed, and clapped my hands in all the exuberance of childish glee. The mansion itself pleased me still more. It was an antiquated-looking building—all gables and turrets, with no end of windows almost concealed by luxuriant ivy; which twined itself around the chimneys, peeped in at the casements, and fluttered over the old balcony lower with the familiarity of long friendship. On our approach, the gates were thrown open by an elderly man arrayed in a suit of sober brown livery, who bowed to us with becoming solemnity; and in a slow, querulous way, welcomed Miss Sackville back to Fenton Abbey.

"Hope my lady's sister is well?" he said, while assisting aunt to alight from the carriage.

"Fish, John! This is her only child."

With these words, aunt Rachel kissed me tenderly and bade me welcome to my new home.

This admonished, the old man glanced at my black dress, shook his head; and, with a heartfelt sigh, ushered us into the entrance-hall.

It was a long, low-roofed apartment, with mysterious nooks and corners all thrown into shade—the hall being dimly lighted by a bronze lamp, placed on a marble table which stood at one side. The roof was supported by black carved pillars, and the panelled walls were adorned by faded portraits of the bygone generations of the Sackvilles; who, arrayed in the brilliant costumes of the age in which they lived, seemed to smile on me as welcome to their ancient abode. My eager eyes, while wandering over these noble warriors and queenly dames, encountered the picture of a lady, attired in blue satin, so strikingly like my departed mother that I started, and, grasping nurse's arm, pointed to the portrait.

"Surely it is herself!" she exclaimed, gazing on the pale, sweet countenance which beamed forth from the canvas, seeming to invite our looks by the calm steadfastness of its regards.

The old servant, observing my emotion, said, in a sorrowful tone, "Yes, my young lady, that portrait was always considered very like Mrs. Abington! Only, your mother had a much livelier expression than that which the painter has bestowed on the Lady Emily."

Here aunt Rachel broke in upon his observations by bidding him attend to the luggage. Gazing herself on the portrait, she heaved a sigh, and murmuring, "Thank God, I was not too late!" took me by the hand and conducted me into the dining-room.

The sole tenants of this lofty apartment were a beautiful white dog, of King Charles' celebrated breed, and a sleek black cat—the latter too lazy to rise from its comfortable position on the rug to welcome its mistress—merely stretching out its snow-white paws, and regarding her with half-shut eyes; while Tiny, with the devoted attachment of its species, frisked around her, seeming scarcely able to restrain its joy at her return.

The three following days were devoted by me to an inspection of my new abode, with which I became daily more delighted. Possessed of an imaginative disposition, a fine old mansion like Fenton Abbey was much more adapted to my taste than a modern house in one of the secondary squares in London.

Old nurse did not agree with me respecting the superiority of Fenton Abbey to the metropolis. Being a curious old place, she admitted it was well worth a visit; but to live in it was another matter. For her part, she did not like going through the long passages after nightfall—the butler having informed her that there was one part of the wall, at the corner of the gallery leading to the upper bedrooms, where no one ever placed their hand, lest it should come in contact with the fingers of a skeleton, said to have been felt there from time immemorial. "So current is the story," added her informant, "that people have come from all parts of England to see the celebrated passage." "It is a well-known fact," pursued nurse, with an ominous shake of the head, "that Mrs. Ellison, Miss Sackville's maid, fainted on the stairs one evening after passing the dark corner. When questioned as to the cause of her illness, she affirmed that, on account of the darkness, she had groped with her hand along the wall, and forgetting the necessary caution—i. e. to lift her hand at that particular spot—it had been clutched as it were by a hard bone, thereby occasioning such a shock to her nerves that she went down at once with a scream. And then there's them pictures," said Marjory, warming with her subject. "I dare not, for my very life, keep my eyes open while passing through the hall."

"Why, nurse? What do you mean?"

"Oh, well, Miss Emily, I just think it's not canny to have the walls of one's house covered with pictures of dead people—they have got such a queer, melancholy look with them; and it is anything but pleasant to know that the eyes of those whose bodies have long been mouldering in the grave are staring after you as you go through the hall."

"Marjory," I said, "should you like to return to London?"

"Me! Miss Emily!" exclaimed nurse, in visible consternation. "Why should I go to London when you are living here? But if you wish to get rid of me"—(Here a corner of the apron was applied to her eyes.)

"No, my dear nurse; I never could wish you to leave me; but I feared you found this old place dull; and, as you seem to have imbibed strange fancies regarding the pictures —"

"Oh, dear Miss Emily!" interrupted nurse, "I'll not mind them any more. John truly says they are but canvases and cannot harm me. As for the story of the skeleton hand, it may just be idle nonsense—every ancient place must have its ghost. Fenton Abbey is really a sweet spot; and Miss Sackville being so kind, and Mrs. Monk a highly respectable person, and one who tells such nice stories about the family, I have great reason to be pleased with my present life. So, Miss Emily, please say no more respecting my returning to London."

The requisite promise was given; and nurse never more alluded to the pictures.

Time flew rapidly away in the peaceful seclusion of Fenton Abbey. As I grew older and more capable of enjoying the calm, rational pursuits of a country life, my heart expanded, with grateful affection, towards that benevolent and warm-hearted relation who had rescued me from the dreary solitude of soul which threatened to overwhelm me at the period of my mother's death. Dear aunt Rachel! I fancy I see her now, seated in her high-backed oaken chair, in all the calm repose of dignified old age—her snow-white hair smoothly braided across a forehead yet unfurrowed by Time, with mild blue eyes tranquilly gazing on the lovely landscape; or, as was most frequently the case, intent on the pages of that Book so calculated to ensure inward happiness. How I loved to contemplate my aunt on occasions like these! Her whole being seemed pervaded by that spirit of benevolent tranquillity which betokened a mind at peace with itself and the world around; while the gentle air of sadness not unfrequently resting on her pale forehead, told of sorrows deep-buried in the recesses of that heart, into the secrets of which none dared to inquire.

Much I wondered that aunt Rachel had never married. Very beautiful she must have been. Even in advanced age traces of departed loveliness were discernible in her finely-cut features and marvellously sweet expression; while her noble carriage added dignity to a commanding figure yet unbent by the weight of years. Had unrequited love or misplaced affection blighted all hope of youthful happiness, and taught the sinfulness of creating an idol for herself among the faithless race of humankind? Or had the possessor of her young heart sank into an early grave, leaving the mourner to traverse the desert of life alone? Who could tell! It seemed a mystery; and there was much about aunt Rachel savouring of the mysterious. She appeared wholly absorbed by some powerful recollection, apparently connected with an early visit to Scotland; for she never referred to that time without betraying symptoms of the deepest emotion.

Of my mother she frequently spoke in terms of the warmest affection, while my father's name was never mentioned. From various hints thrown out by John and Marjory, I gathered that he had been very greatly my mother's inferior by birth, and of a wild, roving disposition. Reports of his evil doings having reached her family prior to the marriage, they implored her to abandon a man every way unworthy of her; but in vain. Blinded by love, and deceived by his specious promises of amendment, in an evil hour my mother fled with him; and the gates of her father's house were closed against her forever.

Shortly after their arrival in London—whither they had gone to reside—my father returned to his former irregular courses; and so regardless did he become of his wife's happiness, that weeks frequently elapsed without her seeing him. Repenting when too late of her foolish choice, my mother vainly strove to reclaim my father. The seeds of vice were too deeply rooted to be easily eradicated; and, within twelve months after their marriage, my father died from the effects of a raging fever, brought on by intemperance.

My birth took place not long afterwards. In the society of her infant, my mother strove to forget the past; still, thought would intrude, and at length she became a prey to the deepest melancholy. The unrelenting displeasure of her relations contributed not a little towards injuring the health of one whose heart was already bowed down by sorrow. Gradually, as old nurse said, she sank and sank, until death put an end to her sufferings. My mother's marriage was a painful subject with aunt Rachel. She never recurred to it without shedding bitter tears; still, on the subject of herself and her youthful prospects, she was silent; and I vainly conjectured her reason for remaining single when numerous must have been her suitors. I was soon, however, enlightened.

On the morning of my sixteenth birth-day, aunt Rachel entered my room, bearing a small casket. 'My dear Emily,' she said, tenderly embracing me, 'you are now a young lady, and I have here a trifling gift, which you must keep in remembrance of me.'

'Dear, generous aunt!' I exclaimed, returning her caress, 'how can I ever repay all your undeserved kindness?'

'You have more than repaid me,' was the affectionate reply, 'by bestowing on me your love, and enlivening my solitude with your presence.'

I opened the casket. It contained a magnificent pearl necklace; and, what pleased me still more, a likeness of my aunt—taken, she informed me, in her twenty-second year. Never had I beheld a more lovely face; and, judging from the resemblance one could trace between it and its faded original, the likeness must have been a striking one. Unable to restrain my curiosity, I exclaimed, 'O aunt! why did you never marry?'

Aunt Rachel's lips quivered, and her eyes filled with tears, as she replied, 'Some day, my dear, you will know the reason why. In the meantime, oblige me by accepting this little present; it will serve to recall me to your remembrance in long after years, when the place that has known me shall know me no more.'

Weeping, I threw myself into her arms. She blessed me; then quitted the apartment.

One evening, shortly after the above conversation had taken place, old nurse informed me that my aunt wished to see me in her room. Repairing thither, I found her seated by the window, gazing forth on the placid lake beneath.

'Dear Emily,' she said, taking me by the hand, and keeping her eyes fixed on the sun-lit water, 'I promised, on your birth-day, that you should know the reason why I have been content to braid St. Catherine's tresses—in other words, to remain unmarried. Life being uncertain, even to the young, I will no longer delay making you acquainted with the circumstances which occasioned my choosing a single life, in spite of the efforts made to shame me out of my resolution. The evening hour is the most suitable time for those in the decline of life to relate their reminiscences of the past. The departure of day is to them a warning that their pilgrimage on earth is drawing nigh its close; while the setting sun, leaving us but to return on the morrow, conveys the blissful assurance of a joyful resurrection. Listen, while I narrate my story.'

Seated by her side, with my eyes alternately fixed on the rainbow sky and the flushed face of the venerable speaker, I listened with breathless attention while she related the following incidents—remembrance of which had thrown a halo of brightness over her solitary existence.

CHAPTER II.

'I was the eldest of eight children,' thus she commenced; 'your mother being the youngest—about sixteen years my junior. Four of us died in infancy. From my earliest years I was of a pensive, reflective disposition; and frequently sought the solitude of my own apartment, there to gratify an inordinate love for the ideal by indulging in dreamy reveries and devouring every novel that came within my reach. I was enveloped in an atmosphere of romance. Everything connected with Fenton Abbey breathed but of the past. The umbrageous boughs of the stately oaks which sheltered my girlish head from the noonday sun, in like manner waved over the plumed helmets of the gallant Sir Hubert Sackville and his retainers as they swept along the avenue—a noble cavalcade—to take part with their sovereign against the traitor Roundheads. The well-polished armour adorning the entrance-hall graced the persons of my noble ancestors when they went forth to do battle in defence of their country; while, from the ancestral portraits which decked the walls, murmuring voices seemed to proceed, telling of many a brilliant pageant and heroic achievement unrecorded in the pages of history. This sort of visionary existence, so enticing to a girl of my temperament, was not conducive to health. I was seized with a low fever—the result, so the medical man informed my parents, of my sedentary mode of life. Dreadfully alarmed by this information, when convalescent, my father insisted on my abandoning my rusty old books and joining in the sports of my brother and sisters. In obedience to my parent's commands, I no longer shunned the society of those youthful friends who, if immeasurably inferior to the heroes and heroines of my imagination, at least possessed a high flow of animal spirits, and, by their merry pastimes, contributed largely towards the restoration of my health. Still, having drunk of the enchanted fountain, I could not entirely consign my highly-wrought fancies to oblivion. In order that I might to a certain extent gratify my love for reading, I requested my father to allow me one hour daily for the perusal of my favourite authors. He consented. Shutting myself up, therefore, in my chamber, I revelled, undisturbed, amid the glowing imagery of poets, historians, and romancers, until the golden moments allotted me were fled.

Of histories, that of Scotland delighted me the most. How my heart went out towards those noble heroes who fought and died for their country's freedom! Again and again I perused their daring exploits; and wept to think such men had passed away as a vision of the night. Among the youthful companions who shared our amusements, there was a boy named Seymour, the eldest son of a neighbouring proprietor. Robert Seymour—or, as we generally styled him, Sensitive Bob—was of a mild, retiring disposition; and so awkward in all his attempts to shine in the sports of his more forward associates, that he generally incurred ridicule where he fain would have excelled. On these occasions, poor Robert's cheeks became of a crimson hue; and, too gentle to resent his companions' taunts, he would withdraw from the contest, and seat himself by my side—always sure of consolation and sympathy from me. So decided was the preference he evinced to my society, that it speedily attracted the notice of his cruel tormentors, who styled him my lover, and teased him with numberless observations, which only caused him to cling to me the closer. Each succeeding year added to our attachment; and at length it was regarded even by the thoughtless companions in the light of a very serious affair. Never was there a more devoted cavalier. His arm outstretched to convey me in safety across the swollen brook; his hand that twined the shrinking violet and wood anemone into a wreath to grace my temples; while, mocking at dangers, he would scale precipitous crags to procure the flower I had admired from a distance. Still, he never spoke of love; and I felt grateful for his forbearance. There was nothing of the hero about

Robert Seymour. His was a simple, honest character, that, combined with a ruddy complexion and yellow curly hair, could not possibly constitute a hero in the eyes of an imaginative maiden in her teens. When approaching my seventeenth birth-day, my father declared his intention of throwing open his halls, in order that I might be introduced to society. Hitherto I had lived for myself only; henceforward I must render myself agreeable to an indifferent world.

There is something melancholy to the mind of a reflective girl in the event of her launch on the ocean of life. She has for ever quitted the flowery banks of childhood; peace and contentment are behind her; the world, with all its gay allurements, lies before her. Who dare say she will pass unscathed through the trying ordeal which all must encounter who mingle in the society of their fellow-creatures?

'Happy, indeed, the individual who, standing at the portals of eternity, can look back with untroubled mind on the long vista of years he or she has been permitted to spend on earth, and say, in all the fervour of sincerity, "I thank thee, O Lord! that thou hast preserved me from the evil thereof!"

The eventful day at length arrived, and endless confusion prevailed within the precincts of Fenton Abbey. All the neighbourhood had been invited to share in the festival. Every one looked radiant with happiness—anticipating the pleasures of the dance—save her on whose account the old Abbey was to don its gayest attire, and seem once more the Abbey of other and more chivalrous days. In order to avoid the disorder attendant on the preparations, I stole away to the woods, there to indulge, undisturbed, in my cherished phantasies. Scarcely had I proceeded a few paces along my favourite walk, when a quick step on the gravel caused me to look back. To my consternation, I beheld Robert Seymour hastening towards me, bearing an exquisite bouquet, which he presented—blushing and stammering painfully while offering me the customary congratulations. There was something in his whole bearing different from his usual deportment. His cheeks were flushed, his hair was disordered, and a certain consciousness in his look inspired me with an undefined terror. I became confused while thanking him for his polite attention, and made as though I should return home; when, sinking on his knees, he seized my passive hand, and, without preface of any kind, poured out his whole soul in a passionate avowal of love.

'I know not how it may be with girls of a different mould, but the sight of Robert Seymour kneeling at my feet inspired me with the deepest sorrow. I did not love him; but how could I pain his tender heart by telling him so, when his very existence seemed to depend on the answer about to proceed from my lips?

"Dear Miss Sackville," he went on; "believe me, this is no momentary burst of feeling on my part. Since boyhood I have loved you. More than two years ago, I acquainted my father with the nature of my feelings, and besought him to ask your parents' consent to our union. He has done so; and they have given their sanction, provided you yourself are not opposed to it. O Rachel! dearest Rachel! dare I hope for so great a happiness?"

'My parents had consented. I looked on the face of my kneeling lover—his beseeching eyes and quivering lips pleaded powerfully in his favour. I could not bear to wound his loving heart by a refusal. If the feeling I experienced for him was not that of love, there was no other whom I preferred. Unwilling, therefore, to keep him any longer in suspense, I expressed my desire to comply with my parents' wishes.

'Poor Robert! this answer, cold as it was, seemed to place him on the pinnacle of happiness. He clasped my hand, pressed it to his lips;—but why dwell on his extravagances? Suffice it to say, he declared himself supremely blessed, and we returned to Fenton Abbey—engaged.

'Speedily extricating myself from my friends, whose congratulations tended only to increase my bewilderment, I retreated to my chamber, and, throwing myself on a sofa, burst into a passion of tears. Youth's too bewitching dreams were for ever fled. Henceforward mine must be an every-day life—a mere prosaic existence. But how render otherwise the fate in store for me? The days of chivalry were gone. Those noble knights whose heroic deeds of arms emblazoned the pages of history slept in their graves, and none had arisen to fill their place. Times were changed. Unfortunately for me I had been born in an age widely different from those—the descriptions of which had filled my girlish breast with imaginative longings that could only conspire to make me miserable.

'At this moment, my eyes rested on the bouquet given me by Robert Seymour. The thought darted across my brain—I was about to be married—married to one I did not love as a woman ought to love an affianced husband! What had I done? To avoid inflicting a momentary pang on my kneeling lover, I had perhaps sealed the misery of one, if not of both, for ever.

'Almost frenzied at the remembrance of my weakness, I rushed to the window, and gazed despairingly on the heavens. "Restore me my girlhood!" I cried, as though addressing some invisible power; but no voice responded to my prayer. Nature alone heard my anguished voice. In the sighing wind and the rustling of the yellow leaves, as they fell trembling to the ground, I read her sympathy with my passionate grief. There was no escape for me. I must for ever have done with the world of imagination. That which had hitherto proved a source of delight, could no longer be indulged in; other cares demanded my attention. I was standing on the verge of womanhood; anxieties and sorrows were before me. Peace and tranquillity, I imagined, were for ever departed.

'A knock at the door interrupted me in the midst of my solitary musings. In answer to my permission to enter, a servant made her appearance, bearing my ball dress. She seemed surprised at my dejected air; and informed me, greatly to my annoyance, that the company were beginning to assemble, and that my mother desired my presence in the drawing-room. Hastily donning my gay attire, I descended to the library, where my father waited to conduct me to the already crowded hall. Robert Seymour was with him. Never having seen me in anything but the plainest dresses, he seemed perfectly bewildered on beholding me so richly arrayed; and his voice faltered as he whispered in my ear how happy I had made him. Sincerity dwelt in his voice; the tenderest love beamed from his sparkling eyes. Poor Robert!

'The ball passed off with great eclat. Every one was happy, or appeared to be so, and expressed regret when the hour of departure arrived. For myself, I was in a continual whirl of excitement. The magnificent appearance of the old hall, adorned with waxlights, and thronged as it was by a numerous and brilliant assemblage—the soft strains of music floating in the air—the intoxicating whirl of the dance,—all conspired to render me oblivious of everything calculated to mar the present enjoyment. Even the old Sackvilles adorning the walls seemed, by their smiling glances, desirous to quit their antiquated frames, and share for a brief space in the festivity.

'In consideration of our youth, my father stipulated that two years should intervene between my engagement and marriage. This probationary term was to be spent by Robert Seymour in travelling; and by me, in fitting myself for the position I was to occupy. It is almost needless to say that, with my peculiar feelings, I felt deeply grateful to my father for deferring the marriage. Not so Robert Seymour. He protested strongly against the delay; but my father remained firm, and Captain Seymour himself admitted the propriety of his son seeing something of the world ere settling down into private life. Having expressed the satisfaction I felt on being allowed to remain some time longer single, you will be surprised to learn that it was with feelings of genuine sorrow I bade Robert Seymour adieu. Such was my inconsistency: the man whom I had longed to get rid of now possessed the power of drawing tears from my eyes. So unaffected was my grief, that I felt tempted to support his petition, and entreat my father to allow the marriage to take place at once.

'But some mysterious power restrained me. It was otherwise ordained. Poor Robert! the tears ran down his cheeks as he bade God bless and protect me during his absence. A presentiment of evil seemed to oppress his heart at this our last interview. More than once he exclaimed, "Dearest Rachel! I cannot bear to go; much may happen in the space of two years. You may be seized with illness, and I not near to comfort you; or," his voice faltered, "you may see another whom you prefer. Were that the case, I could not survive the blow. Rachel! my heart is bound up in you."

'I smiled reassuringly, and bade him have reliance on my constancy. He blessed me and departed.

'Alas! I trusted in my own strength; and no mortal can do that with impunity. The sisterly affection I entertained for Robert Seymour, and the desire to spare him pain, caused me to dissimulate even at the last moment. Not even my parents penetrated into the real state of my feelings. They imagined me overwhelmed with grief at my lover's departure; when, in reality, I was mourning over my own weakness. Solitude being generally preferred by maidens in the absence of their admirers—in imitation of a love-lorn damsel I secluded myself in my chamber; but the time which my friends imagined was devoted to thinking of my betrothed, was spent in poring over favourite authors, with whose glowing descriptions of noble knights and feats of arms I became daily more enamoured.'

(To be continued.)

TRUTH.

Men preach and preach, and write and write,
To wake the soul to life and light;
One preaches that, another this,
As what alone can lead to bliss.
One sage uplifts his pen and writes,
'Behold, O man! the Light of Lights!'
Another and another still,
(Each privy to the Eternal Will)
The very heavens with shoutings fill!
Yet do I fear, when all this noise is done,
The truth has not been told by any one;
Nay, much I doubt, that, teach as mortals may,
The immortal truth will still remain to say! W.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 15 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St. Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 6.]

SATURDAY, NOV. 8, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

THE OTHER HALF.

If I make the remark, at the commencement of this paper, that one half the world does not know how the other half lives, my friend Brown, or Jones, or Robinson may move pettishly in his seat, and say, 'Oh! we have heard that remark before; don't, for gracious sake! let's have any moralising on that subject, for it really is stale.' Jones may say to Robinson, who is reading aloud for the delectation of his two friends and himself, 'My dear Robinson, if we are going to have anything on that subject, shut the Miscellany, and let's have another game of whist.'

I beg respectfully to request that, before they commence their rubber, they will read to the bottom of the page.

One half the world does not know how the other half lives. I have ventured to repeat the saying; but I am not about to launch into a dissertation on the shifts and struggles to which honest or dishonest poverty resorts to make ends meet. I am not about to advocate any particular society for the relief of the destitute. I mean to treat the subject from another point of view altogether. I shall be genteel. 'Honi soit qui mal y pense.' Let no one think that this is a novel feature in my character or writings. I ought to have said—I shall be, as I always am, genteel.

It so happened that, immediately after making up my mind as to the subject of this article, I should fall in with my friend Birtwhistle. Suddenly, I felt that some one was endeavouring to extract my handkerchief from my pocket; and, on turning round, was fronted by Birtwhistle, who smiled, and informed me that I was 'sold again!' He leaped gaily back, did Birtwhistle; and, attitudinising like Laertes in the last scene of 'Hamlet,' made a lunge at me with his stick, exclaiming, 'A hit, my lord; a most palpable hit!' His next proceedings were to 'bonnet' a small boy—who was standing open-mouthed on the pavement, disturbed in mind at his strange conduct—and kiss his hand to a domestic servant of prepossessing appearance, who was tacking along the pavement on the opposite side of the street, with parti-coloured ribbons floating on the wind from her cap, and the beer-jug (a profile likeness of the late Duke of Wellington) at her breast, like the figurehead of a yacht. He then linked his arm in mine, and said, 'Vell, hold fellar! wot are you hup to?'

Mr. Birtwhistle is in the drysaltery line of business; and, if I had been a dignified customer whose patronage he was anxious to secure, he would not have made known his presence to me in the above manner; and his English would have been in strict accordance with the rules of polite conversation. But I was not a dignified customer; it was after business hours; and Mr. Birtwhistle was en route to his club, where his merry flow of spirits, innocent practical jokes, Cockney-costermonger grammar, and general frolicsome vein, nightly keep the table in a roar.

I went with Mr. Birtwhistle that evening, heard two or three of his comic songs, laughed at his bons mots, and joined in the choral chant which eulogised him as 'a jolly good fellow! which nobody could deny;' borrowed some money from him; heard other two or three good fellows apologise for not being able to refund money which they had borrowed; and saw Birtwhistle slap them on the shoulder, and assure them, with generosity and good nature beaming in his eyes, that it was 'all right—no hurry.' Surely a happy man, a benevolent man, a perpetual good-natured man, my friend Birtwhistle! Look at his broad honest face, clear blue eyes, open forehead, and well-formed mouth;—surely the very quintessence of bonhomie. Hold! not so fast. The last song has been sung; all but three or four of the members have retired, and by this time, I would venture to say, are snug between the sheets. My jovial friend Birtwhistle is about the last to depart.

With a 'God bless you!' to the smiling landlord, and a pleasant joke to the landlady, Birtwhistle sallies out; and, buttoning up his coat, moves homeward. Link your arm in mine, my friend Robinson, and we shall quietly follow Birtwhistle. Happy wife to have such a husband! Happy children, such a father! Happy mother and father, such a son! Ha! my good friend, you start, and clutch my arm tighter—Birtwhistle is passing a lamp, and the light streams on his face. We have made no mistake. It is the same Birtwhistle; but lo! the face, which but a few minutes ago was radiant with peace, goodwill, and benevolence towards every one, is now unmistakably changed. The open forehead is somewhat clouded by several ominous wrinkles, which look suspiciously like frowns. The lips are compressed; and, as I live, part for a moment as an oath escapes them. Birtwhistle has reached his own door. He fumbles for a moment, as if in search of the latch-key. He can't find it. He swears, and gives a sharp rat-tat. He waits a moment, and knocks again, furiously. A lady opens the door, and Birtwhistle enters. It is his wife. Happy Mrs. Birtwhistle!

'Supper ready?' says Birtwhistle, snappishly.

'You told me you would not be home to supper,' replies his wife. 'It is now after twelve o'clock, and the fire is out.'

'I did nothing of the sort. I want some supper; so you must either knock up your servant to light the fire or do it yourself—I am starving.' (You and I are witness, Robinson, that Birtwhistle had a chop, two kidneys, some Stilton cheese, and a pint of stout half-an-hour ago, at the 'Pigeon.') Surely this is not Birtwhistle! the amiable, the good-natured—the funny Birtwhistle? Verily it is! But see, Robinson; do you see nothing there? 'You see nothing; yet all that is you see.' Good! But I see something. Behind the hall door a small brass-headed nail, and on it a fiddle. There is no such thing in reality as either a fiddle or nail, but still I see both there. Birtwhistle has, metaphorically speaking, hung up his fiddle on that nail; and now he is another Birtwhistle till he goes out again. Woe to you, children of Birtwhistle! if you are uneasy in your slumber, and cry out during the night. Birtwhistle will be at you like the ghost of Hamlet's father, and you will suffer for disturbing his slumbers. O unhappy Mrs. Birtwhistle! you are yoked to a bilious little hypocrite. You were deceived at first by his seeming amiability and good nature; but your eyes are now open.

At breakfast next morning, the full light of day shines on Birtwhistle, and gives the lie to his appearance at the club the night previous. The bacon is underdone; the eggs boiled too hard; the coffee too weak; and his shirt-collar too stiff. Birtwhistle, Jun. on venturing timorously into the room, is challenged with having two spots of mud on his trousers; which, on further investigation by his indignant parent, being found correct, the wretched boy is immediately commissioned to bring the clothes' brush, with the back of which he is summarily chastened on the knuckles, and sent off—defiantly keeping back the tears, but with indignation and a sense of injustice struggling in his heart.

Is this a true picture?

O ye Birtwhistles of society! think again before ye start up, bristling with indignation, and asseverating fiercely that it is 'gross exaggeration—written for effect—nonsense.' If the cap did not fit, ye would be silent. Defend me, O ye wives, children, mothers, and fathers of the Birtwhistles of society! Do I speak truth or falsehood?

Stand forth, juvenile members of the Birtwhistle family! Have some of you not a brother who is at school with you; and who, on holiday occasions, is in the habit of making fishing, or swimming, or bird-nesting excursions into the country? Have you never earnestly entreated to be allowed to accompany him and his companions on these occasions, and been sternly commanded to 'cut away home,' on pain of 'getting a cuffing?' Has that big brother, on your persisting in following him, never seized hold of your cap and hurled it over a hedge—immediately running off with his graceless companions, and leaving you to return home, with desolation and wounded feelings in your juvenile bosom?

Sisters! have you not, some of you, a brother vapish and disagreeable at home, who, when you meet him at friends' houses—especially where there are young ladies—is all amiability and attention? A brother who invests money in cigars, pet meerschaum pipes, gorgeous studs, alleeve-links, and walking-sticks; who can never spare five shillings to buy you a pair of gloves; and yet who frets and fumes if his dinner is five minutes late, or if one button is off his shirt? A brother who sends expensive presents of the latest music, portmonnaies, smelling-bottles, point-lace, and amethyst card-cases to young ladies, who treats him a duck? A brother who is the life of a social meeting or quadrille-party; who is great at picnics and country excursions, but who never asks you to accompany him; and who, if you happen to be invited, frowns at you in secret, and is doubly disagreeable at home?

Approach, Mrs. Jones! late a snow-white aproned, black-haired, fresh-complexioned servant-maiden; now a pale-faced, anxious-looking, but still tidy matron. Was not your lover, when you first knew him, a cheerful, good-humoured, light-hearted, straight-limbed young carpenter? and did he not gradually change after the first year of wedlock? Has he not a reputation among his comrades for being a good-natured fellow, ready to do anybody a good turn? and does he not render your life, and that of the blessed child, miserable when at home? Does he not often come home at the small hours, in a Bacchanalian state, and even go the length of beating you? You are dumb and hang down your head. Alas! it is too true. Is not this social evil among the lower, middle, and upper classes greater than one would suppose? Is it not very common to hear that Mr. So-and-So—when the party speaking has met in company the evening before—is a very agreeable person, a benevolent person, a person whom it would be perfect happiness to live with, a person who must be a jewel to his wife, children, and relations; and who, if his real character and life were known, would be found a demon and a snare—a very despotic domestic tyrant, who plays on the best strings of his fiddle out of his own doors, and who hangs it up altogether when he is at home?

Then there is a misunderstanding about the life of my friends the Mootons. The Mootons give gorgeous dinner-parties, to which I am sometimes invited. I am constantly being told that the Mootons are the most agreeable people in the world; that they live like a pair of turtle-doves; and that their whole life is sunshine and happiness. This is the general belief; and any person visiting the house, or meeting them in society, would indorse the universal opinion. Mrs. Mooton wears ringlets, and Mr. Mooton a mustache. In Mr. Mooton when she laughs absolutely shines; she shakes her little head, and the golden curls dance about her face as if they actually leapt with gladness and delight. When Mooton père smiles, his mild grey eyes are almost buried in fat; and a regular set of white pearly teeth are disclosed positively delightful to contemplate.

Mr. and Mrs. Mooton amuse themselves and their friends by having little amateur quarrels and fights of repartee on every opportunity. When Mr. and Mrs. Mooton are presiding at a dinner-party in their own house, we are all in ecstasies when Mr. Mooton informs us that his wife and he had a quarrel last night. Nobody present can resist the comicality of the idea; and we are in transports when she informs us that the monster actually caught her by the hair and shook her, because she had invited a few friends (present) without first consulting him. Funny! isn't it? She laughs and pretends to look serious, and calls him the fat ogre with the mustache—the naughty man! And he, determined to be revenged in his funny way, cuts her a very fat piece of meat underdone, and says, 'Take that for revealing State secrets;' and then he invites any of the gentlemen to pull his wife's ringlets, and they will discover that they are false. Can anything be more humorous? The idea of being false! 'She actually threw a candlestick at me last night,' he will tell us—at which we all laugh; and she will be revenged by putting the coldest of the potatoes on his plate; and then, after she has finished the piece at the piano, she will playfully slap his face, because he held his ears, hissed, and pretended that he believed her playing and singing execrable, and told her for goodness sake not to attempt it again.

Open the street door, and allow me a clear passage through the lobby. Guests of the Mootons! what your hosts are telling is true. It is a miserable device to vent their spleen upon one another. Where's the humour now? Nay, further, they pinch each other under your very eyes. I detected Mooton père once kicking his wife's ankles, under cover of the table, at a card-party. I am no slanderer. If they would be honest in their hate of each other, I would say nothing; but I won't be taken in. I likewise warn you. Cover me from their wrath—form a half square in front of me—until I have time to vanish out into the street.

I could say more on this subject, but my space is exhausted; and the stern voice of the genii of the case-room commands me, in the meantime, to 'hold!—enough.'

R. L. G.

LOST.

A LITTLE hand was laid in mine:
The dear, dear shock and thrill
That shot through all my beating blood—
I seem to feel it still.

Two little, longed-for, timorous words
Stole to my raptured ear:
Through half this sleepless, silent night
That voice I seem to hear.

The eyes that long had lit my life
Look'd love to love in mine:
Now, all about the whispering dark,
Their starry glances shine.

A heart was sworn and sealed my own,
O'er-brimm'd with love and trust:
That heart, with all its wealth of love,
Is nothing now but dust.

Woe's me! That warmth of love and life!
And now the bitter change!
How sad! how very sad it seems!
And yet less sad than strange.

P. P.

AUNT RACHEL'S STORY (Continued).

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER III.

'It was in the autumn of the year seventeen hundred and forty-four,' aunt Rachel continued, 'that Robert Seymour quitted England. Everything remained unchanged at Fenton Abbey until the following May; at the beginning of which month my father received a note from an aunt of his, who resided in Scotland, declaring her intention of paying him a flying visit en route from London, whither she had been obliged to go on business.

'My father smiled on reading this laconic epistle, and observed to me, "Now, Rachel, you are about to have a rich treat. Of all people in the world, Lady Macdonald is the one to regale you with accounts of Scotland, and the doughty deeds achieved by her ancestors in the days of old. She is a fine-hearted, noble-looking old woman, but proud as Lucifer. You must therefore remember not to wound her prejudices, as she possesses a fiery disposition, and is not apt to forgive when once offended." "I wonder," he observed to my mother, "what has taken my aunt to London? Depend upon it, something important is dawning in the political horizon when Lady Macdonald betakes herself to the English capital,—a city rendered obnoxious to her by the occupation of the Elector of Hanover—as, in common with the Jacobites, she contemptuously styles our reigning monarch!"

'My mother agreed with my father respecting the singularity of Lady Macdonald's visit to London. Here the conversation ended; but the little that had been said sank deep into my mind. Much I pondered over the terms—Jacobites, Elector of Hanover, and so forth; and I longed for the arrival of her who could enlighten me as to their meaning.

'In little more than a week after the receipt of her letter, Lady Macdonald arrived. She was indeed an imposing old lady; the uprightness of her bearing denoted pride, and the yet unsubdued fire of her eyes, energy of disposition unimpaired by time.

'She resembled in features the old portraits of the Sackvilles (her mother having been a Sackville accounted for the likeness); and her figure, although delicately proportioned, was by no means deficient in dignity; while the elegance of her gestures and dignified composure of manner inspired us with no slight degree of respect for our aged relative. To me she was at once an object of love and envy. How I longed for the time when, permitted by greater intimacy, I might indulge my curiosity by questioning her respecting the nature and pursuits of the present inhabitants of Scotland! Possessed of great natural shrewdness and quick perceptive powers, Lady Macdonald soon discovered that there were hidden depths in my mind in which some secret grief lay buried. Her efforts to win my confidence were crowned with success. Beyond measure delighted in having found a sympathising friend, I speedily made her acquainted with the real state of my feelings towards Robert Seymour, of whose attachment she had been made aware; and, laying bare the inmost recesses of my soul, revealed my irrepressible longings after the great and beautiful—doomed; I feared, never to be realised.

"My dear child," said Lady Macdonald, on the conclusion of my recital, "you are very young, and the youthful are prone to indulge in dreams and reveries such as you have described; but do not fear they will cling to you when once the real battle of life commences. Ah! no. If cares and anxieties will soon banish these bright illusions. The longer you live the more you will realise the truth of my arguments. It is one of the sweetest privileges pertaining to the youthful, that they are able to invest the most commonplace occurrences with a halo of brightness but, when once life's struggles commence, sober reason usurps fancy's brilliant sceptre, and the dreaming youth becomes the active man. Thus it is with the opposit sex; with us it is pretty much the same. A romantic girl given to novel reading, pictures to herself the man she should like to have for a husband. He is the idol of her imagination; celebrated on account of his chivalrous nature and splendid appearance; of noble descent, and with princely manners—in short, a paragon of perfection not likely to be met with in this lower world. A few years glide swiftly away; the girl becomes a woman, and is introduced to society. In the natural course of events, she meets with a gentleman the very opposite of her ideal lover, who, becoming enamoured of her, makes an offer of marriage. The poor girl, still fondly dreaming of other and more captivating suitors, wishes to refuse him but her parents interfere. 'He is rich, owner of a fine property, and must not be rejected.' So argues the matter-of-fact mother; and the daughter, after a few tears she over the memory of her sweet but delusive hopes, finally consents to become Mrs. Smith or Mrs. Tomkins. But a short time suffices to cure her effectually of all such nonsense; she becomes an attached wife—an exemplar mother; and, were any youthful friends to remind her of former sentiments in respect to marriage, ten to one but she would be the first to laugh at her own foolishness. With regard to Robert Seymour, my dear," continued my aunt, "do not give way to silly fancies regarding him. From all accounts, he must be a very amiable young man and a good heart is far before a brilliant appearance or dazzling qualities. These possessions soon lose their value in the eyes even of the youthful; and then one looks to the disposition of one's wife or husband, as the case may be, for continued happiness. Now, what I should wish you to do is this—come with me to Scotland; there you will find plenty to gratify your love of the beautiful in the way of scenery. More than a year must elapse before Mr. Seymour returns to England; and why should you not spend some portion of that time in viewing the picturesque beauties of the Highlands of Scotland? You have as yet seen nothing beyond the confines of Fenton Abbey. Such strict seclusion is by no means beneficial to the young. They require variety, else the mind becomes morbid—thereby rendering the possessor unhappy, unfit for the social duties of life. In your case, a fervent imagination and craving after excitement are the causes of your giving way to despondency, which, if long indulged in, will work serious mischief both mentally and bodily. Thorough change of scene will be necessary to impart a healthy tone to the spirits; and, when once you have slaked your thirst for the novel and romantic, you will calm down into a useful member of society. When resident in my Highland home, your mind will become engrossed in contemplation of the sublime; new features will be impressed upon it; the old will gradually assume a softer tone; things will appear in a light totally different from their present aspect; your ideas will necessarily become enlarged, and your heart more expansive. When viewing our Highland scenery—combining, as it does, what is sweetest and most striking in nature—thought, feeling, and unfettered as the winds of heaven, will soar from the glorious works of nature to nature's God; and imaginary joys and morbid feelings become lost amid the grandeur of immensity. Such are my sensations while wandering over the heath-clad mountains of my native land. The foaming cataract, the tinkling rill, the glorious rainbow—spanning the heavens like an arch, and kissing the summits of the towering monarchs of the north—all combine to fill my soul with ecstasy; and a voiceless hymn of praise ascends from my grateful heart to their Creator. In my Highland home you will find much to delight—possessing, as you do, a mind capable of appreciating the great and beautiful. Say, then, if your parents consent, will you return with me to Glenvoirnen?"

"Dearest aunt!" I exclaimed, throwing my arms around her neck, "words cannot convey the intense longing I have experienced to visit your lovely land; and, should my parents acquiesce, oh! with what pleasure shall I accompany you thither!"

"I then informed her of the delight I experienced when reading the history of Scotland;—how the noble deeds of Bruce and Wallace so fired my imagination that I could think of nothing else.

"Lady Macdonald laughed, and replied, "Well, I do not give you the less for having so much idealism in your composition. In spite of my seventy-and-eight years, I am not without some of it myself; at least few have more enjoyment in hearing an old Scottish legend; and as for a Jacobite song, the first line of the first verse causes my heart to swell with unwonted emotion."

"The word Jacobite again! I wondered much what Lady Macdonald meant by the term, but thought it better to defer asking an explanation until we were at Glenvoirnen.

"My parents not only consented to my returning with my aunt to Scotland, but warmly expressed their gratitude for her kindness in making the proposal. During the few remaining days of her visit, I obtained much information respecting Scotland. Glenvoirnen she would not describe—I must judge of that for myself. But endless were her stories concerning brownies, fairies, and other singular beings supposed to infest the Highlands. In the existence of mermaids she was a firm believer; and told me of one seen by a kinsman of her own, while bathing at early morn in the waters of Loch-Oioh—the lake on which Glenvoirnen was situated. To all her wild legends and stories treating of supernatural agency—for, like the generosity of Highlanders, her mind was stored with tales of omens, warnings, and second-sight—I listened with delight, not unmixed with fear. But possessed of far greater interest for me were my aunt's descriptions of the scenery of the clans. For hours I would listen, entranced, while she portrayed, in glowing colours, the attachment entertained by the lower class of Highlanders for the person of their chief; how it was accounted the greatest honour to die for him; and with what devoted affection the chief's younger brother would risk his own life to save that of the head of his clan. The very idea that such heroism existed in a country I was about to visit filled my bosom with rapture; and as my aunt, who perceived my enthusiasm with delight, described the fine old castles, lofty mountains, and savage glens owned by these warlike men, I imagined myself the sport of some too-enchancing dream, and feared every moment to awake and find the vision gone.

"It was now the night preceding the morning of our departure. I retired soon to rest, having to rise at an early hour. In sleep I was visited by the following dream:—

"Methought I was borne aloft by some invisible power, and conveyed to a strange country—which, from my aunt's descriptions, I knew to be Scotland. On recovering from the feeling of giddiness incident to my aerial flight, I found myself standing in midst of a scene whose loveliness I can never forget. Before me, frowning darkly from amidst the shadow of a forest of pine trees, stood a venerable castle, gray with age, and of singular architecture. In the background were mountains grander than any previously formed conception; while in front of the castle lay a lovely sheet of water, interspersed with little islands smiling in verdant beauty. As I gazed, enraptured, the moon rose from behind a lofty mountain, and, pouring her bright rays on tower and lake, completed the witchery of the scene. In an ecstasy of delight, I extended my arms towards the old castle. "Oh, tell me," I cried, addressing my invisible guide, "the name of this spot so fair?" Then a voice whispered, "You will soon learn all. Here shall your imaginative longings be realised!" Upon this I awoke, and found the morning sun shining in at my window.

"I shall pass briefly over the tender farewells I exchanged with each beloved member of my family, and the different incidents occurring on our journey; suffice to say, the former cost me many tears, and the latter no small enjoyment. It was on a lovely night—the 16th of June, if I remember aright—that we reached the end of our journey; and my surprise may be conceived when, uncovering my eyes—which, in obedience to Lady Macdonald's wishes, I had veiled with my handkerchief on approaching the house—I recognised in Glenvoirnen the castle of my dream! There it stood, dark and frowning. In the background a forest of sombre pines; beyond that, again, a magnificent chain of mountains; while in the foreground lay a lovely lake, interspersed with islands, and all bathed in moonlight. I started on beholding the similarity existing between the two scenes, and could not suppress an exclamation of surprise.

"What, child!" said Lady Macdonald, laughing. "Are you struck with the singular appearance of my Highland home?"

"Oh, it is not that, dear aunt," was my reply. "I was startled to behold in Glenvoirnen the fac-simile of a castle beheld by me in a dream the night before leaving Fenton Abbey."

"In accordance with my aunt's desire, I related it. She expressed her astonishment; and said, while bidding me welcome to the Highlands, that, as the first part of my dream had been fulfilled, she hoped the latter part would also be accomplished. I laughingly re-echoed the kind wish, while following her up a narrow spiral stair.

"There was no fine old entrance hall, as at Fenton Abbey—the principal rooms being approached by the staircase leading up from the door by which we entered. Still, there was something noble in the aspect of the apartment into which we were ushered; and the fact of my being in the interior of a Highland chieftain's castle was more than sufficient to compensate for any apparent want of comfort in Glenvoirnen. The dining-room's splendid proportions astonished me not a little—the outward appearance of the castle entirely precluding the idea that it contained such a lofty apartment. There were three windows in the room; above each hung a deer's head and antlers, while the carpet was in some places covered with skins of the same animal. The walls were adorned with some fine old portraits of unmistakable cavaliers; and between each picture were suspended helmets, swords, battle-axes, and other warlike weapons.

"Who is that, aunt?" I inquired, pointing to the portrait of a noble-looking man attired in the Highland garb.

"My late husband," Lady Macdonald sighed.

"And the one on his right hand?"

"Bonnie Dundee. But, my dear child," observed my aunt, "you must be tired after your fatiguing journey. So please restrain your curiosity until to-morrow; when, please God we are spared, I shall have much pleasure in giving you the history of each portrait."

"After partaking of a plentiful supper, served up in true Highland fashion, Lady Macdonald took a rushlight from the servant's hand, and proceeded to my sleeping apartment. Another tortuous stair conducted us thither. It was a comfortable, old-fashioned room; the furniture solid and entirely plain, with not the slightest pretence to elegance visible throughout. (Lady Macdonald prided herself on her contempt for everything luxurious in the way of furnishing.)

"Now, my dear child," said my aunt, accompanying her words with a tender embrace, "I told you before leaving Fenton Abbey that you must not expect to find in Glenvoirnen the comforts and refinements of your English home; but, should I not be mistaken, fine scenery and freedom of action will have greater attractions in your eyes than costly furniture and tempting food."

"You are right, dearest aunt," I replied. "Rather would I possess Glenvoirnen than the finest hall in England. There is a spirit of proud independence visible in the arrangements of your lovely home which harmonises well with my love of unrestraint and national freedom."

"Lady Macdonald's eyes sparkled with delight, while I thus expressed my sentiments in favour of Glenvoirnen. "Ah, my dear child," she said sadly, "had you only been in Scotland in the year sixteen, when our true and rightful King, James the Third—God bless him!—came to claim his own! How I wept to see him ride through Dundee—his noble charger seeming to know by its curvetings and prancings the rank of its rider; while hundreds flocked around to kiss his hand and testify their joy at seeing one of the old Stuarts back again! He was much affected on being introduced to me at Grandtully, whither he went after leaving Dundee. Full well he knew that my husband, being foremost to declare in his favour, was likely to suffer for his loyalty. In the most courteous manner he expressed his gratitude for Sir Donald's services.

"O, your Royal Highness," I replied with emotion, "my husband's sole ambition was to see you seated on the Stuarts' throne."

"We thank you," he replied; "and when once we obtain possession of the crown, which by right pertaineth unto us, we will not forget such true loyalty as you have this day expressed for our person."

"Precious words! doomed, I fear, never to be realised. The old spirit of devotion to the Stuarts is fast dying out in Scotland; still, there are many who detest, and with justice, the Hanoverian dynasty."

"Why, aunt," I said smiling, "you are speaking high treason!"

"No, my dear," she replied, with flashing eyes and heightened colour. "The Elector of Hanover has no right whatever to the British throne. He is neither more nor less than a base usurper; and all those who recognise him as their lawful sovereign are perjured traitors, unworthy the privilege of being styled true-hearted Britons. For my own part—and there are many who hold similar opinions—I will never take the oath of fealty to that German intruder. Morning and evening this fervent prayer rises at the Throne of Grace, 'Lord, if it pleaseth Thee, may my aged eyes be permitted to behold my lawful King seated on the throne Thou gavest to his ancestors!'"

"My aunt ceased speaking, and raised her handkerchief to wipe away the falling tears. I remained silent, lost in perplexity.

"Good night, my child," at length she said. "How foolish in me to have kept you from your needful repose! But when once on the subject of the Stuarts, I am forgetful of aught else. How I wish you were a Jacobite!"

"Stay, aunt," I cried, as she was shutting the door. "Do tell me the meaning of the term Jacobite!"

"Lady Macdonald seemed amazed. "Why, Rachel, you don't pretend to say—but I forgot," she went on, "you were not in the way of hearing about such things. Your father would carefully avoid the subject, knowing your enthusiasm for everything savouring of the heroic. I shall therefore inform you that I am a Jacobite—in common with all who are steadfast in their allegiance to James. Jacobus, you must know, is the Latin for James. Do you understand the proper meaning of the term now?"

"I smiled an affirmative.

"You shall be one before leaving Glenvoirnen." Repeating her good night, my aunt withdrew

CHAPTER IV.

"I was awakened on the following morning," said aunt Rachel, "by the sun's bright rays streaming through the openings of the shutters. Anxious to have another glimpse of the lake, I ran to the window; but, much to my disappointment, perceived my look-out was to the east, facing the pines, while the loch lay in front of the castle. Desirous to obtain the wished-for peep, I opened my chamber door and proceeded along a passage, which, fortunately for the gratification of my curiosity, conducted me to a room whose window commanded a view of Loch-Oich. And never was fairer scene presented to mortal eye. At my feet lay the lake, reflecting in its pellucid depths the variegated colours of the sky, and glittering beneath the rays of the morning sun, as it rose from behind the sombre pines—tinging the landscape with crimson hues. Some of the mountains seemed bathed in the deepest purple; others, again, were violet-coloured; those in the far distance, blue as the waters of the lake; while the mist, as it rolled away from their towering peaks, blushed a farewell to the morning sun. Transported with delight, I gazed long on the lovely prospect. As my aunt truly said, there is something at once noble and elevating in lofty mountains; and I could well understand that a spirit of proud independence would be engendered in the breasts of those who daily strode o'er their heath-clad summits. From the magic scene beneath, my thoughts wandered away to those mighty heroes who fought and died in defence of their country's rights. "No wonder," I exclaimed aloud, "that such deeds were performed by Scottish knights, when their arms were nerved for conquest by remembrance of the lovely land for which they bled!"

"Here I was startled by the pressure of a hand on my shoulder. Turning hastily round, to my great astonishment I perceived Lady Macdonald already dressed, and apparently quite recovered from her fatigue.

"Forgive me, dear aunt. I really am quite ashamed."

"And wherefore?" she broke in. "I did the same thing myself on the first morning after coming hither. My husband discovered me as I have you—I dare say when giving utterance to similar expressions of admiration. Is it not a lovely scene, dear Rachel? For my own part, I never grow weary of viewing the ever-changing aspect Nature presents in the Highlands. In your champaign countries, where corn fields and lofty trees predominate, it seldom or never varies; while with us a constant variety of light and shade sweeps across the scene. Observe yon mountain range! A few seconds ago they were shrouded in mist, and now behold the exquisite tints with which that great master-painter, Nature, has embellished their naked fronts."

"Aunt," I said, while gazing with pleasure on her noble features lit up with admiring enthusiasm, "never tell me that poetry vanishes with girlhood. Who can look in your face and credit such an assertion? There is more idealism in your composition than in that of many a maiden of sixteen summers."

"I will not say nay," replied my aunt, smiling. "And now, my dear, make haste and dress yourself. Early hours are an established rule in Glenvoirne." So saying, Lady Macdonald swept majestically down stairs.

After our morning repast, I begged she would again show me the portraits adorning the dining-room. Nothing but, my aunt led the way thither; and I was speedily lost in their contemplation. "That," said Lady Macdonald, pointing to the portrait of a tall, thin cavalier, with a fair complexion and very brilliant eyes, "is the likeness of His most Gracious Majesty King James the Third, at present called the Chevalier de St. George—he whose triumphant reception in Dundee I related to you last evening."

There was something at once pleasing and melancholy in his aspect; and I gazed with deep interest on the portrait of one who was born heir to the British throne.

"Is there not true nobility stamped on every feature?" said my aunt, sighing.

"Yes," I replied. "But what a pensive look he has!"

"Ay; every Stuart has that, more or less. You can trace the same expression in all their portraits; and father and son were equally unfortunate. Fated to be unsuccessful in love and war, they have never been a prosperous race. Yet what would I not give to see Scotland once more under the sway of a Stuart!"

Lady Macdonald then passed on to her husband's picture. "Sir Donald," she said, "as I informed you, was foremost to espouse the Stuarts' cause; and, being found guilty of abetting the Earl of Mar—that is his portrait in the corner—in the rebellion of 1715 he was attainted, and died shortly afterwards. Fortunately, this likeness was taken during his residence in France, as was also that of the Chevalier."

"The portrait to which I now direct your attention represents my son, also named Donald; who only survived his father two years. He was a handsome fellow, and his good qualities exceeded his looks."

"How well he becomes his Highland dress!" I said.

"Ay, that he does. Poor Donald! The white cockade on the side of his bonnet betokens his adherence to the Stuarts. How devoted he was to their cause! Never shall I forget his excitement when informed that the Chevalier had returned to France—regarding his case as hopeless."

"Mother," he cried, "our King has abandoned us!" and in his rage he tore the badge from his bonnet and trampled it under foot.

"However, the poor Chevalier was not to blame. He did not wish to leave Scotland; but his counsellors advising his departure; he yielded to their wishes."

"And has there been no attempt in favour of the Stuarts since the '15?" I inquired.

"My aunt replied, "Only last year we Jacobites were aroused by the intelligence that Charles Edward, the Chevalier's eldest son, was preparing to set sail for Scotland at the head of a large fleet. To add to our happiness, the courier—privately despatched from the French Court to circulate this intelligence amongst the loyal Highlanders—depicted the young Chevalier in such glowing colours that we were all eager to obtain a glimpse of him. Agreeably to his intentions, Prince Charles Edward set sail from France at the head of seven thousand men. This was in the month of February; and so skilfully had the gallant young hero carried out his plans, that the English Government remained in entire ignorance of the expedition until the eve of its execution. Unfortunately, the elements proved hostile to his cause. On the evening of the day on which the fleet set sail, it blew a fearful hurricane, several ships were wrecked, many men perished, and the remainder of the transports suffered such damage from the wind that they were obliged to return to harbour. Such was the disastrous termination to this well-organised plan of invasion. Greatly to his distress, Prince Charles was forced to abandon his enterprise and retire to Gravelines; where he is now residing."

"But do you not think he will again make the attempt?" I inquired, with a beating heart. "The elements cannot always prove adverse."

"My aunt shook her head. "I fear," she said, "we will never see him here—not that he himself is at all discouraged by his late failure; far otherwise. But the French Mareschal is doubtful of the success of another such expedition; more especially as England, roused to a sense of her imminent danger, is now fully prepared in case of a similar attempt. Without a French army to support him, it would be madness for Charles Edward to come hither. True and loyal Highlanders—were he to throw himself on their protection—would die a thousand deaths rather than see him taken by his enemies; but there are others whose cowardly natures and lukewarm loyalty would prompt them to take advantage of his coming without troops to decline interfering in his behalf."

"Perish such cold-blooded calculators!" cried I warmly. "The very fact of their rightful king coming a suppliant to their shores should incite them to testify their zeal in his cause, by fighting to the death under the Stuart banner."

"Spoken like a true Sackville!" said Lady Macdonald, embracing me. "Rachel, you are a worthy descendant of the gallant Sir Hubert. No lukewarm loyalty dwelt in his breast; but the noblest principles and enthusiastic devotion to his sovereign. Had our young Prince a few generals like our ancestor and Bonnie Dundee, many months would not elapse ere his father should be seated on the throne."

"Were you but in life," she exclaimed, apostrophising the portrait of the magnificent-looking cavalier whose name I had inquired of her on the preceding evening, "you would not pause to consider whether it were prudent to espouse the cause of a friendless king—and he a Stuart. No! The first to draw a sword in his behalf, you would not sheathe it while work remained for it to accomplish. Bravely you fought—nobly you died; and that is the worst which can be said of you, my gallant Dundee! When stern death cut short your career in Killiecrankie, the knell of the Stuart race was rung by the iron hand of Destiny."

"And pray, aunt, who was Bonnie Dundee?" I inquired, gazing with admiration on the noble bearing and almost feminine countenance of the gallant Royalist.

"What, my dear! Have you, who are so fond of everything referring to doughty deeds, never read of John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount of Dundee—the terror of the Whigs and the idol of the Cavaliers?"

"Oh, yes. I have frequently heard of Claverhouse."

"Well, then, that is his portrait; and proud I am to have it hanging on my walls. Ah, Rachel! had you ever encountered the gallant Graham, what wild work he would have made with your heart! I am not ashamed to confess he would have done so with mine. Poor dear Sir Donald was wont to say Claverhouse was the only man of whom he felt jealous. And no wonder. Many an hour I have cried over Dundee's address to his Highlanders before the fatal battle of Killiecrankie. Never have these words, almost the last he uttered on earth, been forgotten by me. When I repeat them, you will be able to appreciate the brave, loyal nature of him who perished on that hapless field. 'You have come hither,' he said, 'to fight in the best of causes; for it is the battle of your King, your religion, and your country, against the foulest usurpation and rebellion. And having, therefore, so good a cause in your hands, I doubt not but it will inspire you with an equal courage to maintain it. There is no proportion betwixt loyalty and treason, nor should there be any betwixt the valour of true subjects and traitors. Remember that to-day begins the fate of your King, your religion, and your country. Behave yourselves, therefore, like true Scotchmen, and let us by this action redeem the credit of our countrymen; in making which request, I ask nothing of you that I am not ready to do myself. And if any of us fall upon this occasion, we shall have the honour of dying in our duty, and as becomes true men of valour and conscience; and such of us as shall live and win the battle, shall have the reward of a gracious King and the praise of all good men. In God's name, then, let us on; and let this be your word, 'King James and the Church of Scotland!—which God long preserve!'

"Brave, brave Dundee!" sobbed my aunt.

"And he himself was killed?"

"Yes, my dear. He fell, mortally wounded, while riding up a hill to bring down my husband's regiment. The fatal bullet pierced his side, and he expired on the morning of the day after the battle. The superstitious remarked he wore a green scarf during the engagement. On account of its being esteemed a fatal colour for the Grahams, they attributed his death to that circumstance; and ever since Killiecrankie, it has been peculiarly disliked by all bearing the name. I myself, being distantly connected with the Grahams, cannot endure anything green in the way of dress.

"Thus perished the brave Dundee, in the arms of victory. Fatal success! since Scotland lost her noblest cavalier—the Stuarts their most devoted adherent. Yet he died as only heroes should die—fighting for his King and his country.

"Of the Earl of Mar," said my aunt, proceeding to the next portrait, "I cannot say much that is favourable. It was not altogether attachment for the Stuarts which caused him to raise the standard of revolt at Braemar. The unworthy passion of revenge, entertained against the Elector for depriving him of his government office, mingled with and corroded his purer feelings; while of generalship he had little or no knowledge, and sustained defeat at Sheriffmuir, where he was opposed by Argyll.

"Now, my dear, I have given you a slight sketch of the most interesting pictures in my gallery—the others being merely the portraits of deceased friends, to which no historical reminiscences are attached."

"Once more pausing opposite the Chevalier de St. George, I inquired whether the young Prince was thought to resemble his father.

"Without reply, Lady Macdonald walked towards a side table, on which lay a small casket. Beckoning me to approach, she touched a secret spring. The lid flew open, and disclosed two miniatures lying side by side. My aunt opened one.

"This," she said, while placing it in my hand, "is the likeness of Duke Henry, the Chevalier's youngest son; the other, that of Prince Charles Edward."

Both were eminently handsome, in totally different styles—Duke Henry being very dark, and his expression that of the deepest melancholy; while Prince Charles was delicately fair, and although a tinge of sadness rested on his brow, yet his blue eyes were bright with hope, and his lips wreathed with smiles of joyous expectancy. So captivating was his appearance, that I felt I never could grow weary of contemplating the miniature lying before me. And this was the representative of the ancient Stuarts!—the rightful heir to the throne of Britain! What a bright field of romance was now revealed! At that instant I felt that, were the Prince to make his appearance in the Highlands, my heart, my life would be devoted to his cause.

"Are they not handsome youths?" sighed Lady Macdonald.

"He is every inch a king!" I replied enthusiastically. "Were he to cross the seas, my wildest dreams would be realised."

"They should indeed. Then you would behold the clans arming, to the strains of the bagpipes—Camerons, Stuarts, Macgregors, and Macdonalds, assembling round the standard of their King. O Rachel!" pursued my aunt, clasping her hands, and raising her tearful eyes to Heaven, "even you cannot comprehend my love for the Stuarts. The intense longing I have to see the young Prince would alone suffice to sustain me in life until my desire were gratified. Aged as I am, my blood bounds in my veins with the freedom of youth when I gaze on that noble countenance, and remember that its possessor inherits the brilliant qualities of his race. You will in some degree realise the extent of my devotion when I tell you that, in order to procure these miniatures and obtain information respecting the Prince's intentions, I undertook my last journey to England. The gentleman to whose care these priceless gems were intrusted being unwilling to visit Scotland, I preferred encountering the fatigue of travelling to London rather than allow any third person to have them in his possession."

"And did your friend afford you any hope of Prince Charles making another attempt to land in the Highlands?" I inquired.

"Alas! no. So far from that, he told me there was not the slightest chance of his doing so. We must, I fear, for ever abandon all thoughts of seeing him in Scotland."

"Once more taking up his miniature, my heart whispered—He will come, and I shall see him. Here a servant entered, and informed my aunt her presence was requested in the drawing-room. Lady Macdonald carefully replaced the likenesses in the casket and was quitting the apartment.

"Left to my own reflections, I opened a door leading out upon the terrace, and bent my steps to an eminence overhanging the loch. Sinking down on a fragrant bank composed of heather and bog-myrtle, I abandoned myself to a delicious reverie; from which I was aroused at times by the hum of the bee, as it flew swiftly past laden with honey rifled from the sweet-scented orchis and flowering thyme, and the chirruping song of the grasshopper, lying concealed among the luxuriant heath. More than once my thoughts reverted to that singular dream in connection with Glenvoirnen. Then they dwelt on my aunt; on her enthusiasm and devotion for the exiled Stuarts, and the tears she shed over the miniature of Prince Charles Edward. My thoughts were then arrested by remembrance of the kindly countenance of the Young Chevalier. What melting softness lay in those eyes! What expression on the proudly-arched eyebrows! What dignity sat on his finely-developed forehead! The portrait which fancy thus conjured up proved too fascinating for my ardent imagination to dwell upon unmoved; and I sighed to think he was a Prince who thus caused my bosom to experience sensations hitherto unknown.

'As if to mock me by the contrast, the image of Robert Seymour—pale and sorrowful as on the morning of his departure—rose up before me. His parting words rang in my ears with terrible earnestness, recalling me from the sweet world of imagination to the yet more startling one of reality.

'Vainly I endeavoured to shut out the vision. It returned again and again; until at length, unable to endure any longer the remembrance of such culpable weakness, I sharply returned to the house.

'On entering the parlour, I found aunt at work, with a ponderous volume lying on her knee.

"Come hither, Rachel," she said, laying her hand on the book. "Since you appear not to have read much in connection with the Stuarts, I have looked out this 'History of the Kings and Queens of Scotland,' in order that you may derive some instruction from its pages. Their perusal will render you conversant with many things of which you are at present entirely ignorant." In compliance with her wishes, I read until luncheon-time; after partaking of which, we entered a neat little carriage, drawn by two Highland ponies, and drove away to visit a celebrated pass in the neighbourhood of Glenvoirnen. Truly, even yet remembrance of that lovely drive haunts me. Words fail to describe the magnificent scenery through which we passed. We traversed glens wilder than the most fertile imagination ever pictured to the enthusiast. On both sides stupendous rocks frowned darkly above our heads, wholly obscuring the sun's bright rays, so that perpetual gloom held reign in those mountain passes; while occasionally we were startled by the wild scream of the eagle, as it darted through the air or kept solitary watch on the summit of some beetling crag. Then, emerging from these sombre shades, we would find ourselves on the banks of unknown lakes robed in sunlight. Fairy-like in their hidden beauty, far from the busy haunts of men, these exquisite lochs seemed created solely to reflect the glories of the sky; while the silvery sound of distant cascades, and the murmuring of tiny rivulets, filled the air with delicious harmony. Truly, Nature is a wonderful study, and nowhere can she be contemplated to greater advantage than in a mountainous country, where the constant variety of light and shadow afford ample scope for wonder and delight. It is not my intention to weary you with minute details of our daily life; suffice it to say, so enchanting was my new existence, that I sighed to think a time must come for me to return to England.'

(To be continued.)

FURNITURE SALES.

BY THE EDITOR.

'In this wild world the fondest and the best
Are the most tried, most troubled, and distress'd.'—Crabbe.

THE revolutions which scatter families are often as surprising and instructive as those which overwhelm States. Who does not remember Felicia Hemans' 'Graves of a Household'—one, midst the forests of the West, where the cedar casts its massive and sombre shade; another, where the pearls lay deep in the blue, lone sea; a third, on the blood-red fields of Spain, where the peaceful vines were dressed; and a fourth, 'midst Italian flowers, underneath the dropping leaves of the myrtle? A single cradle, and many and wide-separate graves! Such is the touching contrast—the familiar human story—which one of the sweetest of our modern lyrics has moulded into pathetic verse.

At a certain period of the year, when the annual term for which domiciles are rented is about to expire, the advertisements of 'Sales of Household Furniture' occupy a large space in the newspapers. They cut short the debates of Senates, forestall accidents and murders, give brevity to wit, and extinguish émeutes and fires. Readers whose mahogany is polished and paid for, whose kitchen utensils are complete, and who possess a superfluity of bed and table linen, may perceive nothing in these announcements calculated to engage attention. What occasion, for example, has a man for great bargain of gridiron, whose beef-steak is daily tortured into the melting mood on an heirloom, handed down to him, it may be, from his grandmother? Or what concern has he in morocco easy-chair for disposal who doeses nightly, in zig-zag posture of apparent discomfort, on its identical and somniferous fellow? We confess, however, that to us these business intimations are replete with peculiar significance. They tell of misfortune, dispersion, or death—of the overthrow of hopes, the laceration of friendships, and the scattering of household gods.

If the spectacle of one of these sales of household furniture is regarded without interest, save by bargain-hunters, it is simply because it is an everyday occurrence. The house which was the proud man's castle, or the retiring maiden's sanctuary, is open to the promiscuous throng. No corner is sacred. Pride, seclusion, reverence—all are dead. Everything may be handled, pried into, pulled about, and poked, without resistance or resentment. Curtains have nothing to conceal, drawers nothing to contain, keys nothing to protect. The allowable disguises of prudential housewifery submit, without remonstrance, to be turned the seamy side out, by the curious, the idle, or the calculating. Irreverent antiquarian hucksters bore with gimlet eyes into the moth-holes, cracks, and rents; foolish, gossiping neighbours wander from room to room, criticising little luxuries, and slandering defenceless names; exemplary gentlemen 'furnishing' scan the prostrate wreck of domesticity for articles which may adorn the blissful home which they themselves have in prospect. To the one class the scene has no romance; to the other, no melancholy; to the third, no moral. The old nursery rhyme of

Here we go up, up, up;
And here we go down, down, down, expresses, in too many cases, the whole theory and practice of our varied social existence.

But come with us for a brief space into the dwelling about to be dismantled. Hast thou intelligence, fancy, and wit, and yet dost thou discern no pathos in pictures looking at each other perhaps for the last time? Canst thou not 'sing' that sofa, without aid from Cowper, on which a love, since grown old, may have lavished its earliest endearments, and now about to pass into the hands of strangers? Talkest thou to the empty punch-bowl, and hearest thou not thy voice hollow, and thy jokes lugubrious? Is the child's chair, in such cases, a piece of voiceless timber? Can no Æsop in thy brain make the hobby-horse in the lobby speak? In the midst of fleeting substantialities like these, we desiderate a new Hervé to meditate. The clod who can look at old furniture with a pawnbroker's eye—who can scan the dilapidated table, or chair, or sideboard, as the bearded Israelite at the street corner might scan your seediest and most serviceable garment—such a clod, we say, might visit the plain of Bannockburn, and see in it nothing but a turnip field! Was it from profound knowledge of the dulness of human nature in such matters that Thomas Hope—he whose eloquent pen painted the woes of Euphrosyne and the death of Alexis—produced a folio to dignify upholstery, and make chairs, footstools, fire-screens, and candlesticks eloquent of the mythologic gods? Why, not an item in the doomed abode but needs only a tongue to tell of respectable or touching memories that should awe the gaze of the idle, and repel the touch of the officious. Waste straws though they are, and about to be scattered by some implacable blast of fortune, they were yet the straws with which affection built its nest in that hopeful spring-time of life when not a blade was stricken or a leaf scar. The table, the sofa, the sideboard, the bookcase, the piano-forte on which brokers' wives, with their stiff, bejewelled fingers, strike dissonant notes—all were wound about the heart of the indweller like the shell about the tenant snail. If that placid homilist in gown and bands over the mantelpiece, or those loyal or heroic effigies adorning the surrounding walls, could but look out like Parker's 'Smuggler' from their frames, they might tell profounder secrets than ever Asmodeus disclosed. What blandishments! what hopes! what trials! what merry-makings! what quarrellings, it may be, within heart-links which no quarrellings could break! And has it come to this? Are the home-fires extinguished, and for ever? Must the very marble slabs follow the prognosticated fate of Prospero's 'cloud-capp'd towers'? Must the air-castles of the unfortunate be 'knocked down' to the highest bidder; and not even an umbrella be left to the next comer—or a lock of hair, from ventilated mattress or half-bald kitchen-brush—as a sorry token of friendship or memento of associations that were?

These annual 'Sales of Household Furniture' are analogous to the transformations which take place, season after season, in the vegetable world. Out of the deaths of plants, new plants arise to flourish, wither, decompose, and be succeeded by new growths in their turn. In like manner, old households are broken up, and new ones formed from the wreck. The toddy-spoon which its owner knew like his own thumb, falls into other hands, and elicits new sets of old stories; the gregarious chairs cling well together, but support a different group of sitters; the pictures stare out from unknown walls with brightened faces; and the hobby-horse in the lobby rocks on unfamiliar oil-cloth, under fresh glee-bursts of other and strange-voiced childishness. But, amidst all the 'Sales of Household Furniture' which every year take place, where are they who composed the households? Are they, too, scattered, like the books with which they beguiled their leisure, the vessels out of which they drank, the instruments on which they played, or the beds in which they slept? Have they realised the picture drawn by the poetess; and are their graves where foreign fruitage mellows under warmer suns, and birds of holiday plumage turn their languid hearts to song? Some have fallen a prey to disease. Some are away to other localities, on new devices of happiness or new schemes of ambition. Some are mourning in secret over the discomfiture of projects which promised them ease and fortune. Others are toiling over the turbulent Atlantic, or doubling the mystic Cape, with their hearts all homeward, and their purposes all at sea! If sermons are found in stones, with what eloquence should not old furniture preach! 'Britons! attend!' as Pope heroically exclaims, and make purchase of whatsoever articles may suit your purpose or your purse; but let your minds with your households be enriched. 'Sales of Household Furniture' are a species of social obsequies; and foreshadow, to our thinking, the doom even of the very households which they contribute to build up or replenish.

MY RIDING LESSONS.

FROM my infancy upward, I have considered an awkward horseman to be a fair and legitimate source of fun, and have indulged in merriment over some such unhappy figure without suspicion that I should ever exhibit myself in a similar light. It is so pleasant, to be sure, to sit and enjoy Mr. Leech's pictures of Tomkins on horseback, that one is seldom led to ask what are Tomkins' private feelings on the subject. It is such good fun to behold a barber on a broken-winded mare, with half-a-dozen little mudlarks shouting one to the other, 'Hi, Bill! here's a go! Let's frighten this gent's horse!' that one seldom analyses the sensation of having one's feet out of the stirrups, one's hands nervously grasping the mane, one's seat being somewhere on the brute's neck, while the saddle waits placidly behind. It's all very well to laugh; but a person so situated cannot feel happy. In short, it is with riding as it is with many other things—people must expose their ignorance, and be ridiculed some time or other; and those who have the moral hardihood to do so at an early period of their life, fare better in the end.

The means whereby I was forced to become a riding-master's pupil were simply these:—I had gone to pass a month with an uncle of mine who stayed near Callander—a little village lying to the north of Stirling, immediately on this side of the chain of mountains which at that place separates the Highlands from the Lowlands. About a mile from the village, a path cuts through the mountains, well-known as the Pass of Leny—a dark and narrow gorge, twisting round the rocky foot of Ben-Ledi, and leading out to a sheet of silver water known as Loch-Labnaig. Every morning as I rose, were it fair or foul, I could see the soft, white mist slowly leaving the eastern side of the mountains, and gliding slowly down through the dark firs into the darker shadows of the pass; whence I came to infer that the torrent, whose rushing sound I could hear during the night, was not unassisted by other sources than its parent lake. Tom, the son of my uncle Hamilton, was necessarily my cousin. Tom Hamilton was learned in dogs and horses, knew a little of salmon-spearing, and was marvellously ignorant of everything else. But one day—having in our rambles emerged from the purple gloom of the Leny Pass into the whiter light of Loch-Labnaig—Tom suddenly recollected that we could dine at a friend's house near by. We went. The man had a daughter, blue-eyed and beautiful. Ere evening came I was hopelessly in love with Christina Stewart. What a rare and delicate prize to be found in such a wilderness!—she with her full blue eye, her rosy lip, her hair that lay in wildest curls of richest auburn, and her pleasant half-English half-Highland accent, which seemed to have picked up the prettiest modulations in both tongues! I was in for it, I knew.

Then old Stewart invited us to spend the next day with him—which we did; and, as my holiday-time was nearly expired, I made the most of the few remaining days, by inventing a thousand excuses for haunting the shores of Loch-Labnaig, or exploring the Leny Pass, or wandering about near Glen-Skilagh Lodge. Nor was I long in discovering how much my attention to Miss Stewart annoyed my unfortunate cousin—unfortunate, in that he could not bear piano music, had not patience to look at water-colour drawings, and was wofully ill at ease in a drawing-room. He did not like this sort of thing, and determined to show it.

'Well, my hero!' he said to me the second day before my departure, 'have you seen Miss Stewart on horseback? No.'

'She is the most perfect horsewoman of these parts; and looks charming, I can tell you, on her little brown mare.'

'I have no doubt of it,' I said very sincerely.

'Well, then, I am going to ask her to ride out with you to-morrow. I'll give you old Fencer for the day; and mind you don't touch him with the switch, or speak to him, or annoy his mouth, or he'll throw you as sure's you live.' Whereupon Tom looked as though he had said something brilliant.

I did not sleep soundly that night. People have slept soundly the night before their execution; but they were enabled to do so, I presume, because their affairs were definitely and distinctly settled. In my case, there certainly was a chance that I might live through the day, though the odds were long against it. The morning broke beautifully, of course; and Ben-Ledi was gray and green in sunlight. After a somewhat silent breakfast, a little party drove up to the door; then a rustle of silk came up stairs, and Miss Stewart entered.

'You have driven over, Miss Stewart?' said Tom.

'Yes. Papa has gone to St. Fillan's, leaving me quite alone.'

'Then I shall get you Thomson's little chestnut, if you still wish to go out.'

'Oh, dear! no. I thought your friend might accompany me to the Bridge-of-Allan, as I wished to go there to-day; and if he will, I shall promise to drive him safely myself.'

Thus was Tom sold; and thus was I saved merely by a hair's-breadth. But should I run that risk again? The same evening I bade an affecting farewell to Miss Stewart, returning the following day to Glasgow; and, in the expectation of renewing my visit in autumn, went straight to a riding-master's stables.

Mr. Gunn would give me lessons at the rate of ten for every two guineas. I deposited that amount in Mr. Gunn's hands, and declared myself ready. I was ushered into the 'ring'—a large, circular court, surrounded by a high wooden paling, and paved (with what seemed to me coal-dust. The steed was brought. He was a large brown stallion, with full nostril, and wicked black eye. I did not at all like the look of him. Mr. Gunn bade me approach. Why don't they put blinders on riding-horses? I think the omission of this precaution highly reprehensible. What safeguard have you that the horse won't kick? And how, I ask, can any man feel comfortable when watched by a pair of ugly, brutal, big, black eyes, that have a dangerous ring of red round them each time they are turned about? Then, after I had been inordinately puzzled in getting the snaffle and curb reins together—a simple enough process to find by one's self—I was told to catch a lock of the horse's mane, and turn it round the middle finger of the left hand. Was it at all to be expected that any ordinarily-spirited horse would fail to resent this liberty? Nevertheless, I yielded blindly to my fate—thinking of Christina Stewart; and when I had nearly cramped my every sinew in getting my left foot into the 'irons,' I somehow managed to leap or scramble into the saddle. I was on a horse's back! I did not feel happy. I repeat it, I did NOT feel happy. I thought of Maseppe; but it was all very well for him to ride a wild horse when he was tied on. I thought of Dick Turpin, and his ride to York; but I knew that a man in danger of being hanged would run any risk to escape. Dick Turpin was no consolation to me.

Then Mr. Gunn, with his little wiry legs, began to walk; and the big brown horse, with his great eyes still glaring back, did also begin to walk. We walked, and again walked, that annular course, until the little man made some disagreeable noises with his mouth, and cracked his whip in a very offensive manner. Presently I was bobbing up and down on the saddle, my feet out of the stirrups, the reins out of my fingers, and my hat among the coal-dust. Mr. Gunn stopped the horse, and in my gratitude I forgave him for what he had done. He tendered me a large quantity of advice, which only increased my confusion. However, I held on somewhat better next trial, to the palpable discomfort of my knees; and although the bobbing was eminently unpleasant, I persevered for the sake of Christina. Had she only known what I was suffering on her account!

Suddenly the horse stopped, threw his head to one side, twisting the reins out of my hand; and the next second the brute was on his hind legs performing a pas seul, while I was sitting high on his neck, frantically embracing the same. By some means—to me unknown—I managed to get re-seated; and Mr. Gunn came forward, smiling complacently, to observe—

'Yes, sir; now you've stuck on, he'll go as quiet as a lamb with you, sir; he will. He's an artful old 'om, sir, he is; but he seldom try on that trick, sir. You stuck on wonderful, sir.'

I was glad to hear of it. The fact was, I should prefer to have tumbled off, and escaped 'wonderful, sir.' But as it was, I gathered myself up again into the galvanised posture taught me by Mr. Gunn; and again the bobbing was commenced—my thumb being bent nervously over the four reins, in a line with the horse's crest; my feet 'well forrard, sir,' with the toes turned up; my right arm hanging straight by my side; my back hollow; and my feelings indescribable. I hope I looked well. I ought to have done so, merely to make up for the horrible torture of being bumped in such a position.

I went the next day; and the next again; until Mr. Gunn, in a burst of confidence, inspired by a tumbler of Bass, informed me that I had 'a fine natural seat, sir—an excellent natural seat. Bless you, there's some people as comes here, sir; they can't be taught noways, for love or money. Some of 'em, sir, as has had twenty lessons couldn't ha' stuck on as you did, sir, with the old 'oss kickin' or breakin' into a gallop.'

Shortly after this, I was promoted to the back of a little white mare—an active little animal, with a peculiar constitutional tendency to shoot. That is to say, when by any means you so much as suggested the advisability of her moving a shade more quickly, she sprang forward with a 'spang,' and then subsided into the required pace. This habit of shooting—hazardous enough to a beginner—was, however, scarcely so perilous as her other habit of shying each time Mr. Gunn raised his whip, and running up the bank which surrounded the 'ring,' whence she descended very unwillingly and unsteadily, with her ears erect and her neck twisted. Nevertheless, it was on her back that I was first indoctrinated into the great mystery of 'posting.' I dare say every man who has learned to ride remembers with what a gush of joy the consciousness of being able to post came over his mind. I had been striving and striving for two long and weary lessons to no effect, when suddenly, by some unknown intuition, I happened to time my rise to the falling of the horse's foot; and the saddle, which hitherto had been a species of pillory to me, immediately became pleasant as an easy-chair. I was indeed so overjoyed, that I ventured to try if one could ride with the weight of the body always in the stirrups, not touching the saddle at all; with what result the reader may readily conceive. Indeed, my superabundant delight at the acquirement of this accomplishment, was duly tempered by the fact that it was now much more difficult to tell when the mare was about to break into a canter; and this happening not unfrequently, was very nigh bringing me irremediably to grief.

But ere my August holidays came round, the thing was done. I had learned to ride; and I resolved that Tom Hamilton should know it. I doubted not that during these hygone months he had been surreptitiously persecuting poor Miss Stewart with his unwarranted and unwished-for attentions; and I resolved, likewise, that she, being willing, should be freed. With this heroic determination, I found myself in Callander; found my uncle as rosy as ever; found Tom as demonstratively good-natured and stupid. He had not forgotten his joke. Miss Stewart happened—was it altogether a casual visit?—to call that evening; and Tom thereupon engaged himself and me to ride out with her next morning. I did not reproach him when she had gone, though he evidently looked for something of the sort. I cut him dead, chatted gaily to his father, and helped the old man to enjoy his claret (it was very sour), by telling him six months' scandal about the Glasgow Town Council.

Next morning we had to ride over to Glen-Skleigh Lodge. Tom, of course, rode Fencer. I was accommodated with a horrible old cob generally used to drag about a spring cart; nor did I undecieve Tom with an exhibition of my riding prowess. I jogged and bobbed on that old beast all the way over—still thinking of Christina Stewart; and when we reached the Lodge, I at least was thankful that such a thing existed as Highland whisky and-water. Miss Stewart was not ready—who ever expected she should be? So we loitered about the grounds with old Stewart, and examined his vineries, and told I don't know how many lies about the appearance of his cucumbers. But at length she came, riding up the lawn on her little brown mare; and a more beautiful pair you could not have found between Ben-Nevis and the Isle of Wight.

'Oh,' says Tom to me, as we were starting, 'perhaps you'd take a turn on old Fencer? He'll go easier than that old brute.'

I thanked him for his ingenuous offer, and accepted it. I mounted Fencer. We kept by the shores of the loch, riding eastward in the direction of Loch-Earnhead, and for a time went pretty much together. By-and-by, Fencer grew somewhat restive; and, at Miss Stewart's suggestion, I broke him into a canter. Miss Stewart's little mare kept courageously up with us; and further deception being quite useless, away we went without one word to poor Tom. I didn't even look back; but Christina—I have now a right to call her so—turned; and, seeing him ever so far behind, looked at me, and laughed a merry, clear, ringing laugh that I shall remember to the end of my life. Did she suspect how matters stood? Surely she did; for, on reaching Loch-Earn, we turned down to the right by the lake's side, though each of us knew perfectly that Tom would infallibly go to the left, towards the village. The horses were blown—should we walk them? Certainly we should. She saw such a beautiful stalk of crimson catch-fly—would I assist her to alight? I was enraptured. Should I have the pleasure of fastening the flower in her hat?—in which case she had better rest for a few minutes by the side of the wood. Yes, please. Ah me! when I think of that clear, fresh morning, with the blue and white glory above us, and the blue and white lake at our feet running away into a narrowing point between the hills; when I think of her as she sat there, with her brown hair untied, and her little, white hands, ungloved, adjusting the flower which I had put in her hat—nay, what use is there in talking of it? She had promised to be my wife, and we were happy enough, I can tell you. What mattered Tom's crossness when we found him at the Lodge on our return? What mattered even his sulkiness to me during the rest of my stay? I went often over to Glen-Skleigh Lodge, heeding him very little. And when, some months after—I being at the time in Glasgow—he wrote me a note, partly of virtuous forgiveness and partly of reprimand, offering to pardon me the little trick—quarry, who had played the little trick?—and to forget it all; why, I merely answered him by asking his assistance at a certain ceremony to be performed about Christmas, whereupon Tom kindly and generously consented to take upon himself the responsible office of bridegroom's-man!

W. BLACK.

THE LAST SCIENTIFIC BALLOON ASCENT.

MR GLAISHER'S LETTER AS IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

BY ALLAN PARK PATON.

UP to this time, I had taken the observations with comfort. I had experienced no difficulty in breathing; while Mr. Coxwell, in consequence of the necessary exertion he had to make, had breathed with difficulty for some time. At 1h. 51m. the barometer read 11.05 inches, but which requires a subtractive correction of 0.25 inch—as found by comparison with Lord Wrottesley's standard barometer just before starting, both by his lordship and myself—which would reduce it to 10.8 inches, or a height of about 5½ miles. I read the dry bulb as minus 5 deg. In endeavouring to read the wet bulb, I could not see the column of mercury. I rubbed my eyes, then took a lens, and also failed. I then tried to read the other instruments, and found I could not do so, nor could I see the hands of the watch. I asked Mr. Coxwell to help me, and he said he must go into the ring, and he would when he came down. I endeavoured to reach some brandy which was lying on the table, at about the distance of a foot from my hand, and found myself unable to do so. My sight became more dim. I looked at the barometer, and saw it between 10 and 11 inches, and tried to record it, but I was unable to write. I then saw it at 10 inches, still decreasing fast, and just noted it in my book; its true reading, therefore, was at this time about 9½ inches, implying a height of about 5½ miles—as a change of an inch in the reading of the barometer at this elevation takes place on a change of height of about 2,500 feet. I felt I was losing all power, and endeavoured to rouse myself by struggling and shaking. I attempted to speak, and found I had lost the power. I attempted to look at the barometer again; my head fell on one side. I struggled and got it right, and it fell on the other, and finally fell backwards. My arm, which had been resting on the table, fell down by my side. I saw Mr. Coxwell dimly in the ring. It became more misty, and finally dark, and I sank unconsciously as in sleep; this must have been about 1h. 54m. I then heard Mr. Coxwell say, 'It is piercing cold; there is hoar-frost all round the neck of the balloon; I have lost the use of my hands; they are nearly black. I am going to try to catch the string with my teeth, and open the valve. It is our last chance.' Here I heard the sound as if of Coxwell's springing up, and then falling beside me; and I fell into entire unconsciousness, with these words murmuring in my ear, 'Couldn't do it. No power. Five miles high, and ascending rapidly! Glaisher, my boy, it's all up with us!' How long after this we may have remained unconscious I cannot tell, but Coxwell's first words on recovering being 'Let us take an observation,' we did so of each other; and, judging from the circumstance of each having a magnificent beard, we concluded that a very long period must have elapsed. Indeed, so altered were we, that we sat for a while looking curiously at each other, and without exchanging a word. It was not the mere fact of my friend's chest being covered by a beard that would have excited the envy of good Haroun Alraschid that struck me, but there was otherwise a wonderful change upon him. His features had become perfect, his complexion was of unearthly beauty, his eyes were like Koh-i-noors, and his figure was positively majestic. I was yet silently marvelling at the improvement in his appearance, when, regarding me with an inexpressible smile, Coxwell said—and I thought at first it was an Æolian harp, — 'Glaisher! you are beautiful. I've been sitting admiring you. You're a perfect picture. I've seen something in the National Gallery like you. But where are we?' And here he rose, every movement grace itself; and, standing up, gazed out from the car. 'There she goes!' he instantly shouted. 'Oh, Glaisher! come quick and take an observation!' 'What goes, Coxwell?' I asked, hastening to join him, and reminded by my own tones of the musical glasses, or something of that kind. 'The old Earth!' he answered. 'There she goes! What a sight! Three cheers for the old Earth!' And certainly it was a sight. The Earth at a great distance, a richly-variegated sphere, was, dolphin-like, majestically revolving in the ocean of blue air, rapidly rolling away from us, and already so far off as to be only recognisable by its general features. 'There are the Americas!' exclaimed my friend; and I immediately tried to take a view with the camera, but the earth was revolving too rapidly for me to succeed. The spectacle certainly was grand, and we long sat silently watching it; but there was sadness in the sight—for our native planet was continually growing less; and gradually, as we sat straining our eyes after it, we became dejected. How long we may have continued gazing on our departing friend, we cannot tell; for the light was unchanged, or was even becoming brighter; and, strangely enough, our watches had begun to go backward—a circumstance the result of which we were unable to imagine. The stillness was at last broken by Coxwell muttering, 'There's Asia coming round! We'll soon have Europe;' and again we became lost, and long remained in speechless contemplation of the wonderful object. 'There's Europe!' cried Coxwell, by-and-by, starting up and waving his cap. 'Three cheers for old Europe!' which we gave, and with such effect that we startled our only fellow-voyagers, of whose existence we had become entirely oblivious: these were the remaining two of six pigeons taken up by us. One we had thrown out at the height of three miles; it extended its wings, and dropped like a piece of paper. A second, at four miles, flew vigorously round and round, apparently taking a great dip each time. A third and fourth were thrown out between four and five miles, and they fell downwards. On hearing the rustling in their basket, I immediately hastened to look at them; and my surprise may be conceived when I found their feathers turned to gold, their eyes like diamonds, their bills and legs like the finest scarlet coral, and the creatures so tame that they instantly flew and perched one on each of Coxwell's shoulders, who, as he stood up with these lustrous, living epaulets, looked like some 'high admiral.' Cheered somewhat by their companionship, we resumed our watch of the diminishing Earth, until we at last saw it entirely disappear; whereupon, heaving deep chordlike sighs, Coxwell and I embraced each other, and turned our attention to that quarter toward which the balloon was floating rapidly, upon what seemed the gulf stream of the air. It now for the first time struck us how singularly pure and bright the light was, and how exquisitely delicious was the temperature. Being reminded by Coxwell to make personal observations under the circumstances, the first thing I discovered was that neither of us felt the slightest sensation of hunger or thirst; and that a feeling inspired both of us of actual shame in connection with the gross food and drink we had still in the car. Under which feeling Coxwell proceeded ere long to drop over our prosaic sandwiches one by one; while I, with my pen, which I now found had changed from a common steel pen to one of gold, carefully noted and minuted the particular manner in which each of them descended. At last he lifted and was about to drop the brandy bottle; and I will never forget the singularly mixed expression of my friend's countenance during the moments (if any moments existed) that he held this before abandoning it. It seemed to say, 'How much changed we must be, Glaisher, when we have come to this!' With which words he dropped it; and I continued, with the most intense anxiety, to follow it in its downward course, determining one circumstance—viz. that though it had been in our hands a common quart bottle, it gradually, as long as it was in sight, kept changing its shape—being at one time of the form of those long-necked, broad, round-bottomed bottles which I think are called demijohns. What might ultimately become of that bottle and its contents was frequently a subject of speculation with Coxwell and myself. It was, indeed, from a reverie principally connected with it that we were awakened by music; and music so mysterious, so sweet, so sinking and swelling and all-pervading, that we were charmed. We felt the balloon distinctly vibrating with it; and Coxwell whispered that it reminded him of something in the Princess's Theatre, under the management of Charles Kean. After filling our ears for awhile with harmony of the most inconceivable richness and variety, it suddenly sank into a sweet strain that ere long took the tones of a voice; and, to our wonder, we heard these words sung:—

'Welcome, Coxwell! welcome, Glaisher!
Ye who through the seas of azure
Have so boldly voyaged far,
Welcome unto Shakspeare's Star.'

The voice being evidently above us, we looked up, and saw clinging to the netting of the balloon a small creature of astonishing grace, transparent like a Medusa, and, like it, glancing with rainbow hues. Its hair, like the finest silver wire, floated before it; its girdle seemed a knotted sunbeam, and its robe was of a colour of which we yet know nothing, and which would open the eyes of Monsieur Chevreul. One arm passed under the cord, the other pointed out and downward; and, as it moved, the balloon followed. In serotation, the regulation of the horizontal movement has ever been the problem; but here the process was a simple one. After a bewildered pause, Coxwell, whom I have found equal to any emergency, addressed our visitor with the words, 'Who are you?' and of their brusque sound I confess that I felt somewhat ashamed; but he afterwards explained that he had a natural difficulty as to saying ma'am or sir. 'I am Ariel,' it replied, with such a smile; 'still in Prospero's service; but never moody now, and as happy as possible. I'm often with Puck, and he's such a merry fellow! My master buried his rod, you remember; but he got another, and a much superior article; and he's always carrying on his old, strange studies. There's nobody in all the star, except Shakspeare himself, knows half so much about the air, and the winds, and all that. Indeed, he's quite our Admiral Fitzroy. In making his observations lately, he found out what he calls "a disturbing influence;" then, with his telescope, he saw a bottle falling, and he was sure some human beings were in the neighbourhood; then he ascertained where about you were, and sent me to guide you. He thought you would like to see the place, so that you might tell Charles Knight, and Payne Collier, and Halliwell, and these fellows, about it; but you can't land, as there are none but Shakspeare's characters allowed to live there. So I'm just to pilot you over it, and point out the different localities; and then I'm to take you off again to where you will catch the earth stream, so that you may reach home safely. You'll very soon see our Star now, for we're flying quickly. By George! how well she goes!' This strange news took us both completely by surprise; and it was some time before we were able again to address our Elysian cicerone; who, in the meantime, had by singularly fascinating calls coaxed the shining pigeons up to it, and was amusing itself playing with them. At last we recovered articulation, and I said, 'You mentioned Shakspeare, and that none save his own characters lived there?' 'Oh, yes!' it said; 'you must know that this is Shakspeare's "bright particular Star," and where he's over us all, and very happy; but, at the same time, he has much to vex him. However, that's always getting less, and he'll be quite glad some time. You know his characters only come and join him when they get quit of their imperfections. For instance, I was merely guilty of a little grudging and grumbling, and came almost at once; but Othello has only now arrived, for that jealousy was a great defect in his noble nature, and it took long to make up for it. If you had seen him and Desdemona meeting! They were so rejoiced! And, on their account, there's a picnic just about starting (my master's supplying the invisable musicians), to which all the Italians are going:—Romeo and Juliet, Portia and Bassanio, the Two Gentlemen of Verona, Katharina and Petruchio (such nice quiet people), my young master and mistress, Ferdinand and Miranda, and a lot of others; and I do hope we'll be down in time, for I'm so anxious to see the dresses. Then we can see from our Star another—so far off, and just like a hailstone—where Cassio was, but only for a little, for he was tipsy just once; and it must be an awful place, for he told us it was all of ice, and that yet there's not a drop of flowing water on it; and Sir John Falstaff and his men (he said Bardolph's nose was getting quite white), Sir Toby Belch, and Sir Andrew Ague-cheek, Christopher Sly, Stephano and Trinculo, and a number, are there; and Shakspeare fears they won't be here for ages. But look down now! There's our Star, and isn't it a pretty place to live at?' Coxwell and I here looked over the rim of the car, and were astonished; but, ever impressed with a sense of my peculiar province, my companion muttered, 'By Jove! now's the time for observations!' We were steadily descending on what seemed a richly-wooded island, lying, calm and glowing, in a blue sea, which was the air; and there were many other islands—some like it and others of different tones of colour, but all more distant than it, and at varying depths. We had read of the Islands of the Blessed, and surely here they were! 'You one next ours, but lower down,' said our guide, 'is Milton's Star (his garden is quite a Paradise), and the one beside it is Dante's.' As we got nearer that to which our course was directed, I observed that all round it were palaces, and castles, and halls of distinct clames; and that it rose toward the centre with magnificent meadows and forests, and was crowned by a great range of building like Kenilworth Castle, but immensely larger. 'That's where Shakspeare himself lives,' said Ariel; 'and although he is always either receiving or paying visits—(yesterday, he went down to tell Hamlet and Ophelia and the grand old King about your Albert Edward marrying a Danish Princess, with which they're all quite delighted)—he often has every one upon the Star invited up; and you've no idea what a beautiful masquerade it makes—there's such a lot of different people, and all differently dressed. But we're close enough now; I think you can see everything quite distinct, and I'll keep on this level, and begin to go round, and tell you about some of the places as we pass. What we're over at this minute is our own part. Yon's the ducal castle; and there's my noble master just before it, watching us. See! he's waving to you—which he was doing; and while I unmaped and respectfully returned the greeting, Coxwell got out and waved what he thought his usual flag, but which, as it unrolled, became a glorious banner, inscribed 'Ereclior!' 'Oh, we are in time!' cried Ariel, letting go the netting for a moment, to clap hands. 'Yonder is the picnic upon the terraces, and see all the beautiful boats ready to sail!' 'But where do they sail?' I asked. 'Oh, they push off into the blue air, and float so deliciously in it! And they're going a long way to-day, to see a Star that's getting ready for your Alfred Tennyson. Ah, isn't that a sight?' and here our delicate attendant, absorbed by the robes and jewels, passed into utter silence. Coxwell and I, accustomed as we were to look down on crowds—

— 'all faces turned to where Glow, ruby-like, the far up crimson globe, Filled with a finer air'—

were delighted. Upon noble terraces, festooned with the vine, set with vases, and glowing with flowers, the members of a large party were promenading; while pages and gossamers were busy at the landing-place—which was thronged with barges and gondolas of the most graceful shape, draped with rich glistening stuffs, and garlanded with flowers of the most vivid hues. Othello and Desdemona were yet lost in each other, and paced apart from their friends—she leaning on his arm, with both hands clasped over it; and he gazing down upon her innocent face with perfect joy. The rest of the company were mingled in a pleasant manner—Romeo and Portia together, Juliet and Petruchio, Miranda and Bassanio, Katherine and Ferdinand; and so on. Beings so graceful and so happy we had never dreamed of; and we were almost overpowered when, discovered by one of the Two Gentlemen of Verona, all the bright eyes were turned up to us, and a cheer rose like the opening of a choir. 'That handkerchief which Desdemona took out of her bosom to wave, murmured Ariel, 'was Othello's first present to her; seen by a Sibyl, and given to his mother by an Egyptian charmer.' We were still dazzled by the rich picture—how poor had become even Turner's most idealised landscapes and Titian's fairest men and women!—when we found that we had left it, and were immediately over a great castle with many quaint towers and spires, set behind cliffs that bearded o'er their base into the blue sea. Within its battlements, which were clothed with ivy—rich urn of fruits and blossoms glowing at each of the embrasures—stretched a spacious platform, upon which we observed several groups. 'That's the Royal Dane and Ophelia—they're so fond of each other,' said Ariel; and we distinguished the grand-looking King with the sweet girl hanging on his arm. 'There's Hamlet, and Horatio, and Laertes, and their friends,' were the next words; and we soon made them out—the Prince's intellectual countenance lit up with happy thoughts. He was loitering along, with his arm round Horatio; and they were evidently engaged in some amusing argument or speculation. 'Oh, they see us!' cried our guide, 'and Hamlet's beckoning. We must descend a little,' which we did; and by-and-by heard the Prince's voice, 'You are welcome to Elsinore, gentlemen! The brave, o'erhanging canopy, the majestical roof fretted with golden fire, you have boldly travelled. Do me a favour. When you return to the earth, find means to tell the Prince of Wales you saw us, and that my father and I approve and wish them every joy. Say we have determined to drain a flagon of nectar on the day he weds our Alexandra; and that Ophelia's knitting some dreams to send her.' He thereon waved us a most courteous adieu; and we sailed by, to pass over other strange and lovely scenes, and have pointed out noble men and fair women too numerous to be described here. At last, when we had floated over a British palace—beside which King Lear and King Cymbeline walked together, followed by Imogen and Cordelia, and Posthumus and the King of France—our guide said, 'Now we have put, as that mischievous Puck would call it, a girdle round the Star, and must ascend again to the place where I am to leave you. But we shall pass up and over the highest part, and perhaps you may get a glimpse of SHAKSPEARE himself!' 'Oh, Glaisher!' sighed Coxwell, 'do try and get an observation of him!' Thereupon, following Ariel's lifted arm, the balloon began to rise, and sailed toward the centre. On our way we looked down upon the glorious and varied scenery—with here and there a hamlet, or manor-house, or white, oak-ribbed cottage—and perceived many figures sitting at quaint porches, walking the bright fields, or gathering fruit in orchards. As to all these, Coxwell and I felt curious; but the fact of our approaching Shakspeare, seemed to have awed our guide, for the only words it whispered, as we sailed over a luxuriant forest—in the glades of which, brodered with every wild-flower, we caught glimpses of snowy deer—were these, 'Oberon and Titania's kingdom, thronged with fairies!' Ere long we were very near the central palace, which seemed set in what might be England's richest part but richer a thousand times, and calm and bright beyond all words; and were over a curiously-knotted garden, with a great mulberry tree within its walls, when we caught sight of the Poet himself. He was bareheaded; and, although he was turned away from us, we could see what a dome-like brow there was, fringed with auburn hair. He wore, over a scarlet doublet, a loose black gown or tabard, without sleeves, and a large, white collar lay down from his neck. He held a boy by the hand, and they were both intent upon one of a series of bee-hives. Coxwell and I held our breath, and the balloon moved soundless. Ere we reached them, they turned away; and, with a few paces, passed into a thickly-pleached alley, hung with the lime's sweet flowers and the chestnut's white blossoms, and disappeared. But, as we glided silently over that rich avenue, we heard these words, 'Yes, Hamnet. I, when on the earth, thought they were governed by kings. It will take us ages even to understand the bee. Wonderful, my dear child, are all His works, but less wonderful than His love.' Spelled by that brief vision, and these kind, grave tones, it was a while ere my companion and I noticed that the balloon was mounting with incredible velocity; indeed, every second the Star was visibly becoming less, and soon it disappeared. Then our flight became gradually slower and slower, until we were motionless; when Ariel, leaving the netting, floated close beside us, and intimated that its spiriting was ended. We had been so kindly treated by the beautiful creature, that we almost in one breath inquired if we could do any service or favour in return? 'None,' it replied, 'unless, by-the-by, you will give me these doves, for we have grown quite friends?' We were too delighted to be able to grant its desire; and ere long—having, in the same sweet strain as its first, sung these words to us,—

'Farewell, Glaisher! farewell, Coxwell!
Airy compass ye can box well;
And of pluck ye have no dearth.
Soon and safely reach your earth' this being succeeded by the mysterious and ravishing music which had heralded its arrival—our fair guide was speeding from us like a meteor, the two golden pigeons playing with it on the way. We remained silent, watching its diminishing brightness, and deeply impressed with the marvels we had seen. How long we may have so remained we know not; but on waking from my reverie, it struck me that the light was grown thicker and the temperature much colder. Intending to ask him if he too noticed this, I glanced at my friend, to find him gazing intently at me, and to be surprised with his appearance. The magnificent beard had shrunken, his eyes were dull, his features irregular, and his stature puny. Before I could speak he said, and his voice grated on my ear, 'Glaisher! you are very ugly. I've been sitting shocked. You're quite a plain man. You're like one of these hideous pre-Raphaelite productions.' In reply to which I remarked, and my tones were those of a bull-frog, 'Well, Coxwell, you're nothing to boast of! I never saw a man so fallen off in my life. A little while ago you were like an angel, now—' Our mutual unpleasant survey was fortunately interrupted here by Coxwell's springing up like a madman, and shouting, 'Here she comes again! O Glaisher! come quick, and take an observation!' 'What comes again?' I inquired. 'The old Earth!' he replied. 'There she comes again! There are the Americas! Hurrah for the old Earth! Isn't that a sight?' And certainly it was. Here was our native planet coming bowling along in the blue ocean, and plainly recognisable. We long sat, gazing with delighted hearts. 'There's Asia!' Coxwell murmured. By-and-by, and ere long, it was my privilege to exclaim, 'And there's old Europe! Three cheers for old Europe!'—which we gave with a will; and, on its ceasing, we both started to hear a rustling in the pigeon-basket, on looking into which, imagine what I felt on seeing the two creatures exactly what they were when received by us before ascending! In our consequent amazement, there was such a complete silence that we both heard our watches loudly ticking, and, on consulting them, were bewildered to find that we had only been an hour or two away. 'By George!' were Coxwell's first words, 'I'm immensely hungry!' adding, with a kind of hysterical laugh, 'hand over the sandwiches'—which I did, for they were there! 'You'd better take an observation,' said my friend, 'in the place the bottle was;' and acting on the suggestion, I lifted it out and uncorked it! Strengthened by an application to these, we both now resumed our various labours—I with my instruments, and my companion with his balloon; and, as our descent was rapid, we, in a very short time, and without much difficulty, landed safely at Wolverhampton, where none of the pigeons we had despatched had returned when I left on the afternoon of the 6th. It would seem, from this ascent, that five miles from the earth is very nearly the limit of human existence. But the height to which fancy may carry us remains to be ascertained by future observations.

RIVERS.

By Mrs. NEWTON CROSLAND.

"Thou did'st cleave the earth with rivers,"—Ezekiel, c. iii, v. 2.

He cleaves the Earth with Rivers!—bright, bounding, fresh, and free;

Or creeping, dark and sluggish, to meet the restless sea.

And ever still they are the types of Life that onward pours,

And cleaves its little path between the two eternal shores.

The mountains strong, the patriarch hills—that silent seem to stand,

With caps of cloud, and hoary locks, and mien of dumb command—

Hide tarns that never see the sun, and persevering rills,

And silvery waterfalls, that wake the music of the hills.

And these begot the rivers vast, which ever onward glide—

How'er they wander by the way—to meet the ampler tide.

He cleaves the earth with rivers! Beside the limpid brook

The field flowers lean, Narcissus-like, to in their mirror look.

The shy wildfowl, in silence bold, athwart the streamlet skim;
And graceful willows droop to lave their taper, slender limbs.
Anon the stream is sought by man; and water-carriers trail
Their shining burthen, clear and cool, in many a brimming pail.
The village joys to be so near, though learning, perhaps, its worth,

By frost, that, in the shorten'd days, the brooklet chains to earth.

But once a-week the water-wheel grows dry the stream above,
And cattle loosed from heavy yoke with lax footsteps move;
The ferryboat lies at its ease beneath the alder's shade,
And Nature's self almost appears in Sabbath dress array'd.
On Sabbath-days the bells peal out as if surcharged with song,
Till, on the soft conducting wave, the rapture glides along;
And when no more poor human ears can catch the Sabbath note,

A mystic music, lingering, seems beside the stream to float—
To calm 'mid toil, and whisper hope, and give the spirit rest,
When happy still the thews must strain, and life's hard current breast.

He cleaves the earth with rivers! and on their margins rise
Fair cities, crown'd with pinnacles outlined against the skies—
Fair cities! yea, great heart-shaped beads the generations mould,
To hang upon God's river threads of silver or of gold:
Heart-shaped be sure, could we but see the plan that should prevail,

Though aims fall short, and men despair, and means are mix'd and frail;

So that the traffic marts jut out in some unsightly way,
And lordly domes take ample sweep and school-rooms overlay;
And churches oft are crush'd and cramp'd, and have their doors too small,

While monuments to Mammon raised are somewhat overtall!
Still, from the serried mass to which a mighty city grows,
With palpitating thought and deed, a nation's life-blood flows:
Though good and ill so mingled are, they often seem to be—
Like wrestlers, face to face, limb-twined, in strife for mastery—
So mingled, that the very coin with reverent hand we lay
Beside the widow's sacred mite, on Sacramental-day,
May still be foul'd by evil use, how'er the piece look bright,
And still seem warm from heathen palm that clutch'd it o'er-night.

He cleaves the earth with rivers! but, near the haunts of man,
The shores are wed by bridges, which parting waters span;
Each arch a ring completed when sunshine makes a shade,
And memory keeps the symbol when clouds the image fade.
But 'tis beyond the bridges the fleets of nations ride,
And merchants' wealth is floated upon the swelling tide.
O ships, of bird-like fleetness, that make the ocean path!
O ships, the hundred-throated, that bellow nations' wrath!
O ships that part the loving, and dear ones reunite;
That thread the glittering icebergs, or dart 'neath tropic night!
O ships that know the rivers! doth never message flow
From sister streams, for you to give, in mystic accents low,
When home at last you rest your strength upon some limpid stream

Which leaps to kiss your burly sides, that bask in sunny gleam?
No message! but, as rivers fall, obeying One Behest—
With wealth of waters lost and found, on ocean's shining breast—

There rises oft, in Fancy's realm, the thought that yet they bear
Some memories of human life—its mingled joy and care;
And that, when inarticulate, the ocean seems to pant
For power of speech, like some dumb thing which has a human want—

The Great Sea grasps the Rivers' lore, with all its own combined,
And so can symbol something true to every human mind!

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK,
18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 22 St.
Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

LIBERWICK'S

MISCELLANY

No. 7.]

SATURDAY, NOV. 15, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

ITALIAN NOTES.

BY AN ENGLISH GARIBALDINO.

AVERSE to marching under false colours, I have, as above, plainly avowed my sympathies. Nevertheless, I trust to be found as impartial as it is possible for any strong-feeling man to be who has taken a part, however humble, in one of Garibaldi's campaigns for the liberation of Italy. I will frankly confess that, without any ultra hero-worship, I am a Garibaldino—so far as love of Garibaldi goes—to the backbone. But that need not prevent my seeing and owning any spots on the fame of the amnestied prisoner of the Varginano. While speaking, so far as in me lies, the truth as I believe it to be, I ask no man to outrage any respectable prejudices he may entertain merely on my ipse dixit. I only ask for as much patience and consideration as I myself would award to any one—he be Bourbonist or Piedmontese, Ricasolian or Ratazzian, Napoleonist or Garibaldian. I must be wrong in many things; I may be right in a few. As a litterateur, I cannot aspire to the merit of ever having been a deep student of Italian or any other politics. But nevertheless I hope, without undue egotism, that I may assume to know, in Shaksperian phrase, 'a hawk from a hornshaw.'

Italy has always been a political stumbling-block for the rest of Europe. With a climate incomparably delicious; with a fertility of soil, and 'ever golden fields,' which, in the poet's words,

'Plough'd by the sunbeams solely, would suffice
For the world's granary;'

with every advantage that Nature can bestow, hers has, ever since the overthrow of the Roman power, been a kingdom divided against itself. From the days of the Ostrogoths till our own, that fair land has furnished more battle-fields than any other country in Europe. Trodden to the dust by the tyrannies of her many domestic and foreign oppressors, the character of her people deteriorated in due ratio. True, ever and anon fitful gleams of earnestness, free outlookings, and noble deeds, tell that the heart of Italy was throbbing still. But beyond these spasmodic signs of life—reminding one of the movements of a galvanised corpse rather than of the awakened vigour of a long-dormant nation—Italy, till of late years, gave the world little reason to hope that a time would come when once more she would assert her right to a place in the free councils of Europe.

With the Austrians in Venice; an effete if well-meaning Pope, ruined by his evil adviser Antonelli, in Rome; and a Bourbon on the throne of Naples, Italy's prospects in 1860 were not reassuring. When, on the 10th of May of that year, Garibaldi and his thousand leaped on the shore of Marsala, there were not wanting hundreds of quidnuncs—sensible people, too, in their way—to vaticinate from that expedition the direct results possible to the cause of Italian liberty. 'Garibaldi,' said they, 'is a wild adventurer; a few thousand, more or less, of ragged volunteers will melt away like snow in sunshine before the organised forces of an established Government; and even if for a while the insurgents make head at all, their efforts will only further the objects of anarchists, and set an evil example to the rest of Italy, by inciting men to attempt that which cannot be accomplished in our time;'—and so on. Thus people prattled. L'homme propose et Dieu dispose! We all know what happened.

In May, Garibaldi landed at Marsala. At the beginning of September, he entered Naples;—for men were by this time weary of a tyranny which neither God nor man could longer abide. There was a brave sight outside the Palazzo Angri, in the fair city of Naples, at the beginning of September 1860. A joyful mob were there to be seen, swaying to and fro like the waves of the Mediterranean under the influence of a 'stiff Levanter.' From the fashionable marchesa, in her white dress trimmed with pink and white, to the yelling fruit-sellers—almost every one in Naples seemed to be there to do honour to the hero of Marsala. For a change had come;—the Bourbon dynasty, accursed of God and man, was over; and Giuseppe Garibaldi, gentleman farmer of Caprera and Dictator of the Two Sicilies, reigned in its stead.

It was a great day for the Redshirts, who seemed just then to leaven by their presence every group of noisy shouters of 'vivas!' as, standing under the palazzo windows, they discoursed, in their soft, liquid dialects, of freedom hardly won; of hard knocks freely given and taken; and, most of all, of him who had led them in one track of glory on from Marsala to fair, fickle Naples. There might have been seen the sturdy little Zouave volunteers, in their fez caps, fraternising with the grim, gaunt Hungarian hussars, with their proud, stern faces, and thorough soldiers' set-up. Then you would catch the half-intelligible, hisping patois of the Picciotti—the boy-volunteers—some of whom Dunne had actually to urge on with the flat of his sword at Melazzo; but who now, after many hardships, were as brave a band of reckless little heroes as any who marched under Garibaldi's orders. Calmly patronising these ragged soldiers of the Liberator, you might have seen here and there a few of the spruce Sardinian Bersaglieri—with their oil-skin hats, cocks' feathers, and bold, free faces—the best men in Victor Emmanuel's service; and then, next to these—among them, but not of them—you would have seen the lowering brows and serpent-like glances of sundry scoundrels, ex-spies and ex-sbirri, who for years had wrought out the evil will of old King Bomba, Francis II.'s father; and who now, for all that, were cringing to the new power, and seeking to ingratiate themselves with the honest Garibaldini. It was sickening to hear these panders of tyranny yelling out 'vivas!' in honour of a liberty they feared but could not appreciate, and drinking toasts to Italia Una in every café and liquorist's shop in Naples! There were rich Neapolitan 'gentlemen,' too—Heaven save the mark!—there that day swelling the plaudits of free men—'gentlemen' who had made merchandise of their corruption under the sway of the Bourbons; gentlemen who had played the spy on their own fathers and brothers, and who wore decorations as badges of their infamy. They would have yelled Morte à Garibaldi! the next day, if they could have obtained a sixpence by it, and have saved a skinful of broken bones—so debased, so venal, so utterly without conscience, are many of this Neapolitan race, too long demoralised by dark despotism and priestly thrall; and this in the land most gifted by Nature of all the bright spots on God's goodly earth. Every now and then, barefooted vendors of copper medals would solicit your purchase of one lately manufactured, and sold for two or three baioocchi, with a bald likeness of Garibaldi on one side, inscribed—G. Garibaldi, Dittatore; and, on the other, his simple words, which will ring like a knell through men's ears when the gallant heart and restless brain of that devoted patriot are mouldering in the grave. These are the words—(the medal is lying on my desk now, and Garibaldi is lying, such are life's chances and changes—a cripple at Varignano):—Italiani, io voglio l'indipendenza e l'unità della nostra patria.

What followed is matter of history:—The battle on the Volturno, when the Neapolitans were driven back into their stronghold of Capua; the arrival of that unhappily-officered, insubordinate, but thoroughly 'plucky' English legion; the bombardment of Capua by the Sardinian artillery, and its surrender after a few hours' inglorious defence. Everybody knows these things. Everybody does not know the terrible hardships which the raw soldiery of Garibaldi, delicately-nurtured gentlemen though many of them were—I refer especially to the Italian Garibaldians rather than to those of any other nation—underwent, without a murmur, for the cause of Italia Una, and that unanointed king of men, Giuseppe Garibaldi; nor is it any part of my purpose to dwell on that at present. Neither does everybody know that, with all the 'vivas!' and all the mad enthusiasm in favour of Garibaldi and freedom in Naples, there was then, as there is now, a strong Bourbon party—hating the Piedmontese to the death; ay, tenfold stronger than newspaper readers wot of—ready to take advantage of the least opportunity for reaction in Naples. Everybody does not know, either, the many petty jealousies (any of which might just then have been fraught with the most serious consequences to the cause) existing between the officers of the Garibaldian army, which nothing but Gen. Türr's savoir faire and Garibaldi's sweetness of disposition could possibly have allayed. This was one dark side of the campaign of 1860. See another.

On the 8th of November 1860, after Capua had surrendered; after the Sardinians had taken possession thereof, and installed themselves in the city of Naples also; after Garibaldian volunteers had been studiously snubbed, as far as was safely practicable, by the Piedmontese incoming heroes; after Victor Emmanuel as a king, and Garibaldi as a subject in an old red shirt, had entered the Church of San Gennaro, of blood-liquefying notoriety, together; after all manner of back-stair dirty work, and tortuous political 'double shuffle,' the ex-Dictator of the Two Sicilies, the day following the said visit to the shrine of San Gennaro, left Naples. Those who saw him pass that dull morning on board the 'Washington,' will not easily forget the scene, nor the feeling engendered in the minds of many men who would have shed their blood like water at one gesture of Garibaldi's hand. As the 'Washington' steamed out to sea, deep and hearty were the muttered curses on the new dynasty. Victor Emmanuel had received, at the hands of the farmer of Caprera, nine millions of new subjects. Yet Garibaldi was allowed to leave the bay of Naples without one gun firing a parting salute in his honour. As he left, the booming of the morning guns was heard saluting the rising sun and Victor Emmanuel! These things are remembered yet in Naples, and the memory of them stifles many a 'viva' for Il Re Galantuomo.

Come we now to Aspromonte, and the doings of that ill-starred day, in September 1862, when Garibaldi—ill-advised in his efforts to free Rome from the incubus of an effete Papal Government—was shot down by the bullets of the Piedmontese free men turned to him, acting under the orders of Signor Urban Ratazzi, with the hearty approval of Napoleon III.—ex-Carbonaro of years gone by, ex-President of the French Republic 'one and indivisible,' originator of the coup d'état, victor of Magenta and Solferino, concocter of the peace of Villafranca, and annexer of Savoy. Perhaps, after all, it was as well that the Bersaglieri bullets flew like hail that day, till Garibaldi was bleeding and a prisoner. Had Garibaldi been allowed to go on, he might perhaps have failed; but, what in Ratazzian ideas was more awful still, have embroiled the Sardinian and French Governments. God only knows. But one fact remains, and Italy's heart feels it—Victor Emmanuel had no right to take upon himself the reins of government, if he were not prepared to merit the title of 'King Honest Man,' given him by Italy. That 'Rome or Death!'—Garibaldi's cry—received the King of Italy's moral support, all who know the real character of Victor Emmanuel know well. Ere Marsala, in 1860, Victor Emmanuel apparently threw cold water on Garibaldi's plans, and then backed and profited by them. Had not Garibaldi grounds for expecting the like again in 1862?

The 'amnesty'—too tardily granted, and naturally enough refused by Garibaldi—has made Victor Emmanuel more unpopular than ever. The lickspittle, Napoleonic toadyings of Ratazzi have set against him not only the Garibaldian and Mazzinian factions—and, remember, the two parties are quite distinct—but have alienated from him the love of all the truest and most earnest hearts in Italy beside. From Pola to Capri, there is not one true Italian who would not rather be in Garibaldi's place—a wounded cripple—than on the thorny seat of King Victor Emmanuel.

Look at the state of Naples now. What is there? Brigandage, as the Piedmontese call a fact which is something far more deadly than mere unorganised plunderings; internecine hatreds; jealousies innumerable; fifty split-up political parties, ready to fly at each other's throats. There is the Muratist faction, ripe for revolt and French intrigue; the old Absolutist party, crouching, cowardly, but ready any moment for whatever butchery and rascality may be put in hand. There is militating against Victor Emmanuel's ever holding Naples in peace this fact—that the two races, Piedmontese and Neapolitan, are probably more opposed to each other in every thought, feeling, and interest, than any other two races in such close relations on earth. The Neapolitan—debased as he is—detests and despises the stern northern Piedmontese, whom he calls in his everyday talk—spitting on the floor meanwhile—a savage and a goitred idiot. The Piedmontese looks upon the Neapolitan in much the same way as the late East India Company's officers regarded the natives of India; with quite as good reasons. Neapolitan trade, too, has greatly suffered under Piedmontese sway. The influx of brisk, bustling Genoese traders into Naples of late has put the lounging, idle Neapolitan quite out of his stride; and the latter suffers by such competition. The cruelties—and these have been very many—of the Piedmontese régime, in nowise improve the case.

Turn to Venice. The Venetians hate Victor Emmanuel as they love Garibaldi. Il Re Galantuomo, say they, has deceived them. Is Venice forgotten? they are ever asking bitterly. The iron heels of Austria's soldiers still clatter on the pavement of St. Mark's. Are all promises of emancipation but idle breath? Is Victor Emmanuel merely a vassal of Napoleon III?

In Piedmont, popular as is the bluff son of Charles Albert, there is nevertheless a strong ultra-national party, who hate him for ceding, two years ago, the heritage of his ancestors—beautiful Savoy—to a Bonaparte. I heard the two cursed together; my interlocutor spoke a patois in which French predominated.

That Garibaldi is no statesman, is obvious. Perhaps God does not make statesmen out of such honest clay as his. Que sais-je? as said old Montaigne. That the patriot's dream touching the independence and unity of Italy will never be realised in our day, if ever, I sadly believe. Victor Emmanuel is not the man for the situation, now that the Titan brain of Cavour is at rest. Italy will never forgive the Piedmontese for Aspromonte—foolish as Garibaldi may have been there to tempt fate. Louis Napoleon will never suffer all Italy to become one united kingdom. If Victor Emmanuel secured Rome on the withdrawal of French bayonets, some other French annexation scheme would inevitably dog the heels of such a possession. Lately it was Savoy and Nice; then it would be the island of Sardinia, or perhaps the kingdom of Naples, or more probably such a tract of territory as would put the French within an hour and a-half of the gates of Turin. The public has lately learned, on the authority of a writer in Blackwood doubtless well 'posted-up,' that, 'On Tuesday the 15th of May—we can state—Lord Cowley was sent for to the Tuileries, where he found the Emperor attended by his Minister for Foreign Affairs—M. de Thouvenel. The Emperor said "It was necessary there should be no misunderstanding on the part of Her Majesty's Government as to the change which Garibaldi's expedition (to Naples) might effect in the policy of France. He had frankly warned the Sardinian Government of the consequences. The principle which he had recently laid down (in the case of Savoy and Nice) must again be applied, in the event of further annexations being made to Sardinia. The balance of power again disturbed, must, in the case of France at least, again be redressed by the territorial extension of the Empire. The warning which he had given to the Sardinian Government he would now give to Her Majesty's. He was anxious that there should be no misapprehension as to his policy and intentions." Cassandra-like croakings are generally unpopular, and seldom believed. But it needs no Cassandra to foretell that a breach between France and Sardinia, a probable imbroglio between England and France consequent thereon, and a general European war, are any day on the cards—should the French march out of Rome, the Piedmontese march in; and should Louis Napoleon thereon demand the island of Sardinia, or Naples, Sicily, or a tract of country extending from the last acre of French ground in Savoy up to or beyond Susa.*

In the meantime, like Duriarte in the cave of Montesinos, all we can say is, 'Patience; and shuffle the cards.' That the knave for some time will always turn uppermost, is certain. That, so long as Ratazzi continues in power, Italian freedom is but a hollow phantom, is equally so. That, so soon as Garibaldi shall have recovered the use of his limb and his health (that is, in the event of Rome's being then held by the French, which is perhaps improbable), we shall hear his cry, 'Rome or Death!' with or without Victor Emmanuel—taken up this time by millions of Italians—is as certain as that fire burns or gunpowder explodes at a lighted torch. Then we may have a chance of seeing the Austrians driven out of Venice; and the Papal temporal power—that 'ghost of old Rome, sitting crowned on the grave thereof,' to borrow Hobbes' striking figure—as a thing of nought. But, alas! Europe ere now has seen a Pope driven out of Rome by French bayonets, only to be brought back once more at the tail of them. French plunderers ere now have robbed Venice of her five brazen gates—the pride of the city—and stuck them up in Paris. We may see the like again ere we die; and an exchange of French for Austrian oppressors would be but cold comfort to the Venetians.

The greatest hope of Italian unity lies not in powder and shot, strong arms, and stout hearts; but in the spread of education and the force of knowledge. Centuries of spiritual darkness and political pocranteism—if I may coin the word for the nonce—have done despots' work too well. 'Light! more light!' is now Italy's cry. Let but the pen help the sword of freemen. Then may Italian unity be something more than a chimera—a political Moloch demanding the sacrifice of the best young blood in the country. Then may Cavour's dreams be realised in some part; and Italy, if not united in one great monarchy, be at least, with her several federal republics, free from the Alps to the Adriatic. But blood must flow, hearts must ache, and political Tartuffes live, lie, and pass away ere that shall be. God is hastening that hour in his own good time, though men's error-blinded eyes, and impatient hearts burning hot within them, warp their judgments, and make many of Italy's wisest men but sorry political atheists. How can this article be better closed than in Milton's noble words in the 'Aroopagtica,' addressed to the Parliament of England in 1644, and none the less applicable to Italy now?—'Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle renewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full mid-day beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means.'

W. B. R. S.

SUMMER AND WINTER.

BRIGHT summer is going to leave us—
Dark winter is coming to grieve us;
For cold wind and snow
Will steal o'er us like woe,
And of the gay sunshine bereave us.

The flowers bend their knees and are sighing,
Consumptive, like fond maidens dying;
The birds that rejoice
With a musical voice
No more 'mong the groves shall be flying.

The streamlets shall cease to meander
That now o'er their bright channels wander;
All things that were fair
Will look barren and bare,
And Nature be left of its grandeur.

But darker by far is that sorrow
That cannot from hope's treasure borrow
One ray of delight,
Either noonday or night,
But wakes to its troubles each morrow.

A. P.

* The pass of Susa, about thirty miles from Turin, opening its defile at the foot of the Cottian Alps, in bygone years obtained the name of 'La Chiave d'Italia,' or 'The Key of Italy.'

OF CHILDREN.

PART FIRST.

SINCE ever I was myself a little child I have been dearly fond of little children—passionately and, as I have sometimes been inclined to think, almost foolishly and ridiculously fond of them, beyond even my tender admitted privilege as a woman, and more lately a mother. I suppose it must be constitutional. I must, I think, have been born so, as some people are born poets; for I can very distinctly remember that about the age of four or five I had begun to develop a quite scientific interest in babies. Certain of my immature, childish speculations about them I can recall, and might here set down, did they seem to me, at this date, at all profound and important enough to deserve a formal philosophic statement. Some people, it is said, are born poets; and I confess if there is one gift which I could wish had been dispensed to me at my birth, it is this divine one of poetry; including, as it needs must, I think, when given in any really rare and noble measure, the essential sum of all other human nobilities. But the planets, when I came into the world, did not please to be thus propitious; and, instead of making me a Sappho or a Mrs. Browning, they merely made me fond of babies at five; and gave me, during all my life after, a genuine, inexhaustible delight in the joy and the innocence of childhood; so that almost by sympathy with it I can share it, and every now and then, dismissing the arid present, can run back to live for a while again in that first strange brightness of the world. Let me say that I think the amende was not amiss; and that if we could conceive of Shakspeare himself as a monster who did not love little children (how tenderly he did we feel—do we not?—whenever a child is introduced in his dramas), I don't know that I should greatly care to change lots with him, if I could. The temptation would, I admit, be something. The mere fame would not indeed much tempt me. I at once dismiss the consideration of it as important only to very silly or very young people. For the possession of a majestic and unrivalled intellect, unique in the history of the world, and the grand consciousness which must needs more or less have attended it; the almost ferce sensations of power, tyrannous and triumphant, nearly of necessity, I should say, involved in all bery and habitual exercise of faculties so splendid and so vast! Surely these are mighty and tempting things; yet somehow, I scarce know why, I feel as if they would frighten me even more than they allured; and in any case, when sharply looked into, they are seen to be merely a form of self glorification—in some sort indeed most magnificent, and yet in its essence most pitiful, as every form of selfishness must be. On the whole, I think I should be disposed to cry out, on considering the entire matter—Keep, O mightiest Poet of the earth! that large intelligence without love (for the person who does not love children cannot, I believe, truly love anything else whatever); that eye which looks into the secret of the world, yet is needs blind to the best joy of it;—keep them, and much good may you feel you have got of them in the long run! For me, I will go to tumble on the grass, through half a happy summer's day, with my little Tom and Kitty and Mary here, and commiserate over my very much indeed, most mighty, yet most hapless Shakspeare! This little game of romps I am engaged in is infinitely more to my mind than all your great Hamlets and Othellos, produced on these most sad and heartless terms. Your monopoly of your Hamlets and Othellos seems poor to me and even frightful, excluding you from only this one of the small yet priceless felicities which are showered like manna on the paths of all the sons and the daughters of men. I envy not your form of greatness, which would instantly make me, if I had it, too lonely and too wretched to live. I must needs still admire you much—having dipped in you, now and then, a little—but I pity even more than I admire. Wherefore, O Poet! depart, and disturb us at our romps no more; and O ye small and teasing chivalry!—who can never or scarcely ever tease—charge me desperately home; and let me, from this grassy mound here, as I may, repel these frightful attacks! Will the kind reader be kind enough to exert his imagination a little here. I am understood to be a French square; and a thousand bold British dragoons, in the shape of this one very small boy and these two smaller girls, are rushing devotedly against me—resolute to break me or to die. But here I must pause to explain somewhat. My Tommy, for a creature of his years (scarcely quite seven), is a boy of most bloodthirsty dispositions—his martial precocity is surprising, and his great delight is in “playing at battles.” The grandfather of the child (not yet many months gone from us in his mild and venerable age) was a soldier in his fiery youth, and fought bravely at Waterloo and in three other famous fights. The good old man—in his earlier time, I have heard, rather given to be reticent on such topics—was latterly not indisposed to recount to any good listener the story of his early campaigns; and Tommy, who was in listening indefatigable, would frequently suffice him for an audience. The old veteran and his little grandchild, whom he loved beyond anything in the world, would often go about in the garden together; and at such times—watching them at once touched and amused—we could know, by an occasional quick, energetic movement of the staff in the aged hand, when Waterloo was the theme of discourse between them. In this way, little Tom early picked up a stock of military knowledge quite unusual at his years; and he practically turns it to account by compelling little Kitty and Mary and me to play fiercely “at battles” with him. Kitty and Mary, I can see, with their small, feminine instincts, do not quite approve or understand the pastime; and at times they will plead pathetically for “housekeeping” or the like, instead. But the will of our martial hero is strong; and commonly it carries the day. Conceive of me therefore now, as a doomed French square, exposed to the terrific attacks of these murderous British dragoons. Like a gallant French square as I am, for a time I resist and stoutly hurl back my assailants. I am not going just yet to be broken. Presently, however (such is the scheme of battle laid out and sternly insisted on by my dear little Wellington in embryo), my resistance grows feebler and feebler; till at length I am fairly finished, and, lying quite quiet on the grass, am ridden over and over by the enemy. I am now conclusively broken, and, as Tommy says, “sabred to a man” (a phrase of his poor, dear, dead grandfather's), and a great yellow lily which I wear, and which is supposed to be a French eagle, is carried off in triumph by the victor, to be deposited in Chelsea Hospital with the other trophies of the fight. Of course this is all very silly and stupid; yet Tommy extremely delights in it; and Kitty and Mary, too, delight, though with preference expressed for “housekeeping,” and ordering of dinners, &c. as sometimes they hear their mamma do; and for me, I enjoy it, I verily believe, more than any of my little children, and, while the pleasant, foolish romp proceeds, have no care about anything else in the world. All vain desires and dreams are dead in me; and particularly, I do not the least want to be the author of "Hamlet" and "Othello;" or even—which might be more in my woman's way—a poetess like poor, dead, great Mrs. Browning. It is quite enough for me to find myself the happy mother of these three famous little children. For, of course, these children in their way are famous; and I know that in the families about they enjoy a much wider popularity than their poor foolish mother, as I greatly fear, is like to acquire by writing of them. How precisely this terrible, bloody play originated, I never could quite get to know. The dear old grandfather (whom I suspected) always assured us, "on the honour of an old soldier," that except indirectly by means of "his stupid old stories," as he called them, he was quite innocent in the business. Be this as it may, it is certain if the little sport had been the clever and darling invention of his own aged military brain, he would not have been more curiously proud of it. Smiling placidly, he would sit in his garden-chair in the sun, and, with a really keen soldier's interest, would superintend the operations. Occasionally, even, he would in person organise the assault; would marshal the British dragons in front of him; and, after a brief address, shout to them—in tones strangely decayed from those which of old rang out upon the roar of battle—to "charge" these rascally French. Once I remember he essayed, as he phrased it, to "sound a recall"—blowing it on his two great gaunt hands as a bugle. It was a poor, helpless, quavering, decrepit attempt; and, I am sorry to say, we all most irreverently laughed at it. The old man joined heartily in the mirth, and admitted his music a failure. It was all the fault of the bugle, he said; which was got terribly stupid, and cracked, and worthless, and quite old. Throughout the whole business, the exultation of the old man in the prowess displayed by that frightful, fiery dragoon, favourite little Tommy, his grandson (the other two troops were always, by comparison, ineffective and slightly deficient in claw), was, I think, as dear and absurd a sight as one need ever wish to see on a happy summer's day. What especially amused me in the boy—shall I mildly say, delighted me?—and positively transported grandpapa, was the fierceness of his protest, if ever it was proposed, to arrange that I, the square, should be British, and the three small dragons Frenchmen, and, in fact, cuirassiers. Rather than consent to such an ignominy, Tom would have been content to forego the "battles" altogether, and take up with some other game despised in his heart as effeminate. In vain did I urge that on the famous day of Waterloo this was really the manner of it. The point seemed of no weight whatever with him. Again, on my once inquiring of my young patriot hero, in a serious and quasi-vexed manner, why it was constantly I, the poor square, that was to suffer this terrible doom of being French, and never he, the dragoon, the creature had the insolence to reply that, as I was "only a woman," it could not much matter to me; but for him, (Heaven bless my dear, brave, obstinate little Englishman, of full six years old!) the disgrace would be quite too dreadful! For this sad impertinence to his mother, I regret to say he received from his wicked grandpapa a whole half-crown on the spot; and the old gentleman, for days after, told the story with infinite glee to every one who came about the house. When our dear old grandfather died—passing out of life quite softly—and was laid away in the earth from us for ever, there was an end as you may guess, for a time, of our "playing at battles." But soon, with the strange touching heartlessness of a child—is it, indeed, heartlessness in children; or only, alas! that in these matters, as in all else, they are so much more artless and honest than we!—the boy began to bethink him of his old sport, and was eager to commence it anew. It has seemed to me that in such cases of loss we are sometimes too apt, in what is really a sort of wilful pride of grief, to prolong artificially the regrets to which, in the mere mercy of God and of Nature—accepted as it seems to be intended—a narrower limit is assigned. By process natural and tender as that by which presently the grass grows green over the first unsightliness of the grave, comfort is appointed to steal on every stricken human heart. I venture to say it is not good in anything to put it determinedly away from us. I sorrowed truly for the old man whom we had all so loved, with such gentle sorrow as we use for those who have dropped thus utterly ripe from the tree; but I did not see, after a day or two, why I might not play with my children. And in doing so, I did not very long resist the importunities of little Tommy that his favourite "battles" should be resumed. It occurred to me that—in relation to the dear old man who had been taken from us—it was better for me and for my children to choose the one sport of all in which he could not fail to be remembered, than, as it were, to hide him away from us in some other, wherein the memory of him could have no part. It also occurred to me (will the reader excuse the remark, which is made in no spirit of levity, but with a full sense of the awfulness of the mysteries with which it brings us in contact?) that if the old man could still in the spirit, by some strange possibility, be looking at us, undoubtedly it would best please him to find us going on just as before. Still, the first time I found myself again on my little mound of grass figuring as the old French square, it was with a strange feeling of sad reluctance, and a little pang of something like self-reproach, which my reason told me was idle. The empty garden-chair still standing there, whence the quaint old "word of command" was not now to issue any more for ever, brought the tears thronging to my eyes. That one poor, helpless performance on the mimic bugle; and the glad laughing we had all had over it together, struck back upon and touched me strangely. (The French square, in a word, was on this day scarcely in a condition to resist, and quite unworthy of its ancient reputation. I broke up the little game, with which I could not proceed; and, gathering my three little creatures round me, told them that in all this eager play of "battles" they must try never to quite forget the dear old grandpapa who had loved them all so tenderly, and used many a time to play it along with them; and that even when they grew, as I hoped they might, to be old, old people, like myself, it would be very unkind and ungrateful if they did not sometimes remember him. We have done a good many battles since then, and fought them with various degrees of spirit. Still, I seem to have remarked that, since the day on which the poor, feeble French square broke suddenly thus of its own accord, and proceeded, with tears in its eyes, to deliver such a sweet, sad, serious, and solemn lecture as the occasion seemed to suggest, the fighting has been on the whole less fierce; and Tommy, in his "charge," has only at fiery intervals exhibited the full recklessness of his former valour.

I purposed, in beginning this little paper, to discourse easily concerning children in general, and their pure perfection and delightfulness; their strange, quaint wisdom and shrewdness; and the irresistible little winning ways by which they find their entrance into every heart. What I have done, I find, is to discourse wholly concerning myself and my own children—very stupidly, as many will think. And the oddity of the thing is this, that at starting I positively did not intend to write one word about these three precious, particular children. So far as I remember, it was really part of my scheme to avoid doing so; and to be quite general and impersonal in my modes of philosophising. It seems, then, I am merely a mother; and no wiser than the rest of the tribe when these three little persons are concerned, and their importance to the world at large. I would not have it supposed, however, that, loving my own children as I do, and must and ought to do, more dearly than all others, I allow them an utter monopoly of my regard. As before I had any children of my own, or dreamed of having, the love of children was quick and urgent within me, so that my chiefest joy was found in the society of the small people; so now my love of them, though no doubt fondest, as it should be, at home, by no means severely restricts itself there, but is thence diffused as from a centre. Preferring the company of my own children, I can yet, on occasion, make myself very, very happy with the dear little children of others. Wherever there is a little child, there is for me an object of interest. Dirty, ragged urchins in the gutter—sneaking and happy in their ingenious manufactures of mud—I do not often look at as I pass without some little touch of tenderness in my heart. Poor little wretched starvelings, entreating a copper of me wherewith to purchase “a soone,” are not at all unlikely to get one, and along with it a mother’s unspoken blessing. It has always seemed to me a dreadfully deep thing in mendicants to do their begging by means of these small deputies. Who that has a heart and a halfpenny can avoid the surrender of the latter to the little pitiful appeal? Political economists assure us, I know, that the effects upon society of beneficence so bestowed are frightful. As to this, I really do not know or much care to inquire. As a woman, I have two privileges, neither of which shall I easily be induced to forego. The one is, to love little children as dearly as ever I please; the other, to be utterly ignorant of the principles of Political Economy. A science which severely prohibits me from giving succour to a starving child, just about the size and age of my darling little Tommy at home, is perhaps a very deep and good science; but, as a Christian woman and mother, I do not find that it much concerns me. The “soone” beseeched for by the child is perhaps, as you say, if interpreted with due rigour, merely whisky for the wretched parent. It may be so; but am I, as dear Charles Lamb says, in his delightful essay on “Chimney Sweeps,” to “dig into the bowels of unwelcome truth in order to save a halfpenny?” The “saving of the halfpenny,” I suspect, is a considerable part of the philosophy of this great question. Political Economy at this point defines itself to my mind pretty strictly as a severe economy of coppers. Loving children thus dearly as I do—and have always done, and shall never, I trust, cease doing—it occurred to me the other day that out of my mere love of them I would try to write them a little story, with a view to their amusement and instruction. If I really could do anything to amuse and perhaps instruct them, do I not surely owe it to the little people who all my life long have been amusing and instructing me? Certainly I think I shall try. And, adopting the old approved form of fable—than which there is none yet invented more delicate in its adaptation to the needs of the childish intellect—I shall call my little tale for little people ‘The Trials of Little Kitty Blackbird: A Story of Wedded Life.’

MARIA.

THE BRITISH COLONIES.

A CONTROVERSY has recently sprung up in this country as to the propriety of emancipating, from home control at least, those parts of our Colonial Empire which have manifested sufficient capacity for self-government. Philosophers who advance the enfranchisement theory maintain, that while emancipation would be nothing more than a simple act of justice to the peoples involved, it would at the same time benefit the mother country to the extent of her yearly expenditure in support of these Colonies. The conclusion therefore is, that as emancipation would be an act of common justice as well as a proper act of economy, the great dependencies ought to be freed from the leading-strings of the old country.

There is some cunning displayed in the manner in which these propositions are combined. The sentence appears to be constructed for the purpose of acting upon the highest and the lowest tribes of motives which impel men to action, or those which address their sense of honour and their sense of interest. It is easy to do justice when the act is an immediate benefit. There is little merit, however, in such a low-bred virtue. It is the virtue which worships the gods for a twopenny loaf. But we should have no objection to the junction of these propositions, if the inferences which they naturally suggest were true. From the assertion that emancipation would be an act of justice, one might very naturally imagine that the Colonies had demanded to be released from the control of the mother country and been refused. This is not the case. We are not aware that a single British dependency in any part of the world has expressed a desire to be emancipated from parental authority. So far as can be ascertained, from the voice of the colonists themselves, we should think that the very contrary was the fact. They are perfectly content—as well they might be—with their present rational and profitable bondage. Under these circumstances, to free them—or, more properly, to cast them off—would be an entirely gratuitous proceeding, and a very questionable piece of political wisdom. Until any Colony clearly and unanimously expresses a wish to commence the game of empire on its own account, we hold it to be the true and only defensible policy of Great Britain, to maintain the present healthy relationship with her vast Colonial brood. The wing which she extends over them is a shield rather than a shadow; for, while it is a guarantee of safety, it does not intercept a single ray of light or degree of heat necessary to their vital development.

It is assumed, in addition, that to emancipate particular Colonies, would be an economical proceeding on the part of the mother country. This involves the further assumption that Britain derives from her foreign possessions no adequate return—if any at all—for the aid and protection which she extends to them. For argument’s sake, it might be admitted that to drop the Colonial protectorate would save a few immediate millions of money; but this saving would be wretched economy if ultimately our lack of authority over the liberated Colonies lost us sixty million pounds' worth of commercial advantages. Yet such losses might result under two possible conditions. In the event of our former dependencies falling a prey to some of those political sharks which exhibit so insatiable an appetite for territorial empire; or in the event of the Colonies themselves becoming narrow and protective in their commercial policy;—for, to fling the reins entirely into any Colony's somewhat unpractised hands, would certainly expose it prematurely to the vagaries of an unballasted imagination—it might start on the proverbial ride to the fiend, or allow itself to be gobbled up by some unscrupulous pirate. In either case, in addition to the bitter grief which this country would feel at such catastrophes, our material loss might be incalculable; while to the Colony itself it would probably amount to total ruin; or at least to a fatal retardation, and very likely to an emasculation of its social, commercial, and political growth. But such a result would act inimically in another important direction. It would seriously interfere with, if not entirely shut up, the stream of immigration from the mother country—that stream which acts like a healthy drain, as it flows from a densely-peopled land; and like a blessed current of irrigation, as it rolls its living waves into the unpeopled desert.

In the controversy to which we have thus referred, the leading representatives of the pro and the anti-emanicipation policy are, or were, Goldwin Smith, professor of modern history at Oxford, and Mr. Hermann Merivale, C.B. A paper by the latter gentleman, on the 'Utility of Colonization,' was read at the recent meeting of the British Association at Cambridge. In this brief but comprehensive production, the potential arguments in favour of maintaining our Colonial Empire—so long as the interests of the mother country and her different dependencies are one and the same—are set forth with much calmness and force. Population, in nearly all countries, doubles in 25 years—a rate which outstrips considerably the increase in the means of subsistence. Nature demands that the disproportion between subsistence and population should be diminished to the proper level, in order that life may be rendered bearable. This is achieved in a variety of ways; such as by increase of deaths, or by a diminution in the amount of subsistence enjoyed by each individual—which is just a falling off in the general well-being; or by diminution of births through the 'prudential' check—which is, generally speaking, by fewer and later marriages; or, lastly, by emigration. Throughout Western Europe, since the commencement of the potato disease in 1845, population has increased at a greatly diminished rate. In Germany and France, the increase of population has been quite insignificant; while in the United Kingdom of Great Britain the increase since 1841 has been also small. Population in Ireland has greatly diminished; and in Scotland there has been very little advance. Any increase has been in England and Wales. During the last decennium, the natural increase in the population of this country has been under ten per cent.; that of France something under four per cent. Yet during that period, England and Wales have sent out immense numbers of emigrants; and France none at all—that is, her trifling loss of population by emigration is fully balanced by accessions from without. One would be apt to imagine, since there is no emigration in France, and only four per cent. of increase in population during a whole decennium, that there must be a variety of adverse causes preventing that increase. Yet, curiously enough, the material comfort of the French people is equal to that of our own; the mortality in France exhibits a tendency to diminish; while the number of marriages appears to be unaffected either way—they remain singularly stationary. To account for the scarcely perceptible rate of advance in the French population, we are shut up to the conclusion that it must spring from the decreased fertility of marriages. It follows that, while the well-being of the people in England and France is nearly equal, and does not diminish if it does not increase—it results from strikingly different causes. To secure general comfort, by contracting later marriages and having fewer children, is not a beautiful, and cannot be a healthy, mode of life. 'The English,' says Mr. Merivale, 'can enjoy the same result without putting the same restraint on nature; and may marry almost as early as their forefathers did, although they live much longer. This they owe in great measure, though not wholly, to an established emigration, which has become part of the institutions of the country, and which makes provision for nearly one child in six.' Opinions will, of course, differ regarding the French method of maintaining the rational well-being, by sacrificing a portion of the reproductive powers of their people. Few, however, will hesitate to yield the palm to that nation which can escape so unnatural a sacrifice without losing a particle of happiness. Britain undoubtedly occupies that remarkable position; and it is principally due to the 'enormous advantage of continuous and therefore reliable emigration as an outlet.'

The full value of our splendid Colonies—Canada, Australia, New-Zealand, and the rest—will appear in the light of these facts. It is maintained, we are aware, that it is not necessary we should retain large dependencies, at great expense, simply that they may remain open fields for our surplus population. Under certain conditions, it would certainly not be necessary. For many years, the United States of America were the land of promise to the vast European overflow of population. But 'the great receptacle of the emigrants of the world, the great refuge of the poor, the great home of the homeless, the great field for the adventurous, is closed;' and when it may be opened again is beyond the ken of mortal prophet. At present, neither Federal nor Confederate America is likely to attract the emigrant. The superb natural advantages of the country remain the same, but there is no security. It has assumed an unfriendly attitude to the whole world, and is a standing example of how soon a country, once the Paradise of Paddies as of other wanderers, may become the most unprofitable field for emigrants and colonists.

We should not at any time advise the severance of our political relationship with any of our Colonies; but at the present moment we should especially refrain from such unwise advocacy. More than ever are they necessary to us; and perhaps more than ever are we necessary to them. If America is at present shut to the great European surplusses, Canada, Australia, and New-Zealand are quite qualified to take the whole of them. Doubtless, copious streams will flow to those regions; and we regard it as a supreme advantage that the mother country of all these magnificent lands is one from whose protectorate nothing can emerge but the blessings of freedom, knowledge, and the model of a stable government. The whole discussion may be summed up in the following words:—“Under a system of free trade, it would be immaterial how soon a colony shook off the dominion of the mother country (or, rather, the mother country would gain through a reduction of expenditure), if the emancipated colony remained equally prosperous and equally friendly. But if it did not; if its advance was checked by internal insecurity; if it became actuated by feelings of hostility; if it fell under the dominion of, or into connection with, foreign States; if it adopted hostile tariffs or opposed the admission of our emigrants, then we should find that the loss of the colony was the loss of an economical advantage.”

To these words we can add nothing but the solemn hope that Britain and her Colonies may remain bound to each other by ties both of interest and gratitude; and that they may never sever themselves from each other, except for the imperial and sacred purposes of freedom.

M. D.

AUNT RACHEL'S STORY (Continued).

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER V.

“Shortly after my arrival at Glenvoirinen, I received a letter from home, enclosing one from Robert Seymour. He was then in Rome. Instead of responding to his wish, that I were with him to enjoy the magnificent works of art by which he was surrounded, my gaze turned from his letter to the surrounding scene, whose painter was Nature; and I envied not Robert Seymour amidst the ruinous grandeur of Rome. The conclusion of his epistle interested me more than the beginning. In it he mentioned his having frequently encountered the two sons of the Chevalier de St. George during their stay in Rome. How my heart beat while reading of Prince Charles Edward!

“The eldest of the Stuarts,” he wrote, “is a noble-looking youth—tall and fair; has a splendid carriage; and seems possessed of all the attributes requisite to endear a sovereign to his people. Often have I thought, while gazing on his striking countenance, how much you would have admired him; and felt almost glad you were not here. He makes so many Roman ladies captive with his fascinating manners, that you might have proved faithful to one who is counting the hours until he can break his chains, and set sail for England.”

“Poor Robert! Lady Macdonald was enchanted to hear such accounts of her darling hero; and made me read his description until she had it indelibly imprinted on her memory.

“On the same day, after dinner, my aunt called for a bumper of claret. Raising the glass in her hand, she gave forth, with suitable solemnity, the loyal toast, “His Majesty the King!” and then passed it over a decanter of water standing near her. “Rachel,” she said, smiling at my bewildered look; “do you the same.”

“I obeyed mechanically.

“Are you aware of what you have done?”

“No.”

“You have drank the health of the king who is —” here she again passed her glass over the decanter. “Do you understand now?”

“O yes!” I replied, laughing. “We have been toasting King James, who is at present over the water.”

“Quite right, my dear. That is the way in which we Jacobites toast our absent sovereign. But let us not forget Highland honours.”

“So saying, my aunt threw her glass into the fire. I followed her example with such alacrity as fully testified my loyalty to the exiled Stuarts. Lady Macdonald seemed delighted with my demonstration in favour of King James; and expressed the delight she should have in introducing me to him should he return to Scotland.

“Ah, my dear!” she went on, “had you only stayed with me in the year ‘16—that is, supposing you had been alive—how enchanted you would have been with our sovereign’s affability! I mentioned to you having met with him at Grandtully. Well, a fine ball was given there in his honour. According to the express desire of Sir James Stuart, the gentlemen came attired in Highland costume; while the ladies were arrayed in white—each wearing a tartan scarf over her left shoulder, and a white rose in her hair, out of compliment to the royal guest. It was a lovely sight to behold so many of the young and beautiful collected round their monarch. The King was deeply affected when informed by Sir James that even the ladies were ready to die in his cause.”

“Would we were on the throne!” he replied, with emotion. “Not that we wish to possess it by the shedding of such noble blood as flows in the veins of those here assembled, but that we might have it in our power to recompense those loyal subjects who have declared themselves so attached to our person. And, should that happy day arrive when James may with truth style himself the father of his people; then shall the old halls of Holyrood resound with gay festivity, and a grateful King confess how much he owes to the faithful few who remained firm and true in his darkest hours of adversity.”

“We knelt and kissed his hands as he finished speaking; and all present felt that to die for such a monarch would be an enviable fate. Ah! these were the days, Rachel!”

“Now aunt,” I said, “it is too provoking to tell me of such things, when you know how I long to see a similar scene, and the little probability that exists of my desire being gratified.”

“Well, well, my dear; I shall not dwell longer on so exciting a theme. But how well you yourself would look in a white dress and tartan scarf! Now, Rachel, do gratify me in one thing. Go to Macgregor, and tell her to bring me the dress I wore at Grandtully in the year ‘16—thirty years ago. Just think of that!”

“In compliance with my aunt’s wishes, I left the room; and shortly returned, followed by Macgregor bearing an amplitude of lace, white feathers, &c. Lady Macdonald’s eyes beamed with delight. Taking me by the hand, she said, “Now, you must don the dress I wore in my gay days; and we shall see whether Nature intended you for an English or Scotch girl. No one save a genuine Scotch-woman knows how to wear a tartan scarf: it must fall off the shoulder with an easy grace never likely to be acquired by a foreigner.”

“In no small degree amused with my aunt’s whim of transforming me into a fashionable lady of thirty years back, I placed myself in Macgregor’s hands. In the lapse of a few minutes, Lady Macdonald declared my dress perfect; and protested I was in every respect worthy of being considered a daughter of Caledonia.

“Is she not, Macgregor?”—this to her maid, who stood a little apart, surveying me approvingly.

“Deed, ma’am, she is. I have all along been wondering who it was Miss Sackville reminded me of; and now that I see her dressed, I remember it is the portrait of Lady Lovat which hangs in the hall at Castle Frazer.”

“She certainly is not unlike her,” observed my aunt in reply. "Rachel," she said, laughing, "you must esteem that a great compliment. Lady Lovat was counted one of the most beautiful women of her time. Walk towards the foot of the room, in order that we may have a full view of your dress. Now, return."

"As I once more approached my aunt's chair, she took me by the hand, and said, solemnly, "You are undoubtedly very handsome, my child; but be not vain. Loveliness, like our other possessions, is the gift of God; therefore we should only value it as such." After a moment's silence, she observed, "What would Robert Seymour say could he see you thus?"

"I turned pale, and bit my lips.

"Lady Macdonald eyed me keenly. "I am sure he would admire you extremely," she said.

"Perhaps he might," I replied, coldly. "In the meanwhile, aunt, allow me to have another look at the miniatures."

"She opened the casket. I took up the likeness of Prince Charles Edward. Long I gazed on his bewitching countenance.

"Ah, Rachel!" said my aunt, sighing, "had you been a princess, you might have been our future queen."

"Not being a princess, I shut the miniature hastily, and turned pettishly away. While doing so, my eyes encountered my own figure in a full-length mirror which graced the opposite wall. Then I, too, sighed, and murmured inly, "Had I been a princess!"

"After denuding me of my borrowed plumes, Macgregor withdrew; and my aunt, excited by remembrance of the brilliant past, launched forth into a lengthened history of the Macdonalds, and their claim to be descended from royalty. Then her subject embraced a wider range. How her eyes flashed as she described the daring exploits of her ancestors, and glistened with tears while relating some touching incident of Highland devotion! The shades of night lent a yet deeper gloom to the apartment in which we were seated; and, as the face of each cavalier waxed dim and shadowy, and the distant corners of the room became lost in obscurity, I abandoned myself to a dreamy reverie, in which the different distinguished personages my aunt brought forward in her stories played an active part. Gradually, a pleasing languor stole over my senses; the gloom deepened and deepened; the voice of the narrator became more vague and indistinct, until at length it seemed but the echo of my own thoughts.

"I was speedily aroused by the entrance of a servant, who came to apprise Lady Macdonald it was long past her usual time for retiring. Surprised at the intelligence, my aunt—who was regularity itself in her domestic arrangements—bade me a hasty good-night; and withdrew to her sleeping apartment. I also retired to mine. Not feeling inclined, however, to slumber, I took out my diary, to make my daily entries ere abandoning myself to repose.

"How time flies when one is happy! I fancied barely three weeks had elapsed since my arrival in Scotland; and, behold, rather more than four had glided away! Unwilling to indulge in melancholy reflections, I laid the diary aside, and withdrew to my couch. But I was too excited to sleep. The wildest fancies coursed through my brain. Now I was at Grandtully in company with my aunt, who introduced me to the Chevalier de St. George; anon a princess, receiving an offer of marriage from Charles Edward. At length I slept; and, strange to say, was again visited by the singular dream I had formerly in connection with Glenvoirnen. Once more

I was on the terrace; the old house frowned darkly before me; lofty pines swayed to and fro in the breeze. Again I extended my hands in ecstasy, and implored to know the name of a spot so fair; but this time, in answer to my inquiry, a young man came forth from amidst the pine trees, and advanced towards me. I recognised him at a glance. It was Prince Charles who stood before me. He was arrayed in the Highland costume; his blue bonnet surmounted by a white cockade. Gazing in my face long and sadly, he said, "Then Miss Sackville is not an enemy to the Stuart cause?" Methought I replied, "No, your Royal Highness. Willingly would I die could my death restore you to the throne of your ancestors." He smiled a melancholy smile. "Then we enlist you on our side." So saying, he detached the white cockade from his bonnet, and fastened it on my dress. "Oh!" cried I, in a burst of enthusiasm, "do not abandon all thoughts of regaining your crown. Come to the Highlands; throw yourself on the loyalty of your faithful Jacobites in the north; and the white rose shall soon be the victorious emblem of a king." Smiling, he waved his hand towards the lake; which instantly changed into a stormy sea, whereon I beheld a ship tossed to and fro by the billows; while a number of young men, likewise arrayed in tartan, stood on the shore, watching with eager eyes the movements of the vessel as it strove to make head against the wind. I turned towards the Prince. His eyes were fastened on a magnificent eagle which followed in the track of the ship. Once more he smiled, and pointed towards the royal bird, Here I awoke. So real appeared the scene, that I could scarcely bring myself to believe that it had been merely the creation of my over excited fancy.

CHAPTER VI.

"This repetition of my dream perplexed me not a little; and I grew feverish while endeavouring to arrive at its meaning. Vain were my efforts to court repose. At length, wearied out by my incessant tossings and vivid imaginings, I quitted my couch, and took a few turns up and down the room, in order to cool the fever of my blood.

"While promenading through the chamber, the clock in the adjoining apartment struck one. I opened my door. The moonbeams were streaming through a window into the passage, rendering it almost as light as though the sun were shining. Seized with an irresistible desire to have a glimpse of Loch-Oich, I stole noiselessly along the gallery, and entered the unoccupied chamber. Wrapping a warm cloak around my shoulders, I gently opened the casement and gazed forth, enraptured with the almost unearthly beauty of the scene. The heavenly host begemmed the sky—each glittering star seeming a guardian spirit appointed to keep watch over the silent earth; while the queen of night threw her silver mantle over mountain, lake, and terrace. Such stillness prevailed, it seemed as if Nature were reposing in peaceful security beneath the protecting care of that Almighty Power who neither slumbers nor sleeps.

"Suddenly a sound broke in upon the silence of early morn. It was the plashing of oars. Looking towards the lake, to my amazement I beheld a skiff shooting swiftly through the water. As it touched the shore, the sole occupant—a young man arrayed in the national costume—leaped lightly out, and dragged the boat a little way up on the beach. He then crossed the field which separated Glenvoirnen from the lake, opened a little gate, and admeed along the terrace, until he stood directly beneath my window. My heart throbbed wildly with apprehension. Who could the intruder be? He had not the appearance of a robber. Yet, to my astonishment, the stranger commenced singing, in a low tone, the following song. The melody was wild and plaintive; but the words—O Emily! I could weep when I recall them to remembrance. They ran as follows:—

"Over the sea! over the sea!
Was ye wha's coming now over the sea?
Oh, wha should it be but all Scotland's heir?
The lad wi' the blue een and lang yellow hair—
The pride o' the Highlands. Yes, yes; it is he.
Our Charlie is speeding now over the sea!"

Just at the foot o' the mighty Ben-Nevis;
High, high o'er my head sang a bonnie sweet mavis;
In like blithe note there was aye the same strain;
When I list to the lark, I but heard it again:—
Over the sea! over the sea!
Our Charlie is speeding now over the sea!"

The singer paused, as the window below mine was thrown open; and a voice, which I recognised to be that of my aunt, exclaimed, "Is that you, Donald?"

The young man held up his finger by way of caution; and a long conversation in Gaelic ensued. Of course I did not understand what was said, but the song sufficed to enlighten me as to the cause of this untimely visit. My aunt had been prophetic. Prince Charles was now on the way in the course of a few days he would be in the Highlands—perhaps in Glenvoirnen! How my heart throbbed at the idea of seeing him who had so long been the subject of my waking dreams! What excitement would be kindled in Scotland! Then I should indeed behold a prince, if it did not surpass, the wildest dream I ever dared to conceive—when nobles and chiefs assembled to welcome a Stuart in the land of his forefathers. In the meantime, the conversation between my aunt and the stranger had been brought to a close; and her boat was already rowing in the silver track of the seabreams. For more than an hour I remained at the window, reflecting on what had occurred, and the singular circumstance of my dream being so speedily fulfilled. Now it was explained. The ship I had seen was the one even now bearing the Prince to the Scottish shores; while the boat was emblematical of the royal passenger. Much I wondered how my aunt would act towards me on this occasion. Would she at once inform me of the visit she had received; or preserve it a secret until the young Chevalier landed in the Highlands? One thing I resolved upon, that was to conceal my knowledge of what was going on until my aunt herself introduced the subject.

Having adopted this resolution, I returned to my chamber. For a considerable length of time I lay awake, turning in my mind the singular events likely to occur during my residence in the Highlands, and the influence of the unseen Prince already exercised over my ardent imagination. Worn out by excitement, I at length fell asleep, while murmuring the words,—

"Over the sea! over the sea!
Our Charlie is speeding now over the sea!"

On entering the sitting-room on the following morning, I found my aunt pacing up and down with disordered steps. Her greeting was even kinder than usual; but she made not the slightest allusion to her early visitor. Agreeably to my resolution, I also refrained from entering upon that topic. Our breakfast was discussed in almost total silence. The secret each harboured in her breast, produced an unnatural degree of constraint, and rendered it a difficult matter for either to support anything like conversation. Scarcely had we finished our repast, ere my aunt's little carriage drove up to the door. I looked surprised, but did not speak. Lady Macdonald silently quitted the room.

On her return, she kissed me affectionately; and said, hurriedly, "The receipt of some unexpected intelligence rendered a visit to Mrs. Munro necessary," but that she would soon be back.

Aunt having previously informed me that Mrs. Munro was, like herself, a staunch Jacobite, I instantly conjectured that this visit to her was in consequence of the intelligence communicated by the stranger. In the course of a few hours she returned, in high spirits—her colour was brilliant, and her eyes shone like diamonds. She informed me that her friend had an exceedingly handsome son, who was very desirous of making my acquaintance; and also, that his mother had kindly invited me to Glendunin. Saying which, she patted me on the head—remarking that I was a good girl, and that she hoped my duller days in the Highlands were past. Then looking at me earnestly, she sighed.

Still, not one word in connection with the subject I knew to be engrossing her thoughts. This apparent want of confidence did not wound my feelings. I felt assured she had some hidden reason for her reserve.

Things continued pretty much as usual at Glenvoirnen. Nothing indicated that momentous events were at hand. Still, I observed a decided change in my aunt's manner. At times she seemed excited and irritable; at other times, hopeful and joyous. Strange to say, since that eventful morning she ceased mentioning the Stuards; but I frequently found her either stationed before the portrait of the Chevalier de St. George, or contemplating the miniature of Prince Charles Edward. When thus detected, she would start like some guilty thing, and bustle out of the room without allowing me time to obtain another look of the hidden treasure.

Curious to learn whether the young Highlander would repeat his visit nightly, I stationed myself at the window overlooking the lake. But he came not. And I wondered exceedingly how my aunt managed to procure information regarding the Prince's movements. That she did derive intelligence of his proceedings, I was fully aware; and at length concluded she had some messenger who apprised her of what was taking place.

It was now the evening of the 25th of July. Throughout the day, Lady Macdonald appeared more than usually disturbed in her thoughts. She seldom addressed me; and frequently walked up and down the room as though motion were necessary to tranquillise her mind. On the approach of night, she became more restless; and often paused in her walk to gaze forth from the window. Feeling somewhat dejected—in consequence of having that day received another long letter from Robert Seymour, in which he expressed strong hopes of prevailing with his father to permit his speedy return—I withdrew to my chamber, and sought to drown anxiety regarding the future in the perusal of my favourite history.

I had not been seated long, when rapid footsteps ascended the stair. Soon my room door flew open, and my aunt burst in. "Rachel! Rachel!" she cried; "follow me."

I stared in amazement. The intense excitement under which she laboured seemed to have taken twelve years from her age. Her figure was erect, her eyes flashed with joy—not anger, and a look of proud triumph pervaded her aspect.

“Come! come!” she repeated, impatiently.

“Recovering from my astonishment, I followed her into the room I so frequently visited unknown to her. On reaching the window, she seized my hand—every nerve of hers was quivering—and, pointing to a spiral flame which at that instant shot up into the air from the summit of a distant mountain, exclaimed, in a voice broken with agitation, “Rachel! he is come!” and sank, weeping on my shoulder.

“Oh, what wild tumult these simple words occasioned in my breast! Again the signal-fire shot through the air. Lady Macdonald fell on her knees. I knelt beside her; and together we prayed that the Almighty would bless and prosper King James the Third.

“O Rachel!” sobbed forth my aunt, “my prayer has been heard. God has graciously permitted me to remain on earth to welcome the son of my King to his dominions; and when once my aged eyes have beheld him, then I can indeed depart in peace.”

“The sound of oars upon the lake attracted our attention.

“Ha! This will be Donald Munro,” said my aunt, smiling through her tears. “He it was who first informed me that the Prince was on his way to Scotland. Although advised of his intention some weeks ago, I preferred keeping you in ignorance, Rachel, lest something should occur to prevent his landing.”

“But I was not ignorant, dear aunt. I chanced to be an unseen witness of your interview with Mr. Munro; and his song enlightened me as to the cause of his early visit.”

“And pray, miss, what brought you from your chamber at that untimely hour? O fie! Rachel! To what will your love of the beautiful lead you? And you never told me you had learned my secret! Well, well; another time I shall hear what you have to say in your defence. In the meantime, here comes Donald.”

“The young Highlander came quickly along the terrace. When arrived opposite our window, he gave utterance to a low whistle, and commenced singing the following song:—

“THE BONNIE WHITE ROSE.

Oh! dear are our Highlands, our mountains, and glens,
Wi’ their beauty that Nature bestows;
And dear is the thistle that proudly there waves;
But dearer ‘The bonnie white rose!’

There cam’ to the Highlands a winsome young lad,
Wha’se garb was the plaid, kilt, and hose;
And he wore at the side o’ his bonnet o’ blue,
For emblem, ‘The bonnie white rose!’

The clans round him gather’d in battle array,
And swore to regard all as foes
Wha’ wadna adhere to their rightfu’ young king,
Wha’se emblem’s ‘The bonnie white rose!’

Oh! wha’ wadna wish a’ success to his cause?
And wha’ wad his rights e’er oppose?
Here’s a health to our brave and gallant young king,
Wha’se emblem’s ‘The bonnie white rose!’”

“Aunt could no longer restrain her enthusiasm. Waving her handkerchief out of the window, she exclaimed, “God bless King James! and stir up the hearts of his faithful subjects to fight and die in his cause!” She then invited Mr. Munro to enter. He hesitated, on account of the unreasonable hour; but my aunt would take no refusal. And, at her command, the gate flew open to admit the welcome visitor.

(To be continued.)

HANGERS-ON.

ON PUBLIC-HOUSE HANGERS-ON.

As I take down my hat, and sally out this bright July morning, I have a very indefinite notion of where my pilgrimage may lead to; and this feeling, I confess, imparts a delightful sense of independence to my whole being. I am rather inclined to feel grateful to despot States in general for the control they exercise over their subjects; for occasionally pulling up and snubbing editor of papers, who are inclined, in a very faint way, to imitate the glorious independence of journalism in my favourite country; and for clapping in irons, starving, dungeon-moating, and torturing daring subjects who may state their conviction that in general things are not as they should be—that the iron heel of the despot is on the neck of themselves and their countrymen—that it is eating into the flesh—and that it is an insult on common sense to suppose they can stand it much longer.

I confess that time was, three or four years ago, when I myself began to look with a jealous eye on my Government; and edged gradually to the opinion that there was a screw loose somewhere; that the aristocracy were in the way, and inclined to try the iron heel on myself and contemporaries—notably in the case of the game law. I could not see what right they had to prevent me taking down my double-barrelled gun, and firing away at the birds of the air and a few of the beasts of the field, if I felt disposed to amuse myself in that way. They were given by God for man in general, not for pampered scions of ancient feudal lords, who had had their day. (I gloated on this—“had their day.”) I also felt grieved that I should have to give part of my hard-won money for the support of offices and sinecures which were of no use to me, or to my country. I felt deeply grieved at this; so grieved that I became a prominent member of various seedy exchanges, which were held in the parks, on debatable ground—where no police authority could touch us—which the system of republican government was vehemently and truculently discussed. I confess I was gradually brought to this by my cousins on the other side of the Atlantic. I was continually being badgered and baited by the cousins about the miserable benefits which I enjoyed, at the glorious institutions which it was the privilege of them to enjoy who had the felicity of living on the other side of the Atlantic. I looked with contempt at a few of the public buildings here; and felt convinced that American cities must have a very imposing appearance, from the multitudinous institutions which are planted thick all that country. I contrasted their freedom from taxes with their boundless prairies, where any one who could hand a gun could shoot at and kill the game to their heart’s content—with my own stinted liberty. I felt that the crown of England was a very great many removes from my head; but that I had a chance, if I crossed the water of one day ruling a much larger, finer, and more milk-and-honey flowing country than ten times ten Great Britain and Ireland. Recent events in the glorious country had altered my opinion, however. I recant all I said about my country; and, as I walk forth this morning, the glorious old refrain rolls clearly from my throat,

“Britons never, never, never shall be slaves!”

Like every Englishman, I am proud of my country, but, like some Englishmen, I am ashamed of a few of the types of my countrymen. For instance, I am not proud of that artisan countryman of mine who, after he has one hour's repairing at my town or country house—for which he is paid by his master, and for which I pay my master liberally—stands fawning and touching his cap in the lobby, while the maid-servant taps at the parlour door, and informs her mistress that the man (?) has finished the job, and is waiting for his beer-money allowance. I am not stingy, and I am not one of those who would rob a poor man of his beer; but this is not a poor man—he is a well-dressed, industrious, and, I have no doubt, well-paid artisan. Why should he demean himself before my wife, servant, and visitors, by asking 'beer-money?' I don't respect that man. I do not say that this is a universal custom among my artisan countrymen; but it is pretty general.

If there is one class of people above any other whom I am inclined to dislike, that class is the great world of hanger-on. So much so, that in an amateur way I become, this bright sunshiny day, a hanger-on. (This I do in order that, as far as in my power, I may faithfully depict the character—in the manner of actors throwing off their own personality and identifying themselves with the parts they are to play.) I don't refer to those hangers-on of fashionable society—of the 'upper ten thousand'—because they more properly come under the great class of 'nobles,' and as such I disclaim them.

As I lounge against the brass-ribbed door of my favourite 'public' (not the swinging part of the door), my hands deep in my pockets, my cap far over my eyes, and the stifling July sun incrusting the dirt on my skin, imparting a delicious sense of warmth to my whole being, I am lost in amazement. If it were not too much to wish, I would turn round and regard everything about the 'Duke of Dishwater Arms,' against which I am leaning, with profound awe. What a fearful amount of work there must have been expended in its erection! First, in laying the foundation. What a destiny to have to shovel earth; then drag and tug at refractory horses; and, merciful Fates! even above behind or assist by occasionally pulling the team! It makes me sick to think of all the various degrees of labour which have been necessary in the erection of this building against which I am leaning, and to which I am attached in the capacity of hanger-on.

I am dirty—I know it. My attire is shameful; I seldom change my clothes—it costs trouble. I hate trouble. The 'Duke of Dishwater Arms' is at the corner of two great west-end thoroughfares. As I lean against the door, I am sensible that thousands of well-dressed, industrious people pass my way, and regard me with looks of disgust. Half-dreamily, I sometimes hear the remarks about me made by the washed and well-dressed portion of the community. I am, in their opinion, a 'hulking, lazy dog, who ought to be whipped;' a 'shameful blot on the great patchwork of human industry;' 'a lazaron;' 'a living blot standing out in black relief against the white page of general progress.' Very neat figures of speech, truly! And all because of that which is my own prerogative as an Englishman—independence of action. Never mind, it pleases them and don't hurt me; and even if it did, I have my revenge. They must work—sweat. I don't. I won't sweat by the sweat of my brow. They have a saying that it is prudent to make hay while the sun shines. I sleep in the lounge when the sun shines; and when the sun, who is my only friend, ceases to shine, I commence to 'hang-on.' From the crown of my head to the sole of my foot, I am a compound of mouldiness, pockets—or rather receptacles for articles—and glaze. So prominent is the latter feature in my dress, and even in my appearance, that I cannot flatter myself I have said rather a neat thing (for a hanger-on) when I compare my general appearance to a snail. The analogy is palpably obvious. A smile is also part of my make-up in my character of hanger-on. This I share in common with haberdashers and ballet-girls. We have all a stereotyped smile on our countenances. But although all three denominations—viz. hangers-on, haberdashers, and ballet-girls—find a bland smile necessary to success in life, still I claim for my smile a more prominent character with regard to sycophancy. Mark my smile! The sun has disappeared. The chill of the evening has begun to set in. I begin to feel cold. I will crawl into the bar of the 'Duke of Dishwater Arms,' for it is warm there; and the red-cheeked, black-ringed barmaid has lit the gas, and is now showing off her artificial charms to more advantage than in the garish light of day. My motion into the bar is snail-like. I first look timidly in, then withdraw, and look in again. The barmaid, Peggy, has caught my timid look; our eyes meet; I smile, and if ever a smile expressed humble admiration of the appearance, position, and importance of the person to whom the smile is directed, it is the smile which I have just made to Peggy the barmaid. If ever there was a smile which plainly said, with reference to the smiler, 'I have dared to smile in your august presence; but your own acute perception will tell you plainer than words that, in smiling, I have only intimated my transcendent admiration of yourself in all your various parts and qualities, and of my own debased unworthiness to stand in your presence.' In fact, my smile is the smile which the fawning vizier of the Great Mogul would make to his gracious master, were that potentate in good enough humour to warrant the familiarity.

Mark the effect of my smile! It is blandly reciprocated by Peggy the barmaid; which encourages me to enter. I fumble about my receptacle for articles. In which of them did I put my pipe? I smile in bewilderment. I remember—in the lining of my cap. I produce a diminutive, dirty, highly-coloured clay pipe, and commence to smoke—fixing my eyes modestly on vacancy; and trying to look as if I had been all day after a job, which I was unsuccessful in obtaining, and was now patiently resigned to fate, and the chances of a situation to assist in demolishing a range of old buildings, which I am hopefully inclined to think will turn up to-morrow. Of course, Peggy the head barmaid knows better than this, as do all the barmaids and pot-boys; but I have so smiled and fawned into their good graces, that they could not live without my daily worship and homage. There is a party of 'young bloods' at the bar, who are drinking brandy and sherry, at the expense of one particular 'young blood,' who is great in oaths, jewellery, and compliments to Peggy. I attempt to catch his eye, by edging closer and in front of him; and appear to be in transports of respectful delight at his brilliant conversational powers. My face beams with admiration; and the expression is, that although I have wanted food for three days, still, I would cheerfully prefer the feast of reason which I am now enjoying to the certainty of victuals for a fortnight—with pudding and cheese after dinner secured. I do not succeed in catching his eye; and therefore occasionally put in, accompanied with a timid clapping of the hands, 'Ah! good again!' 'Had him there!' 'True; true;' 'Can't be denied;' 'Ave remarked it myself.' In consequence of this, I am not long in catching his ear and eye; and now I flatter myself that my whole expression, as regards beaming admiration and sycophancy, is inimitable; and leaves

Mr. Toole as Abinadab Sleek alight in the shade. He has seen me, and swallowed the bait. I affect, after a moment, to be awed into blank silence at the dignity of his appearance; but gradually allow my feelings of admiration at his wit to overpower me. He observes this—(I may note here that a modified edition of the same is gone through before his face by one or two of his well-dressed companions, who also affect to be in ecstasies at his brilliant repartee)—and, just before he gives an order for more drink, he patronisingly addresses me, 'Hullo, Meal-and-Water! you look cold; what'll you have to drink?'

I modestly give him to understand that, having tasted nothing in the shape of food or drink for the last three days, I am humbly of opinion that 'two penn'orth of gin, 'ot, with a morsel of Cayenne pepper,' would, in conjunction with a small piece of 'baccy which I am fortunate enough to possess (showing quarter of an inch of mouldy tobacco), assist to support exhausted nature for other three days; by which time I expect to obtain employment in a brick-field—definite hopes having been held out to me by the manager, whom I saved from a watery grave about fifteen years ago.

'Two penn'orth of gin and water, be blow'd! my patron exclaims. 'Wanted food for three days! Here, Peggy, bring six penn'orth of rum, hot, for this skeleton. Here, Meal-and-Water! what'll you have to eat? Come, put a name to it, man!'

I again humbly suggest that, if he would purchase for me two sea-biscuits, I should eat one at present; and keep the other for my sustenance till the job I expected from the party whose life I saved from a watery grave fifteen years ago would turn up.

'Nonsense, man! don't be a fool! Biscuits! Here, Peggy, frizzle a steak also; and serve it quickly. Here's your rum, Mealy! drink it up—it'll do you good. Don't be frightened, man!'

I am overawed by the sight of rum; and in drinking mention, as showing the healthy state of the British constitution in the year of grace sixty-two, the cheering fact of which I am a witness—that the proudest aristocracy in the land do not disdain to enter hostilities, seek out and relieve distress personally, in preference to leaving the task to pampered menials.

This speech is intended for the whole company—two or three of the members of which having been inclined to look at me incredulously, and on their friend in the light of a party artfully taken in. They now look at each other, whisper, 'Aristocrats, by Jove! 'Pon honour, this is really a deserving fellow.'

In taking a second sip, I humbly hope they will pardon my ignorance of their proper titles; and mention as a fact, the recollection of which overpowers my feelings, and may not be unacceptable to their lordships as a piece of general intelligence, that 'I have seen better days.' The effect of this information is heightened by four tears, which fall into my glass; and which I imbibe with the third drain. The information is highly successful; and before the party has left the bar, a small subscription is collected, and I am richer by ten shillings. The party whose life I saved from a watery grave fifteen years ago is voted an 'ungrateful hound,' 'a beast,' 'one who ought to be kicked;' and I tremble in case his address is asked by any of the company for that purpose.

It is now nine o'clock. Will the kind reader follow me into the bar-parlour? We shall see Mr. Bibson—no unimportant person, when I inform the kind reader that on an average he represents at least three shillings and sixpence a-week and suppers in my favour. Mr. Bibson is head-waiter of the Duke of Diahwater Arms.

When I enter the parlour, I find Mr. Bibson combing his whiskers at the mirror above the mantelpiece, and running his hand through his fine black curly hair. Mr. Bibson is 'a fine figure of a man.' There is no company in the room—the company generally arrives at about ten o'clock. Mr. Bibson sees me timidly entering. I take off my cap when I approach Mr. Bibson, and touch my brow with my forefinger. Mr. Bibson runs his hand through his fine head of hair, and moves gracefully round on his heel like a pivot. Mr. Bibson slips his white napkin under his waistcoat, endangering the breast of his shirt, leans rather more on the left leg, forming a bow with the right, takes his coat-tails in his arms, elevates his head, and gives me a gracious half-nod.

'Ha, Greasy!' says Bibson, 'is that you? How are you Greasy?' Mr. Bibson looks as if he were the Duke of Diahwater himself, or at the very least the owner of extensive property in the neighbourhood, and had just looked in to have a slight refreshment before proceeding home to dress for dinner.

I touch my brow with my forefinger again, then suddenly start back, and assuming a look of mingled admiration and entreaty, implore him to excuse the great liberty. 'But would Mr. Bibson keep that attitude for a few minutes longer?'

Mr. Bibson smiles, as if he were humouring the liberty of an attached and faithful dependant; and, running his finger through his hair once more, half nods again.

This almost affects me to tears. I gaze with sorrow and beaming admiration in my face.

'Mr. Bibson,' I say, dashing away a tear, 'you didn't hought to do it. You may have been wronged by those who professed to be friends; or, I will say, blighted affection—a seared heart. But what will your aristocratic and titled mother, and true friends say? Oh! I implore you return to your proper station, your true spear. You will never deceive me, my lord. I can't, and I will not care for Mr. Bibson. This is a terrible revenge on your friends for whatever crosses you may have suffered at their hands. Renouncing them; your own station; and condescending to take orders—from those a thousand miles beneath you in rank—for 'arf and 'arf, brandy 'ot, and screws;—makes my heart bleed; it does indeed!' I dash away another tear.

Mr. Bibson sighs, looks pensively for a moment, as he were sadly reviewing his former career of fashion and aristocratic pleasure; but immediately closes his lips firmly, as if no power in heaven or earth would prevail him from carrying out his great revenge, by keeping for a considerable time at least, his assumed position of head-waiter.

'Here, Greasy!' he says pathetically, and, in the absence of the moment, pulling out his napkin and wiping his eyes, 'Here, Greasy! is 'arf-a-crown; but swear not to reveal to a living person your suspicions of my rank. I have reasons, Greasy. Take it, Greasy. You are a faithful fellow—take it. Come to-night, Greasy, to my bed-room, and 'ave a bit of supper. I am not proud now, Greasy. I will have revenge. God bless you Greasy!'

Mr. Bibson bolts out, unable to stand it any longer. Mr. Bibson's mother is a respectable washerwoman, as the sole support of his father, who is always in a chronic state of delirium tremens, and unable to work. Mr. Bibson's hobby is the 'be-mond,' and a distinguished genio. I put the latter in his head long ago by hints like the present. It pays me.

Occasionally, in the course of the evening, I adjourn to the 'tap'; and generally manage, by a different process, to get a few coppers from the Irish labourers, and other poor people who take their half-pint of porter, and look at the Star or Telegraph by the fire. I have also a small allowance from the pot-boy, for listening to his stories about his master's imbecility and tyranny; and his own intention of 'being blow'd if he stand it hany longer!' This drapery of the master, and determination of the pot-boy not to 'stand it hany longer,' keeps me in screws of tobacco and occasional pots of four ale and porter.

Like all good things, this 'hanging-on' is sadly cut up. There are hangers-on who 'do' perhaps a dozen public-houses in a day; and sometimes I am made to look sad in earnest when, after having smiled and lied to just within the effective point, some rival in trade lounges in, and, through some more artful feature in his 'dodges,' takes the custom out of my hand, and gulls the silly young fellows at the bar, who can't appreciate true genius when they see it.

In my next paper, I shall have something to say on another class of Hangers-on; till which time, I am glad to resume my own personality. R. L. GENTLES.

ESSENTIAL PRINCIPLES OF THE DRAMA.

DRAMATIC compositions, though not now so popular on the stage as heretofore, still form a very important element of literature. Some of the most transcendent efforts of human genius have been put forth in this form; and it is beyond doubt that, whether read or acted, the drama will ever exercise great influence on society. It is therefore highly desirable that the true principles of dramatic art should be clearly understood. They have long been well settled and familiar to critics and students; but new to general readers, much less to mere play-goers. They have, however, been most admirably expounded in a volume which issued from the press a few years ago, entitled, 'The Divine Drama of History and Civilization.' The author, the late Rev. James Smith, M.A., first editor of the Family Herald, was a man of great original powers and very considerable attainments. Many of the opinions advanced in this and other productions are startlingly new—some of them perhaps quite visionary—but almost all philosophical and ingenious. His ideas in the work referred to, on the essential principles of the drama, are not only just and well expressed, as the following extracts from his book will show:—

'A true drama is an artistic model of a Providence within a limited sphere of action. So inseparably connected is this idea of superhuman arrangement with the principle of the drama, that even an atheistic poet instinctively weaves the divine and the human together in the action of his poem, as the weaver complicates the web of the woof. An unseen power is ever supposed to control and adapt, restrain and regulate, the events as well as the actions, the words and thoughts, of the parties engaged; and though the co-operation of human art and passion is deeply involved, and a perfect freedom of thought and conduct is apparent throughout, yet the spectator of the play never fails to expect some unforeseen and surprising result as the providential denouement of the complicated series of interesting events. This inevitable peculiarity of every acting drama of any value whatsoever, consecrates dramatic art by investing it with a sacred character, and cannot fail to remind the intelligent reader of its religious origin and the exalted spirit of its earliest drama, as they came forth fledged and winged for heavenward flight from the rapt imaginations of Æschylus and Shakespeare.'

'Every drama must have its scenery—scenery, too, in accordance with the passionate and personal performance. The Comic Muse delights in incongruities.

She introduces a love scene in an eel-pie shop, and makes a traveller sing a musical burlesque to the great Sphinx of Egypt, or the Statues of Memnon on the Plain of Gourni: her parson reads the burial service at a wedding, and her jester bandies quips and cranks with a flash of lightning. Discord, or contrast at least, is her element, and she not unfrequently produces her effects by deliberate violation of the laws of propriety. Not so the Tragic Muse; her scene is all in harmony with the spirit of the performers. With a deed of terror she makes the elements mourn: the thunder roars, the waves rage, the wind sighs, and the owl screeches in the dark night. Majesty walks in palaces or forests, amid the grandeur and magnificence of nature or art; love nestles in gardens amid fragrant perfumes, brilliant flowers, and vigorous evergreens, with bindweed or mistletoe twining the sturdy trunks, and trellices laden with the riches of the vine; melancholy pines under weeping willows; and rapine elaborates its heartless machinations amid ruinous heaps of dismantled towers, unroofed cottages, rugged precipices, and deserted gardens.'

'Now, what is the natural development of either of these two forms? Nature teaches us that all development of any value to man is from worse to better; to reward or retribution. The hero may die, but he dies gloriously; the villain must suffer, and be execrated also. Retribution to the criminal is demanded by the moral sense, and that is the moral to which tragedy tends, even when the destiny of the good is deplorable. A dark fate impends over virtue in the doleful accessories of the tragic drama; but even when hope refuses to lend a sunbeam of comfort from the social world, it gleams from heaven in the faith of the sufferer. The development is upwards and onwards, either socially and domestically or morally and religiously; or the artist has forgotten his mission, and his effort is a failure.'

'What, then, is this development? In the first place, a position is described that presents a difficulty; for without the difficulty there is no interest to be excited. In the second place, an effort is to be made to get out of this difficulty. The effort is accompanied with new difficulties. In the third place, a hopeful scheme is devised on purpose to complete the effort. In the fourth place, the scheme fails, and the difficulties increase, and the plot thickens. In the fifth place, a great and almost unexpected deliverance or catastrophe occurs. This is the general character of a drama, more or less. And there is a natural reason for all these five peculiarities. The first is self-evident; the second seems equally so; but it is not so evident that the hopeful scheme of the third should be a failure. Why should it be a failure? Why not a gradual continuation of the effort in the second act to effect a deliverance? There is an admirable reason why this ought not to be, in the fact that the disappointment arising from a hopeful scheme of deliverance is one of the most universal, and at the same time distressing, features of that severe ordeal of moral discipline which characterises the providential government of the world. And it is an indispensable character of all moral teaching, and especially of dramatic teaching, that it should reveal the agency of a higher power, that watches over us and brings us deliverance when hope is lost after our utmost efforts, and that leads the guilty by a path of fancied security into the very catastrophe which he intended for others. The failure of the middle scheme is the preparation for man's extremity and God's opportunity; and the denouement is invariably an unexpected result, in which Divine justice or mercy is revealed by a quick, a smart, and a marvellous combination of simultaneous accidents, which Heaven alone could overrule and fit so admirably in time and space.'

'It is by no means necessary that these leading ideas should be slavishly followed in any drama; and perhaps in many they may not even be perceived. But it must be very evident to every one, that, if a drama is divided into five parts, like a deal board or sheet of paper, without any regard to special characteristics, it will not be a drama of five acts, but a drama of one act divided into five parts. Each act of a drama has its distinctive character, like the five fingers—the thumb being the first or fifth, and equal in power and interest to all the rest. The first, the third, and the fifth acts like alternate notes in music, are naturally akin; so also are the second and the fourth. The first is the statement of the problem; the third is a false or defective attempt at solution; the fifth is the true solution.'

'A great failure or disappointment in a drama is indispensable to the interest of it. There may be many failures, it may be full of disappointments; but a prominent and a hopeless defeat, in the zealous or the desperate efforts that are made for deliverance, is the central pivot upon which the drama divides itself into its two hemispheres. It is the bridge over which the feelings pass from a lower to a higher degree of excitement, and the natural position for this bridge or pivot is the third or middle act. A solution of the difficulty in this middle act would be premature, for then the two succeeding acts would be useless. The revelation in this act of the scheme by which the problem is to be finally solved would anticipate the conclusion, and destroy the interest; and no surprise or satisfaction would be experienced with a sudden and unexpected termination in the fifth. And if no attempt at solution were made in any of the acts that preceded the fifth, it would be impossible to produce a greater depth of misery, or intricacy of confusion and hopelessness, than was represented in the first; and as we have already seen that the third is the natural position for this abortive effort at deliverance, the law becomes plain and intelligible, and the reason for the five-act model becomes apparent to the understanding, independent altogether of the mystic inspiration by which dramatic genius was led to its adoption.'

DAY-BREAK.

AFAR, on the horizon's distant rim,
Slowly in beauty breaks
A gleam—faintly discernible—so dim
It dawns in palely streaks.
Broader and grayer now it grows, then dun;
Anon adorns with gold
The eastern hemisphere; it is the sun
Appears; whilst back have roll'd,
From fair creation's face, the shades of night,
Till earth grows into beauty, life, and light
Within the heaven's illuminated arch
The morning star expires;
Whilst higher on his broad, blue, regal march
The sun all nature fires;
The clouds—that erst, like draperies of death,
Curtain'd the solemn sky,
And shrouded in deep gloom the world beneath—
Now gleam with purple dye,
And silvery whiteness, wavering fold on fold,
In piles of grandeur round his track uproll'd.
The crimson heath that wreathes the mountain's brow
Hath caught the golden glow,
And fanpalm branch, and fruitful oaken bough—
That far outstretch below—
Grow radiant in the flood of tender light,
Shed o'er the verdant earth;
And in the life-awaking beams so bright,
Unnumber'd flowers have birth;
From out thick woven leaves bright living things
Disport in joy their tiny, glittering wings.
Slowly, from leafy hollows, re-ascends
Morning's transparent mist,
And through the arch of azure silent blends—
Whilst brightly stretch and twist,
Like silver serpents, rivulet and brook,
Through mountain gorge and mead;
And from the dark green woods ringdove and rook
On downward pinions lead
To dewy levels, where, amid the grass,
A myriad insects hum and lightly pass.
The moon grows pale upon her azure throne—
Like some imprison'd soul
Looking farewell to earth, all purer grown
As time doth onward roll.

Forth from the tulip's chalice steals the moth
On airy, golden wing;
And waveless sea and voiceless lake are both
In beauty mirroring
The brilliant blue of the still heavens afar,
Lovely with sunrise—fading moon and star.
The owl, within her ivied, lone retreat,
Hides from the morning rays;
The fawn starts from his lair of herbage sweet,
Within the greenwood mass;
The gladiator's pale, nocturnal torch is out,
Beneath the honey'd leaves;
The hum of bees is rising round about;
And forth from matted eaves
The hungry, chirping sparrows wing their way
To orchard boughs, and stack-yard, for the day.
Now soars the light-wing'd lark, from daisied sod,
Towards His temple high—
The earliest, sweet worshipper of God—
Now lost within the sky;
And from the groves, and dells, and grand old woods—
Whose stately, towering trees
Sublimely arch the sylvan solitudes—
Ring out sweet harmonies,
A matin—"Gloria in Excelsis"—grand,
Pealing across the morn serene and bland.
The cliffs, lit up in splendour, nearer grow;
And all the brightening sea
Slumbers upon the circling shore below
In tranquil majesty;—
The purple and the crimson sea-flowers spread
In beauty 'neath the tide,
And silver star-fish, carp, and concha red,
Among the corals glide;
And, 'tween the ocean and the heaven's keen blue,
Like a white foam-speck, floats the wild curlew.
The light-wing'd, spotless sea-fowl congregate
Like foam-wreaths on the sands;
And, gliding like some parent bird elate,
The little boat expands
Her sun-gilt sails to catch the passing breeze
That softly skims the deep,
Sings in the shells, then stirs the distant trocs
From out their quiet sleep—
Awaking, 'mong their many-colour'd sprays,
Their ever-tuneful, ancient roundelays.
The dew-besprinkled iris—like bright Mars—
Irradiates the earth;
And golden calyces, like lesser stars,
Sparkle all brightly forth,
From verdant crevice and from dewy nook,
And glistening emerald lawn,
From lings and mosses, by the talking brook,
Rejoicing in the dawn—
Arraying Nature's bosom passing fair,
And breathing balm into the morning air.
Like little stars, within an emerald sky,
Quiver the dew-drops bright;
Amid the asphodels the dragon fly
Flits carelessly and light.
All Nature is awake: the shepherd leads
His gladsome, bleating flocks
Forth to the succulent, sweet-smelling meads;
And round the towering rocks,
The eagle, from his eyry, wings his way,
To drink the sunshine of the new-born day! C. K.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St. Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

HARDWICK'S MISCELLANY.

No. 8.]

SATURDAY, NOV. 22, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

NEWSTEAD IN OCTOBER.

LORD BYRON, 1812.—LORD WENTWORTH, 1802.

CHAPTER I.

My early dreams of life glowed in the lurid haze of Byron's poetry. Life, when it was no dream, brought me into contact with some of his nearest connexions, and with his descendant, who sank the other day, unhonoured, to the grave. In the meantime, I have visited Newstead Abbey more than once; and at this moment one of my October rambles, through it and around it, comes back to my remembrance with some soft and tender touches which scarcely rested on it at the time. And why did they not? Because I had just before been riding through Robin Hood's country—through parts of Sherwood Forest; and my mind was full of the brave, generous, free man of olden times, whose spirit can never die. In comparison with him, the modern man—poet though he was—could not interest so deeply as usual. Never had I been so charmed by any scenery in any country as by the glades of the famous outlaw's forest, in the varied glories of October. Not even Spenser's fancy could have pictured them more exquisitely; the ideal could not have been finer than the real. The slender silver stems of the birches, bearing their light golden floating foliage—there mingling with the brown masses of the oaks and the sombre green of the firs—give grace and cheerfulness to the noble woodland view. As I abandoned myself to the enjoyment of it, Hardwick, Bolsover, Clumber, Thoresby, Rufford, Newstead, Annesley, and all the other aristocratic mansions that I had seen, were forgotten by me; or, if recalled, were dismissed instantly from the mind, as bringing what was factitious—nay, even painful—into the happy presence of Great Mother Nature, and into the ancient domain of one of her true sons.

With all that, the old pile of the Byrons must be revisited then. It was certainly an advantageous time to see it, when the trees had put on their autumn wardrobe of many-tinted warm hues. Yet even that could not change its peculiar aspect. Monkish, ruinous, and lonely it looks; and, independently of its connection with the Poet's name, it makes a very different impression on any one seeing it for the first time, from that made by the other old castles in the neighbourhood. Its interior was filled with reminiscences of Byron—sufficiently complimentary to his fame; but not, perhaps, all in the best taste. On the whole, I had rather have seen the Abbey untouched, in a state of decay—sacred to the memory of the robbed monks, of the ruined Byrons, and of the unfinished career of the Poet—than as it is. But the nation will not purchase it, to keep as a memorial ruin; and, passing from hand to hand of one wealthy commoner after another, each owner must try to find in it what comfort he can, in his own fashion. He will not know—or, if he know, he will not care to recall—how great a page in the history of England's aristocracy Newstead embodies. Byron himself did more than any man towards revealing the condition of his order in his day. His revelations were not favourable; yet no man was prouder of belonging to that order than he.

And, if Newstead be a page in the history of England's aristocracy, Annesley—the adjoining property—is also one in the history of its gentry. Strangely, poetically, are they united in our thoughts, by Byron's youthful passion for the heiress of Annesley, Mary Chaworth. The day was damp and chilly on which I visited the abode of the Poet's first love. It suited well the aspect of the dismal, deserted house—speaking all too plainly of her unhappy fate. It was just in such a state as one would imagine it after its having been for some years the residence of a debauched, fox-hunting, claret-drinking, tenant-grinding squire. Alas, for the choice made by the object of the Poet's admiration! To the lame, sickly, poor, passionate young lord, she preferred the athletic, rich, handsome country gentleman; and her fate was sadder even than the fate of Byron's wife. I looked in vain for 'The hill crowned with a certain diadem of trees,' which the Poet described in 'The Dream.' He who became master of Annesley by marriage with its heiress, caused the trees to be felled—in a fit of jealous spite, it is said. In one of the large rooms of the house there hung a portrait of Mary Chaworth. It was lovely; yet it seemed to look with an expression of girlish gloom on the desolation around.

With a deeper cast of thought on her brow might the great heiress of the Milbankes and the Noels now look, in some youthful likeness of herself, on her father's noble estate of Seaham—where he kept court as Lord-Lieutenant of Durham—transferred, as it is, to other aristocratic owners. Lady Byron lived long enough to have known something of the fate of her 'whose face had made the starlight of the Poet's boyhood,' as he phrased it, and to have compared her own fate with it. But I am sure she never did so.

She was too proud to make comparison of her fate with that of any other wife; yet too good to think that she alone was, of all women, most wretched. She has been heard to say (not with reference to herself, but rather as giving an anecdote of her youth) that she knew seven young ladies, heiresses—brought out at the same time that she was—who all married noblemen, who were all unhappy, and eventually all separated from their lords. For her, then, the volumes of twaddle that have been written about genius being destined to make the home of a virtuous woman unhappy, were merely twaddle. She knew that not genius but vice was the cause of domestic unhappiness—from Regents of the realm down through every rank of the nobility, and through every grade of society, to the shoe-black on our streets.

Let us, then, leave for ever that form of excuse for Byron's life which has been uselessly adopted. Let us no more extenuate the vices of the Poet than we would those of the shoe-black—giving them up to the retribution which attends on all vice. While this world lasts, men, it is to be feared, will be vicious; but how much of ill in manners, temper, and habits a wife should endure from a husband, is a question which each individual wife must settle for herself, and then she must allow the law to do the rest. Lady Byron acted firmly and honourably on this conviction; and her firmness did not pass unblamed by many of the male members of the aristocracy. The interest of the general public in her, as Byron's wife, ceased on her separation from him; but a new interest arose, from her being the mother of his child—the guardian and instructor of 'Ada, sole daughter of his house and heart.' That link with the fame of the Poet was broken by a death as early as his own had been. The widowed, childless mother lived on some years; sank to rest at last; and in a few months the rush of events carried her out of the world's remembrance, until it was reminded of her by the premature death of Byron's grandson. At twenty-seven, his immature life ended.

A French philosopher says that 'there is an inexorable logic in events.' The great German poet declares, that 'what we earnestly desire shall come to pass, perhaps even in our own time; but never exactly as we wish it.' For me, only an observer of men's acts and their sequence, I see frequently a grim irony in the way in which the inexorable logic shows itself, and in the manner of the fulfilment of our wishes. Nemesis sometimes laughs at us; sometimes says, 'My dear fellow! I know you have been long sighing for this. Here it is for you!' And thrusts it in our face when we are sick of life; or gives it so different in its reality from what our hopes had made it, that it sickens us of existence. An acknowledgment of this kind of treatment at the hands of Destiny might have been communicated to us in ottava rima, had Byron lived through the last ten years unharmed. And let it be remembered that, although old as a poet, and taking rank on our shelves with men who died centuries ago, he would, if living, not be as old as our energetic Premier. He was enraged when his daughter was born, and flung soda-water bottle about in his passion. He wanted a son. A son would have been, as he supposed, Lord Wentworth from the day of his birth, and would have brought him thousands per annum so much needed just then; therefore his rage and his breaking of bottles on the birth of a daughter.

'Patience, my lord!' Fate might have whispered. 'Live quietly, soberly, and godly, and you may see Lord Wentworth of your race; and if you do not like him, it will be your own fault. He will embody some of your expressed ideas, which you never chose to embody in your own person. He will hold a man to be better than a lord; and he will show the world that he is in earnest.'

In the year 1812, Lord Byron was twenty-four. At that age, his grandson inherits the title of Wentworth—concerning which and its belongings, the Poet had some ungentlemanly cravings. Before marriage, Byron writes to his friend, 'All Miss Milbanke's father can give or leave her he will; and from her childless uncle, Lord Wentworth—whose barony, it is supposed, will devolve on her mother—she has expectations. But these will depend on his own disposition, which seems very partial towards her. She is an only child; and Sir Ralph Milbanke's estates—though dipped by electioneering—are considerable. Part of them are settled on her.'

Of this father, who will give Lady Byron all he can, her lord writes, 'Address your next to Seaham, where we are going (a bore, by the way) to see father-in-law Sir Ralph, and my lady's lady mother.' And when there, at Seaham, 'My papa, Sir Ralph, who recently made a speech at a Durham tax-meeting; and not only at Durham, but here, several times since, after dinner. He is now, I believe, speaking to himself (I left him in the middle), over various matters, which can neither interrupt him nor fall sleep—as might possibly have been the case with some of his audience.' Again, 'I have been very comfortable here, listening to that d—d monologue of the elderly gentlemen call conversation; and in which my pious father-in-law repeats himself every evening except one—when he played upon the fiddle.' The great genius could only despise the kind, good Sir Ralph. You shall mark how 'the whirligig of time will bring in its revenges' for that.

CHAPTER II.

A few months after Byron's marriage, we find in a letter to his friend this passage:—'To your question, I can only answer that there are favourable symptoms; but it is a subject about which I am not particularly anxious [the birth of a child] except that I think it would please her uncle, Lord Wentworth, and her father and mother. The former, Lord W., is now in town, and in very indifferent health. You perhaps know that his property, amounting to seven or eight thousand a-year, will eventually devolve upon my wife. But the old gentleman has been so very kind to her and me, that I hardly know how to wish him in heaven if he can be comfortable on earth.' The month later:—'Lord Wentworth died last week. The bulk of his property (from seven to eight thousand per annum) is entailed on Lady Milbanke and Lady Byron. The first is gone to take possession in Wiltshire, and to attend the funeral, &c. this day. I have mentioned the facts of the settlement of Lord W.'s property, because the newspapers have been making all kinds of blunders in their statements. His will is just as expected—the principal part settled on Lady Milbanke (now Noel) and on Lady Byron; and a separate estate left for sale to pay debts (which are not great) and legacies to his natural son and daughter.'

In a few months, he begins a letter thus:—'I have not been able to ascertain precisely the time of duration of the stock market; but I believe this is a good time for selling out, and I hope so: First, because I shall see you; and next, because I shall receive certain moneys on behalf of Lady Byron, the which will materially conduce to my comfort—I wanting (as the duns say) "to make up a sum." Then he proceeds to describe a large, fashionable, drunken dinner-party, and ends with this P.S.—'Lady B. is in full progress; and next month will bring to light (with the aid of Juno Lucina, fer opem, or rather opes, for the last are most wanted) the tenth wonder of the world—Gil Blas being the eighth, and he (my son's father) the ninth.'

The harping on my wife's uncle and his ducats, in the noble Poet's letters, is not very noble. But when a man's door is almost daily beset with duns during his first year of marriage, and his house nine times during that year in possession of bailiffs, it is enough to make him a little ignoble in his thoughts. True; but not enough to make him forget his title, and the rights appertaining to it. We find this in his journal respecting that year:—'When the bailiff came upon me to seize my chattels—being a peer of Parliament, my person was beyond him—being curious (as is my habit), I asked him' so and so—'our own business was then dismissed, which was none of the easiest for me at that time. But the man was civil, and, what I valued more, communicative. I had met many of his brethren years before, in affairs of my friends (commoners, that is), but this was the first, or second, on my own account—a civil man, feed accordingly; probably he anticipated as much.'

Deficiency of cash, however, and pride of title, cannot succeed in extorting from Fate what they want at the right time. The tenth wonder of the world, the son which Byron seemed to have decided was to come, did not come. Two months afterwards he writes, 'The little girl was born on the 10th of December last. Her name is Augusta Ada (the second a very antique family name—I believe not used since the reign of King John). She was, and is, very flourishing and fat, and reckoned very large for her days. Her mother is doing very well, and up again. I have now been married a year. Heigh-ho!' Before the end of that month in which he wrote, his wife and he had separated, never to meet again; and he never more beheld his daughter. So ended his speculations on the Wentworth lordship for a son of his. He did not renew them for a grandson; yet, in two of his grandsons were his wishes to be accomplished. First, in the eldest, bearing the name of 'Byron'; secondly, in the younger, bearing that of 'Ralph'—he, by his grandmother's will, had to take the name of Milbanke, and to him has passed the title of Wentworth. Thus has Time brought in a part of its revenges.

Only a part of them. The rest are more important, and of a different kind. At twenty-four, Byron, the heir of an old baronial title, a peer of the realm, was taking his place in the House of Lords. At twenty-four, his grandson inherits a title of the same kind, but more than a century older in its date, becomes a peer of the realm, and rejects every proposal to take his place anywhere but among the hard-handed workers in iron of Mr. Scott Russell; and, on the Saturday night, he will receive his weekly wages as they do. And this is he who has become the lawful owner of that seven or eight thousand a-year so much longed for by Byron in the time of the nine executions in his house! Hear it, ye sons of neediness and greediness throughout the length and breadth of the land! Whether ye be the offspring of peers, with 'honourable' before your names, who are forced to many dishonourable means of raising a hundred pounds; or of manufacturing and commercial men, gone to ruin in the effort to live like squires—hear it! Behold the power of purchasing a Mohammedan paradise, and many another paradise of fools, actually disregarded!—thrown away! Toil and independence are chosen instead of all that the grandfather bought at the expense of nine executions in the year—all which could have been had without the executions. It is a singular case. The civilised world of these later times offers many examples of sons of princes, nobles, and men of wealth, loving barbarism, seeking out degradation in various ways—eating, drinking, and so forth; cursing, swearing, and rowdying; boxing, cock-fighting, and gambling. But what titled and rich youth ever before this took to labour and honest pay? It is more curious than Czar Peter's working in the Dutch dock-yards. There was a purpose—a selfish though a great purpose—to accomplish in that. But this young nobleman seems to have had no other object than that of getting free from the trammels of an artificial life—trammels which all others who can in any way obtain wealth are eager to impose on themselves and on their children!

It is to be regretted that the experiment which he was making terminated so sadly and so speedily. He had, however, persevered in it determinedly enough to convince us that he would never have adopted again the life which he had rejected—that of a mere nobleman—of a man whose title is his sole claim to our notice. Our regret, also, with regard to the experiment, as it may be named, arises from regarding it—in a psychological point of view—as deeply interesting to the mental and moral philosopher. And here one cannot but recall that, by family descent, his name of 'King' was connected with a name dear to every Englishman to whom the liberties of his country are dear—a name to which honour belongs higher than aught appertaining to the titles of Wentworth or Byron. In the family mansion of Lord King, at Ockham, hangs the likeness of a man with whom the Kings should be proud to count kindred. On the face are thought, refinement, decision, and perfect probity. It is the face of John Locke. How would he, who left us such excellent lessons on education, have looked on the strange determination of the young lord? With gentle pity, no doubt; with something of respect for the mind that could reject what thousands clamour for. Lovingly could he have sought to show him that he had in his power a means of doing good not lightly to be cast aside, and not to be found on the path which he had chosen.

CHAPTER III.

The period of Lord Byron's life which corresponds to his late grandson's years of manhood, offers us contrasts in many ways. The Poet took his seat in the House of Peers at twenty-four; and made his first speech in favour of starving and riotous operatives. The fifty years passed since then have taught our operatives to starve and not be riotous. He writes to Lord Holland—'Surely, my lord, however we may rejoice at any improvement in the arts which may be beneficial to mankind, we must not allow mankind to be sacrificed to improvements in mechanism. The maintenance and well-being of the industrious poor is an object of greater consequence to the community, than the enrichment of a few capitalists by any improvement in the implements of trade which deprives the workman of his bread, and renders the labourer unworthy of his hire.' We have persevered since then in improvements in mechanism, until we believe we have made 'the well-being of the industrious poor, and the enrichment of a few capitalists,' one and the same thing. The truth of this conviction of ours, Nature and Nature's laws are testing, and have yet to test. Byron, had he lived, might have continued still to sympathise with rude handicraftsmen who break machines.

Now, the desire of his grandson was to be one of the skilled workmen who make them. Not, it would appear, impelled ambitiously to this by the wish to rival, though a nobleman, the great men who have by their works as engineers raised themselves to a higher than aristocratic rank, and been interred with the most honoured of the land. If the course of events, however, had made the views of the grandson so different from those of the grandfather, a certain similarity of character may have driven them on their opposite paths.

Of Lord Byron we are told that, 'whilst all other youths of talent in his high station are heralded into life by the applauses and anticipations of a host of friends, young Byron stood forth alone—unannounced by either praise or promise—the representative of an ancient house, whose name (long lost in the gloom of solitudes of Newstead) seemed to have awakened from the sleep of half-a-century in his person.' But he enters society heralded by his poetry; and he becomes at once 'the centre of a circle of star-gazers. Soon, we are told, 'that sort of vanity showed itself which is inseparable from genius—a certain sensitiveness on the subject of self; and never was there a career,' says his biographer, 'in which this sensibility to the opinions of others was exposed to more constant and varied excitement than that on which he had entered at twenty-four. There can be no doubt, however, that the cheerless isolation—unguided and unfriended—to which, at an earlier period, he had found himself abandoned, was one of the sources of that resentful disdain of mankind, which even the subsequent worship of him came too late to remove. That there was much of the affected and the false in his disdain of mankind, is proved by many pages of his journals and his letters. Other pages of them prove, as certainly, that lonely independence was charms for him.

To his grandson we may apply, with some alterations, what has just been quoted. He was unheralded into life by the applauses and anticipations of a host of friends. But this new representative of the ancient house, whose name had been long lost in the gloom of solitudes of Newstead, had the misfortune to come into the world when that name was, on the contrary, 'too much in the sun.' The bearer of it and of a title could not escape a kind of observation that might have staggered older and wiser heads than his. But it would seem that he was early disposed to regard as ludicrous any notice of himself as one to be distinguished from the rest of mankind. At twelve years old, he found an inexhaustible source of laughter in commencing stories with 'Once upon a time there was a very great lord,' and he did so-and-so; adding some absurd trifle about himself, evidently in ridicule of his having been too much 'my-lorded' by some one or another. The elements of the funkey as the snob were wanting in his nature, if those of the gentleman were also.

Byron burst into tears when his young companions turned their eyes on him when he was for the first time named 'lord' in the calling over of the school roll or bill. But his proud and imaginative nature was too quickly reconciled to the artificial distinction of a title. The less fanciful, more childlike, simple mind of the grandson looked on this distinction as a mere absurdity, among beings of the same flesh and blood, the same thews and sinews. He had been at a private school, and some of his companions excited his laughter in a great degree—they were those whom he designated 'pious and holy fellows

That, again, is a trait of the Poet's mind given out in a different way—not in distorted reasonings in verse, but as an artless, natural distaste for hypocrisy. The Poet's sensitiveness on the subject of self comes out also in the grandson in another form. Byron felt it, but it did not give him strength to break away from the great world, which he was conscious of prizing too highly. His grandson felt it, and would not be bound in the chains of that great world. When talked to about some points of aristocratic manners, he exclaimed, 'What is a man worth if he cannot be himself a man—valued for himself and not for such things? I will go and be a man on my own account!' He would not be a thing stamped with a mark, and shaped into a certain form, for passing current among the stupid, who look only at externals. He would live for himself, and by himself. And he kept his word—to the death! And if we have tears for the Poet's old last days in Greece, shall we have none for the sadder, lonelier last days of his grandson in his native land? This question I asked myself when the lines of October brought back Newstead to my remembrance, in connection with the death of Lord Wentworth, announced in the journals. I turned to these exquisite lines of Byron on his last birth-day, and then I re-read them to myself with a melancholy sensation, which I shall give here.

ON THIS DAY I COMPLETE MY THIRTY-SIXTH YEAR.

—Lord Byron.

'Tis time this heart should be unmoved,
Since others it hath ceased to move;
Yet, though I cannot be beloved,
Still let me love!

My days are in the yellow leaf;
The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone!

The fire that on my bosom preys
Is lone as some volcanic tale;
No torch is kindled at its blaze—
A funeral pile!

The hope, the fear, the jealous care,
The exalted portion of the pain
And power of love I cannot share;
But wear the chain.

But 'tis not thus, and 'tis not here,
Such thoughts should shake my soul; nor now,
Where glory decks the hero's bier,
Or binds his brow.

The sword, the banner, and the field,
Glory and Greece, around me see!
The Spartan borne upon his shield
Was not more free!

Awake!—not Greece: she is awake—
Awake, my spirit! Think through whom
Thy life-blood tracks its parent lake,
And then strike home!

Tread those reviving passions down,
Unworthy manhood! Unto thee
Indifferent should the smile or frown
Of beauty be.

If thou regret'st thy youth, why live?
The land of honourable death
Is here. Up to the field, and give Away thy breath!

Seek out—less often sought than found—
A soldier's grave: for thee the best;
Then look around, and choose thy ground,
And take thy rest.

'THIS DAY I COMPLETE MY TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR.'

—Lord Wentworth.

This youthful heart has ne'er been moved,
And others it could never move;
Then, since I cannot be beloved,
I will not love!

My days are in their spring of leaf—
No flowers, no fruits of love they bear;
Not mine the canker and the grief,
The fond despair.

Yet in my bosom preys a fire—
Lone, as of some volcanic tale;
Perchance 'twill be a death-lit pyre—
A funeral pile!

The hope and fear, the jealous care,
Of toilers seizing bread with pain
Are manifold; these I must not share,
But wear a chain.

To servile acts 'twould bind in vain—
My tongue would force to servile words.
A lord must cringe, where manners reign,
To other lords.

The forge and anvil, and the glow
Of manly toil, are everywhere.
My country marks her greatness so;
I'll win my share!

Awake!—not England: she's awake—
Awake, my spirit! Think through whom
Thy life-blood tracks its parent lake,
And then strike home!

Strike on the anvil! Strike with force!
Be—what the lordling's not—a man!
Help nations in their onward course—
Steam in the van!

Vapid has been thy youth. Why live?
The tollworn here find daily death.
Up! then—with England's labourers give Away thy breath!

Seek out—unsought 'tis often found—
A workman's grave: for thee the best.
Worthy thy hire. Choose thou thy ground,
And take thy rest.

A melancholy alteration of the noble lines indeed! But the simple facts of the case have true poetry in them, and are more sad than the spoiling of the heroic verses. Grandfather and grandson are gone. Peace to their ashes! To their own Master they must stand or fall—not to us. When Byron's daughter was laid in the vault with him, there was in it one vacant space more. Lady Byron, consistent unto death, did not choose that it should be occupied by her remains. Let us hope that the young Lord Wentworth has been laid in the vault of Hucknall Church, with his mother and with the Poet. And again, when October embrowns the Nottinghamshire woods, and the pilgrim to Newstead has worshipped at the shrine of genius, he will turn from it to the little country church; and, as he reflects on the three who sleep there—the Poet, his daughter, and her son—he will forget all but the strange contrarieties of life with our wishes and our purposes, as exemplified in those three existences of such short duration, but so richly endowed by fortune and by Nature.

A. M.

BEFORE the battle, it is neither cowardice nor folly to remember the possibility of failure; but in the heat of the strife it is true wisdom to act as if there were only one possibility—that of complete success.

W.

A BRACE OF DREAMS.

THE evening before I left Cambridge, after taking my degree, was spent by me in a manner perfectly innocent and laudable; for, next to a man's paying his debts, the most creditable thing he can do is to discover how much he owes. Your tailor may ask in vain for his money; but still there must be some comfort in his discovery of your particular knowledge of the debt. It is your careless payers who spoil the ecstasies of trade—men who fling down their money in a hurry, and never look at the bill. There is no professional glory in being paid by such men as these. But to procure, with subtlety and ingenious craft, a settlement of your account from the man who knows every item, and insists upon every grace of time and discount; this, I opine, must be the true charm of business to a business man—a keen, delicious, piquant enjoyment, delaying on the road and tantalising, but, therefore, all the sweeter when it does arrive.

On the night in question, I was busily employed in preparing this kind of gratification for my tradesmen. Yet I should be doing myself injustice if I asserted that my conscience was altogether at ease. For some weeks previously, certain thunder-clouds of anxiety had darkened my mind; and this process of bottling their electricity—I mean making out a list of my debts—did not fail of deepening the gloom. Yet I had not been extravagant. As, with my pencil in hand, item upon item of my liabilities deployed in column before me, I could not help contrasting the smallness of their sum total with the thousands which I have known young men to leave behind them unpaid for years. But here was the rub:—My father, either distrusting me in particular or acting from a general theory, insisted upon having all my bills transmitted to him at London; where, with or without oburgatory comments, he settled them. I had no money but pocket-money—a meagre stream, for ever on the ebb: at times sinking rapidly into absolute drought and desert. What was a young man to do amidst so many rosebuds of pleasure waiting to be gathered? Was I always to purse my lips, look prim, and, with fearful step, hurry past this dragon of parental restriction, guarding sweet Hesperidean fruit of smarter coats, dandier vests, and neater boots? I protest, mine were very sober-suited enjoyments. They did not cost me much. Yet, from natural—sometimes not to be resisted—inclination; from shame at not doing and appearing as others; from a feeling of inward revolt at what I considered an unworthy, childish restriction, I became entangled in certain complications of debt. From some of my more pressing embarrassments I managed to extricate myself by difficult, bitter, self-denial of ordinary gratifications. Nevertheless, I could not, unaided, deliver myself from all; and on this particular evening my mind had just arrived, sorrowfully enough, at this conclusion, when I was called away; and did not return to my rooms till late. Finding the miserable schedule still lying on my table, I seized a pen, and hastily wrote under the pencil items the addition of the whole; which done, I thrust the paper into my writing-case, and went to bed.

When I arrived in London next day, the many congratulations on my honourable degree, the smiles of home beaming on all faces—from Paterfamilias to mere knife-boy—puffed away my anxieties in a general wind of welcome. Though I solemnly affirm it, no son was less a canker in his parents' peace—no young man of quieter, more moderate, door-latch-key habits than myself; yet, by some cruel, malicious contrariety of fortune, my family used to consider me somewhat of a scapegrace, a pillow-troubler, a perpetual cheque upon the bank of our domestic peace. On this very day of my return, a laurelled victor, I could not help sniffing, in the wondrous prodigality of smiles bestowed upon me, a latent odour as of fatted calf. Nevertheless, surprised and infinitely pleased with my welcome, my spirits cast off the slough of their troubles, and emerged into life new and hopeful. I laughed, joked, jumped about the house; polked with my sister; caught up our old fat cook in a rapid, instantaneous waltz round the kitchen; and, till my father's return at six, effectually dissipated the solemn, puritanical gloom which pervaded the entire establishment.

After a friendly, festive evening, I retired to my bedroom; and there, for the first time for some hours, thought with dismay of the morrow—the morrow of revelations untoward and unwelcome; a corrugating, brow-bending, parental-mind-upsetting morrow. With a sigh, I threw off my coat; undressed in deliberate discomfort; and, involving myself in misery as with a garment, got into bed.

I had not long been there when I heard a knock at the door, and a gentle voice asking—'Tom, are you asleep?' On my replying in the negative, the door opened, and in walked my lady mother. She placed her lighted candle on the table, and sat down by my bedside. Her first question—'Tom, don't you owe some money at Cambridge?'—so directly bore upon the agitated state of my mind, that for some time, in reply, I could only stare at her, speechless.

At last, 'To be sure I did. I was very sorry; but it could not be helped. Other fellows had thought me queer in not doing this, or not buying that. I did not owe much.' 'I know how much you owe,' answered my mother, naming the exact amount, to the odd half-penny.

'How did you discover that?' I almost shrieked in amazement, looking in the meantime towards the corner of my room, where I had placed my writing-desk. There, however, it stood; with its leather cover on, safely strapped and padlocked.

'It's rather a strange story,' answered my mother; 'but how you shall know. I dreamed last night that I saw you in your rooms at Cambridge. You were sitting at your writing-desk, with coat off—having, I presume, just come—and preparing for bed. In fact, your bed-room door was open, and a lighted candle was burning near the looking-glass. Though I have never seen your apartments, yet the appearance of them in my dream agreed remarkably with what you had told us of them. I distinctly recognised the position of your bookcase at the end of the room, the great table covered with a red cloth under the oriel window. There was your coat hanging behind the door, your hat placed on a chiffonier, standing against the wall, opposite the fireplace. I missed your engravings. There was only one—"The Last Supper"—still remaining over the chimney-piece.'

'How very odd!' I cried. 'I had taken down all my prints, with the exception of the one you have mentioned. This I was intending to give to a King's College man, an old friend, who had just come up.'

My mother resumed her tale. She described even minutely the various objects in my room, thereby illustrating the known fact, that our memories absorb into their tissue the faintest hues and forms of words and facts. I had at times during my vacations spoken of my College abode; of the strange, mysterious traditions connect-with it; of the equally strange, inexplicable noises heard in it. Not altogether surprising, then, was this maternal, vivid dream-seeing. But strangely surprising was her declaration that in her dream she had bent over me while I was writing; had seen so clearly the paper before me, that she described its appearance accurately—the algebraic notation running down one side, its ragged edges, and general smears and blots. Confused, blurred, half rubbed out lines appeared before her. These she could by no means make out. Only, doubtless, by some mental rapport with my thoughts did she vaguely suppose these marks to be particulars of my debts. There was, however, one thing plainly, unmistakably legible, and that the rapid pen-and-ink total scored at the bottom of the paper. This was the main point and interest of her recollections. On this, as on a pivot, all other memories of her dream revolved.

It occasioned her no surprise when I extracted from her loose papers in my writing-case the identical, real, yet visionary paper of my debts. She took it away with her to my father. Happily, this mystery effectually befriended me. My father proved himself willing to pay handsomely for this new fact in psychology. Next morning a cheque for the amount was put into my hands, without a word; and I was a free man.

Now I, the writer, vouch for the above anecdote as essentially, incontestably true. The main facts are known to dozens of my friends; but no one has ever yet explained the wonder of my mother's finding out the exact sum which I owed. Nothing is more natural than her merely dreaming of me. Let us suppose this to have proceeded from a mother's anxiety about her doubtful first-born. I can commend that supposition; but let it stand. Nothing was more natural than that her thoughts, and probably her conversation with my father, turned, the evening before I returned home, on the possibility of my being in debt. But her extremely vivid recollection of my room and its belongings, her knowledge of the peculiar position in which I was sitting, of the description of paper on which I was writing, the figures which I had previously set down in pencil and which she could not make out, the sum total which I had written with ink in her visionary presence and which she did make out;—what are these but corroboratory proofs of the fact that, by other means than by our bodily senses does the mind acquire a knowledge of outward events, and that the soul employs these means not unfrequently during the repose of the body? It is beyond cavil that my mother's dream—if you choose so to term it—was a true, decided, mental consciousness of things that actually took place. Even the time at which we may suppose this vision to have occurred agrees with the hour at which I returned to my rooms. My parents kept very early hours—generally retiring at ten. On the night in question, I am convinced that it was past midnight before I finally closed my bedroom door.

In the anecdote which I am about to relate, the same extraordinary consciousness by the mind, of circumstances lying far from our usual sources of information, was manifested. In this case, too, as in the former, my informant was a lady of advanced years—having long outlived the period when the shaping spirit of the imagination, after being exercised upon the day's occupations, may be expected sometimes also to influence the troubled visions of the night. The sober material of which the stuff of this dream was made, proves the days of the lady's poetry to be well high ended, since her inquisitive soul, delivered from the thralldom of the waking senses, fastened on no nobler object of imagination than an old, square, mahogany table.

This dear, good friend of mine, possessing, like many other old ladies, a rare nose for a bargain, had bought the article at an auction, which by chance she dropped into as she was taking her walks abroad. It was nothing, as I have said, but an old, dim, yet highly respectable, library table—worn, and with an unmistakable air of having seen better days; moth eaten, and frayed in its green baize top; fly-bitten about its legs and claws. Nevertheless, with rubbing and deep searching into its defects, with carpenter's scalpel and medicatory glue-pot, it quickly assumed a bright, and, comparatively speaking, radiant aspect. As such, it was established in an old room of the house traditionally known as the study; but where nobody read and nobody studied, except, indeed, those learned spiders whose curious webs, woven outside the massive volumes on the bookshelves, appear in their dust and obscurity no inapt emblems of the intricate and forgotten speculations within. But to return. Why my friend should have bought this table would have puzzled her to say. I suppose the mere fact of its going as a bargain overcame her prudence. She held her peace concerning the purchase. Few noticed it or knew about it beyond her own family. In a long-established household, it must be something very new or very striking which claims attention. But as for this particular piece of furniture, in a day or two it looked as oldly-fresh, as newly-old, as did every chair, cabinet, and table in the establishment of an ancient, venerable gentlewoman. One of my friend's first acts after her purchase came home was to open the drawers, of which there were two on each side—long, narrow, close fitting. However, she discovered nothing except some old, yellow bills and receipts, utterly prosaic and unromantic—grocers, butchers, washerwomen's accounts;—items of candles long since burned out, the very persons whom they had lighted buried for years in deep-grave darkness; of joints eaten up long ago by them who, in their turn, were now pasturing the dust; of socks meant for feet at present travelling we know not what remote and melancholy paths in Hades. No papers like these would not set an old lady dreaming who, as wife, mother, and mistress, knew something of the hard prose of life involved in their composition. She simply looked to see what they were—and burned them.

But in the quiet watches of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, how came it that the mind of my venerable friend, instead of remaining calmly in the silent chambers of the brain, chose to walk discontentedly from room to room in her house; till at last, ending its wanderings, it or she (for in dreams it is curious how the mind always discerns in and through the shadow of the body) stood by the lately bought library-table, and began pulling out drawer after drawer, in a new and spiritual pursuit of knowledge? Why was it not satisfied with its noon-day information on the subject of their contents? Why should it feel convinced that there was another drawer—a secret, far-hidden, cunningly-concealed recess—get-at-able only by a spring lying perdu in the corner underneath the table, near the leg, left hand side, close to the fire-place?

We may ask such questions till doomsday, but who is to answer them? Suffice it, that the spring was found, the little drawer flew open, and disclosed its secrets. These lay wrapped up in a roll of thin, dusty-looking papers. With deft, dream fingers, my old friend unfolded the parcel, and counted a series, varying in value, of bank-notes. I think she computed their total sum to amount to exactly one hundred pounds. Of that I won't be sure. At all events, it was an even number. Let us say it was a hundred. When she had finished her calculations, she carefully replaced the notes in the drawer, and returned to her room. Whereupon she lost all further consciousness, and enjoyed a dreamless sleep till the morning.

Of course, when she told the night's adventure to her children, they, wise with nineteenth-century scepticism, talked learnedly of suggestion and association of ideas. There was nothing but an old table, dropped from the limbo of some queer odds and ends of unfortunate furniture—beds taken in distress; tables that had become involved in difficulties; chairs, looking-glasses, warming-pans, &c. despondent and bankrupt, yet seeking to set up themselves once more in society through the knock-down blow of an auctioneer's hammer. What was the article before them but the merest poor relation of a study-table—the outcast of some former highly respectable family of furniture, whose pedigree had been long forgotten, and whose members were scattered irretrievably to the four winds of obscurity! As for your dream, my dear mamma, the numberless tales of wills, exculpatory letters, deeds of sale, thousand-pound bank-notes, &c. which all turn up at the right moment into the right hands—such things as these well accounted for that. If you are not satisfied, behold the article of furniture before you, turned upside down, disembowelled so to speak, drawerless; with bare, base, reversed anatomy. It discovers nothing; it has nothing to discover. Silently, however, it protests against any tricks of the imagination being played off upon it. For, certainly, no unlikelier subject of a romance ever testified to the slow genius of a cabinet-maker.

A little afraid, as many mothers are, of her better-educated children, my good friend found very little to say in support of her convictions. As the day wore on, she thought less and less about the matter; and, when she retired to her room at night, was only moderately anxious to know if her dream would be repeated.

To make a long tale short:—Thrice—the mystical number of times—was the vision renewed. Thrice her wandering spirit, while the body slumbered, opened that secret drawer, and counted those dim bank-notes. The third morning, my friend arose with mind convinced, lips compressed, brow set, eyes resolute. Being a woman of decision, she sent, promptly and energetically, for a carpenter. With much solemnity, yet not without nervous agitation, with indefinite feminine trembling, she beheld the cause of her restless visions dissected, analysed, reduced from the synthesis of a table to its component parts of top, drawers, and legs. Now, if ever, of dreams the experimentum crucis! Yes, there was a secret drawer—defly concealed, hidden in the very centre, beneath the top. The spring by which its existence should have been known was found to have been fractured through rust. But there was the drawer—long, narrow, mysterious; and there, too, was the very roll of discoloured, mildewy, ancient notes! These, with agitated fingers, did my old friend count. Meantime, the astonished carpenter beheld, wondered, possibly envied. Wait awhile, thou foolish carpenter!

Does the sum-total agree with the calculation of her dreams? Sufficiently near; there is, however, a difference of a five-pound note less in the actual than in the visionary computation. But what of that? one must not look a gift horse of this colour too curiously in the month. Ninety-five pounds! Her daughter Mary shall have her new piano. She will buy her grandson John that pretty pony he is longing for.

Alas, my dear, good, credulous soul! thou hast all this time been fooled by thy—only, after all—half-knowing spirit! Of a truth, here are the drawer, the notes. But put your work together again, Master Carpenter; quickly, from these scattered data of legs, screws, tops, and pins, build up again your irrefutable syllogism of a good mahogany table. For, if the mystery of the dream still remains; if the consciousness that such notes existed be considered, as it must be, wonderful, inexplicable, by usual experience of the means by which we gain our knowledge; yet is the monetary profit of this dream a mere mirage, an apple of Sodom, a monstrous delusion and snare. Submitted to banker eyes, to friendly, cautious investigation, these notes were pronounced to be bank-notes indeed—once real and vitalised by known existence of the specie which they represented. But, alas! now they are but the shadows of their former selves—things without worth or substance—representatives of that which no longer exists;—nothing but the spurious issue of a bank that had stopped some twenty years before!

HIGH-WATER MARK.

Who can stroll along the margin
Of the rippling sea,
And not feel his soul responding
To its melody?

In the sandy creek or inlet,
Or the lonely beach,
Hoards are piled young eyes to gladden,
Minds mature to teach.

Cast upon the shelf of sea-board
By a restless arm;
In this unarranged museum
How the treasures swarm!

Splinter'd armour from the battles
Of the spiny race;
Bristly coats, outgrown, yet keeping
All their former grace;

Weedy strings—long, green, and silky—
Torn, by tempest-shocks,
From the reefs of storm-swept Ushant,
Or the Scilly rocks;

Fragments of the vegetation
Of some Indian strand;
Filiant stalks of circled bamboo;
Staves with chisel'd brand;

Spar and rack from vessel founder'd;
Bear they not, impress'd,
Prints of death-cold, grasping fingers,
'Neath the wave at rest?

There it stretches—that dim region
Where the lost are laid—
Hills and crags of glimmering azure,
Table-lands of shade!

Verily, 'tis little marvel
Why, with Truth at odds,
Sages placed the Trident-bearer
High among the gods!

Deem not ye the ocean changefull
Still it heaves the same
As when Eden's rivers sought it,
Ere the Deluge came.

Widest province of that Ruler
Whom its tribes adore!
Well may onward nature perish
When it rolls no more.

'OUR VOYAGE.'

BY THE EDITOR.

SCARCELY had this 'Miscellany' been ushered into existence, when we were waited upon by an odd genius, whose hobby it was to purchase and preserve the first numbers of all new periodicals. He was a collector of first numbers, just as some men are collectors of rare pictures, of cracked china, or of 'breeches' Bibles. For him a magazine of goodly age, established character, or world-wide celebrity, had no fascinations. He cared for nothing, and hunted after nothing, save the fresh, abortive starts of literary enterprise. We know not in what the precise charm of such things consisted, and can only draw a vague analogical reason from the circumstance that infancy is more interesting than manhood—that sunrise is sweeter than noonday—that a rosebud is earlier than a rose—that the snowdrops and crocuses of spring are dearer than the rank luxuriance of midsummer.

Perhaps, however, our connoisseur in first numbers was not moved by any such fine sentiment. He may simply have been the victim of a grim, incomprehensible cynicism. We can even form some conception of his dismal delight in contrasting the ample promise with the deficient fulfilment—the high-flushing and radiant hope, with the miserable realisation and failure. His collection of first numbers amounted, he assured us, to many hundreds. It doubtless compared 'Mirrors' long since shattered, 'Worlds' that had ceased to revolve, 'Stars' and even 'Suns' that were for ever extinguished. Our 'Miscellany' he was, of course, anxious to secure for his repository of perished periodicals—in the hope that the 'blind Furies,' in a fatal conspiracy with an unappreciating public, might do something to render it speedily precious in his eyes.

It was no business of ours to interrogate our candid and very peculiar customer. For example, we did not ascertain whether—in addition to his collection of first numbers—he had a museum of dead infants preserved in bottles. Neither did we satisfy our curiosity as to whether his taste extended to the first green peas and the first lamb of the season; or whether he rushed to the moors in August to carry off the first grouse that were shot; or plunged into the street in September to devour the first oysters that were cried. Was he a gourmand in first numbers and in nothing else that was first? In any accidental dearth of these, was his reading confined to prefaces, to dedications, to introductory chapters? In architecture, did he limit his admiration to edifices stuck at the first storey for lack of funds? Cherished he a thing for all sorts of unfortunate beginnings besides the beginnings of unfortunate periodicals? Had the beginnings to which he was attached no end?

We should be decently sorry—if we could afford it—were the longevity of our 'serial' to disappoint the fair calculations of so early and prompt a patron. Thanks, however, to his penny, and to the pennies of a goodly number of thousands besides, we are enabled to decline the implied invitation—namely, that we should become editorially defunct to oblige his eccentric fancy. The Highlander might dutifully submit to be hanged in order to please the laird; but, for our own part, we confess that we own no obligation of a like self-sacrificing kind towards that mysterious first-number collector. Possibly our anonymous friend was the veritable man who patronised the lion-tamer, Van Amburgh, in the nightly expectation of seeing him devoured. Now we think on it—was there not something murderous in his grin? Yes! The eyes of our literary ogre told us, as plainly as eyes could tell, that to them periodicals were only valuable when they were discontinued, just as certain engravings are only valuable when the plates are authentically destroyed.

But let not our first-number virtuoso despair of adding to his rare and curious list. He has but to look in the right direction. We have now on our table a paper entitled 'Our Voyage.' It is duly labelled 'No. I.'—a first number, therefore, with the rare merit, as regards the purposes of the gentleman whom we have introduced to our readers, of being likewise the very last. What a prize for him!—a periodical without periodical issue—a number with no successor—a firstling with no follower—an only bantling without companion or rival. It is wholly unique. The 'No. I.' is merely significant of its oneness. Abruptly broken off, it is yet finished, like a broken monumental column—not a ruin but a device. Its very imperfection constitutes its completeness. All its purposes were fulfilled at its birth. It has run its entire course, like a human first-born graciously coveted of the gods.

The title of the periodical thus originated and conducted, but not carried on, affords a clue to its story. 'Our Voyage!' It is literal. Not the 'voyage of life,' nor any other metaphorical voyage, is intended to be shadowed forth. Simply this:—On the 16th of June 1862, some six hundred individuals embarked at Liverpool on board the steam-ship Great Britain, Captain Gray, bound for Australia. What a strange and memorable passage in the life of an ordinary landsman is a sea-passage! How completely is the old life broken off!—the voyager carrying nothing with him but a trail of sad or happy recollections. What an ample interval does it furnish for reflection as to the old world left behind, or for hope as to the new world about to be reached! But a two months' voyage is much too long for the indulgence either of tearful memories or of glowing expectations. Besides, even in the solitudes of mid ocean, six hundred men and women cannot be wholly solitary. It is natural that they should draw to each other—combine for their mutual entertainment—fortify themselves, by the delights of social intercourse, against the daily intrusion, or awful pressure, under the keen starlight or in the vast darkness, of the infinite, overpowering eternities. So was it on board the Great Britain during the voyage in question. There were flirtations on the spar-deck; concerts and private theatricals in the saloon; religious services on all the Sundays. We have said that they were leaving the old world behind them; but they were, in fact, carrying it along with them. They were a fragment of British life. In saloon, second cabin, and steerage, various classes were represented. There were social meetings, and anniversary celebrations, and complimentary addresses to the captain, and speeches, and plaudite, and songs, and recitations. Some of these last were by professional people, among whom was Miss Aitken, a popular Scotch tragedienne and reader, en route to draw forth some colonial tears—together, we hope, with sundry more substantial tributes. All these things, and many more of a kindred character, are duly and cleverly recorded in 'Our Voyage.' In addition to her ordinary freight of goods and passengers, there were, on board the Great Britain, collections of British plants and singing-birds, intended to enrich the Australian fields and woods with the perfumes and the melodies of home.

Not the least interesting part of 'Our Voyage' is 'The Log.' It consists of a regular diary of each day's doings and events; and the days, ere reaching Melbourne, were 59 in number. Thus, close upon two months sailed 'the six hundred' in that identical Great Britain which, in the earlier and less fortunate part of her career, lay a helpless hulk in Dundrum Bay, on the north coast of Ireland, for the period of nineteen months; but which, in her recent Australian voyages, has been realising the promise of her first vigorous youth. That long yet swift voyage she performed partly by sail, partly by steam, and partly by both combined, amidst weather varying from excessively hot and becalmed, to heavy squalls, strong gales, and showers of hail and snow! Some of the entries are curious. One day the pitching of the vessel threw a boiled leg of mutton into a lady's lap; whereupon the chronicler says:—'The lady's nerves received a severe shock; the lady's dress received an unextinguishable stain; further particulars will appear in a future edition.' On another occasion a pig fell overboard, and the case was pronounced one of 'fello de sea!!' In the Bay of Biscay, 'Braham's song was heard between decks; and, indeed, throughout the voyage we seem to hear the sound of human voices, breathing human feelings and passions, joining fitfully in the low murmurous chorus of wind and wave. 'No. I.' says, under date 20th June—'Some delightful music in the evening. The question frequently asked "What are the wild waves saying?" The sea does not condescend to reply, but a porpoise wags his tail in a contemptuous manner.' Mixed up of course with all this frivolity are many grave and interesting realities—the occasional meeting with other voyagers in the wide and lonely waste—the days or nights of black and howling hurricane—the bright and beautiful weather-changes—the appearance of the Southern Cross—together with all the other incidents and wonders of the great antipodean voyage. At length came the concluding day, which is thus entered:—

'Thursday, August 14th.

Great excitement amongst the passengers. Pilot boarded us at 6 a.m. A gentleman came on board, and made inquiries about the health of the passengers. Dropped anchor at noon—the passage from land to land having been made in 59 days 4 hours—the quickest run but one ever made by this favourite ship. Hurrah!'

The voyage was a prosperous, a happy, and even a merry one. It was meet that so great a community as were assembled on board the Great Britain should have their periodical, and hence the appearance of No. I. of 'Our Voyage.' But the moment they touched Australian soil, the said community dispersed and melted away—some to fortune; many, we fear, to failure; and one at least into the clutches of the law, from which he had been vainly seeking to escape. The publication could no longer be supported. Its subscribers were nowhere. They were in the embraces of their friends or fiancées; they were hurrying to the 'diggings'; they were finding, as the result of their half-world's wandering, that 'all was not gold that glittered.' There was nothing, in short, left for 'Our Voyage' but quietly to give up the ghost, leaving its first and only number to supply a theme for this casual paper, and possibly to find its way, through the present gratuitous advertisement, into the archives of that laborious first-number collector whose acquaintance we made, or rather who politely made our acquaintance, when our 'Miscellany' was new to the world.

AUNT RACHEL'S STORY (Continued).

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER VII.

'AFTER the usual ceremonies of introduction had been gone through, I found leisure to examine the features of the enthusiastic young Jacobite. The result was highly favourable. He was very dark, even swarthy in complexion; with a fine aquiline nose, and an eye like a hawk. Careless good-humour was his habitual expression, save when speaking of Charles Edward, or any other animating subject; then his eyes would kindle, his cheeks burn, and his whole frame quiver with excitement; while he played with the handle of his dirk in a manner that boded no good to the individual who ventured to cross his path in battle. We drank success to the young Prince; and the Highlander's eyes flashed and sparkled with delight on hearing me wish him success in his undertaking. My aunt smiled approvingly.

"And who are the noble fellows who have hastened to welcome their Prince to his native shores?" she said.

'Mr. Munro looked somewhat grave, and replied that, "As yet, but few had declared themselves in his favour—the circumstance of his coming unattended by any French troops having considerably damped the ardour of several powerful chiefs who would otherwise have joined his standard."

"And who are the cold-blooded traitors who have thus deserted their leader in his hour of need? Name them, Donald, that we may consign them to well-merited ignominy."

'Mr. Munro coloured, and looked down as he replied, "The Laird of Macleod and Sir Alexander Macdonald of Sleat are among the number of those who refuse to join the Prince."

'My aunt started to her feet in a transport of indignation. "What!" she cried; "do I hear aright? And have I lived to see the day when a Macdonald, one of my own house, too, should display a craven spirit, and swerve from his allegiance to the Stuarts? Oh that I were a man!" and Lady Macdonald paced to and fro with disordered steps. "To think," she went on, "that the nephew of this noble, loyal-hearted chief (she pointed to her husband's portrait), should have so far forgotten the race from which he sprung as to refuse when the son of his King deigned to supplicate assistance! I think you said, Donald, that Charles Edward despatched the brave young Clanranald to solicit his aid?"

"Yes, your ladyship; Clanranald and Allan Macdonald brother to Kinlochmoidart, started on the 22d, hoping to persuade your nephew and the Laird of Macleod to join the Prince."

"And what said the chiefs?"

"When told that the young Chevalier came without French troops, they at once declared their intention to keep aloof from so rash an enterprise; and gave it as their opinion that the sooner he returned to France the better."

'Lady Macdonald resumed her walk through the room "Sir Alexander shall rue this," she passionately exclaimed "Not one farthing of mine shall ever go to a mean-spirited poltroon who deserts his sovereign in his adversity. No never! Rather would I see Glenvoirmen level with the ground than that it should pass into the possession of one who, although a Macdonald, has caused himself to be despised by all true men."

"Dear aunt," I said, "compose yourself. The very circumstance of the Prince landing on the shores of Scotland unsupported, save by the justice of his cause; unattended, save by the prospering wind which wafted him over the sea, will excite the deepest enthusiasm in the breasts of his faithful Highlanders. The instant he unfurls his standard, thousands of the descendants of those heroes who fought at Kilsyth and Killiecrankie will hasten to support the noble young hero who thus testifies the confidence he reposes in their honour and devotion to his person."

"Miss Sackville is right," said young Munro, his black eyes flashing approval of my sentiments. "There are sufficient true hearts and willing hands to place King James on the throne without the assistance of those cautious chiefs, whose worldly wisdom and cold calculating policy would only hamper the efforts of the more chivalrous portion of the Prince's adherents. So long as there are Camerons and Munros, Mackintoshes and Macleans, to fight in behalf of the Stuarts, they need never fear defeat. Do not give way to useless sorrow. Perchance your nephew, when informed that other chiefs of the north are determined to evince their dislike of the Hanoverian dynasty, may atone for his seeming coldness by joining our ranks."

"Donald Munro!"—my aunt paused in her walk, and drew herself up to her full height—"should Alexander Macdonald join the Prince to-morrow, at the head of a thousand men, he could never redeem himself in my eyes. The disgrace would be the same. Charles Edward requested his aid; he refused, and that in terms almost insulting to the royal applicant. What will the Prince say when writing to his father? 'You told me true loyalty would dwell in the descendant of Sir Donald Macdonald; but when I despatched two friends to express my hope that the nephew would imitate the uncle's example, they were treated with coldness, and my request denied.' Oh, James! shame!" Lady Macdonald buried her face in her hands. "But I will prove my loyalty," she cried, raising her head proudly. "The Prince will soon learn that if the nephew of the brave Sir Donald declined risking his life and estates, his widow has not forgotten her husband's attachment to the Stuart cause. There are more than a hundred men on Glenvoirine estate; and, should the Prince honour my home with his presence, on my bended knees I will beg his acceptance of the only gift I have to bestow—namely, a hundred loyal Macdonalds, who refused not, when the widow of their chief commanded them, to draw their swords in favour of a Stuart!"

"Nobly spoken," said young Munro, rising to depart. "But let us not grieve, on so joyful an occasion as the present, over the unworthy conduct of those who should have been foremost on the field. The worst is past. Our Prince has landed; and let us trust that the Almighty Power, which rescued him from the perils of the deep, may in like manner protect and prosper him in the hour of battle!"

"Amen!" responded Lady Macdonald.

"While bidding my aunt adieu, Donald Munro informed her that he proceeded on the morrow to Borodale, the house in which the Prince was then residing; and requested to know whether she had any message to transmit."

"Tell him," said my aunt, in a tremulous voice, "my heart hath rejoiced to think that my aged eyes may behold one of his beloved race; and that, in the dining-room of Glenvoirine, there hangs the portrait of one who would rather have died than have suffered disgrace to fall on the name of Macdonald."

"Your wishes shall be obeyed," said young Munro; "and I fondly hope, ere we meet again, Charles Edward may be surrounded by an array of faithful Highlanders."

"God grant it!" exclaimed Lady Macdonald, enthusiastically. "Do you, Donald, raise a powerful party of Munros; send the fiery cross through the country; summon the clan to Glendunin; bid your retainers fight to the death; lead them forth to battle like a true Munro; and, on your return from Borodale, my niece shall present you with a white cockade, to grace your bonnet o' blue."

"And will Miss Sackville deign to honour me thus far?"

I blushed, and smilingly expressed the pleasure I should have in decorating the bonnet of so enthusiastic a Jacobite.

He bowed his thanks, took my hand in his, gazed on my face a moment in silence, slowly resigned his grasp, and departed.

"Now, my dear," said Lady Macdonald, as the outer gate closed upon Mr. Munro, "we must retire instantly to rest. The excitement of this evening has almost proved too much for me; and yet I would willingly go through it once more, out of admiration for the gallant young Prince, who has set us all such a bright example of perseverance and contempt of danger. Now, don't keep awake for hours, thinking about Donald. Ha, ha! He cast many a stolen glance in the direction of a young lady who shall be nameless. My word, had Robert Seymour seen him, he would have been in a pretty way. Well, well! If the young fall in love, they must make up their minds to abide the consequences. If you choose to lose your heart with a handsome lad—Donald Munro by name—in the absence of your betrothed, why—"

"Dear aunt," I said, laughing, "do not be afraid. There is not the slightest chance of your friend falling in love with me, or I with him."

"I am glad to hear you so positive regarding yourself, my child. Constancy to the absent is a thing greatly to be admired. As regards Donald, however, I am not quite so certain. He seemed, judging from the frequency of his looks, pretty much inclined to fall in love with my fair niece. What nonsense I am talking! Really, Prince Charles' arrival has quite bewildered me. O Rachel, my dear, how you will admire our young Chevalier! Fortunately, your heart is safe in the keeping of a gentleman at present in Rome; otherwise—"

"Aunt! aunt!" I exclaimed imploringly.

"Well, well, dearest; I shall not distress you by even hinting at such a thing. Good night. God bless you! Constancy is much to be admired."

"Oh, had she but known!"

CHAPTER VIII.

"A month glided away on the wings of expectation—each day bringing us important news of Prince Charles' success. His standard had been unfurled in the wilds of Glenfinnan; and he quitted the glen at the head of nearly twelve hundred men. Donald Munro made us acquainted with the joyful intelligence, and received from my hands the promised cockade; which he gallantly pressed to his lips ere placing it on his bonnet. He informed my aunt that the Prince fully intended halting at Glenvoirine on his way south, in order that he might make the acquaintance of one whom he was proud to rank among his friends. Lady Macdonald's tears fell fast. Unable to speak, she clasped her hands, and raised her eyes towards Heaven."

For myself, I felt overcome with mingled feelings of joy and sorrow—joy at the thought of seeing the hero whose portrait had so excited my imagination; sorrow, when I reflected on the disparity existing between us. Meantime, I had secured a new lover in the person of Donald Munro. The morning sun shone on his barque as it flew across the lake to Glenvoirnen, while the moon's soft rays illumined the earth ere he returned to Glendunin. My aunt at first viewed his growing partiality with indifference. At length, becoming seriously alarmed, she ventured to drop a few hints relative to my prior engagement; but they fell upon inattentive ears. Donald either could not or would not comprehend the meaning she wished him to attach to her words; but kept close by me the entire day, and consulted me on all things relative to his joining the Prince—which he intended doing when Charles Edward visited Glenvoirnen. He was a noble, manly-hearted young Highlander; and I listened, entranced, while he described his retainers' devotion to the cause they were so shortly to defend with their lives. Endless were the inquiries I made respecting him who thus aroused such tempestuous feelings in the breasts of those warlike mountaineers; and as my colour came and went while listening to his praises, poor Donald fondly imagined I had discovered, and was not displeased with, the passion I had excited in his breast; when, in reality, my thoughts were entirely engrossed by the captivating hero whose praises he had so enthusiastically sounded.

'While seated at breakfast on the morning of the twenty-third of August—never-to-be-forgotten day!—we were startled by a hasty summons at the outer gate. Almost immediately afterwards, a letter was placed in my aunt's hands. It was from Donald Munro, and contained this brief but agitating notice:—"The Prince marches southward to-day; he will be at Glenvoirnen about two o'clock."

'All was instantly bustle and confusion within and around Glenvoirnen. A young gentleman, one of the clan, was despatched to assemble the Macdonalds preparatory to the Prince's arrival; while the dining-room was converted into a banqueting-hall, and festooned with Stuart tartan, intermingled with white roses and heather, out of compliment to the royal visitor. A long table ran down the centre of the room, on which was laid out an elegant repast, lest the Prince or any of his suite felt inclined to partake of refreshment. So magnificent was the old plate adorning it, that I could not refrain from expressing my admiration. My aunt smiled with pardonable vanity; and said, taking a small plain cup in her hand, "This little thing is dearer to me than aught else. Out of it Sir Donald drank during his campaigns with Dundee and the Earl of Mar. Ay; well do I remember his giving me a description of their bivouac on the field of Sheriffmuir, and his drinking success to their cause out of this very cup. Precious relic!"

'It being time to think of dressing, my aunt proceeded to her chamber; requesting me to accompany her. On entering the room, Macgregor advanced, bearing an elegant white dress, adorned with bows of Stuart tartan ribbon, which Lady Macdonald informed me was intended for the adornment of my person. After thanking my dear, generous aunt, I unrobed; and Macgregor, smiling and smirking the while, passed over my head the costly muslin.

'The scarf and white rose completed my toilet. Both aunt and maid agreed in declaring that I was the very image of Lady Lovat. I obeyed my aunt's injunction, to look in the mirror; and certainly was not displeased with the result. I had entirely lost the pallor which characterized my complexion at Fenton Abbey. My cheeks had become ruddy with health, and my eyes sparkled with unwonted vivacity. My expression was no longer one of sentimental dejection—sweet anticipation rendered it bright and animated. In short, my whole aspect was changed, and, I felt, changed for the better.

"Rachel," observed Lady Macdonald, eyeing me approvingly, "Nature certainly intended you to be the wife of a Highland chieftain. And, should Robert Seymour prove faithless, you will be the lady of Glendunin; and proud will young Donald be to have you."

"Indeed, ma'am," said Macgregor, "a better than Mr. Munro would be glad to see so handsome a young lady as Miss Sackville presiding at his table. The Prince himself —"

"Hush! hush!" replied my aunt, gravely. "Don't fill the girl's head with nonsense. The Prince will have other things to attend to than remarking whether a maiden's eyes be blue or black." Lady Macdonald then bade her maid fetch the brocade dress she wore on the occasion of Sir Donald's return to Glenvoirnen, after the battle of Sheriffmuir. While Macgregor proceeded to array her mistress, I made my escape to my chamber; and with a beating heart and listening ear awaited tidings of the Prince's arrival. More than an hour elapsed; still no sign of his approach. At length, wearied out of all patience, I proceeded down stairs to the dining-room, to have another look at my aunt's preparations.

'On entering, I was surprised to see a tall young man attired in the Highland costume, standing opposite the picture of the Chevalier de St. George. His back was towards me; and so attentively was he regarding the portrait, that my entrance passed unheeded. At length the rustle of my dress attracted his attention. He looked round—the original of the miniature stood before me! His blood rushed in floods to my heart. I turned pale as death and stood irresolute—not knowing whether to advance or retire. The Prince did not give me much time to consider which course to adopt. He instantly came towards me, and, with the most winning smile in the world, said, "The Miss Sackville is not an enemy to the Stuart cause?"

"No, your Royal Highness," I exclaimed, sinking on my knees before him. "Willingly would I die could my death restore to you the throne of your ancestors."

'He smiled a melancholy smile as he raised me from my kneeling posture. "Then we enlist you on our side. So saying, he removed his bonnet; and, detaching its white cockade, fastened it on my dress.

'A tremor passed through my frame as I recalled my dream, so strangely fulfilled. I remained motionless, unable to speak. Observing my emotion, the Prince thoughtfully withdrew a little aside, that I might the sooner recover my presence of mind. At this embarrassing moment, my aunt entered. On beholding the Prince she started back amazed. Instantly recovering herself, however, she advanced, and, sinking at his feet, took his hand in hers, and pressed it to her lips.

"Kneel not to us," said Charles Edward, raising me gently from the ground. "The widow of Sir Donald Macdonald needs not thus testify her loyalty; and we are too happy to have this opportunity of thanking Lady Macdonald for the kind interest she has expressed in our behalf; and hope that, when in possession of Holyrood Palace, our receptions may be graced by her presence; that of her niece, who has also desired to express her sympathy in favour of the Stuarts."

"Oh! your Royal Highness!" my aunt's lips quivered. Unable to proceed, she pointed to his father's portrait.

The Prince, quite affected by this mute demonstration of devotion, turned aside his head to conceal his emotion.

Lady Macdonald recovered herself by a mighty effort.

"Did your Royal Highness come unattended to Glenvoir?" she inquired.

"No; we came hither escorted by our faithful Highlanders. Desirous, however, of a private interview with a loyal subject as Lady Macdonald, we outstripped our followers, and attained the Castle unperceived. It is thus," continued the Prince, dropping the royal we, "that Charles Edward loves to thank his friends for their support. Frequently has he heard in France of the noble, chivalrous disposition of Sir Donald Macdonald; and bitterly does he regret the decease of so distinguished a chief."

My aunt's eyes overflowed with tears of proud satisfaction, in being thus addressed by her Prince. Pointing towards her husband's picture, she exclaimed, with marked emphasis, "Yes, your Royal Highness; his sole ambition was to see the Stuarts reinstated on the throne of Britain; and amply would he have deemed himself repaid for all his sufferings could he have seen the son of his sovereign within the walls of Glenvoir, and heard him give utterance to the gracious words which have sounded so pleasantly in my aged ears."

Lady Macdonald was interrupted by the sound of bagpipes. The Prince's eyes sparkled with pleasure. "Here are our brave followers," he exclaimed; and, giving my aunt his hand, led her forth on the terrace, from whence we could plainly distinguish a large body of men descending a mountain side.

"How would such music be relished in England, Miss Ashville?" inquired the Prince—a joyous smile lighting up his fine countenance.

"By many it would be hailed with delight," I replied, enthusiastically.

He smiled his thanks; and, turning towards Lady Macdonald, entered into an animated explanation regarding his future plans. The music sounded nearer and nearer, until at length the dense column of men was within a few yards of the Castle.

The Prince was about to speak, when the strains of rival bagpipes arrested his attention. He paused a moment, to make sure his ears had not deceived him; and then turned an inquiring eye on Lady Macdonald, evidently desiring an explanation. Soon was he answered. The music sounded fiercer and more near; and, in less than five minutes from the time we first heard the soul-stirring strains, a band of Highlanders, to the number of a hundred and fifty, arrayed in the Macdonald tartan, marched into the field fronting the terrace; and, forming into a square, stood, sword in hand, awaiting further orders.

With heightened colour and flashing eyes my aunt exclaimed, pointing to the Prince as she spoke, "Men! behold your leader! Henceforth you belong to him. Fight for him; and, if necessary, die for him; but never disgrace the clan to which you belong!" Then, kneeling on one knee, she said, "Your Royal Highness! words cannot paint the shame and sorrow that overwhelmed me, when informed of the dastardly conduct of one who should have been foremost in taking the field on this joyful occasion. It would have broken my husband's heart, could he have foreseen that the representative of his house would refuse to arm his clan when the son of his King required their services. But, God be praised! there are many brave men in whose bosoms the pure flame of loyalty is unextinguishable. Led on by you, they will fight to the death; and, believe me, among all the heroic Highlanders who flock around your standard, none will be found more fearless in danger, more devoted to your person, than these who, I am proud to say, are called by my name. Honour me, then, by accepting them; and may the loyalty of the aunt in some measure atone for the disloyalty of the nephew."

Thus spoke the noble-minded woman; and the air was instantly rent with cheers and cries of "Long live King James! Down with the Elector of Hanover!"

The Prince was overwhelmed by emotion. He strove to express his gratitude; but the words died away on his lips. Unable to speak, he warmly pressed my aunt's hand, and smiled the thanks he could not utter. The Macdonalds, after lowering their swords and saluting the Prince, joined his other adherents, who had now approached as near to the Castle as their numbers would permit, and stood awaiting marching orders. Their chiefs came forward to exchange salutations with Lady Macdonald. Scarcely had they reached the terrace, when the pibroch resounded in the distance. All stood expectant.

"Ah, this is Donald!" cried my aunt joyfully. "I recognise the gathering of the Munroes."

The sun at this moment burst from behind a cloud, and its rays shone full on a body of men advancing along the banks of the loch. At sight of this reinforcement, the assembled Highlanders gave forth a series of huzzas, which awoke the echoes around; nor did they cease until the new-comers—to the number of two hundred men, headed by Donald Munro and his younger brother—wheeled into the park, already tenanted by so splendid an array of adherents. Then the different pipers struck up "The Gathering of the Clans." My aunt waved her handkerchief in the air; and, with tears coursing down her cheeks, cried aloud, in the fervour of her enthusiasm, "God bless and prosper King James the Third, and his Royal Highness Prince Charles Edward!"

"O Emily! that was a scene to be remembered. My day-dreams of chivalry and renown were more than realised when my gaze rested on the gallant young Prince, for whom so many brave mountaineers were ready to sacrifice their lives."

Our party was now joined by the two Munroes. The Prince received them with marked satisfaction; and complimented them on the fine martial appearance of their men. All the chiefs and gentlemen of distinction being now assembled on the terrace, my aunt ventured to suggest that some refreshment would not prove unacceptable, after so much excitement and fatigue. Charles Edward bowed his thanks, and conducted her into the dining-room. I followed, leaning on the arm of the gallant Lochiel. The others came after. Although frequently at Court when the élite of both countries were assembled, yet never have I seen such a cluster of splendid-looking men as were present that day in the old Castle of Glenvoir. Cameron of Lochiel, young Macdonald of Clanranald, the two Munroes, the Chief of Glengarry, and he of Kinlochmoidart—all were equally handsome and distinguished looking; but who would ever have regarded them in presence of their leader? Ah, Emily! he was the personification of all that was noble and chivalrous. Much as I expected from the miniature, the reality far exceeded my expectations. The beauty of his countenance, the winning softness of his smile and manner, endeared him to all who entered his presence; while his gaiety and sanguine disposition instilled hope in the breasts of those least certain of success. Donald Munro managed to seat himself at my left hand, and endeavoured to engage my attention; but I had leisure for none save the Prince. When he spoke, I listened with breathless attention; and when he addressed himself to me, or turned his eyes in my direction, I blushed painfully, and displayed such agitation as attracted the notice of the assembled chiefs. Being the only young lady present, I received great attention from every one; each strove to render himself agreeable, and expressed the pleasure it afforded him to see an English lady adopt the Highland scarf and Stuarts' badge.

"Ay, but Rachel is one of us!" said my aunt, over-hearing their remarks. "She is an enthusiastic Jacobite; and would not rest satisfied until she had constructed dozens of cockades for my men."

"I was overpowered with confusion while my aunt spoke thus. The Prince smiled graciously; and thanked me in the most courteous language for my flattering sympathy. "Who would ever despair of success," he said, addressing Lochiel, "when the ladies are our staunch supporters? With their bright eyes to encourage us, and their fair hands to weave us badges of distinction, we will carry all before us;—then, let us onward!"

"So saying, the Prince rose from the table; the others imitating his example. "Accept," he said, taking Lady Macdonald by the hand, "our best thanks for the love thou bearest our person and cause. Never can we forget Glenvoir and its noble owner. While remembrance lasts, this day will stand conspicuous above all others, because of the encouragement we have received to pursue our enterprise; and, when once in possession of our royal Palace of Holyrood, Lady Macdonald and Miss Sackville will be foremost among the number of those invited to witness their sovereign's triumph."

"God bless and prosper your Royal Highness!" replied my aunt, kneeling to kiss his hand. "The sceptre and crown are before you. God recover what is lawfully yours! and long may your noble father live to be a blessing and protection to those loyal subjects who risked their all to place him on the throne."

"God grant we may never forget the gratitude due to our faithful Highlanders, who have thus come forward to aid their Prince in his extremity," he exclaimed, visibly affected. "All who survive the horrors of war will be honoured and recompensed by us when crowned with success; and the names of those who bravely fought and fell shall be held in hallowed remembrance while memory survives, to remind us that they died—as only the true and brave would wish to die—fighting in behalf of their lawful King. Farewell! we shall, we trust, soon meet in the Scottish capital. Miss Sackville—adieu!"

"Our hands touched; our eyes met, lingered a moment, and were withdrawn. That speaking glance sealed my destiny. It haunted me in long after years; it haunts me now; it will haunt me to my grave."

"Dear Miss Sackville!" A shade of sorrow clouded the usually joyous face of Donald Munro, as, taking my hand in his, he pressed it to his lips. "I am leaving the sweet solitude of Glendunin," he said, "to follow the fortunes of my Prince, wherever they may lead me. Your aunt visits Edinburgh when once it is in our possession. You will be with her. Until then—adieu!"

"Adieu!" I said, mechanically. My eyes were following the retreating figure of the Prince, as he hastened to rejoin his men. He placed himself at their head; and, drawing his sword from its scabbard, pointed onward. The assembled Highlanders cheered to the echo; the bagpipes struck up a favourite Jacobite air; and, from the terrace, we gazed after the departing warriors until they disappeared among the mountains.

"Rachel!"

"Dearest aunt!"

"A convulsive pressure of her hand alone betrayed the fervour of my feelings."

(To be continued.)

A PLEA FOR THE PLAYERS.

Poetess—"I mean the matter that you read, my lord!"
Hamlet—"Slanders, sir."

THE curtain had descended. The 'fair benefactor,' as the newspapers say, had achieved a great success in the new piece—the bringing out of which had been postponed till her benefit night. A unanimous call was made for her; and she appeared, led on by the hero of the piece. A shower of bouquets descended on the stage; and she retired, blushing almost as red as the roses which were sprinkled among the bouquets.

The applause subsided; part of the audience went out for ten minutes' recess, the rest chatted and consulted the bill; the orange and lemonade boys in the pit and galleries stalked about, retailing their wares, and looking, as they picked their steps over the heads of the audience, like so many Gullivers among the Lilliputians.

The whole performance had been a real intellectual treat, and had been enjoyed amazingly by the audience—a fashionable provincial audience, in one of the first provincial cities in England. I was sitting in the middle of the dress circle—alone as regards companionship, but surrounded by the very quintessence of the gentility of the town. Rich merchants, with their wives, daughters, sons; young merchants and men about town, with their sweet-hearts. By-the-way, sweetheart seems to me to be a sort of patronising word, only to be used when referring to clerks and shopkeepers with their little milliners, and 'people in that walk of life.' I confess that, in using it with reference to wealthy merchants' sons and daughters, I experience a twinge of conscience. Would scawels do?

I was, I repeat, surrounded by wealth, and, of course, fashion. The young ladies and their mammams had been highly amused; and the gentlemen, although they did their best to look bored and blasé, could not help occasionally being betrayed into expressions of delight and approbation, which they made up for at the end of each act by cold criticism of the poetess. Now that the piece was over (a sparkling comedy, which had met with great success in London), the mammams and young ladies began graciously to speak of the clever actress who had contributed so much to their instruction and delectation.

'Miss—Miss what? eh?' said an old, dowager-looking lady, the middle of a coterie of bombasino, Brussels lace, red and blue opera-cloaks, black dress-coats, lavender gloves, and eye-glasses.

'Miss Kate Atherton,' said an insipid-looking Dundreary party, with his hair parted down the middle, and an eye-glass dangling from his button-hole; and which persistently refused to stick in its place, thereby saving him a frightful distortion of features and injury to his eyesight.

'These creatures seem all to be mimses,' continued the dowager-looking lady, regarding the bill through her gold spectacles. 'Do they ever marry? What is this Miss Atherton?'

'An actress, mamma; and a clever, charming girl,' said the youngest, most amiable, and best-looking of the company. 'Oh, how I should like to know her!'

'How foolish you talk, Georgina, to be sure. Know an actress!' said another lady, evidently a married sister.

'Why not?' continued Georgina. 'She seems an intelligent, well-bred, and accomplished lady.'

The company laughed, and the fond mamma smiled indulgently. 'Foolish Georgy!' she said, 'those theatrical people have always some inherent badness. Probably she supports a drunken father and mother, who make a living of the girl; and are not afraid to see her do anything bad, as long as it leads to their own profit.'

'Oh, mamma!' said the young lady, 'don't be so harsh.' 'Not harsh at all, child. Alfred there knows all about actors and their belongings. I dare say he will corroborate what I say.'

'Oh, Alfred!' said the whole bevy of young ladies, 'do you know her? Tell us about her;—do.'

Alfred smiled meaningly, as if he were 'rather inclined to think he did know her,' as he would have expressed it himself.

'Oh, you wicked wretch, Alfred! What delightful scandal do you know about her? Come, tell us,' said a young lady with blonde curls—almost a beauty.

Alfred smiled again, once more attempted to screw the glass in front of his eye, made a signal failure, and looked at the bill again, as if he wished to evade the question.

'Now, my dear young ladies,' said the bland Alfred, 'don't ask me. I don't wish to shock you.'

'Shock! Nonsense!' was the chorus. 'Now, Alfred, don't tantalise us. Oh, you naughty fellow! you seem to know all those delightful, dangerous creatures.'

'Well, she is a nice young lady,' said Alfred; 'but I am afraid that she would not make a proper companion for you, Georgy, although you seem to desire it so much.'

'Why?'

'Because she is not married.'

'Well, she don't pretend to be. Her name is "Miss" as the bill,' said Georgy.

'But, my dear, she has a score of lovers.'

'Well, what of that? So have I.'

'Now, you little inquisitive, you have forced me to it. She lives with one who is—'

'What! oh?' cried all in a breath.

'Not her husband.'

There was a little cry of delighted horror; and Alfred turned round to speak to an acquaintance who had just entered, almost as insipid-looking as himself.

'Well, Alf,' the acquaintance whispered, after shaking hands with the ladies, 'how does she look to-night?'

'Splendid! lovelier than ever. But she is not worth my attention.'

'How! What about the present?'

'I sent it.'

'Lady's watch, set in diamonds, was it not?'

'Exactly. Cost me thirty pounds. But, thank God! I have it back.'

'How's that? I am impatient to hear.'

'Well, the fact is, I sent the watch, accompanied with a note, begging her to accept it—stating that I would feel extremely gratified at the honour of her acquaintance; asking her to acknowledge the safe receipt of the present; and begging her to inform me, at the same time, when I should have the pleasure of waiting upon her at her house, to pay my respects. Well, the result was that next day I received the watch back, accompanied with a very lady-like epistle, as I have no doubt she thought, in which she thanked me for my kindness; begged to return the present, which she could not think of accepting, especially as she felt it her duty to decline the honour of the acquaintance of a total stranger, who deemed that a note and a trinket were sufficient to justify him in asking to pay his respects to one who wished them not, and to whom he had never been introduced.'

'Ah! I see,' said Alfred's friend. 'It's a case of the virtuous peasant girl—in chints gown, short petticoats, high-heeled boots, and straw hat—refusing the proffered gold of the proud lord of the manor. Egad! the girl lives perpetually in the stage atmosphere; but courage, Alf, my boy. Try her with a necklace; alip that under her observation, as Mephistophiles says.'

'No good, my boy! When that class of persons make up their mind, Mephistophiles himself wont alter it. Besides, I have made inquiries, and find she is respectable.'

'Well, what of that? They must be so at one portion of their career—the commencement. Very likely she is only pretending, however—nibbling at a better bait. What's the next piece? Oh! the burlesque. We shall see Miss Featherlot. Sweet little creature!'

'Heaven help the girl!' I said, when I had involuntarily overheard the conversation; 'and help all of her malignéd profession!' I felt inclined to turn round and call the gilded coward, slanderer and liar to his face; but it would require a general crusade, greater than that instituted by Peter the Hermit, to put down the class who deem actors and actresses fair subjects for abuse and false witness.

When the burlesque is finished, and the theatre empty, I sallay forth to have some supper at one of the contiguous taverns. I enter one frequented by the fast clerks and tradesmen's sons of the city. Drinking, smoking, eating, boasting, and scandal are going on bravely. I call for a chop and half-a-pint of stout, and sit down. There is a small coterie of very fast-looking, bejewelled, and bewhiskered youths at the next table, who are talking very loud. As I eat my chop and drink my stout, I can't help overhearing their conversation.

'Ha!' says one, 'she's artful.'

'Aint she!' echoes another.

'I believe you!' another sighs out, as he finishes a pull at the quart pot.

'Why, what do you mean?' asks a light-haired, mild-looking, whiskerless youth. 'Nothing wrong against the girl, I hope.'

'Oh, no. Not at all!' continues the first speaker, leeringly winking at his companions. 'She aint up to snuff; she doesn't know what's what; does she? All but the light-haired young man chorus deeply, 'Ah, I suppose not!'

'What's wrong about her? She seems to be a very clever and entertaining girl. What do you know about her, Barclay?'

Barclay, the first speaker, looks fiercely up, as if to defy contradiction. 'Mean to tell me,' he says, 'that her name is Miss Featherlot? Teach grandmother to suck eggs?'

'Well, what if her name is not Featherlot? Many actors and actresses assume names. She plays, sings, and dances remarkably well; and is, without doubt, a valuable acquisition to the stock company.'

'Ah?' continues Barclay, looking very profound, 'I know something about her!'

'Well, perhaps you do,' says Light Hair; 'but not to her disadvantage, I hope.'

'Cut away from her husband, low comedian—lived with a captain in the army for six months—husband wont have anything to do with her now.'

'How do you know all this?' asks Light Hair.

'Heard it.'

'From whom?'

'Well, in general conversation in this room. But hang your impertinence, Harvey; what do you mean by cross-questioning me in that manner? Are you nuts on the girl?'

'I don't wish to cross-question you; but doesn't it strike you, Barclay, in the light of mean and cowardly, to retail tap-room scandal in the manner you have done. It does me. I think you are libelling the girl grossly; and you are all the more to blame, because she is not present to defend herself. I happen to know her intimately, and can testify that what you have said is foul scandal. She is as pure and respectable as her best friends could wish her to be.'

'Ha! pure and respectable! That is a good-un! Gammon, Harvey! Idea—actress respectable!'

'Why do you encourage them, Barclay, in that case. You laughed, and seemed to enjoy yourself, both in the play and the burlesque, as much as any one present.'

'Don't at all deny it. Paid my money; and have a right to enjoy myself.'

'Why, what nonsense you talk, to be sure!' continued the firm Light Hair. 'Who ever heard of you paying? You sneaked about till you got an order; and in return, you vilify the very people who had consideration for your empty pockets, and gave you a night's enjoyment for nothing.'

'Is this intended for an insult?' said the truculent-looking Barclay, starting up, and glaring wildly at Light Hair.

'Just as you please,' said Light Hair. 'It's truth.'

All slanderers and backbiters are cowards. So Barclay glared another moment; uttered something about not wishing to 'kick up a row,' 'knock head off,' &c.; set down, and moodily filled his pipe.

'There's Dukkinfield, the heavy man!' he recommenced, in a sneering tone, as a gentlemanly-looking, portly man passed through the lobby and exited by the door. 'Thrashed his wife last night. Blacken her eyes to-night, dessey. Poor creature!'

'It's an untruth again,' said Light Hair. 'He is unmarried; keeps his mother and sister, to whom he is a kind and good son and brother. How did you hear that he thrashed his wife?'

'Rumour, of course. Everybody knows it.'

'Then rumour lies again.'

Barclay was caught again, and so wailed out, sneeringly, 'Who the deuce would be an actor? Bad lot, generally.'

'True; who indeed?' echoed the company, all except Light Hair.

'You wouldn't, Barclay,' said the undaunted champion of truth; 'you haven't brains to become one. And although you affect to despise Dukkinfield, still I have no doubt you would be glad if your total year's income reached a third of his six months' salary.'

But, etoostera, etoostera, to that conversation. Would to Heaven that it and the former were all that the writer ever heard damaging to the fair fame of actors and actresses! O much-maligned race! when will this end? When will people, high and low, cease to sneer away the reputation of as hard-working, amiable, and intelligent a class of people as there is to be found in any profession? Far be it from the writer to fulminate any cant sympathy, or try to invest the profession with any maudlin sentimentality; for in that case he would be worse than slandering them. But it is too true an evil that, with regard to actors and actresses, there is a growing tendency on the part of great numbers of the public at large, of all grades, to slander and vilify them; whilst, at the same time, they are not ashamed to enjoy and instruct themselves, by contemplation of their talents and accomplishments. 'Well,' but some will say, 'it is nonsense to deny that they commit a great many indiscretions, and through their private conduct give rise to a great deal of talk and scandal.'

Be charitable, and look at home! Far less indiscretion than what takes place in ordinary life. Where, in any other profession, do you see so much kindness among themselves, and so much sympathy for charitable institutions? How often does the actor cheerfully submit to the loss of a night's salary, in order that some benevolent fund may benefit by a gratuitous performance? This takes place repeatedly in a single year, and represents serious item in his income—far more than many private and wealthy people, who affect to sneer at himself as his calling, would ever think of giving. How frequently do actresses volunteer their services to assist at amateur performances; and often, in consequence, have to submit to a great deal of laughter and derision, through the clownish attempts of some egotistical 'stage-struck,' who discover that it is one thing to mumble through the part at a rehearsal, and another to identify himself with the character before an audience!

I cannot close this paper without lingering fondly on scene which took place not long ago at Woking, in Surrey—viz. the installation of the first inmates of the Royal Dramatic College. Regard the quiet, unostentatious, delicate manner with which the proceedings were conducted. Surely this touching proof of their unanimity and kindness should silence all slander. But, alas! it may be said truly to those entering on the histrionic profession 'Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not scape calumny.'

R. L. GENTLES.

LITTLE WILLIE.

THE wind is blowing roughly
Against my window pane;
And, like a knell's sad tolling,
Drop, drop the drops of rain.
A dark and dreary evening,
Meet for a heart alone—
A heart which once had treasure
To clasp, and call its own!

I know they took him from me,
And bore him far away;
I cannot but remember
That dark and bitter day.
Dead as he was I nursed him,
And held him to my breast:
Until, with words of comfort,
They laid my boy to rest.

And yet, somehow, I call him
As though he still would come Back to his vacant corner—
Back from his narrow home.
'Willie!' I cry; 'my Willie!'
But oh! I cry in vain;
Echoes fly back and mock me,
But he comes not again.

And then I see good angels
Shine forth from out the dark—
Like lights upon the ocean
Lost men should miss their mark.
And low, mysterious murmurs
Swell in the twilight dim,
'He shall not come for ever,
But thou shalt go to him!'

W. C. D.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 12 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, London, E.C.; and 22 St. Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

7

8

Glasgow. Paisley has, therefore, the honour of being his birthplace; but the genius of that 'Christopher North,' whose name and deeds were to be indissolubly connected with the Manse of Mearns, may be said to have been cradled amongst the moors. The stranger walking or riding through 'Our Parish,' will not be struck by any particular beauty which it possesses. A wild, desolate country-side it is, with a few low-lying hills, a few lochs or ponds, a few clumps of trees; holding but this one recommendation, that from it—as from a vantage-ground—one may look down upon some of the finest scenery in Scotland. Ascending the highest of its eminences, you will see, lying afar in the west, the Frith of Clyde—its silver studded with innumerable islands; towards the east, the rivulet-glens and undulations of Lanarkshire—darkened by sycamore, and birch, and fir; while away in the north rise the dim, blue peaks of the Highland mountains, which the young Christopher learned to love while yet a boy. With the minister of this parish John Wilson dwelt, until he was removed, in his twelfth year, to Glasgow College; and the record of his life during this period reads like the record of a golden dream, until the reader almost fancies that he, too, was born in the Mearns.

In 1797, the yellow-haired youth came to Glasgow—there to attend the usual University classes. Tall beyond his years, and possessed of a frank and pleasant disposition, he won himself many friends; and we are not surprised to find from his diary that his studies were lightened both by the amusements of his fellow-striplings and by companionship of a gentler kind. Like all other boys of his age, he wrote a vast deal of nonsense at this time; and it is on this point alone that we are disposed to find fault with Mrs. Gordon's very excellent memoir. There is somewhat too much given of this foolish vapouring; and there are likewise many quotations from his diary that could have been well dispensed with. Further on in life, it is really amusing to see an aspiration to Heaven joined to a chronicle of a pet-hen's eggs. But surely the precise amount of coppers which the young collegian was wont to expend on barley-sugar might have been discreetly withheld. One cannot but think of a conversation of Burns, wherein the then dying poet expressed to Mrs. Riddell his fear 'that every scrap of his writing would be revived against him, to the injury of his future reputation; that letters and verses, written with unguarded and improper freedom, and which he earnestly wished to have buried in oblivion, would be handed about by idle vanity or malevolence when no dread of his resentment would restrain them.' Poor Burns' forebodings were but too prophetic. Over the grave of no other poet has such a mass of rubbish been raked up for the self-glorification of certain literary rag-pickers. Indeed, in those days when everybody has his or her life written, it were well that a habit of circumspection with regard to letter-writing were more widely inculcated upon our young people. John Wilson, meantime, only suffers through some silly stories, which are as false as they are foolish. Spare him, ye autograph hunters!

Until he was seventeen years of age, Wilson remained at Glasgow College, signalising himself as much by gymnastic exploits as by intimate acquaintance with Æschylus and Sophocles. During this time, too, our young poet managed to fall in love with a fair Lanarkshire girl, known in these memoirs by the name of Margaret. She was young and beautiful; he was young and hopeful—why should they not together go down through life? It was not to be. Meanwhile, Wilson in 1803 removed to Oxford University, whither he took with him a strong attachment for this Margaret of Dychmont. And now his college life began—a long period of alternate fitful hard work and vagrant idleness. At one time we have him thrashing a man who, after being licked, declares that his unknown opponent must be either John Wilson or the Devil; and, at another, we have him passing sleepless nights of feverish anxiety about a forthcoming examination. A strange, restless, exuberant spirit—either in rapturous ecstasy or black despair; but Margaret of Dychmont was at the bottom of it all. In his letters at this time, however, there is just a touch of exaggeration, as though he were saying, 'Look now, how I, through being a poet, am in love!' Yet his affection for this girl seems to have been real and genuine; and to it we owe many of the most beautiful passages in his writings. To marry her, he writes, would kill his mother—filial duty prevails, and poor Margaret is heard of no more.

This splendid fellow, who was the wonder and admiration of all the different sets of college men, passed as had been expected, a most brilliant examination. The college dons, who generally are shy of such boisterous youths, united in lauding his attainments. His companions, admiring as much the general kindness of his disposition as the vigour of his mental powers, were equally enthusiastic; and Wilson left Oxford in 1807, having earned golden opinions from every one.

A new section of his life commences. He has reached manhood; has bought a piece of land and a house for himself; and, at the beautiful and well-known Ellera, has settled down as one of the Lake Poets. But his method of settling down was somewhat peculiar. Out at all seasons of the year, in all weathers, by night or by day, on the lake or among the hills;—there was nothing too erratic about John Wilson for the inhabitants of the lake district to credit. Had it been reported that Wilson of Ellera had thrashed the Fiend in a hand-to-hand fight on the summit of Helvellyn, the simple people of Winandmere would have wondered and believed. He was in the full bloom and vigour of his manhood. He was not remarkable for his height—any recruiting tailor could have produced his superior; he was not remarkable for his strength—many a prize-fighter could have beaten him; he was not remarkable for his beauty—any tea-party could have produced sweeter-looking young men; he was not remarkable for his genius—there were many greater poets than he alive;—but he was remarkable and altogether unique in that he had a large proportion of all those qualities, united in perfect harmony rarely to be seen among men. Altogether, a man of equal development physically and mentally. Yet rather than think of him at this time, with his over-florid complexion and 'enormous whiskers,' we would think of him as the lithe and supple young man who could beat any lad in Glasgow College at a step-and-leap; or as the keen-eyed old man, sitting in judgment over the sins of a literary world in the imaginary arbour of the imaginary Buchanan Lodge. It is to this later period, we presume, that Mrs Gordon's description of him pertains:—'The old man and mighty, whose eyes were "as the flames of fiery flame," and his voice like an organ who laid about him, when the fit was on, like a hammer breaking small men's bones; who was loose and careless in his apparel, even as in all things he seemed too strong and primitive to heed much the dictates of custom.' This is a good passage; but the manner in which it is fashioned is better, and the reader will note the fine spondaic movement with which the latter closes:—'Scott drew his first breath in Edinburgh; here he was living, a fair-haired youth of fifteen, when black Burns passed through; and when he grew up to be the man that the world was proud of . . . Wilson, the magnificent, had his dwelling here; here he chanted his prose-poetry, and here, so savage, his yellow mane.'*

In his beautiful estate on Windermere, Wilson lived for some time a happy young bachelor, writing poetry, boating on the lake, walking at midnight through the mountains; becoming acquainted with Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, De Quincey, and a host of others; becoming acquainted, too, with a certain lady, by name Miss Jane Penny—which gentle lady who was destined to lead through life in silk. As this yellow-maned lion, he soon thereafter married; setting out upon a long life of happiness with a bright prospect as ever flushed the dream of a young poet. When he did settle down to work, it was to finish the 'Iale of Palms,' a graceful, beautiful poem, but very unlike the work of John Wilson. From this trance of love, and youth, and poetry, he was roused to the fact that, in pecuniary matters, he had been ruined by the deceit of a near relative; and from 'a more sheltered Ellerray' he, forced by circumstances, went to Edinburgh. There, in 1815, he was seated at the bar, though we do not read that his affairs were so urgent as to make him much of a lawyer. He and young Lockhart seem to have amused themselves considerably in those days; and several anecdotes are given of their madcap pranks. Wilson, of course, was off to the Highlands, or away on a fishing excursion, on every possible opportunity; and one day, indeed, which he and his gentle wife made into the high country, struck the conventionalities of Edinburgh with amazement. Together they walked on the one pedestrian tour 250 miles—he carrying the baggage of both; and very amusing is the account of the receptions given to the 'gangrel bodies' at their various halting-places. Edinburgh thought him mad, and laughed.

New commences that connection with Blackwood's Magazine which was to make the name of John Wilson known to the world. His poetry had been successful to a certain extent; but his fame as a poet came with but a secondary light beside such luminaries as Wordsworth, Walter Scott, and Byron. But in this magazine he was destined to discover a new continent for himself, which he was to people with creations unique and hitherto undreamed of. Prose-poetry, out of the Scriptures, was unknown in English literature—at least such prose-poetry as he continued to pour into Blackwood for many long years. The poetry of his nature, by itself, burned with but a very gentle flame; blown upon by all the fervour and passion of his being, it kindled up and burst forth like a prairie on fire. Into those papers of Blackwood he first threw that intense personality which was the true power of his genius—a flood of mad and boisterous self-assertion, bearing away before it all friendly remonstrance, contemporary criticism, and such frail obstructions—until, month after month, as Blackwood grew more brilliant by Wilson growing more defiantly personal, people, forgetting to be shocked, were amazed and then delighted; for a man is sure some day to find wherein his strength lies. Let the hen educate her adopted duckling carefully as she may, the young one will surely take to the water. Many of our literary men have begun life as painters, until they found that that method of expression was not their method; and whether they would ever have attained success may be seen by Mr. Thackeray's illustrations of 'Pendennis.' It is useless to lament that Wilson did not discover the secret sooner; yet we may point to one short poem in which he seems to have done so—the 'Address to the Wild-Deer.' Is this a description of a wild-deer? Certainly not. It is John Wilson describing himself as John Wilson would be were transmigration of souls a possible thing.

In 1820, he was elected Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. Despite the 'success' with which he laboured, one can hardly think that it was a proper sphere for him. He did his work conscientiously, and most certainly benefited his students more than any other man then living could have done; but perhaps it was not altogether by means of his subject. He gave them knowledge they probably could have got nowhere else; but it did not all pertain to the Moral Philosophy Class. In an especial degree, he had the gift of awakening the enthusiasm of his pupils, which is three-fourths of a lecturer's power. Their admiration of him as a man added to their respect for him as a teacher; and to have been a pupil of Professor Wilson was to have been one of a family, the members of which were knit together by a bond of brotherhood rarely found in a public class. Not unfrequently one or two of their number were invited to the Professor's house in Gloucester-place—a fact which shows how much, in the relations between Wilson and his students, the character of the father superseded that of the dominie.

It is with a feeling of relief that we turn from his pent-up University life, to see him once more returning to his beloved Ellerray, whither he often went in the long holiday times. What a pleasant family-party it must have been; and with what a quiet, patriarchal sense of enjoyment must the matured Professor have returned—now with a family—to the home of his youth! Here it was he first learned the steadfast beauty of life; and with her who had taught him, the place was evermore associated. Dreams of its loveliness came to him during the dull winter nights, sitting in his Edinburgh home, by the dim light of the fire; and he who would know how the memory of Ellerray dwelt in Wilson's mind must read 'A Day at Windermere.' Oftentimes, too, in these summer months, the sporting-jacket was donned; and then we find him salmon-fishing in Loch-Awe, trout-fishing in the Ettrick, or star-gazing by night in Glen-Etive; while, wherever he went, materials were accumulating for the further perfecting of that most wonderful creation, the Shepherd,—whose imaginary conversations in these 'Noctes' are the nearest approach to a perennial work of genius which Wilson ever made. In them, he made use of the Scotch language as it had never been used before—finding in it a wealth of expression and a melody of sound of which Walter Scott himself had scarcely dreamed. Fain would we quote some choice bits of description that in these pages gleam like the sparkles in the depths of a wine-cup; but he who would quaff the nectar of the gods must not approach it with a tea-spoon. A cold winter's night, a seat by a blazing fire, a volume of the 'Noctes'—and who could refuse to be happy?

* Mason's 'British Novelists,' page 162.

'Recreations of Christopher North.' Vol. I., p. 242.

Stories are yet told of the outcry raised in certain quarters when the 'Noctes' appeared, concerning the gluttony and wine-bibbing of the Scotch, and more particularly of the contributors to Blackwood; and of the shamefacedness which came to the protestors on discovering that these bon-vivant papers were written by a solitary man, shut up in a small room, who would see no company until his article were finished, and whose gourmand dinners 'consisted invariably of a boiled fowl, potatoes, and a glass of water—he allowing himself no wine!' Could it have been otherwise? There is much nonsense talked of the inspiration required by men of genius—inspiration to be derived from very ignoble sources; as if the mind were a convenient machine, formed to lie dormant until set in motion by some convivial meeting or other. The notion is extremely silly. Your artist may paint the golden yellow of a sunset, but he admits into his studio only the pale, true light of the north.

Many of the little ways and habits of the Professor are thus illustrated in the book before us, adding considerably to its interest—though we must hope they will lead to no other and less agreeable consequences; for the youth of Britain are a gregarious fraternity, and are very much given to dress in the cast-off feathers of any particularly brilliant eagle or peacock which may fly or strut before them. We all remember the Byronic period of dress, and more recently the Disraelitish; nor would it be wonderful if, on this present book being more widely read, we should have our young men going about with broad-brimmed hats, large turned-down collars, a carelessly-tied neckcloth, and long, unkempt hair. It is so much easier to be a Dr. Johnson in manners than a Dr. Johnson in genius.

In 1837, Professor Wilson's wife died. Then we have his family growing up, and one by one getting married, until the old man lives almost a solitary life in his house in Gloucester-place. The record of these closing years of his life is very sad. His misery on finding his mental powers failing; his melancholy on thinking of the strong, glad days which could never come again; his wretchedness on knowing that he could never more revisit his beloved Mearns, where—in his genius at least—

'One was born

To make the nations less forlorn!'

might almost make one fear to grow old. But this mental depression sometimes passes away; and we have him merry and humorous as was his wont, superintending the romps and games of his grandchildren, or conversing pleasantly and cheerfully with their seniors. But the long day was at last to fall softly into twilight—then into night. On the 3d of April 1854, John Wilson, the lion-hearted and gentle, breathed his last; and we end this paper, as Mr. Gordon ends her memoir, with one word—Reurgitur!

WILLIAM BLACK.

AUNT RACHEL'S STORY (Concluded).

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER IX.

'When once more ensconced in her accustomed seat my aunt informed me she would proceed shortly to Edinburgh; also, that she intended despatching a trustworthy messenger to Fenton Abbey, in order to assure my parents of my safety, and her intention to detain me prisoner at Glenvoirinen until such time as order was restored. "This is to say," she went on, "provided you are willing to remain!"'

'I threw my arms round her neck, and expressed my desire to spend my life with her. "Dear aunt," I said, "never can I forget your kindness when informed of my private griefs and secret longings. Your treatment has been attended with complete success. No longer do I pine after unattainable things. Knowing that God has something for us all to do, into His hands I commit my destiny. Be it joy or be it sorrow, I am willing to accept what comes from Him."

"Good girl! good girl!" said Lady Macdonald, patting me on the shoulder. "And Robert Seymour—what of him?"

"O aunt! there I was foolish—guilty in the extreme. Never can I be the wife of Robert Seymour."

'Lady Macdonald looked grave.

"Do not be angry with me," I said, imploringly. "When acquainted with the nature of my feelings towards him, you bade me hope that change of scene would dissipate my fancies. I came hither, and what has been the result? In midst of scenery lovely as a poet's dream, have met with one who combines in his person all I ever dare picture to myself in my wildest dreams."

"Ha! Donald Munro!"

"No, no, aunt!" and I hid my blushing face on her shoulder.

"Why, Rachel! Surely you do not mean me to understand you have fallen in love with Charles Edward?"

"And wherefore not?"

"Because he is the son of your King!"

"O aunt! his rank entered not into my thoughts. I felt but the hero and the man. Could you for one moment imagine that I, so full of enthusiasm, could come in contact with the Prince, and not recognise in him the long worshipped in secret? It is only in the histories vanished ages that we read of such dauntless bravery and chivalrous ideas as he possesses. While gazing on his speaking countenance, and reflecting on the perils besetting his path, no wonder I experienced sensations hitherto unknown."

"Rachel! And I have led you into this temptation."

"Dear aunt, do not upbraid yourself for bringing me hither, or mistake the nature of my sentiments in respect to the Prince. Should he succeed in regaining the crown, I will revere him as my sovereign; if otherwise, as a womanlike, I shall cling to the remembrance of one whom fortune refuses to smile. Do you now understand the devotion I bear towards the Prince?"

'Lady Macdonald clasped me in silence to her breast and I felt I was understood.

'You have read in history of Charles Edward's campaign; therefore, I need only mention that within a month from the day he visited Glenvoirinen he was in possession of Edinburgh, and had proclaimed his father King at (Cross. In a letter to my aunt, Donald Munro described the ceremony thus:—

"Congratulate us on our success! Everywhere the Prince has been received with acclamation; and numbers are daily flocking to his standard. The gloomy old Palace of Holyrood appears quite a different place now that the tarts are back again. Yesterday, the Chevalier was proclaimed King at the market-place. It was a splendid sight. How Miss Sackville would have enjoyed seeing it! The Prince resembled a young Apollo, so splendidly handsome he looked in his Highland dress. The streets were thronged by an enthusiastic multitude, who were warm in their praises of our gallant leader, comparing him to King Robert Bruce, and crying 'Down wi' Geordie!' The surrounding windows were crowded with ladies, who waved their handkerchiefs, and showered bouquets on our heads; while Mrs. Murray of Broughton—a lady remarkable for her beauty; and, as the Prince himself says, not unlike Miss Sackville—stood near the Cross, with a white cockade in her breast and a drawn sword in her hand."

"After spending a few days at Glendunin, my aunt, Mrs. Munro, and myself, went to Edinburgh. We reached the capital on the evening of the day on which Charles Edward turned from Prestonpans, where he had defeated the Government's forces, commanded by Sir John Cope. The city was in an uproar of excitement. Bands of Highlanders, preceded by pipers, paraded up and down the streets with the dignity of conquering heroes; anxious citizens stood in groups, conversing in whispers, and eyeing askance the rebel mountaineers; while the Stuart banner, surmounted by a white rose, floated gracefully from the Market-cross."

"During the six weeks Prince Charles spent in Edinburgh, a large concourse of chiefs and lowland gentlemen arrived from the north to take part in the insurrection."

"The victory of Prestonpans created an immense sensation throughout the country; so much so, that several influential gentlemen assured the Prince he had only to march upon London to take it. Possessed of an ardent, impetuous temperament, their brave young leader—elated by the late victory and the prospect held out to him of reinforcements being immediately sent over from France—resolved, in an evil hour, to march into England. The evening prior to his departure, he gave a farewell party to those ladies who had shown themselves zealous supporters. O Emily! never did the old walls of Holyrood witness such a scene. Never can they behold such another."

"The melody and beauty of Scotland were assembled there. The spacious hall was brilliantly illuminated; and the soft light of the wax tapers seemed to enhance the charms of the King's lovely daughters—present out of compliment to their Prince, and to bid farewell to husbands, lovers, and others, who were to accompany him on his expedition. Charles Edward opened the ball, by dancing a strathspey with the Countess of Wemyss. Never was there such a display. My eyes followed him through the mazes of the dance; him only I saw amid the vast crowd; his was the only voice I sighed to hear; his was the only countenance I loved to watch. My aunt, observing the steady flow of my regards, gave me an admonitory shake of her head."

"He is my sovereign," I whispered, reassuringly. She pressed my hand.

"In the course of the evening, the Prince did me the honour to request my hand for a minuet. As I stood by, listening enraptured to his exquisite voice, whose tones lingered in my ear long after the words were spoken, my eyes encountering his as he turned to address me during the pauses in the dance—my heart throbbed wildly, under the consciousness of too exquisite happiness. And yet to me an air of sadness overshadowed the brilliant scene—too brilliant for earth; and I vainly endeavoured to conceal my emotion when I reflected that many a noble form which then shone in the dance would be cold and stiff ere many weeks had passed away. Happily for us, an all-wise Providence has shrouded the future from our gaze. Horror-stricken would have been that gay assembly! How suddenly sweet strains of music would have given place to the stillness of death, and the cheeks of the dancers waxed pale, had the curtain of futurity been rent in twain by some invisible hand, and the dark field of Culoden displayed to their affrighted gaze! But it was not so. No hooded friar appeared to warn the Prince against proceeding to the hostile shores of England. No voice was heard, proclaiming the names of those destined to perish on that hapless field. Delicious music floated on the perfumed air; lovers, beneath the festive lights, breathed vows of constancy; and all seemed forgotten save past success and present enjoyment. The glowing hours flew swiftly past. Soon the first red streaks of dawn gave warning it was time to depart. Donald Munro, who had been sedulously attentive since our arrival in Edinburgh, stole gently to my side as we rose to leave the hall. His face was pale; his manner hurried and nervous.

"Dear Rachel," he whispered, "to-morrow we leave for England, and God alone knows what may be my fate! Should I live to return, dare I hope—"

"O Donald!" I said, "do not distress me by talking thus. You will return to Glendunin; and live, I trust, long and happily with a fair and amiable bride—"

"Rachel!"

"Donald! I am betrothed to another. Forgive me if I have deceived you into the belief that I encouraged your addresses."

"His lips quivered, 'Then, welcome Death!'"

"Say not so," I exclaimed, taking his passive hand in mine. "A strong and enduring tie unites us—namely, the love we bear our Prince. Let us forget our private griefs and crosses when we remember his fate. His life even hangs trembling in the balance. And oh, if you would wish Rachel Sackville to regard you with sisterly affection—the best, the purest of all love—watch over the safety of Scotland's heir! Fight for him; and, if need be, die for him! God grant that may not be necessary. Nightly will I entreat the great Father of all to preserve you in the midst of danger."

"Donald's sole reply was a fervent pressure of the hand. His heart being too full for utterance, he turned sorrowfully away as the Prince approached to bid us adieu."

"What! leaving us so soon?"

"His cheeks were flushed; his eyes radiant with triumph. Taking Lady Macdonald affectionately by the hand, he again thanked her for the fine body of men who had joined his party by her command; and hoped, when in possession of London, he would be honoured by our presence at St. James's."

"My aunt shook her head sorrowfully. 'I am now verging on eighty years,' she said. 'My time on earth, therefore, must necessarily be short; but blessed be God who has permitted me to see the son of my King in possession of the ancient capital of Scotland! I can now depart in peace, since I have lived to bless him who, I trust, will be the future sovereign of Britain.'

"The Prince was deeply affected, and bowed his head reverently; while my aunt, laying on him her trembling hand, committed him to the protection of God.

"I became icy cold, as, taking my hand in his, he thanked me with his winning smile for having graced the ball with my presence. A presentiment of coming evil took possession of my breast; and the few words I strove to utter died away in broken murmurs. We parted "to meet again," he smilingly assured me. And what a meeting!

CHAPTER X.

"Immediately after the departure of the Highland army, we returned to Glenvoirnan, where we received weekly accounts of the Prince's proceedings. At first, Donald's letters were cheering in the extreme. He described their march southward as being that of conquerors; and gave us glowing descriptions of their enthusiastic reception in various places. Gradually, however, a desponding tone became apparent. He hinted there were traitors in the camp; and censured severely the conduct of several of the Prince's advisers, which caused dissension and mistrust where only peace and harmony should prevail. My aunt became fearfully excited on reading those gloomy accounts. Frequently I surprised her in tears—occasioned, she informed me, by sad misgivings respecting the ultimate success of the expedition. Mrs. Munro likewise participated in her fears.

"Several weeks passed away without our receiving any further intelligence from Donald. In an agony of suspense, Lady Macdonald despatched a man to Edinburgh, to ascertain if anything was known of the Prince's movements. The messenger returned, bringing disastrous tidings. Rumours were everywhere afloat that the Highlanders were retreating towards Scotland. A letter from Donald Munro confirmed the sad news. "All is lost," he said, at the commencement of his despatch. "A council of war was held at Derby to debate whether we ought to march upon London. Charles insisted, with tears in his eyes, that they should do so. 'My cause is just; therefore it must prevail!' he said; but Lord George Murray, in company with the other chiefs, declared in favour of a retreat. In vain the Prince protested against their decision. Vainly I joined my voice to his; they were inexorable. Farewell to all hopes of recovering the crown! For my part, I now consider our cause as hopeless."

"Each fresh account served but to increase our fears; and hourly we prayed for the safe return of the Prince and those brave men who shared his danger. Lady Macdonald became almost broken-hearted at this sad change in the aspect of affairs. Her energy seemed suddenly to desert her. She no longer loved to dwell on her reminiscences of the past, but sat, silent and dejected, in her wonted seat; while the heavy sighs which burst from her bosom told of bitter thoughts within.

"Once her nephew, Sir Alexander Macdonald, came to see her. What a reception she gave him! On his approach, she quitted her chair; and, drawing herself up to her full height, while her eyes blazed with preternatural lustre, she poured forth a torrent of indignant reproaches which amazed and appalled the calculating chief. He endeavoured to exculpate his conduct; but in vain. She motioned him back with her hand, and bade him begone.

"Go!" she said. "Pollute not the halls of Glenvoirnan with your presence! Never, with my consent, shall this floor be sullied by the foot of a traitor—never shall it be owned by one! You shall no longer remain in my presence!" she exclaimed, in towering anger, seeing he was about to seat himself. "My husband would frown on me from the walls were I to suffer you to break bread at my table. Go, degenerate chief! and think not to possess Glenvoirnan. Hitherto it has been the abode of loyalty and I shall take good care that, after my death, its rent does not pass into the coffers of the cold-blooded, cautious Sir Alexander Macdonald of Sleat! Begone!" She pointed towards the door. Her nephew withdrew, crestfallen and indignant.

"Soon the whole of Scotland was thrown into confusion by the intelligence that General Hawley, at the head of a large army, had arrived in Edinburgh to suppress the rebellion. The Prince, who was then in Glasgow, determined to march upon Stirling, to gain possession of the castle. A letter at this time received from Donald put my aunt into the highest possible spirits. He said—"I will not be cast down, dear lady; the Prince is sanguine as ever. He has not abandoned intentions of marching upon London; but will again proceed south whenever his army sufficiently recruited to admit of his doing so with a prospect of success. A right gallant leader is our young Prince; and well beloved by his Highlanders. They will willingly submit to any privation for his sake. With the last few weeks his army has increased wonderfully. It is now nine thousand strong. We expect soon to engage with General Hawley, who is marching hitherward at the head of nine thousand men. Do not be nervous regarding the result, as we are determined to show the English what Scottish claymores can do. The town of Stirling has this morning surrendered, and we are now preparing to besiege the castle. We have this moment learned that General Hawley has reached Falkirk. The Prince intends giving him battle."

"The decisive victory gained at Falkirk caused the hopes of the Jacobites to bloom afresh; but soon the news reached Scotland that the Government, highly dissatisfied with General Hawley's conduct, had despatched the Duke of Cumberland to supersede him in the command of the troops. This report was verified by the Duke's arrival in Edinburgh on the 30th of January. Prince Charles, being made acquainted with the Duke's expected arrival in the capital, informed Lord George Murray that he intended attacking the royal army whenever it reached Falkirk; but Lord George, with many of the chiefs, protested such a measure, and strongly advised a retreat into the north. The Prince, as Donald Munro wrote me, was frantic with grief and anger, and vainly endeavoured to dissuade them from their resolution. They remained firm in their determination to withdraw their army—maintaining that so many had returned to their homes after the battle of Falkirk, while numbers were so sorely and disabled from fighting, that it would be worse than madness to meet the enemy with their thinned ranks. Accordingly, Charles Edward, sorely against his inclination, commenced a retreat north. At Crieff, where he halted for some little time, he reviewed his troops; and found that, contrary to Lord George Murray's statement, instead of having lost the third part of his army, not more than a thousand men were missing. He was deeply affected on making this discovery; and believed that his chiefs had voluntarily deceived him, in order that they might sooner return to their homes. Notwithstanding this, the leaders still persisted in their determination not to counter the Duke. Their march northward was resumed amid loud murmurs and altercations among the dissatisfied portion of the Highlanders, who were eager to wage war for the sake of plunder.

'Meantime, the Duke of Cumberland, eager to fulfil the mission on which he had been sent, set out in pursuit of the Highland army. After a few weeks spent at Aberdeen, he arrived at Nairn. But why linger on facts already known to you? The Prince left Inverness with his troops, and encountered the foe on Culloden Moor.

'Let me hasten to the sequel. Glenvoirnen being situated in Inverness-shire, Donald Munro was enabled to send us daily despatches from the camp. His letter, dated the 15th of April, ran thus:—"We are on the eve of battle. To-morrow sees us conquerors, or—I tremble to think on the consequences that must ensue should fortune prove adverse. But let us not indulge in gloomy forebodings. The Prince is calm, even cheerful, in manner; and endeavours to rouse the somewhat drooping spirits of his soldiers. I do my best to aid him. God grant all may be well with us, and the white rose rise unwithered from the fight! Should I survive the encounter, you shall hear from my lips, in the course of the evening, a full description of the battle; but if doomed to fall, then let Miss Sackville feel assured I died, as she would wish me to die, defending my King."

'While the deep thunder of cannon and volleys of musketry resounded along Culloden's dreary waste, in the dining-room of Glenvoirnen we awaited, with beating hearts, the issue of the fight. Frequently my aunt, fancying she heard the distant sound of horses' feet, would hasten to the window to descry the first approach of the expected messenger. Surrounding pine trees waved to and fro in the breeze; birds sang sweetly from amidst their branches; but the tiny waves broke murmuring on the beach; and other sounds there were none. With a sigh of disappointment she would resume her seat; and, leaning her head on her hand, abandon herself to despair.

'The shadows of evening were falling on the distant hills, when the sound of footsteps on the terrace arrested my attention. I listened eagerly. They were ascending the stair. I looked towards my aunt. Worn out by incessant watching and mental anxiety, she had fallen into a gentle slumber. I crossed the room, and touched her arm. "Dear aunt," I cried, "Donald has come!"

'She heard me—started to her feet as the door flew open; and not Donald, but the Prince staggered into the room!

'How changed was that lovely countenance! Gone was the light of hope from those frenzied eyes! Vanished serenity from that noble forehead—all was madness, sorrow, and despair! It needed not words to reveal the catastrophe which had befallen him—his looks sufficed to tell the dismal tale. Death and defeat were behind him; ruin and captivity frowned in the future. He threw himself into the nearest chair, and covered his face with his hands. It was no longer a triumphant Prince whom I beheld; but a haggard, unfortunate man seeking safety—in need of consolation.

'With faltering steps and tear-stained eyes Lady Macdonald knelt by his side, and kissed his hand, with as much reverent devotion as though he had been surrounded by the paraphernalia of royalty; while she said, in broken accents, "Oh, your Royal Highness! sorrow not thus. Remember the kingly Bruce! Seven times was he defeated in victory crowned him with success. Although conquered this once, you may chance to be victorious at your next encounter with the Duke."

'"Never!—never!" he sobbed forth. "All is lost now! My faithful Highlanders are dead, or scattered to the four winds of heaven; and I, no longer your Prince, am a heart-broken man—a fugitive on the face of the earth!"

'With pale cheeks and dishevelled hair I threw myself at his feet, and besought him to be comforted. "Do not abandon hopes of recovering the crown," I exclaimed, with vehemence. "Let not the Duke exult in the belief that he has rendered you for ever incapable of continuing the struggle for the recovery of your rights. The Almighty, who brought you in safety to the house of a loyal subject, can, with one word of His mouth, scatter your enemies like the leaves of the forest. There are many brave men left to rally round your standard. Arouse yourself, therefore, from this despondency. Be a Prince once more, and fortune will yet crown your arms with victory!"

'"Generous girl!" he cried, seizing my hand, and pressing it to his lips. "My faithful Donald acquainted me with the charge you gave him, to watch over my safety; and nobly he did his duty. He died—killed by a bullet intended for me. With his last breath he blessed me; and whispered, 'Should you see Miss Sackville, tell her I fell as she wished me to perish—while defending my sovereign.'"

'Donald was dead. I bowed my head over my hands, and shed bitter tears at the thought. Lady Macdonald wept aloud.

'"What will his poor mother say?" she faltered forth.

'The Prince started to his feet. "I must go," he cried, hurriedly. "Even now the Duke's bloodhounds may be on my track."

'"Stay! oh stay!" said my aunt, beseechingly. "Whither would you go?"

'"To join the few chiefs who fled with me from the fatal field. They are awaiting my return on the banks of the loch. I would not bring them hither—knowing that I should give way to weakness; and that might cause them to despise me. Farewell! O God! what a difference between our first and last meeting!"

'My aunt sank into his arms, overcame with sorrow. She could not speak, so choked was her utterance. I felt as if the chill of death were upon me. The pulses in my hand throbbed painfully; and my heart seemed breaking beneath the load of agony which crushed it like an iron weight. The Prince observed my agitated countenance. He gave me a look of mingled gratitude and despair; and, detaching a miniature from off his neck, thrust it into my hand; then placing Lady Macdonald gently on the sofa, staggered from the room.

'Again I went forth on the terrace to view Prince Charles' departure from Glenvoirnen. How different the scene! With a heart overflowing with anguish, I recalled the brilliant procession which, eight months before, had swept proudly along the banks of the lake. Then, a noble young hero was marching onwards to victory; and now, a wretched, despairing man was seeking safety in flight. I opened the miniature. It contained the likenesses of the Prince and his brother. The following inscription, in beautiful Roman characters, was engraved within:—"Given me by my dearest brother Henry, on the eve of our departure from Rome." With a cry of agony I pressed it again and again to my lips. He was no longer my sovereign; I could, therefore, love him without fear. Misfortune had rendered us equal. He needed sympathy and assistance; and I might yet be able to befriend him. In the hour of adversity, woman's love shines brightest. There is no alloy in her affection. When frowned on and neglected by an unfeeling world, unfortunate man turns for consolation to her whose gentle bosom throbs with pitying love. Oh, what a priceless treasure was that miniature! Night and morning I bedewed it with tears, while praying for the safety of him who was dearer to me than life.

"During the space of twelve days, my aunt remained shut up in her chamber, to which no one was admitted save Macgregor. When she again made her appearance in the dining-room, I was dreadfully shocked and alarmed at the alteration which had taken place in her since that too-exciting interview. Her eyes were sunk, quenched their wonted fire; while the step, once so firm and stately, was feeble and tottering as that of an infant. I withdrew to the window, in order to conceal my emotion. It was too apparent. My aunt was sinking fast. Her existence was bound up in the Stuarts. Their hopes had been blighted, and she would not long survive. Only once I saw her inspired with a portion of her ancient enthusiasm, and that was when visited by Robert Munro, poor Donald's younger brother, who came to apprise us of the Prince's safe arrival in Skye. It was a most affecting meeting. We shed floods of tears as he described his brother's death and Charles Edward's noble conduct throughout the battle. But when he related the heroic manner in which the Prince bore up under the hardships and dangers he was hourly exposed to in the course of his wanderings, a flush mantled on my aunt's cheek, a tear glistened in her eye; and she sorrowfully exclaimed, "Oh, my beloved Prince!"

"And he intends leaving Scotland?" I said, in a choking voice.

"Yes," replied Robert Munro. "He is waiting the arrival of a vessel to bear him to France. I go to rejoin him; nor shall I leave him until he is beyond the reach of his enemies."

"Lady Macdonald wrung his hand. "Tell him you have seen us," she said; "and that he has no hearts more loving and true than those which hourly grieve over his misfortunes in the solitude of Glenvoirnen. And bear him this from me." From the drawer of a cabinet she abstracted an antique gold cross, studded with precious stones, which she reverently kissed, and placed in the hands of Robert Munro. "It belonged," she said, "to his ancestress, the hapless Mary. It was her solace when confined in Lochleven Castle. May it be to our Prince a source of true comfort; and in all his heavy trials may it direct his thoughts to that great Fellow-Sufferer now enthroned on high!"

"Robert Munro bade us adieu; promising he would return to acquaint us with the Prince's safety.

"Summer passed away; brown autumn tinged the trees with its golden hues; and Charles Edward was still a wanderer amid the wilds of Skye. The enormous sum of thirty thousand pounds was placed upon his head; and yet—to the everlasting honour of the Highlanders be it told—none could be found base enough to betray him. His sorrows and patient endurance excited much sympathy, and moved the gentle heart of a woman to befriend him in his loneliness. Noble Flora Macdonald! thy name is imperishable. Never shall thy memory be consigned to oblivion while history is extant, and poets exist to sing thy praises! A lofty mission was thine; and nobly didst thou accomplish the task God assigned thee! Deep it grieved me to think I was not with that incomparable woman, to share her danger and watch over the safety of the unfortunate Prince.

"At this period of my visit, I received a letter from home, desiring my return. On account of my aunt's rapidly-failing health, I hesitated to comply with my parents' request. When informed of the summons I had received, Lady Macdonald burst into tears, and implored me not to leave her. "I will not trouble you long," she said. "My strength is fast falling me. Death beckons me away to join my beloved husband. Rachel, say you will not go!"

"I wept while promising not to leave her—knowing that her days upon earth were numbered.

"It was the twentieth of September. Throughout the day my aunt appeared more than usually feverish and disturbed. The medical man who was in attendance gave it as his opinion that she was sinking fast.

"Can you give her nothing to support her strength?" I said, through my tears.

"The doctor shook his head. "When once the decree has gone forth, science must withdraw from the field," he replied. "Lady Macdonald has lived to a good old age, and the sands of her life are well nigh exhausted."

"As night threw its sable shades over the landscape, my aunt desired her chair to be wheeled to the window, that she might see the moon rise over the distant hills. Stationed by her side, I gazed forth in sorrowful silence. Soon the fair queen of night rose, calm and serene—her soft light quivering on the smooth surface of the lake. "Rachel," said my aunt—her voice loud and clear as when first I heard it—"does not this night remind you of the one on which Prince Charles landed in the Highlands?"

"I could not reply. My tears were falling fast. I stooped and kissed her forehead. She was about to speak once more, when a step was heard on the terrace. Grasping me by the arm, she said, "There is some one below." Fearing I knew not what, I pressed her hand, and listened in breathless suspense.

"The footsteps ceased, and soon the following words, sung to a plaintive air, struck upon our startled senses:—

"September's moon is shining bright,
And Nature's deck'd in robes as fair;
But ah! I turn me frae the sight
O' charms that make my heart fu' sair.
The breeze which blows frae Hieland hills
Brings but the sad tear to my e'e;
For oh! the vessel's sails it fills,
And speeds Prince Charlie o'er the sea!"

We parted sadly on the shore,
O'ercome wi' grief that wadna hide;
'Farewell, I'll never see you more!
He said, and gain'd the vessel's side.

Though far frae Scotia's shore, yet still I'll gaze across the stormy main;
And think on him that's far awa',
Though he should ne'er return again."

"The singer ceased. "O aunt! he is gone!" There was no reply. "Aunt, dear aunt!" Still no answer. Robert Munro entered. I beckoned him forward. Overcome with a nameless horror, I gazed into her face. No warm breath fanned my cheek. Her forehead was icy cold, and her hand fell lifeless from my touch. I looked imploringly on Robert. He placed his fingers on her pulse, and shook his head. It was as I feared; her spirit had passed away. The sad news of Prince Charles' departure broke her heart—that heart so full of love towards the exiled Stuarts.

"I shall not linger over the mournful events of the last few days I spent at Glenvoirnen. Sir Alexander Macdonald arrived shortly after receiving news of his aunt's death. In his presence her will was opened. It was found she had bequeathed Glenvoirnen to me, provided I resided in Scotland, and assumed the name and arms of Macdonald; failing these conditions, it was to revert to Robert Munro.

'These were conditions I could not fulfil. Scotland no longer possessed any charms for me. My dear old relative was gone, and Prince Charles had quitted its shores, never to return. Signifying my inability to comply with my aunt's wishes, Mr. Munro immediately entered upon possession. This done, I returned to Fenton Abbey.

'How different were my feelings when driving up the stately avenue to those with which I set out on my journey to Scotland! Two short years had wrought great changes in me. I quitted England a dreaming, enthusiastic girl; and returned a chastened, sorrowful woman. My ardent longings had been gratified. In the Highlands I had witnessed scenes bright and glowing as those narrated in the pages of history; and their remembrance was sufficient to haunt my imagination through life, and tinge my character with gentle sadness. On my entrance, I found the whole family plunged in the deepest affliction—my only brother having that morning been killed by a fall from his horse. All my love and sympathy were requisite to comfort the hearts of my sorrowing parents. I was now the heiress of Fenton Abbey. hateful title! Worlds would I have given to avoid filling the important position thus assigned me; but escape being impossible, I was obliged to fulfil the duties of my station. My mother noticed the careless air with which I received the homage of the heartless crowd, and chid me for my too apparent indifference to the doings of the gay world. But she knew not the spell that rendered me callous to all save the past.

'Robert Seymour was now on his way homewards—drag on the wings of love, he wrote, to receive his promised bride. No longer the timid, shrinking girl, but the determined woman, I resolved at once to make him acquainted with all that had occurred since his departure. Acting upon this resolution, I wrote him a long and painful letter, informing him of my unalterable determination never to marry; and throwing myself on his generosity to forgive the past. I then despatched the missive to London to await his arrival. In a few days I received his answer. Poor Robert! "I forgive you, and may God forgive you!" was all he could bring himself to say. Immediately on receipt of my letter he set sail again for Italy, where he remained for many years. I informed my parents of what I had done—concealing, however, my resolution never to marry. They were grieved at first; but finding I was resolute, they ceased importuning me—hoping, perchance, I might form a more brilliant alliance. Alas! ambition had now no place in my heart. In compliance with their wishes, I mingled in society; and was everywhere greeted with respectful homage, admiration, and, not unfrequently, love. But I was coldly indifferent. Often were my ears assailed by abuse of the young Pretender, as many of the English styled Prince Charles Edward. His conduct was reprobated; his pretensions ridiculed. On these occasions, my heightened colour and flashing eyes betrayed my agitation. When any of these empty-headed courtiers condescended to honour me with their notice, I treated them with a haughty coldness for which they were unprepared. Years passed away; and it being soon discovered I had refused several eligible parties, and did not seem desirous to encourage new suitors, I was abandoned in despair by those who formerly entertained hopes of winning my hand and fortune.

'Vain were my parents' arguments." I would never marry.'

'And now,' said aunt Rachel, withdrawing from her bosom a small miniature encased in gold, 'I must show you the likeness of one whose image has never been effaced from my heart. This is the portrait of Charles Edward, which he gave me on leaving Glenvoirne.'

'How nobly handsome!' I said.

'And it is thus that I see him,' said aunt Rachel. 'Remembrance of the haggard, despairing man has faded away like a morning dream; while the image of a generous, high-souled youth stands forth, bright and beautiful, from amid the shadows of the past.'

CHILD'S RHYMES.

HOW THE LITTLE GIRLS WERE ANSWERED.

Go, get on your hats! and we're off for a walk.
To gather wild flowers, and to hear the birds talk;
And though what they tell us is not very plain,
We shall ask them some questions, and guess what they mean.

And first, Mr. Robin, pray what do you spy
When flying about in the air up so high?
'I see all the berries on bushes and trees,
And take for my dinner as much as I please;
Then pay with a song what I take without right,
And pick up the grubs that the harvest would blight.'

Come hither and tell us, you dear little Bee!
When here and there humming, what seek you or see?
'I seek for the honey in blossoms that lies,
And to nourish my children I seize on the prize;
And I gather the wax to make candles for you.
Now, pray, don't you think I have plenty to do?'

And you, Mr. Lark, when you soar out of sight—
Say, what do you find in your high airy flight?
'I mount so aloft, when I'm up on the wing,
That I think the sweet angels might list while I sing.

Now, you can't see at all, you poor, blinking Owl!
And we think you're a very disconsolate fowl.
'Oh, no! I'm quite happy. I see in the night,
Ay, almost as well as you do in daylight;
Then I grab rats and mice. Don't you think I am right?'

And now, from the birds to the fishes we go.
What is seen in the air we can easily know;
But whom shall we ask of the waters below?
Come up, Mr. Pike, and we'll thank you to tell
All the wonders you find in your crystalline well!
'I find plenty of worms, and I gobble them up;
Then the water is pure that you drink from your cup.'

The quaint little Tadpole, oh, next let us hail!
Come out here! and tell what becomes of your tail.
'Oh, dear little girls! let me stay in my bog;
I cannot leap out till I turn to a frog.'

And now let us hear, if we can, what is found
By those sly little fellows who live underground.
And first, nimble Rabbit! who tunnels so deep,
Far into your burrow we gladly would peep.
'Oh! I feel very timid, for those I love best
Are carefully hid in my snug little nest.'

And you, little Worm! when you poke in and out,
We should like very much to know what you're about?
'I make tiny channels, that keep the land dry,
And drain off the water that falls from the sky.'

Thus, to each of His creatures, has God given the power
To provide for his wants and be happy his hour;
But to us, my dear children, alone He has given
To know, while on earth, what may fit us for heav'n!

THE TWINS.

AN APOLOGUE.

IN a beautiful palace in the village of Fountains, which stands on the sloping edge of a narrow, brawling stream, there were born, many years ago, twin princes, to whom their royal parents gave the singular names of Liberty and Necessity. In popular estimation, the infants were regarded as a freak of Nature, from the curious fact that, while each in himself was physically well proportioned, they were bound to each other, for life and death, by ligatures at the shoulder and at the ankle; so that, wherever you beheld the one, the other was certain to be at his side. Some called them the fatal twins, because the life of each was essential to the other; for, had the ties by which they were irrevocably and eternally united been severed, their lives would have become a burden to themselves and a nuisance to the world. Numbers of wise and learned men wrote of them in their great books, as the genii which preside at the birth of all human action. As to the truth of this statement, I could never conscientiously aver; but perhaps a few biographical facts regarding the twins may help to clear up the mystery. Be it known, then, that the parents of these singular children were Law and Will—both of them exceedingly strong-minded people; the father exhibiting the nicest precision and regularity in the performance of his daily duties; and the mother, true to the quality of her sex, showing an inherent proneness to think and act as became her feminine sovereignty. She was a great projector—erratic and impulsive; and, like others of that character, she often made fun of the rotatory monotony of her husband's mode of life. She was wont, playfully, to call him her Fixed Star, or Star with only One Motion, coldly revolving on his axis, eternally in the one speck of space. In reply to which, he dubbed her his Wilful and Lawless Comet, coursing creation in her wide wanderings; but apparently to little purpose, especially as she appeared glad to return to his sphere, in spite of its coldness and alleged want of variety. To speak truth, this ancient couple, like other people, had in their time many a domestic tiff, and not a few rather serious disagreements. They grew tolerant betimes, however, of each other's peculiarities; and lived a life of average happiness. One excellent feature in their character was the remarkable affection with which they cherished their famous twins, which was greatly deepened by the striking resemblance the latter bore to their parents. Nothing was omitted in the education of the inseparable boys which could qualify them for the rough ways of the world. As they grew up, they excited a great deal of attention among the curious and the learned. With one class of wise men—the Metaphysicians—they were, especially, mighty favourites. Indeed, to such a height did the admiration of these illuminati rise, that they split into distinct camps on the subject—the one section proclaiming the sovereignty of Liberty, and the other as determinedly upholding the imperial claims of Necessity. I question very much whether, upon any other subject, there were ever such mountain-loads of ribbed logic and learning expended. Of course, there was also a goodly quantity of nonsense talked in the discussion. The very Philosophers got sometimes into a condition of intellectual insanity, and fired immense showers of red-hot shot into their opposing strongholds. Such foolish conduct on the part of wise men is greatly to be lamented. Being evil, it seldom comes to good; and never does come to good in cases in which, as in the present one, the dispute is founded on a basis of misapprehension. The controversy became fiercer as Liberty and Necessity grew older; and by the time they had reached their legal majority, the kingdom to which they were the rightful heirs was shaken to its foundation by the fury of the angry eloquence. Such shameful partisan warfare, among those who ought to have been the wise teachers of the youthful princes, was well nigh bearing its legitimate fruits in the complete dissolution of society. A slight reference to this conjuncture will exhibit the utter folly of the controversy, and how narrow a spirit it was which led to the false conception of the character of the royal twins. Princes, it will be readily admitted—however much favoured in other respects—have little advantage with regard to their intellectual endowments over the generality of their subjects. They love, hate, and act pretty much in the same manner. They are impelled by similar motives in their desires and aspirations; similar vices debase them; virtues of a like character exalt them; and they are borne onward upon the great stream of life by passions of the same fiery complexion. It may be imagined, therefore, what effect the controversies of the Philosophers had upon the inexperienced princes Liberty and Necessity. Under the foolish rhetoric and strong-sinewed logic of their respective partisans, each of the twins was puffed up with the vanity of imagining that he only was the legitimate successor to the whole empire. They began to regard each other with absolute aversion, and to thwart each other's natural and indispensable motions—a course of action which would ultimately have been destructive of their corporate happiness. Liberty flung up his head till his eye rested on the zenith, and refused contemptuously to listen to the cooler and generally wiser counsels of his thoughtful brother. Many a cruel wrench did the wilful scamp give to the fleshly chains which bound him to his royal relative and everlasting companion. On many a wild-geese chase did Liberty drag Necessity; usually, in the end, to the intense agony of both. So outrageously foolish and capricious did the wild prince become, that Necessity at length made a most deadly stand, and pulled the madman up in a manner which made him stare and gasp as if his throat had been clutched by the hand of a giant. The only effect which this resolute conduct had upon Liberty was to madden him a hundredfold, and make him more determined than ever to concentrate all power in his own revolutionary hand. In order to accomplish this, he began a series of petty annoyances—such as altering the times for eating, and encroaching upon the hours of rest by a course of midnight dissipation. This was a most unnatural proceeding—such a reversal of the Divine laws, that it not only rendered miserable the nights and days of Necessity, but, as might have been expected, seriously affected even the inexhaustible energy of Liberty, and clearly revealed to him a truth which he ought to have known by instinct—that, even for divinities, there is no impunity for unjust and wrongful deeds. A fit of repentance now seized him, which continued for some time; but as there is little merit in a repentance which comes with the spur of physical suffering, he relapsed into his former evil habits—listening to the treacherous counsels of his flatterers, and resisting the gentle persuasions of his less passionate brother. But this course of conduct could not go on for ever without provoking the most signal interposition of the gods. A singular series of incidents brought the evil to a crisis. It was the custom, before any prince could ascend the throne, to make what was called a voyage of probation down the stream which had its source in the high lands above the village of Fountains. If I remember rightly, this river bore the curious name of Time. From the steep walls, down through the valley, it broadened and deepened until it became capable of floating a larger fleet than was ever yet built by human hands. After many windings, it poured the vast volume of its waters into a great sea, which was believed to be endless, and whose waves at least rolled and moaned in a circle of insoluble mystery. Down this river, towards the ocean, the princes of the blood were compelled to make a long voyage—not alone, but in full command of the leading ship. If they were skilful and wise enough to take proper channels, avoid hidden rocks, and touch at points indicated in the chart, they were deemed sufficiently furnished to attempt the voyage down to the shoreless sea itself. But if they failed to show a requisite amount of skill, their command was withdrawn for awhile, during which they were placed under the management of experienced instructors. Naturally enough, the voyage of the present twin princes caused a deal of interest and excitement, accompanied as they were by a numerous fleet of ships, manned with the gayest, most gallant, and most heroic hearts in the land. As in all similar cases, the royal ship (the Inevitable) led the way—Liberty and Necessity commanding. So long as the vessels moved to the more familiar parts of the river, everything went smoothly and well. Those who followed in the track of the royal commanders began to imagine that the voyage would be a peaceful and prosperous one. These anticipations were premature. As the stream expanded, and the fleet got into less known and more intricate waters, the Princes commenced to issue different sets of orders—each imagining that he only possessed the skill to guide the ship in its safe and proper course. A strong current was visible on the left; and Necessity was of opinion that it would be wise to watch it, and take as much advantage of it as was consistent with the course of their voyage. Liberty regarded this advice as cowardly and exceedingly unseaman-like—accusing his brother of fear, and of being deficient in that spirit of adventure by which their forefathers had been distinguished. In a voice of thunder, therefore, he issued a series of orders, which considerably altered the course of the vessel. Less than half-an-hour sufficed to test the value of this dashing style of navigation, by driving the Inevitable on a sandbank. Necessity only smiled at this mishap, as if it were the very thing which he had expected; while Liberty exhibited intense chagrin, and spat and fumed, mightily cut at the accident having occurred so immediately after his boasting assumption of command. Of course, the catastrophe could not be complete without another half-dozen ships following the Inevitable into the mud—a despicable proceeding, knowing, as their captains did very well, that they would certainly stick. But if the princes had sailed into a maelstrom, their obsequious followers would have been sure to tumble in after them. Having cleared the bank, Necessity at once took charge of the Inevitable, and brought her into the current which Liberty, in the vanity of his heroism, had so much despised. This latter prince became moody; and, clothing his face with the subtlety of a conspirator, he set himself to watch for an opportunity of taking vengeance on his patient, methodic associate. Nor was this long in presenting itself. The evil heart seems to create its own evil opportunities. Under the command of Necessity, the vessel seemed to feel as if she were in the hands of a master. So smooth and safely did her dark beak cut the lapsing river, that all on board were inspired with double security, and commenced talking in groups or dicing in quiet corners. The very helmsmen, infected by the general air of trustful idleness, dropped on the deck beside the wheel to chop tobacco into quids for future use. This was too tempting a chance for the fiends to forego; and therefore, when not a soul on board (excepting Liberty, and he disdained to give warning) was on the outlook, the Inevitable came suddenly into horrible collision with a coasting brig, cutting her in two halves, and drowning all her crew but one solitary soul. A large hole was knocked in the bows of the Inevitable just on the water-line, so that the pumps had to be set in operation to save her from going to the bottom. This sad accident produced a furious quarrel between the twin princes. They accused each other of cruelty, ignorance, and imbecility; and, in the blindness of their passion, were actually within a hair of shedding blood. So the voyage was clearly a failure. One truth, however, was brought into strong relief by the pitiful incidents of the trial—namely, that, separately, neither Liberty nor Necessity was fit for empire. They were twins in mind as well as in body; so that life and sovereignty were only possible to them in unity of action and in tolerant diversity of thought. The princes ultimately discovered these things—things hard to see through the mists of personal ambition; and still harder to practise amid a crowd of flattering courtiers, passionate partisans, and philosophers puffed up with the veriest chaff of knowledge. It may seem hard for a prince to be told that he cannot act in defiance of the great laws without being subjected to such punishment as it may please the gods to inflict; yet Liberty came to acknowledge the inherent wisdom of the Divine method, and to be heartily ashamed of his former blind and headlong career. Even Necessity, who was wise beyond his years, penitently confessed that, although the unresting current of Time flows steadily onward without human aid, yet this does not supersede mortal responsibility. It is beyond his art safely to resist the eternal stream; but he has the power to take advantage of its rolling waves, to steer his ship down fair mid-channel, and to avoid collision by watchful and intelligent navigation. Terrible was the process; but the royal twins at length learned the true philosophy of their eternal union. They became reconciled to each other—Liberty submitting to the reasonable rule of Necessity, and Necessity not interfering with a single legitimate action of Liberty. Acting on the Divine but painfully discovered knowledge that each was essential to the other, and that they were overshadowed by Powers greater than themselves, they began their united reign peacefully and without ostentation; and so successful were they in the government of their empire, that it is now the strongest and happiest in the world. F.

HANGERS-ON.

ON LITERARY HANGERS-ON, OR BOHEMIANS.

No literary man can be a godly man.

Why?

Because cleanliness is next to godliness; and dirtiness is next to literary genius.

Prove it.

Easy; although not pleasant. Far be it from me to aspire to the character of a genius on these terms. But as, in my last paper on hangers-on, I threw off my individual identity, and went into my part of a Bar-parlour Hanger-on; so, also, in this paper do I throw off my individuality, and step forth on the stage a Literary Bohemian.

Why am I dirty? Why do I seem to have slept in my clothes for the last six months? Why does my matted, unkempt hair hang quarter of a yard over my back? Why is it carefully brushed from my temples and brow, bringing forth my long ears in very bold and dirty relief? Why am I 'loose in my gaiters, looser in my gait?' Why, when I walk abroad, do I button myself up in a very seedy, tight-fitting dress, like a night-policeman's frock-coat? Why do I carry a wretched-looking blackthorn, something between an Irishman's shillelah and a withered umbrella stick? Why do I walk the streets as if I were Campbell's 'Last Man'? Why are my cheeks pale and haggard; my hands nervous and trembling; my eyes rolling in their sockets? Why do I wildly stare at vacancy or the mud on the pavement, and mutter as I walk? The answer is—Brains, sir! brains! Excess of brains! Great thoughts are struggling for escape, and will escape—nailed, pinned, impaled on the back of this county court summons which I clutch in my hand! When, oh when? When I have reached the first public-house where they will accept one postage and one receipt stamp in payment of a glass of sweet ale.

Mark the early dawnings of that genius which will one day burst upon the world like the first morning of the Millennium! The true genius is always dull at learning, and, consequently, a dunce at school. At school, the first symptoms of his genius appear generally in the shape of a chronic disinclination to learn, and a hardened obstinacy in coming late and unwashed. At this time, the true genius is not himself aware of the mighty impulse which is within him, and which will soon prompt him to take up the pen and write. With a wonderful degree of fortitude, he endures the floggings of the master and the gibes and jeers of his companions—crawling lazily home when school is over—eating voraciously—and generally preferring a warm seat on the hearth, where he can gaze comfortably into the fire, to joining his companions at play. When he is ignominiously turned out of his snug corner, and told by his indignant parent to go at once and learn his lessons, he slinks sullenly off, takes up a book for a short time, and commences to ruminate on his great wrongs. The fire has a magnetic attraction for him; and, accordingly, he soon finds an opportunity of regaining his seat, where the contemplation of the bright blaze serves as a valuable aid to reflection. The first distinct impression which dawns on his young mind is, that he is the victim of a general conspiracy on the part of his parents and schoolmaster. Even his mother must be classed among his oppressors. He can't see what difference it makes to her whether he washes his face every morning or not—his own opinion being that once a-week, in warm water, is quite sufficient for all sanitary purposes. The grievance which he has to submit to from his father is an occasional flogging, and graphic analogies made by the stern parent between himself (the genius) and his young brother, who is very smart at 'picking up things.'

All this I endured; and behold the great consummation! I am a contributor to the poet's corner of the Wharfedale Weekly Warbler and Midland Counties Gazette. I was at one time a clerk—a slave of the pen; working among a soulless, brainless herd of worshippers of pounds, shillings, and pence. What if I am seedy? I could be otherwise if I would; but I won't. I am an object of disgust and aversion to all my friends; but I have the true poetic soul. I have congenial society at the 'Shakespeare's Skull.' I meet there Wackerbath, Baggall, Squales, and other cotemporary men of the age, who (like myself) will shortly remove the bushel which in the meantime covers their lights. I occasionally do the theatrical critique for the Warbler. You are in the stalls of the T. R. Mark my entrance! It is the middle of the second act, and the most pathetic part of the play. As I lounge leisurely along the lobby which leads to the stalls door, I call up to my features an expression of the most unmitigated contempt and scorn for everything and everybody in general. When I have reached the mirror, I survey my appearance. I season the unmitigated scorn with a slight expression of pity, and ruffle my hair slightly—dashing it back from my temples, and fixing it behind the ears. I now call up a frenzied glare into my eyes, and open the door with as much noise as I can conveniently make. If the audience are too much absorbed in the piece to notice my entrance, I drop my heavy blackthorn, which has generally the effect I desire. The attention of the audience being now directed to me, I favour them, especially the stalls portion, with the look of unmitigated contempt and scorn, unseasoned with the dash of pity. They regard me with amazed looks, and whisper accordingly, 'Who is he—that strange-looking individual?' 'Blatterton F. Dukks, the poet and critic for the Warbler,' is whispered. And those who know me by reputation forget the piece, and look at me wonderingly and submissively, as if to say, 'We are aware, to our confusion, that we are soulless clods, crawling between heaven and earth, with no spark of intellect whatever; nevertheless, Blatterton F. Dukks, poet and critic, author of "Lines on a Poet's Skull," turn away those eyes from us, and in mercy think not of our brainless, soulless condition! In mercy I infuse the pitying look, tone down the wildness of my eyes, look searchingly round the whole theatre—galleries, boxes, pit, dress circle—as if I were inclined to think somebody ought to be turned out; and let whoever he or she be look out, for Blatterton F. Dukks is in the stalls!

My general appearance, as I stand loungingly at the stalls entrance, is a sight. Critic is marked in every expression of my appearance. The performers are slightly nervous when they behold my profile. But I am careful; and if they have not had the misery to offend me in any way, I let them know by the expression that I can endure them—which from me is a great deal. Of course I have a favourite either among the ballet or the soubrettes; and when she appears, I lead the applause which greets her entrance. If she is particularly good in a burlesque dance or song, she is rendered delirious with delight to observe that I smile and relax my stern expression for a moment. If the audience presume to encore any actor who is not my favourite, they are terrified into silence by my scowl and look, which plainly signifies that still more of this—just the least bit more—and I will raise the curtain to descend, the lights to be put out, and the proceedings to terminate. Just try it again, my fine fellows! Do. Be careful what you are at. B. F. D. is in the stalls, my good people!

At the urgent request of numerous friends and admirers, I published a volume of poetry—gold-edged, green-covered, within; which was sold by subscription at half-a-crown. I was a loser by this, on account of the low state of intellect in Whackford, and the sluggish stupidity of my publishers, Messrs. Peeze, Meel, & Co., in not pushing the work. The name of the volume was, 'Amelia Jane, or Female Devotion; and Other Poems.' The Teignmouth Elder, in a savage and personal onslaught, went the length of styling the book 'simply indecent.' The editor—a contemptible, crawling scycphant, unworthy of the name of man—could not distinguish poetical license from decency. Look at Shakspeare, Byron, Burns! Honi soit qui mal y pense.

In private circles I am a lion. But it is a bore; I don't like it. Provincial society has no charms for me. I long to be the centre of a metropolitan circle; and, as I mentioned before, I have only to remove the bushel. But I bide my time. A day will come; and, when it has come, let those contemptible reviewers who have affected to sneer and snarl at myself and my works, beware! I bide my time. As I think I mentioned before. But stay! When I remove the bushel, it may be that the world will conspire to pretend unconsciousness of the brilliancy of my genius; but when I enter the silent land, lo! they will then humbly acknowledge that another star of English literature has been withdrawn from the firmament of letters, and strive to drown their miserable consciences by tearing their hair and howling requiems over the earth which covers my mortal remains. The remark made to me by a contemporary poet, at the 'Shakspeare's Skull,' is, alas! true:—'They starve us when living, and raise monuments to us when we die!'

Ho! here, call-boy! Carry to my dressing-room a basin, warm water, sponge, brush, comb, and ordinary walking apparel, that I may wash, brush, cleanse, and throw off this unbecoming part of a Literary Bohemian.

Kind reader! judge between me and the Blatterton F. Dukks of society. They call me a miserable, soulless caricaturist. Do you not recognise their class?

R. L. G.

A SOLITARY WALK IN PARIS.

THE weather was cold and gloomy when I arrived in Paris; very like what it had been on my first visit, exactly twenty years before. It soon improved, however, and tempted me to take a long walk. I saw with surprise the many changes for the better which have been made in some parts of the city, in spite of the tumults of those twenty years. Life, too, just as of old, was brilliant on the Boulevards, the Champs Elysées, and in the Quartier St. Honore. Splendid equipages and splendid toilettes were to be seen everywhere; and, to judge from appearances there, one would have said that no dancers have the grace and gaiety of slaves in chains. Ah! but where was la jeune France with which I talked of old—about 1830? Where was it? Being literary in its quality, it was not there where equipages and fine toilettes were exhibited. It does not show itself to dance. Perhaps we may yet know where it hides, when the iron heel is taken off its head and the gag out of its mouth. Until now, it has been silent and still as a stone.

And, asking myself this question about la jeune France, I began to ask myself other questions as I pursued my way. Where were those not young enough to dance? Where was that decorous Chamber of Peers into which I had been admitted, and which had proved so sorry a dyke against the popular flood? Where were its members? Where? Then I had to ask myself—What will the next uprising of that flood do? Almost was I disposed to answer, 'I do not care,' so entirely did I at first feel as if I had lost all hope of and for the French people. But I did not allow myself to utter the 'do not care;' though I could not help comparing my present feelings with my former ones, and saying—Light-minded nation! Ye have wronged me, personally, by robbing me of faith in the future—robbing me of the candid, loving heart which sympathised with the oppressed, and beat so truly with the hearts of all strugglers against oppression! When you told formerly, with honest pride, of what you had done in the cause of Freedom—how you had listened to the voice of Prudence, and stopped short of what was to be done, of what should yet be done—I heard and believed. Now, how shall I believe? How find again the generous warmth with which I entered into your feelings? How strange the coldness with which I regard those feelings to-day!

Then followed another questioning thought, and this one brought back some of the generous warmth which I had believed extinct—If I feel thus, what must many children of the soil, many of the French, feel, wounded in their patriotism as well as in their love of freedom? Madame C—, whom I knew twenty years ago, still lives. How hard must it be for her old Republican heart to keep still! And young R—, who told me his creed was 'hatred of kings,' how has he kept that ardent tongue of his silent? Perhaps, ere this, it is silent at Cayenne.

Pondering thus, my steps had brought me under the shade of the chestnut trees in the gardens of the Tuileries. From their verdurous light I passed into the open sunshine of the Place de la Concorde, and I recalled the emotions it had formerly excited in me. Then, I thought only of its having been the Place de la Guillotine, and I had to swallow down my tears. Now, no tears came to my eyes; and I fixed them on the obelisk of Luxor, looking at it almost with awe. That silent thing was eloquent with undecipherable histories before Egypt had fallen or Rome had arisen. Rome arose—conquered the world—fell; and the silent thing remained, telling the old tale. Thebes crumbled away around it; men ceased to break their hearts with the low but strong passions of the citizen under its shadow; and a silence brooded there suited to it.

But now it stands where the guillotine once stood; and again under its shadow throbs the heart of the citizen—the tumultuous heart of the most civilised man of these days—the man of Paris; and it beats with all the passions of the man of Thebes. The ambitious soldier and the ambitious priest; the wary politician and the wary dealer in money; the daring aspirant after freedom and the daring aspirant after truth—all have already, since its erection here, contended to the death near it; as, thousands of years ago, such spirits must have contended amidst the worn-out civilization of Egypt.

I glanced but in passing at the other decorations of the great square—the fine fountains, the colossal statues representing the commercial cities of France, and the rostral columns; and paused again, only before another monument, which had the impressive charm of now speaking silently! I mean the former Chamber of Deputies; in which I had also been permitted to hear good words—very good words—as in the Chamber of Peers.

But I went on; and my thoughts took another direction. I said—In my early days when I was in Paris, after I had been out, I was always disposed on my return home to bring forward some of my thoughts on what I had seen. But now it is not as then. There is no lively, intelligent Madame C—in our company to listen to my fancies and respond to them. The ladies at our dinner-table would stare at me as one insane. The bearded men would shrug their shoulders; the pale Italian count, always mute beside me, would shrink still more into himself; the Russian noble opposite would say that the closing of the mouths of French deputies and peers was a matter of no moment to Europe, but that which might be so was that there was not a good understanding between Russia and France; and then that priest who visits the marquise, what a scowl I should have from him!

And here, my reflections taking another turn, I began to be aware of a feeling in me which had grown stronger than I suspected—a feeling of hostility to the religion of the Roman Catholic. At first I was angry with myself. I said—'Is all my candour to be taken from me? Am I to be robbed of those sentiments which I cherished as my safeguard against bigotry?' It was in vain. My indignation got the better of me, and I had to allow myself to be illiberal; as every now and then priests in twos and threes passed by me, eager and bustling, boldly swinging about in their long black garments; and, when their dark skirts wafted by me, I felt as if the noonday sun was being obscured by bats and owls—creatures of night—as if gross ignorance was about to descend on the world and wrap it in its folds.

No, I thought, I have seen no one since I have been here—I have heard of no one—like the dear old Curé at Madame M—'s. He had gone through all the terrors of the times from '89 to '99, and had come out of them pure gold. His gentleness and simplicity made one forget that errors of the understanding can be united with true Christian virtue—one could hardly help thinking that the intellect must be right where the heart was so right. But now, instead of him, I see in our house Madame P—'s confessor—a tall, hulking, dark-countenanced fellow, with no words of lively kindness for the stranger.

And then—thus I went on in my thoughts—the newspapers Monsieur P—gives me, what absurdities they contain! Yesterday, the touching trait which filled a column was, after a most eloquent exordium, to this effect:—A captain conducting his regiment through a country town met a priest carrying the Host. Drawing his sword, he made it—the Host—a military salute. His pious example was followed by the soldiers; and the leader expressed his regret that his duties prevented him from staying to take a part in the religious procession.

But to-day's touching trait surpassed yesterday's, and the eloquence was greater:—In a garrison town, the zealous soldiery were employed in making, for a religious festival, an altar of truly Christian materials, in the great square. The base was of cannon; the side supports guns; the ornaments around and above, swords; the crucifix, bayonets! And at this altar mass was performed with the greatest pomp—the soldiers attending with holy fervour. Shade of Voltaire! I exclaimed, return! return! But no! Shade of Pascal! return to shame thy nation into truth and freedom!

Away, now, with thoughts of priests, soldiers, and newspapers! My walk has brought me into the Bois de Boulogne. It is gay with equipages, and riders, and promenaders—let me enjoy it. I will banish these foolish thoughts of mine. So, walking slowly along, and admiring all things, I observed that some carriages had come to a stand still, and that the heads of riders and walkers were all turned in one direction. 'It is that Emperor,' said I to myself; and I felt a sickening sensation. I had never seen him before. My heart beat thick and fast, oppressed and quickened at the same time. Such a feeling a woman might experience when, after many years, she meets the man who had betrayed her in her youth. But this man had not betrayed any hopes of mine. Even when I read of his solemn oath to maintain the liberties of France, I founded no hopes on him. Then, why sicken at the sight of him? Not because he had betrayed me, but because he had betrayed so many noble hearts in France and Italy—uprooting the trust of the good, outwitting the powers of the great—did I thus feel at his approach.

In a low, open carriage, slowly passed the Imperial Jockey—his wife by his side, handsome but triste in her fashionable bonnet. They passed, and not a cheer of any kind from any lip greeted them. So far I was contented.

It was but a sullen kind of contentment mine, however. At that moment it brought me no pleasure in the gay scene around, and I hurriedly left it. I determined to go and see, at least, the old house in which I had lived, since my living friends were not to be found. Its aspect surely would be friendly, I thought. I turned off from the Champs Elysées, and got into the long, narrow streets of the well-known quarter. I studied now and then the looks of the dwellers in it, as if I had some vague hope of finding some one whom I could recognise. No. There was no one. The people about the shop doors and portecochères appeared to me listless and discontented. It is true there were none of the gaieties of the Boulevards or of the Champs Elysées in these streets to enliven them; yet I thought that formerly they were very animated, although not much visited by fashion. I went on, then, wondering where all the old cheerfulness was gone, and wondering why there were so many more barracks in that quiet quarter than there used to be. At last I reached what seemed like my former abode. I could not be quite sure of it—its gate was so like that of many others now, and so unlike what it had been then. Heavy and solid, it offered no crevice through which I could have peeped. I hesitated—summoned courage, and rang; starting when I had done so at the loud, empty clang of the ball. A woman came to the wicket. I asked if that were not a boarding-school? saying that I wished to have a prospectus of its terms. She consulted a man on the matter, but at length admitted me, closing the gate carefully behind me. I was now in the long straight avenue which I knew so well—a shady avenue; but its increased depth of shade surprised me—it was midnight overhead. We stopped about half-way up, at a little building used as a parlour for callers on business; and, in a couple of minutes, a lady came in. I said that I had paid a visit in that establishment twenty years ago, and that I wished for a prospectus of the present school.

'Ah then! you were here in the time of Madame Y—,' she replied. 'There have been many changes since then. The school is a new one, and we have no prospectus; but if you will give me your address, I will write one out, and have the pleasure of waiting on you with it.'

I begged her not to give herself the trouble—her answers to a few questions would be sufficient. So, after a little conversation, she asked me if I should like to walk in the garden. How much I should have liked to sit an hour in my old room! I saw its windows in the house as I advanced down the avenue, but I could not intrude so far as to ask to be allowed to enter. She led the way to the garden—formerly a very pretty one; now grass-grown and all neglected, the branches of the trees straggling up to each other and making a dark wilderness.

The lady's talk was very agreeable, I suppose, as I walked by her side trying to listen to her, my thoughts filled with old times. As we drew near the avenue again, and I had to propose to take leave, I found that she had not to public matters. She was speaking of 'the nation's being tried a liberty which led to slavery; of its being under the régime of the sabre. It was a little oppressive—un peu lourd mais que voulez-vous!—in any case, tranquillity is best.'

And so we parted. I walked back to my abode sadder than when I set out from it. That night I lay long awake; and, when I did alumber, started at every noise, thinking it to be the first booming of the cannon of another Revolution. 'Such tricks hath strong imagination;' yet it is no trick of imagination that another Revolution must come.

M. M. L.

SHAMS.

BY A MISANTHROPE.

'THERE is no such thing as hypocrisy,' says a great Scotch preacher. Well, Dr. Caird, I am quite of your opinion that, taking the word hypocrisy in its large and truest meaning, few people have sufficient ability, even if they had the desire, constantly to impose upon their acquaintance. But we live in an age of Shams. Almost every third person we know belongs to the genus. For who, now-a-days, is so vulgar as honestly to appear what he really is? I wonder who introduced dissimulation? Was it a scoundrel, who had much to conceal; or some poor, silly, modest individual, who timidly dreaded to show his or her little mind? Latent discontent with ourselves, bodily or mentally, gives the foolish idea that we may, by artful contrivance, almost entirely hide from others those defects which we are so keenly aware of. But this is a clear case of self-delusion; for, after all the attempts made by a wretched being to play a part which Nature never intended, the continual strain on mind and body shows that conscience revolts at the deceit. I think the business of a police-detective must be a most delightful and exciting one. But oh! how much more pleasant and interesting to be a detective in a moral sense!—to find out people's weak points, and mentally to dissect them!

Now, with regard to the different phases of the genus Sham, their name is legion; so I shall only touch upon a few. Never to appear ignorant of any subject under discussion is a fruitful source of sham. It is the fashion of the present day to know, or pretend to know, about everything. Therefore, if you have not sufficient moral courage to be looked upon as an ignoramus, and politely stared at by society, you must do like your neighbours—talk about everything, and trust that your luck may prevent you from making a terrific fool of yourself. Assumption, I have heard it said, is a great feature of our time. This is a fact which experience corroborates; hence we often find the most commonplace individuals criticising men of acknowledged genius, and giving their opinions about art, poetry, or music, in the most conceited and provoking manner. A favourite phrase of such people is, 'I was rather disappointed' with this or that—intending in an easy but somewhat indefinite way to show you that they possess great discrimination, and don't mean to be pleased with everything. Of course, you feel angry at their stolidity, and would fain give them a bit of your mind; but this is a privilege you can never enjoy.

But although there are aggravating cases of sham, yet there are many so petty and transparent that we would not like to dispense with them, because of the amusement they afford us. The robust young lady, afraid that her health and strength may make her appear plebeian and uninteresting, tries by word and deed to impress upon everybody that she is far from strong. She indulges in little scenes where fictitious faintings are enacted. She takes her female friends aside; in a confidential manner informs them of her symptoms; and expects by such conduct to give her acquaintance some slight idea of her delicate state of health. The would-be wit, or rather buffoon, is another diverting kind of sham. His tout-ensemble reminds you of a valentine. He is often red-haired, or at all events not very attractive personally; but, conscious of having 'that within which passeth show,' his appearance gives him little concern. The aim of this individual is always to please the ladies; and if they are silly or wicked enough to give him his full swing, he will crack miserable jokes, grinning and putting his features to an awful tension for the amusement of his hearers. He is delighted to sing, although he has seldom much voice; in fact, nothing staggers him, and it is impossible to destroy his good opinion of himself. A fine commanding presence (yet without corresponding greatness of mind) passes with many superficial observers as a certain index of strength of character. The colossal fool, on whom Nature has been so lavish of her gifts, is a very specious sham. He delivers his most trivial remarks with great pomposity and unction. His large dark eyes roll about in the most imposing manner; and the solemnity of his slightest action shows that he is always mindful of his own dignity and importance.

'As a general rule, Egotism lies deep at the foundation of most shams. To bring number one into notice seems with many the prevailing thought and desire; they could talk of themselves for hours together; they have a variety of anecdotes in which their sayings and doings stand out conspicuous; they are never tired of laughing at their own wit; and even when they are silent you fancy that they are purring over and mentally congratulating themselves.

But just as there are aggravating and amusing cases of sham, so there are a few productive of much melancholy thought. Infant phenomena is one of these. Some foolish parents imagine that by encouraging or fostering premature tastes in their children, they are thus taking the best way to make them seem clever and interesting. Miniature men and women may be a curious study, but there is something extremely sad and touching about it. Who likes to see a careworn child, whose small mind has been tasked to the utmost to please papa or mamma? The play-hour, so much relished by its companions, finds this little creature so tired and jaded that it cannot enjoy their youthful sports; so it creeps away, fretful and discontented, perhaps to think over to-morrow's lesson.

Now, I am aware that many amiable little surface shams must go on to the end of time. We should not wish to do away with these. When good-natured Mrs. A. requests the pleasure of your company to attend her evening party, though you know from sad experience the flat and tiresome nature of her entertainments, still you must smile in a polite but sickly manner, and accept the invitation as graciously as you can. When Miss B. favours you with her last new song, which neither suits her voice nor style, you must be ready with a little compliment when she rises from the piano, or at least thank her civilly for the 'treat' she has given you.

All these and many more are allowable and trifling little bits of sham; for how dreadfully obnoxious would we often make ourselves if we just spoke out our mind! Modesty and perfect sincerity are rare and beautiful qualities; but they are sometimes to be met with. We find them for the most part among people whose lot in life has not been very fortunate. Bitter trials, it may be, have taught them the utter frailty and impotence of their own judgment; they see the folly and shallowness of affectation, and loathe deception of every kind; consequently they are natural and honest—their company is improving and refreshing as a sweet spring day. You feel conscious of a delightful reality about everything they say or do. Truth is their motto, and you can always depend upon them.

S. H.

WAYSIDE THOUGHTS.—No. I.

BY THE LATE JAMES MACFARLAN.

WE should always be careful even of single acts. One step suffices to throw the traveller over a precipice.

A SINGLE line of genius will often conjure up a whole picture; as one star, seen through a rent in the clouds, will suggest the entire heavenly host.

THE origin of apparitions must be traced to the conscience. The demon of a bad deed, or the ghost of a strangled virtue, will never cease to haunt a man till driven away by the exorcism of repentance.

THE patriot is great, but the cosmopolitan is greater. Shakspeare the Englishman, or Goethe the German, do not appear half so grand as when we view them in the light of noble citizens of the world. They are not merely for you and me, but the property of all mankind.

WHEN a man has sown his wild oats, burned his cards and his dice-box, and begins to discover that the race-course is a round of folly, he flatters himself that the memory of his excesses will disappear with the colour of his hair. Presently, however, there spring up cruel remembrancers in the wild doings of a son or nephew; and the old fellow, who believed his skeletons all snugly buried, is hunted to death by the resuscitated errors of his youth.

CALM and lovely is the morning of life, with a beauty born of green leaves, flowers, and the music of birds. Sacred, too, is its noontide, when there is work to be done and duties to be performed; and this, although the clouds may lower and the rains may fall. Still, hallowed is its sunset—the sober 'gloaming,' with its gray quiet and its lengthened shadows, peacefully and slowly wearing away into the deep and solemn night, crowned with the glory of the stars.

MAN has been sometimes careful in selecting sites where his great works appear to advantage. On the flat shores of the Nile, the Pyramids look sublime; they would have been dwarfed beside Ararat or Sinai. Had even that daring artist of old succeeded in hewing the mountain into a colossal statue of his hero, a glance at the stars overhead would have made us conscious only of a pigmy presence. It is well for the whole of us, great and small, that Nature thus keeps us to our level. The ocean rebukes alike Canute and his courtiers.

COMETS.—At uncertain times, the firmament of life is visited by strange erratic lights. The regularly moving planets grow panic-stricken, and fear that all things will go to chaos from their dangerous proximity. No one can tell their exact path, whence they come and whither they go, or can find out by what precise laws they are guided. Men fly up to the top of their watch-towers to observe the unwelcome visitor, and communicate their fears in whispers. One person trembles for his favourite views, and another for his darling author. Old forms and long-established habits have a strange presentiment of annihilation. The crazy old fabric of custom shakes to its rotten centre; all the sacredness of antiquity is insufficient to maintain the courage of certain institutions. Nothing, in fact, is considered safe while these wild luminaries continue to flash their burning manes. Has a novel inventor, a daring speculator, or original thinker suddenly come among us? If so, then has one of those comets appeared.

MEMORIES.

Young hopes like rainbows melt in tears;
Our joys like flowers decay;
As noontide shadows o'er the hills,
The loved ones pass away.
But there's a rapture never dies,
Howe'er our lot be cast—
The mellow moonlight of the mind—
Dear memories of the past!

As ivy robes the hoary oak
When all its blooms depart,
Sweet thoughts of home and happy day
Cling round the ruin'd heart.
When drifted o'er the waves of time,
Before affliction's blast,
We soothe the soul with songs that breathe
Dear memories of the past!

T. L.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, London, E.C.; and 32 St. Knoch-Square, Glasgow. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 10.]

SATURDAY, DEC. 6, 1862

[PRICE 1d.]

FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.

'For tempests wear, and lightning cleaves the rock;
If such his heart, so shatter'd it the shock.'—Byron.

CHAPTER I.

FRED HARPER was for some years our foreign correspondent. In his manners and habits he was somewhat peculiar. He was apparently of a light and joyous temperament; but beneath this there was an under-current of deep melancholy, which not unfrequently assumed the ascendancy. Sometimes he would keep us laughing for hours; sometimes he would scarcely speak to any one for days together. Some of the youngsters did not hesitate to affirm that he was positively crazed; but, in any conversations I ever had with him, I never could discover the smallest ground for entertaining such an opinion regarding him. Indeed, had he been so, he could not very well have fulfilled the duties of his situation. He was—I had occasion to believe—of a restless, roving disposition. He had been in almost every part of the world. Thus chiefly it was that he had acquired the extensive knowledge of languages which he possessed. The extent of his wanderings had afforded him opportunities of meeting with adventure. He used frequently to recount some of his experiences for our amusement. Often, between the mail days, when we had comparatively little to do; and after the 'oldsters'—as the partners and senior clerks were designated—had gone, would we gather round the fire in one of the private rooms, and join our solicitations to get Harper to spin us a yarn. Sceptics were not wanting who expressed their doubts as to the veracity of some of his narratives; but the manner in which he told them inclined me to believe that their suspicions were altogether unwarrantable. He certainly appeared to believe them himself; and it could ends! The dashing sound of the sea told that it was making a clean breach over us. The shock of the squall had strained the timbers above, and the water came pouring into the cabin. We heard the captain—'Cut away the sheets!' The hurried tramp of the men overhead, and the wild howl of the wind, now risen to a gale, heightened the feeling of dread which our perilous position was calculated in itself to inspire.

'O Fred! do go on deck and see what it is!'

'She is on her beam-ends. They will perhaps have to cut away one or more of her masts; when, I trust, she will right. If not—but I will take a look out of the companion.'

On ascending the ladder, I found that during the short time I had been down a great change had taken place in the aspect of nature. The sky was wholly overcast, except on the western horizon, where shone a long streak of lurid light. The sea was white with foam, seething and boiling around us. Our mainsail and foretopsail had been blown out of the bolt-ropes, and torn into rags; which, with the sails whose sheets had been cut, flapped in the wind with a sound like the discharge of a battery of artillery. The carpenter stood by the weather-mizen shrouds—an axe gleamed in his hand. The captain stood on the quarter-deck, steadying himself by the weather rail. One look to windward—one look aloft; he waved his hand. The axe descended—one of the shrouds snapped; another broke—the mast creaked and tottered.

'Harper! Harper! Down with you! Look where you're standing—just where the mast may fall! Down, down for your life!'

The companion where I stood was just under the mast. I had not before noticed my danger; but I jumped down at once. Another instant, and the mast fell crashing over the side. The ship slowly righted; and the wind took off a little almost immediately after.

But the lull did not long continue. Again it came on, with greater violence than ever; and gradually increased, till, in the course of half-an-hour, it blew a hurricane. I had not again gone on deck; but I knew from the motion of the ship that the crew had succeeded in laying her to.

'A terrible night, Harper!' said the captain, as he came below, and stood drying his clothes by the fire. 'If we get through it, it's more than ever I expect. She has strained her timbers; the water comes in swimmingly; and the pumps are next to useless. If she would keep to, we might manage it; but she is constantly for falling-off into the trough. Then, suppose we scud—if we don't get pooped and go down—to-morrow morning finds us among the breakers on the coast of Chili. Well, Cox! what new calamity?'

'The leak is getting worse,' said the mate. 'The pumps, however, are doing a little better. Davies says he thinks it's nothing very serious as yet. But about the ship—she won't keep to. If we had the mizen-mast still standing, she might do it with the help of the sparker; but as it is, she won't.'

'Then, I suppose there's nothing for it. We must take our chance of the breakers. It is one blessing that the wind has some nothing in it—it gives us a longer tether; and perhaps it may take off before morning, though I suppose there is no appearance of its doing so.'

'No; none,' said the mate. 'We must scud; and we can't do it too soon. There she goes!'

A heavy lurch of the ship sent him into a corner of the cabin. Telford rushed on deck. I followed him. A tremendous wave came rolling towards us. I caught by one of the davits. There was a man standing beside me. The wave broke over us. I felt it sucking me away with all but irresistible force; but I held on for my life. When it passed I looked around—the man was gone! It was Ned Brown, the second mate; and already, far to leeward, I saw him darkly on the foaming crest of a wave, and, piercing loud above the blast, I heard his drowning cry.

Our situation was now truly perilous. Each wave as it came threatened to board us, and to carry some of us to a watery grave. The leak was gaining on us—there were already some feet of water in the hold. The rigging strained, and the timbers creaked violently; while the roaring wind, the flying clouds, and the foaming sea conspired to fill our hearts with awe.

The head of the foretopmast staysail was shown to the wind. Slowly she came round, and away she flew before it—the huge waves rushing after in her track. But even the single sail we had spread was too much—it bent the mast like a willow whip; and, despite the danger we were in of being overtaken by the waves, the captain ordered it to be lowered. But before this could be done it split, and blew in shreds in the gale.

We were now driving almost directly on the coast. In a few hours, at the rate at which we were going, we would be among the breakers. Telford stood, with lips compressed, looking fixedly to windward. I read our fate in his look. We were helpless; our destruction was all but inevitable.

I went below. The aged missionary had arisen from his bed. He was kneeling in a corner of the cabin, with Flora and little Alice. I knelt beside them, and joined in the prayer of the good old man; as, in such broken English as he possessed, he poured forth his heart to Him who holds the sea in the hollow of His hand, and rides on the wings of the wind.

When we rose, Flora put her hand in mine. 'Is there no hope?' she said. 'O Fred! is there no hope?'

'I cannot deceive you, Flora; indeed, I would not if I could. The situation of the ship is truly desperate. But all that can be done has been done. We must leave the rest to a higher Power.'

'And we may rest sure, my children,' said the old man, 'that, whatever may remain for us in this world, if our hope has hold of the Rock of Ages, we have nothing to fear for the next.'

'But oh!' exclaimed Flora, 'it is a terrible thing to die! I have never almost thought of it before—I have thought too little of it. But is there no hope! Is there no hope of our being saved by the boats?'

'I fear but little. Few boats could live to-night. Our only hope is that the wind may take off, or come round more to the northward. But, Flora, we will at least perish together; and even death to me with you is sweet!'

She looked up into my face—oh, with such a look!—never, never can I forget it! It comes back to me now, sending the blood throbbing to my heart, as it did when, with such a light of love in her eye, she leaned her head upon my shoulder, and burst into tears.

A long time we sat thus together. I scarcely heard the storm—I felt almost insensible to our impending fate. We spoke not a word—our hearts were too full for words; but we thought of and prayed for each other.

Some hours passed. The old man sat reading by the lamp which swung from the roof; little Alice lay fast asleep upon the floor; and Flora—she, too, had fallen asleep. The noise overhead had for some time ceased; but it was now resumed—there was a hurrying to and fro, and the frequent rattle of ropes on the deck. I softly disengaged myself from Flora; and, spreading a cushion on the floor—that being the only place of safety with the rolling of the ship—I gently placed her on it, and hastened upon deck.

Day was beginning to dawn; and, by the glimmering light, I could descry the rugged outline of the coast; and far away, before the rising sun, the snow-capped peaks of the Cordilleras. But the wind had moderated; and although it still blew fresh, it had come round more to the northward—enabling us, as we went before it, to stand to the southward along the coast. The danger which had threatened us had all but passed. My heart filled with joy and gratitude, such as only those can know who have been rescued from what seemed to be almost certain death.

The crew succeeded in rigging a jury mizen-mast, and with its aid we were soon enabled to head again to the sea. The wind continued to go down. We stood more and more away from it; and gradually the distance between us and the land increased. There was a heavy sea; but the wind by degrees came round more off the shore. Sail after sail was bent, and away we stood to the westward.

(To be continued.)

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. I.—DUNCAN BAN MACINTYRE.

The amount of popular lyric poetry current in the Highlands is, to this day, very great. The songs—of which there are still sung by old and young, within doors and without—come, for the most part, directly from the mint of Nature; and have, many of them, a freshness and simplicity about them—an artless confession of sentiments actually experienced—which seems to be the chief charm of such compositions at all times. They are in every sense popular poetry. They were composed by men and women who knew nothing of any other literature than that which happened to be contained in their own language. They formed the heart-treasure of men and women who were to be better instructed generally than the authors of them. They speak the wild, deep feeling which their seclusion from the rest of the world and their peculiar institutions were so nicely calculated to inspire and nurse into strong growth in the easily moved but not easily changed spirit of the Highland people.

A strongly affectionate race were they. It really quite surprises a stranger to mark the powerful expression their eyes give to some all-absorbing attachment, either for place or person. I have frequently felt as if there were a perfect torrent of devotion struggling into light in many a simple and touching lyric I happened to be reading. And as well as women speak with entire surrender to emotion; or, at least, with so cordial an acquiescence in the sentiment of the moment, as if nothing else was worth dreaming in the world. The clansman who threw himself before Lochial, receiving in his own bosom the arrow intended for his chief, was but a prototype of the Highland singer. The latter is equally self-forgetful; equally engrossed in his regard for another; ready to throw himself with equal abandonment between the stern world and his dear feeling—let the action slay him or give him life, he does not seem to care.

The Celtic heart is not, it may be, more tender than any other; but it has one striking advantage over most when it seeks to project its secret emotion into the outer light of the Gaelic language, without degenerating into silliness. It gives it an amazingly tender outline. Hence the great difficulty of rendering the songs of the Highlands into English. To be like their originals, the translations must be simple. They must be pretty much in the language of every-day life. They must be extremely soft and tender; but they must not be maudlin or doting. It is not sufficient to give a feeble echo of the Highland sentiment in English, or to dress it in some shabby and threadbare Lowland garb. There is something in the Gaelic song which is not in the English or Lowland lyric. The air and sun of the great mountains and tuneful sea-lochs have breathed and shone upon it, and given its every feature their own peculiar tan. The translator's difficulty is to preserve this; and it is no small one. I am well aware of that. But yet, I trust, the following Highland poems will be found to retain something of their own look. I cannot think they have lost all their old expression when presented with an English face.

The present paper will be devoted to specimens from the poetry of Duncan MacIntyre, better known among his countrymen as Donacha Bàn, or Fair-haired Duncan. This humble poet was born in Glenorchy, Argyleshire, on the 20th March 1724; and died in Edinburgh, about the 14th May 1812. He is the best known and most generally esteemed of all the Highland poets. Others are more highly appreciated in certain districts, or preferred according to individual taste. He belongs, above any of the rest, to the whole people.

If a representative poet of the modern Highlands be sought for, Duncan Ban MacIntyre is unquestionably the man. With this feeling, his countrymen lately erected a monument to his memory in a conspicuous situation in Glenorchy, not far from the place of his birth, and within a few miles of all the scenes which he has celebrated with such loving minuteness in his poems.

This mark of respect was truly well deserved. Not only did Duncan Ban lead a pure life and always bear a good character—he was a genuine son of Nature and a real poet—without doubt, the most remarkable of all Scotland's rustic and uneducated bards; for he, unlike all the others, to the day of his death, could neither read nor write. It may surprise those who do not know the Gaelic language to learn that he not only composed long poems, notwithstanding his utter want of the common elements of education, but that his style is distinguished for its elegance, its beauty, and correctness. I can myself vouch for the music of his numbers; and Gaelic scholars have assured me that he invariably uses the very choicest Gaelic. But here certain peculiarities connected with that ancient language must not be forgotten. From what reason it comes I cannot tell; but I know that old men, who never thought of grammar or dictionary, are still to be found who speak as pure and graceful a style as the best scholars. Some go so far as to say they speak even better! This is a well-known fact. Then, along with that, this other fact is to be remembered:—All Gaelic poems, of whatever nature, are meant to be sung; or, rather, are actually sung. Highland poetry is still what all poetry was originally—veritably song. The longest and most elaborate productions are composed and chanted to a tune. So much is this the case, that an uneducated Highlander finds it impossible frequently to repeat the verses he has got by heart. A collector of Highland songs once told me that he experienced the greatest difficulty in taking down a certain interesting poem; for, directly he stopped the singer to explain a word, or for any other reason, the man got perfectly bewildered, and was obliged to begin at the very beginning again before he could go on! The three parts of a Gaelic poet are, to this day, that he be able to compose; that he be able to sing his compositions; and that he be able to write them. The last, however, is the least important. The other two only are essential. This habit of composing and chanting poetry to a tune will help to account for Duncan Ban MacIntyre's carrying such a quantity of verse as he must have done in his mind. The other fact will account for the purity and beauty of his language. The great excellence of his compositions consists in his having sung of what he was perfectly familiar with, what his taste led him to study, and what his mode of life gave him every opportunity of knowing. Finally, he had no inducements to make attempts too great for his strength—no chance of affecting feelings which he did not actually possess.

Thus, with his true feeling, his accurate knowledge, his cordial love of his subject, and the native-born music of that gifted though untutored soul of his with which he wedded his sentiments regarding it, Duncan Ban MacIntyre may be pronounced a genuine poet. What his place is among those who shine brighter or dimmer—stand nearer or farther—about the great star of Burns, it is not for me to determine. I consider him well entitled to a place among these—that is all.

COIRE CHEATHAICH;

THE CORRI OF MIST, OR THE MISTY CORRI.

This poem is the most elaborate of Duncan Ban's compositions. It is thought the finest specimen of Gaelic versification in modern times. The following translation, in the rhythm of the original, and rendered verse for verse with it, may be safely called almost literal—by that is meant that a prose translation could hardly give the poet's meaning with closer accuracy.

CORRI CEATHACH.*

My misty Corri! where heifers wander;
My lovely Corri! my charming dell!
So grand, so grassy, so richly-scented,
And gemm'd with wild flowers of sweetest smell.
Thy knolls and hillocks, in dark-green clothing,
Rise o'er the gay sward with gentle swell;
Where waves the cannach and grows the darnel,
And troop the wild deer I love so well.

A strong, well-woven, and double mantle—
A lasting garment, and good for wear,
All rough with rich grass, whose verdant ringlets
In each small dew-drop a burden bear—
Is round my Corri, my green-knoll'd Corri,
Where reeds and rushes so thickly grow;
They'd yield a harvest, were reapers able
Among their quagmires and bogs to go.

'Tis a gay clothing, shows off the long plain,
With pastoral smooth grass from side to side;
A painted garment by rains well nurtured,
As fair as can be by man described.
On this side Paris, I do not fancy
A brighter raiment hath e'er been seen;
Oh may it fade not! and then what fortune
To haunt, at all hours, its varied green!

About Ruadh Aisridh long locks are hanging—
Close, crisp, and clustering, and crested high;
In every moist spot their tops are waving,
As this or that way the breeze goes by.
There the straight rye-grass, the twisted hemlock,
The sappy moor-grass that ne'er gets dry,
And the strong bent grow, and close set groundsel,
Beside the dark wood where heroes lie.

* O is always hard and th silent in Gaelic. Ceathach is therefore pronounced almost as if it were spelt 'Kayach.' The name Macknoch comes from it, and means 'Son of Mist.'

The mountain ruin, where lived MacBhaidi,
Is now a desert that howls alone;
Yet near its white stones is often nurtured
The brown ox, shapely and fully grown;
The cows with calves there that wander houseless,
Grand-group'd on hill-tops are often seen;
Their calves so peaceful, in light and darkness,
Frequent in numbers the smooth Clach Fionn.

The garlic chooses the nooks and bendings
Of steps that climb up the mountain-head;
While the kind sun-slopes are spotted rarely
With countless berries—round, ripe, or red.
The dandelion and penny-royal,
And cannach smooth-white, there wave or rest;
As from its deep roots they deck the mountain,
Unto its lofty and haughty crest.

The tallest crag there is richly coated
With softest mosses above—below;
Unmoulded, stapless, whene'er they're needed,
O'er things unsightly these sweetly grow.
While in the hollows, beneath the sharp peaks,
Where shaggy verdure is thickest spread,
Beside the primrose, right often peeping,
The feeble daisy lifts up its head.

A frowning eyebrow of verdant cresses
Round all the fountains and wells is seen;
And bunchy sorrel conceals the deep roots
Of those great rough stones the springs that screen.
With plunge and gurgle, and dancing motion,
In heatless boiling these quit the ground;
And each dear streamlet leaps, laughs, and lingers,
And runs and loiters in circles round.

The salmon, leaving the roaring ocean
Where they are singing, his white breast shows,
And darts rejoicing, and stops the small flies—
So truly steers he his crooked nose.
On whirling eddies his pompous leaping,
His splendid clothing, his back blue-gray,
His silver spangles, his fins, his speckles,
His white-tail'd smooth flank—how noble they!

The Corri Ceathach is sweet and joyous,
A royal site for the hunter's pride;
There the dark lead-shot his blasing powder
Sows thickly over the deer's dun side;
And there his needy and light-foot gamehound—
With bloody fierceness, without a fear—
Runs madly, leaping with hardy spirit,
Pursuing boldly his red career.

Within thy lone brakes there never fail'd yet
The fawn, the red stag, the hornless doe;
So, 'twas our glory in sunny morning
Through deer-trod dingles a-hunting go.
Nor would the wild heath e'er leave us lying
Before the rain-storm, exposed and bare.
No! In the forest were low-brow'd grottoes,
With well-fenced couches to stretch us there.

Then, when the morning's white calm would wake us,
Beneath the steep cliff 'twould charm my ear
To list the moorhen grow hoarse with croaking,
Or rich-voiced redcock come murmuring near.
The lively wren there his own small trumpet play'd,
And flung his steam off so brisk and beon;
While thrush and redbreast, with bustling motion,
Kept lifting gaily a warbling tune.

All the hill's songsters, in flocking numbers,
From leafy branches, soon pour'd their praise.
First came the gray lark, that noted lyricist,
And shrilly chanted its cheeriest lays;
The merle and cuckoo, on tall thin tree-tops,
Gave out their music with might and main,
When up this sound rose so light and lovely—
The glen was breathing a choral strain.

Then every corrie within the mountain
Sent forth the live things within its bound;
First, treading proudly, the antler'd red-deer
Stapp'd, snorting loudly and looking round;
Throughout the wild fen he dash'd in rapture,
Or near the brown hind more gently play'd—
His charming princess, so strong, so stately,
So spare, so active, so fine, so staid!

In shy recesses the yellow doe crept
Beneath the light twigs, and cropp'd them bare;
While o'er his proud couch the lordly buck stood,
And poked and stamp'd it with gloomy stare.
The little kidding of speckled, smooth side,
Of placid nostril and noble head,
Found sleeping snugly in some lone hollow,
Among the rushes, a cory bed.

How many a light foot, when autumn ripen'd,
Tripp'd gaily over that hill's brown side,
And sought and shared all the store it offer'd
With manly kindness and gentle pride!
In a soft round nest they got the honey
Of the small spotted and brindled bee,
That labours, flying from flower to flower,
With lonely murmur and peaceful glee.

Then nuts well season'd—no scanty harvest
Of wither'd kernels—were growing seen
In great abundance, thin-skinn'd, smooth cluster'd,
That suck'd the life-juice from branches green,
Where pur'd the streamlet throughout the sweet strath,
And rowans ripen'd their berries red,
And many a sapling in graceful mantle
Kept waving gently its new-clad head.

How far, surrounding the lonely desert,
By moor and gray glen where small knolls stood,
With shaggy tufts and with warm soft shelter—
Once spots for wild birds to rear their brood.
Thence from soft couches in May's sweet morning
Rose up the dun doe and stag of ten;
While glanced the red light upon the tall sides
Of the rough Corrie—the Misty Glen!

The minuteness of Duncan Ban's descriptions will perhaps remind some readers of a passage in Lockhart's 'Life of Scott,' written by Mr. Morritt of Rokeby. When he was engaged on his poem of 'Rokeby,' Sir Walter paid a visit to his friend, Mr. Morritt. The latter made the following memorandum:—"I observed him noting down even the peculiar little wild flowers and herbs on the side of a bold crag near his intended cave of Guy Denzil; and could not help saying that—as he was not upon earth in his work—daisies, violets, and primroses would be as poetical as any of the humble plants he was examining. I laughed, in short, at his scrupulousness; but I understood him when he replied, "That in Nature herself no scenes were exactly alike; and whoever copied what was before his eyes would possess the same variety in his descriptions, and exhibit apparently an imagination as boundless as the range of Nature, in the scenes he recorded. Whereas, whoever trusted to imagination would find his own circumscribed and contracted to a few favourite images; and the repetition of these would, sooner or later, produce that very monotony and barrenness which had always haunted descriptive poetry in the hands of any but the patient worshippers of truth."

Thus, men with a true genius for their work, in the most diverse circumstances, agree in their mode of operation. His own unlettered instinct taught Duncan Ban to embody this very important truth, pointed out by the fallible sagacity of Scott. He was a 'patient worshipper of Nature's truth'—very likely without knowing how or why.

THOMAS PARTISON.

THE 'LIGHTHOUSE GHOST.'

OF the many ways that men have of earning a livelihood, few are easier and at the same time more irksome than that of keeping a lighthouse. This may seem strange to some; but so it is;—and the hardest-wrought tradesman, if he only thought it, is much better off in his mode of life than the lighthouse-keeper, who never needs to wipe a drop of sweat from his brow or strain a muscle. The tradesman, in following his avocation, exercises both mind and body to a certain extent; and when he has got his ten hours of labour past, he has always the miscellaneous events of the day to turn over for amusement in his own mind, or a mixed society within reach, by mingling in which his thoughts may be diverted. It is very different with the lighthouse-keeper. His duties are of the most routine description; and in themselves, so far as the exercise of either mind or body is concerned, most trivial. Most of those employed about lighthouses have been, at some time or other of their lives, connected with the sea—this circumstance or connection being supposed to make them more alive to the great responsibility of the situations they are hired to fill. Few of them have gone so far into the study of any branch of science as to be able to employ their minds with anything literary or scientific. The great amount of spare time they have on their hands is therefore passed mostly in reading works of fiction and amusement. Even this becomes, in course of time, tiresome; and then the rigging and fitting out of small model ships, or the darning of pictures on canvas with coloured threads, forms a source of recreation and pleasant pastime. The monotony of lighthouse life is, however, to seamen, almost unendurable; and many have given up good remunerative situations, in order that they might resume their wild, wandering sea-life. Sheer ennui drives them from land to sea. A very slight consideration of their case will show how this comes to be. The caged eagle is never to be compared to the same bird 'soaring o'er the abyss.' The gannet—sailing along on motionless pinion over the sunlit ocean; sporting now on the bellowy air, now on the billowy deep—would not be the same bird cooped, cabined, cribbed, confined; and it need not be wondered at, therefore, that Jack—after having bowled round the world two or three times, seen all the wonders of foreign lands, and felt the variety and excitement of a sailor's life—should not be able to shut himself up and live like a fly in a bottle. Our lighthouse-keepers are perhaps the most secluded class of men on our islands. On lonely rocks, miles away from habitable land—exposed to all the fury of the ocean tempests, and only a few feet above the surface of the never-motionless ocean—some of them have their abodes; and there they live, from day to day, for weeks at a time, without hearing the tones of a strange voice or catching the echo of a strange laugh. On barren islets, amid raging currents, where the winds and waters rave; on the crest of some bold promontory overlooking a wide expanse of ocean; and in light-ships, anchored over sandbanks and sunken reefs—gently rocked by the summer ripples, or wildly dashed hither and thither, straining moorings and timbers, by the wintry storm—others have their anchorite homes. Now and again may the sameness of their lives be relieved by the booming of guns heard above the wild midnight storm, and the glimpse—through the flying wrack and drift—of the split sails and crippled rigging of some gallant ship being driven to destruction; and mayhap—when gray daylight succeeds an evening of tempest and terror—the sight of a sea-sodden corpse lying among the wrack and waifs at high-tide mark, or rising and falling in some rocky bay, where the still untamed waves chafe at the jagged flints. Good cause have sailors for becoming discontented with such a life. Add to this that their solitary lives lead to reflection—which such sights and sounds as we have mentioned increase rather than diminish; producing, furthermore, a sort of morbid hypochondriacal feeling—and the reason of the irksomeness of lighthouse life becomes more apparent.

In the life of a lighthouse-keeper, incidents that might occur fifty times to even the same individual, were he situated amid the bustle and stir of city life, without observation, are noted with curious minuteness. It may be because these events give variety to the monotony of existence that they are so taken hold of by the mind and imagination. How they do so it is the purpose of the short narrative I have now to relate to discover.

On the southernmost point of a little island, off the south-east corner of the island of Arran, on the Frith of Clyde, stands a lofty beacon-tower, which, from the name of the islet on which it is built, has been called Pladda Lighthouse. It is a columnar building, whitewashed outside and in, and surmounted by a cupola, composed chiefly of an orbicular window. At the base of the lighthouse are situated the lightkeepers' dwelling-houses, magazines for oil, coals, and other necessary stores. North of the isle of Pladda is the island of Arran—its lofty, rugged hills towering to the catching of the mist-clouds that come drifting in the North Channel from the Atlantic. To the east and south-east can be seen, in clear weather, the shores of Ayrshire and Galloway; Ailsa Craig and the coast of Ireland, in uncloudy days, relieve the ocean view to the south; while a few of the Western Isles and the promontory of Cantire rest upon the western horizon. In this lighthouse I was stationed as a watcher for about two years. An injury to one of my limbs, received from tumbling over a guano-cliff in the island of Ichaboe, while skylarking there with some comrades, had made it necessary for me to give up a seafaring life for a time at least. My mother had been at service in her young days; and it was an application made by her to one of her old nurslings—at the time a Northern Lighthouse Commissioner, residing in Edinburgh—that had secured for me the situation of second keeper in Pladda Lighthouse.

The novelty of my situation and new duties drove weariness from me for a time; but a yearning for a change began to creep upon me as the autumn sobered down. The novelty of my situation was then worn off. My duties were becoming troublesome to me—not from their weight, but triviality. I had rigged a small schooner and brig; and was heartily tired of all reading, except the most exciting tales of the blood-and-murder sort. Magazines, furnished by the Commission Board, reached us monthly, and newspapers oftener; but, as I had no one with whom to discuss their contents, they very soon failed to entertain. My only companions on the island, I have omitted to mention, were the principal lightkeeper and his wife. The former was a morose, incommunicative, middle-aged man-o'-war's man. A jealous, querulous disposition was his, as I discovered soon after taking up my quarters with him; and, to give him no cause for disturbance, I had as little intercourse with him and his better-half as I could help. With the selfish, clannish, Gaelic-speaking islanders of Arran we had no comings or goings; and any little sociality I enjoyed was when a party of pleasure-seekers came—as they did at times—to picnic on the island, see the lighthouse, or amuse themselves with a dance on the level green sward of our little kingdom. The flowery months had passed away well enough; but as the autumn tints began to supplant those of the summer on the hills, my spirits succumbed to the pensive influences. It was late in autumn. The Arran hills were stripped of their roseate, heathery garb; and the sea to the south of the lighthouse was seldom enlivened by the presence of any of the smart clippers of the Royal Northern Yacht Club—on which it had been my delight to gaze during the more genial season of the year. My dislike to my situation was so strong that I began to think—as I was not fit to go as an ordinary seaman in any of the line of vessels in which I had been employed—I would go and look for a situation as cook or steward on board some coasting trader or steamer rather than wait any longer. I felt that my body as well as my mind was beginning to suffer, and that change I must, when an incident took place that delayed me for a little.

In a most desponding mood did I enter upon my watch on the evening of a breezy day in October. The sun had set ere I went up stairs to the lamp-room, and all I had to do was to sit by and see that the flame kept burning clear, bright, and steady. Though our lamp was lit, there was still a good glimmering of daylight remaining outside; and the outlines of the island of Sanda and Mull of Cantire stood out bold and sharply defined against the reddened western sky. In the east and south-east, whence came a wind that was perceptible, the atmosphere was thick with heavy masses of vapour, streaked saffron and yellow. Appearances were portentous in that direction. To the south, Ailsa Craig rose like a big bluish haystack from the wide expanse of waters; and in the same direction I caught at intervals the glimmer of Corsewall Light. But in the Frith there was fresh breeze blowing, and an outward-bound barque—one of the line belonging to Mr. Kerr of Greenock—as I knew by the private signal still fluttering from her mastshead—came spanking along the Arran coast, all her square sails set, filled with the favouring gale and bellying out 'full and round, without a wrinkle or a fold.' A small ranterpike schooner was beating up the Frith on the larboard tack; and, as she stood in towards the lighthouse—evidently steering by it—I could see the water break under her weather bow, and ripple along her side in merry bubbles that disappeared beneath her counter. She tacked about half a mile from the island; and I most interestedly watched every manœuvre on board ship, as her yards were hauled aft and she swung round to fall off on the opposite tack. I stood on the walk round the base of the cupola for some time, viewing with much interest the movements of the two craft as they passed each other; the one going away free into the glowing west, the other all caught up into the gloomy foreboding nor-east. A chilly gust swirling round me, and a spit of rain on my face, told me it was time to go inside. I went into the light-chamber, looked that things were all right, took my accustomed seat and position therein, and commenced the perusal of a few old numbers of a weekly publication, of no great respect I must confess. The story I chanced to light upon was one somewhat suited to interest me at the time; and as I finished the chapters in one number, I proceeded with the process of devouring mentally those in the succeeding. Now and again, as I reached the end of some dramatic sticking and stabbing piece of the tale, I rose, touched up the light, and looked out upon the night. 'Twas fearfully dark, and the sighing of the wind was ominous. I returned to my seat to pore over the story. It told of an Englishman of fashion ruining a guileless Italian maid; of his being hated through many lands by her brother; and of a grand dénouement, as the story-books say, in which there was a plentiful spilling of blood and life. The interest I felt in the consummation had so engrossed my attention, that I was heedless of all objects around me. My excitement, notwithstanding, was considerable; and my imagination was busy with the details a circumstantially set forth. All at once I was recalled from the realms I occupied in imagination to the little room at the head of the long winding stair, by a rattling peal of thunder. At the same time, a wild shriek burst upon my ears; and, with the tail of my eye, I caught a momentary glance of a female form, clothed in white raiment, floating away on the wind from my window. Oh! what was that? I felt it could be no real woman; and my belief in spectres was before that not great. That it was a spectre, however, I was not prepared to deny; as I had seen a pair of burning eyeballs—a hollow cavity, like that occupying the place of the nose in a fleshless skull, between; besides a pair of wide-extended, white-vested arms. The entire figure—so far as my glance enabled me to discern—was draped in white. I thought my excited fancy might be playing me a trick; so I resumed my reading. The grand crash of the story I read was imminent, when again the arch above me rang with the weird, unearthly wail; and again I caught a glimpse of the ghostly lady waving her white-robed arms above her head, and floating away on the wind. This time I started to my feet, and peered through the glass into the murky midnight—'darkness there, and nothing more.' Once I thought I saw the white figure gleaming in the rays of the lamp; but it almost as quickly disappeared. This time I resolved to wait the reappearance of the white demon; and, laying down my book, I sat with gaze intently fixed upon the window. Another clap of thunder shook the house from the cupola to its rocky foundation, and the rain began to hum around me. It was an eerie situation. My eyes became sore with watching. Meantime, conscience—which makes cowards of us all—was chilling my heart, as memory summoned before me, in that lonely hour, all the heinous offences against God and man which I had committed in my young, thoughtless, wild seafaring life. Imagination, at the suggestion of memory, led me back to the banks of the Hooghly; to a wild orgie in Calcutta; to a mad rum crusade in one of the West India islands; and to the poor Lascars who came round with us from China to Singapore, on the last voyage but one I was at sea. It may be readily conceived that my mental distress was waxing greater and greater. Cold sweat broke upon me—drops heavy, cold, glittering as pearls, stood on my forehead. The thunder boomed along the cliffs of the Arran shore, and combined, with the storm now raging, to shake the lighthouse. For relief I closed my eyes; but, just as I did so, there was a crash at the window, and again the awful, despairing, heart-rending cry quavered on the gale. I started to my feet—eyes and mouth wide open—to behold the phantom raise its arms in an apparently agonised manner above its head, and then drop down, down, down through the darkness to the waves champing at the rocks below. I remained in an unusual physical and mental state till about half an hour of the time when I should be relieved from my watch. By the time I had put the lamp right and composed myself, my comrade came to my relief; and I retired to my bed, but not to rest. It struck me that all the appearances had been made during the period of time intervening between midnight and three o'clock, which made me the more inclined to believe in the supernatural character of my visitor.

When I rose, about my usual hour in the forenoon, the storm of the preceding night had moderated. After breakfast, I went out for a stroll round the cliffs, and to see what waifs had been driven ashore by the gale. In a little natural bay, formed by projecting rocks, I found, cast upon a bed of shingle, a solan goose or gannet, in beautiful feather, white and pure as snow. I picked it up, and examined it carefully to try and ascertain how it had come by its death. No shot or other wound was visible, and its body and the condition of its feathers showed that it could not have been long in the water. How came it there? I took it up to the house; but my neighbours, who had been much longer in the lighthouse than I, evinced no concern about it, and casually laid my demon by remarking that most likely it had flown against the lighthouse window. Possession of the key made the solution of the riddle easy. The poor bird, driven from its resting-place by the storm, had been flying about in the darkness when it noticed the light. Following a natural inclination, it flew towards it; and, in its efforts to reach the object of its attraction, became my ghostly visitant from 'the night's Plutonian shore.' Its eyes glaring in the lamp-light were the fearsome orbs of the spectre; the black bill was its nasal cavity; its snowy plumage the floating white vestment!—Often since that occasion have I been startled by seawowl against the window, and have found them dead on the outside walk of the lighthouse in the morning.

T. B.

NO WITNESS.

Oh, the wild moan,
The dying groan,
That wakes the stillness of the silent night!
Is no one near
That cry to hear,
And save the crushing out of life's dim light?

The fiends are by;
But yet the cry
Is borne up, heavenwards, like an angel's breath.
In deathly swoon,
O piteous moon!
Fade out, and blackness kiss the house of death!

R. L. G.

A SOLITARY WALK IN PRAGUE.

PRAGUE is a lovely city. Even that kind of traveller to whom (to parody the words of the poet)

A city on a river's brim
A place of taverns is to him,
And it is nothing more;—

even he must be charmed by it, one would think. He would hardly fail to observe that the river has pretty islands and fine bridges; the city antique buildings and great palaces; and that it is surrounded by ramparts and walls—which make it different from many other cities possessing, like it, a large railway station and some very good hotels.

But the traveller, who sees a little more than such things, will find the history of Bohemia—and, to some extent, the history of Germany—written in the aspect, the physiognomy of Prague. As we mark the lines of thought and feeling on some noble face, and say—'This is no common man—such and such years must he have gone through of passion, sorrow, and duty. He is but what those years have made him.' So do we say of this city. It is a historical result, worked out by many centuries—some of fiery zeal in the right, some of bitter, indignant submission to wrong; and each century has left on it a stamp of its own. As Paris is France, Prague is Bohemia. Here are residences of great nobles; royal palaces; and municipal halls in which, in ages past, lived and acted men once mighty for good or for ill in the destinies of the land. Here misty and shadowy legends of ancient times float over places given up to the practical works of to-day. Thus, past and present meet at the point where meet also, yet stand opposed to each other, two nationalities—the Slavonic and the Teutonic. I had heard in Saxony of the efforts made in 1847 to bring about a union of some kind between the two races on the Elbe and on the Moldau. But these had failed—as all attempts to inspire men with the feeling of common national life fail in Germany. I knew, also, from some Dredeners, that the position of Germans in Prague was not agreeable, and that there they found themselves often excluded from good society. However, all this gossip of the day I forgot at once on being in Prague. Recollections solely of past history crowded on me, and made me almost indifferent to the present. There was something thrilling in them; for in them was what I had felt to be wanting in all other parts of Germany—that sense of national life which can affect whole masses with a common impulse, and give them a common pride in the remembrance even of great defeats suffered by them in a great national cause. I could almost persuade myself in some parts of Germany that a patriot heart had never beaten there. But, on the contrary, in Prague I could not persuade myself that Bohemia's heart, which had throbbed so deep and strong in former days, did not still pant, as of old, for truth and freedom. I began to know my way through the city; and, full of these thoughts, I set out, on a lovely summer's day, for a walk; my fancies ending, as I left the hotel, by—Truth is great, and it shall prevail!

Truth is great, and shall prevail! The truth shall make you free! In the meantime, falsehood has prevailed; and freedom—where is it? Regiments of Austrian soldiers, in their showy white uniforms, were passing along the streets. Black robes now and then threw a shadow along the glittering white-coated line—the robes of priests, whose hands were seized and kissed by any women and children who came near them. And thus my enthusiasm received a check. The troops in thousands were entering the great churches in that quarter. I felt no inclination to see them at their devotions, high holiday though it was; and I went on to the Alt-Städter Ring—that is, the Ring, or public place of the old town.

When in it, I turned into a church very interesting to me, from its formerly having been a place of worship of the followers of John Hus. There were no military; and a preacher was delivering a discourse in a language new to my ears—the Bohemian. It is called the 'Tein Kirche.' Among its monuments is the tomb of the great astronomer, Tycho de Brahe, with this inscription—"Not power, not wealth; only the works of science remain." There was not much inducement to stay to listen to what I could not understand, and I did not care to hear then the service of the mass which was to follow the sermon; so I slipped away. But when I was out, I felt that this was so decidedly a day for churches, I had better put aside remembrances of old legends, the Hussite wars, the Swedes, Wallenstein, the great insurrection of the last century and that of 1848—which make every street in Prague living with the past; and follow at present the multitude to the Cathedral. For that, it was necessary to leave the old town and cross the bridge to the Hradshin side. The bridge! All remember it:—

'On Prague's proud arch the fires of ruin glow,
Its blood-dyed waters murmuring far below.'

Old towers stand at each end; and the wall on each side has ten pediments, bearing statues of more than life-size. Conspicuous among them is St. Nepomuk, the patron saint of Prague and of all good Catholic bridges. His festival is for this city one of the greatest in the calendar. On seeing the worship that is then paid him by the thronging crowds, who come in from many miles around, one cannot but say that Fetichism reigns in some parts of Europe as well as in some parts of Africa. There is also on the bridge a great crucifix, with the figures of Mary and St. John at the foot of the Cross, all made in copper; and erected in the place of a wooden one thrown down by the Swedes. But if I would hear the grand music, I must hurry on to St. Vit's, the Cathedral; and to reach it there are more than two hundred steps to ascend.

The Hradshin is a hill on which is the royal or imperial castle. It is palace, fortress, and cathedral in one—or, rather, in many—but all connected together; and the terrace in front of them commands a splendid view of the town. The Cathedral appeared so full, that I thought I should have to leave it without getting a seat; but a person who observed that I was a stranger very kindly took me up a little staircase to the gallery in which were the singers. There, opposite the principal altar, I had a full view of the whole church. Hundreds of candle were burning all around, at altars and tombs. Clouds of incense were ascending over the many heads bowed in deep devotion; and strains of divine harmony swelled to the vaulted roof. In full canonicals, with two pages to bear up his train, the Cardinal-Prince-Archbishop led the ceremonial and the procession, with really quite a nice little army of priests following him. Here at last he must repose, after all his pomp and power; for here are buried all the Archbishops of Prague; and many other great princes and nobles, with some royal personages, rest with them. Yet this Cathedral, like many great churches in Germany, has never been completed. The high choir, the side aisles, and some of the chapel only are finished; and there is a prophecy that the king who shall complete the whole shall rule over the Easter and Western Empires like a Caesar of old. Perhaps some Russian sovereign may do the work. I have little expectation that an Austrian one will.

A silver coffin is to be seen, in which are the relics of St. Nepomuk. Over it is a massive canopy, and around are angels and kneeling figures—all in silver. A bit of bone of the saint, under glass, and set in pearls, is within reach of every one. Many women kissed it; and I saw a man rub his eye against it, to cure it of some disease! Altogether this kind of thing, and the incense, the lights, the music, the splendid robes of the priests and their garbations, made me begin to feel a little as if I were in Cathedon. I was glad when the musicians near me seemed preparing to go. There was a general movement below—a man began to extinguish the candles. Just before that, a group of persons, in elegant attire, had disappeared with a lady and gentleman, to whom an extraordinary degree of attention seemed to be paid. Royalties! said I to myself;—but who can they be? My question was soon answered, when I made inquiry whether I could be permitted to see the interior of the Castle. I might see the old part of it, but not the modern State apartments—they were occupied by the Emperor. What Emperor? Der alte Kaiser—the old one, who had been in the Cathedral. Yes, it was Ferdinand the Second, who in 1618, when so many kings said—'J'abdique, messieurs,' got his dismissal, and made way for his nephew. Not long ago, a king who got his dismissal in 1830—Charles X.—lived in that great palace; and with him the Princesse d'Angoulême, granddaughter of Maria Theresa.

Napoleon, king and emperor had reflected on the vicissitudes of the times. I reflected on them in my way, as I went into the first court of the Castle, under a gateway which has the great Empress's name and the imperial arms cut in the stone. There are three large courts; each with iron gates, which are kept carefully locked. In the palace they count more than four hundred rooms, besides many great halls and long galleries. The Vladislav Hall is two hundred and sixteen feet long and sixty feet wide, and was destined for the assembling of the Constitutional Estates, or Parliament of Bohemia, in 1848. Destined!—that is all. There is also the Spanish Hall, in which two thousand ladies and gentlemen, whose country had no constitution, might assemble and dance to their hearts' content, by the light of two thousand wax candles, and the thirty splendid lustres down the centre of the hall, and the thirty girandoles on the walls.

But I saw a room, not so lustrous, which interested me more. It is called the green room, and it was the old audience chamber, out of a window of which were pitched the two imperial councillors, with their private secretary, in the fateful year 1618. The window, whence the world-renowned un-voluntary plunge had to be taken, was closed for me to look out. From that height, it seemed impossible that the men could escape with their lives; but a heap of manure saved them. A little pyramid of stone on the spot now commemorates the event, of which the Catholic imperial party made a miracle. The pictures of the three—Martinitz, Slavata, and Fabricius Platter—were pointed out to me among the emperors and empresses who adorn the walls.

I left the Hradschin to return, as I had come, over the bridge and by the Alt-Städter-Ring—the Great Ring, which is also called. Here is the old Rath-haus, or Hotel de Ville. It was built in the fourteenth century, but burned down before that century ended; then rebuilt and enlarged. And there fell the sparks, from the faggots kindled at Constance for Huss and Jerome, which lighted a fearful fire in Bohemia. From this old town-hall went forth, in the fifteenth and in the sixteenth centuries, edicts inspired by religious and political fanaticism, which sent terror throughout Europe. It was stormed again and again; the town councillors were cast out and killed; the king was kept prisoner there. It is impossible, in recalling these events, not to recall what the Hotel de Ville of Paris was at the end of the last century, with some scenes of Parisian revolutions in these later days.

And how did all end here in Prague? In the erection of this pillar to the Virgin in the centre of the Alt-Städter-Ring, to commemorate the departure of the Swedes in 1648; in modern additions to this ancient Hotel de Ville—which give it a sinister, double aspect, telling of old times and of new; in a discarded emperor ending his days, in peaceful luxury, in the town where his ancestors exercised the rights of conquest by every indignity which mere brute force could employ against humanity!

M. M. L.

'UNCLE NATHAN.'

THERE are persons in the world who seem fated to carry about with them some peculiarity, the painful and constantly intruding consciousness of which only serves to increase its tenacity and vitality. A stammerer, for instance, will stutter through his sentences with redoubled vigour, if, when he begins to speak, the unwelcome recollection of his infirmity rushes upon him. The bashful young man, also, instead of profiting by the memory of the blunders and mistakes induced by his timidity, often gets more and more entangled in the meshes of his bashfulness; until it becomes to him an incubus from which he is scarcely free in the retirement of his own chamber—where, in spite of solitude and the soothing influence of his 'choice Havana,' he feels himself tingling all over to the ears as he mentally reviews the awkward positions and transactions in which he gets from time to time involved by reason of his besetting weakness.

To the last-mentioned class of unfortunates does my 'Uncle Nathan' belong. Dear old soul! Years ago his whimsical peculiarities had only the effect of provoking my girlish mirth and ridicule. But now that I am a woman long past the meridian of life, and conversant alike with its sunbeams and its shadows, experience has chastened my mirth—not into sadness, but sympathy; and taught me to look upon many of the apparent weaknesses of our humanity as being only the untrained offshoots of goodness and amiability; which, for lack of genial, supporting soil and culture, become degenerated, straggling, and distorted. At least, so to some extent it has been in the case of my uncle. I have often heard it alleged that excessive bashfulness is only excessive pride, or an over-weening self-conceit; needing but to be treated with contempt or indifference in order to effect a cure. Had 'Uncle Nathan' never been on the list of my most intimate friends in life, I might have been drawn in to credit such an erroneous opinion. As it happens, however, the close observance and study of his character have led me most decidedly to rank bashfulness as chief of the vagrant virtues, if I may be allowed the expression; and more closely akin to a noble nature than pride or self-conceit.

Another of 'Uncle Nathan's' peculiarities is an extreme and sensitive devotion to the fair sex; but which he evinces in a manner by no means calculated to fascinate or prove agreeable to them. Such is his diffidence, that no sooner does a lady approach him than he blushes to the temples, begs her pardon, and manages to convey himself out of the way by a series of nervous jerks altogether peculiar to himself. I have found him, after such an occasion, sitting alone in his room, in a state of mental excitement difficult to account for, and ejaculating—'Humph, humph! old fool! humph, humph!' with a vehemence and rapidity almost alarming for so slight a cause. I suppose men are privileged to be whimsical and fidgety on small occasions; yet it must be confessed that 'Uncle Nathan' has more than his own share of these characteristics. His overgrown and unchecked bashfulness have been prolific in producing a host of minor, and, it may be, of more unlovable eccentricities. These keep him in such thralldom, that he rarely ventures into society. Indeed, there are days when a morbid melancholy takes possession of him, and everything in creation seems out of joint to his distorted imagination. To my lady visitors he is generally invisible; and it is to no purpose that sundry slippers embroidered by fairy fingers, and smoking-caps of most elegant design, have found their way to Brier Cottage. My uncle never wears the gifts; and if I venture to direct his notice to the eloquent 'heart's-ease' and moss-rosebuds on the slippers, or make any allusion to the possible connection of smoking-cap with courting-cap, he only smiles, without in the least seeming to understand my delicate insinuations.

I don't pretend to be exempt from the frailties of my sex; and consequently do now and then, just to relieve the monotony of a country life, indulge in a little bit of gossip, or it may be of scandal, with a neighbour. My uncle detests scandal, and places all scandal-mongers on the civil service list of Satan; and I might just as soon think of swallowing the bed-post as try to get him to join us, or even to listen, especially if the object of scandal be a female. In fact, he seems to think that there is, or ought to be, something little short of divinity about us; and it is my secret belief that, if he has a doubt on that score, it is only when he sees a young lady eagerly permitting and returning the empty, meaningless attentions of what he ill-naturedly designates 'the puppy tribe.' Being rather taciturn in his manner, his discomposure and dissatisfaction at such times is indicated by a series of emphatic humphs—his usual mode of expressing annoyance or displeasure.

I need scarcely tell my reader that 'Uncle Nathan' is a bachelor; that fact, I think, is transparent enough. Somehow or other, married men manage to escape all these innocent peculiarities of character. Their feelings and affections get drawn out and mellowed, and their angularities rubbed down, amid the amenities of genial domestic intercourse; while the bachelor too often becomes an amalgamation of all the oddities and crudities incident to masculine nature.

How it comes to pass that my uncle—possessed as he is of a good fortune, a prepossessing exterior, and the most tender, affectionate heart in the world—has never got married, is often a perplexing subject of cogitation and discussion at the select 'tea-parties' of our village, when the topics of conversation naturally have a very limited range. These parties are chiefly composed of widow ladies with their growing and grown-up daughters, and some half-dozen spinsters, who, like myself, have long been laid aside from any chance of entering on the coquettish cares and pleasures of wedded life.

I am under a pledge to avoid all scandal here, and therefore cannot gratify any reader with a detail of the various designs and intrigues formed against my uncle's freedom by some of these ladies. Of course, they were all innocent, and all equally unsuccessful. Although it is going on to a score of years since I entered on the 'spinster's list,' still I have a strong belief in the blessings of matrimony. I have always been of opinion that a lively, spirited young wife, and half-a-dozen prattling picanninies, would be the greatest possible addition to my uncle's happiness, and would render complete our establishment at Brier Cottage.

With a view to bring about this most desirable consummation, I had at different times set various little match-making schemes afloat. But, somehow, my projects for the promotion of 'social science' had hitherto been failures. The truth is, I had gone to work in a too timid and lady-like manner. I feared rubbing too roughly against my uncle's prejudices, and endeavoured to take him as it were by stratagem. It wouldn't do. I never could get him to acknowledge my most palpable hints on the subject of matrimony; and began to suspect that a certain measure of boldness would be absolutely necessary, and quite praiseworthy under the circumstances. So, while sitting together in our little parlour one evening lately, enjoying all the cozy confidence of a gloaming fireside chat, I asked, quite abruptly, 'Why don't you get married, uncle?'

'Eh! what?' he laughingly answered. 'Art tired of being my housekeeper, Kate?'

Of course he knew quite well that I wasn't; and I told him so. We were talking in the fire-light, and I did not see him so well; yet I felt instinctively that the blushing process was in active development on his physiognomy, and that the abruptness of my question had greatly disturbed his equanimity. I was a little vexed at this; but no matter. Having probed the wound, was I, like an unskilful surgeon, going to desist merely because my patient winced? Not very likely! I had at length succeeded in making an impression, and was determined to go on. Indeed, on second thoughts, I rather liked the perturbation into which the question had thrown my uncle. It was a plain indication that he was not altogether impervious to an attack. So I continued—

'You see, uncle—shut your eyes and disguise the fact as you will—it will be out and evident that "it is not good for man to be alone." There is no end to the monotony and isolation of an existence such as ours, but in an entire change of condition. As for me, my lot is sealed for single-blessedness, and I am happy and content; but you, uncle! why should you drift out of existence like a wave that has washed the shore and returned to the ocean, leaving no trace behind it? No, no, uncle! positively it's unchristian. You must get married; I am decided on that point. Oh, dear me! it would be so delightful! I would feel quite young again—nursing the babies and helping your wife in housekeeping! Poor thing! you know she couldn't be expected to have experience, in such occupations; and I have been thinking, for some time past, that if something did not happen to cause an exhilaration of the atmosphere here, we would get fossilised in it.'

'Get—get what, Kate?' deprecatingly exclaimed my uncle, moving uneasily in his chair, and looking victimised.

'Become regular petrifications, uncle; and I am sure, whatever veneration we may have for the British Museum as an institution, neither of us have any ambition to be impaled in it as geological curiosities.'

'Humph, humph! Scientific studies don't agree with your constitution, Kate; they jumble your ideas too much—they do indeed, my dear. Get fossilised! Humph! Well, to be sure, ladies are queer sometimes. The Rev. Jonathan Malachite's geological lecture has excited your imagination, I fear. Just ring for tea, will you, like a darling? That will put you all to rights."

Very pretty, wasn't it, to hear my uncle talk, when I could plainly perceive, by the fitful flare of a piece of gas-coal which sputtered away in the grate, that he was all in a tremor of agitation? If he thought that I would let him take refuge in the 'tea urn,' he was mistaken.

"Tea, indeed!" I replied, folding my arms, and setting my feet resolutely on the fender. "Why, it wants a whole hour till tea-time yet! and you never found our Betty guilty of the indiscretion of setting the kettle to boil an hour before its time. No, no, uncle; I won't let you off that way. Do tell me now—Were you never in love?"

"The Devil's in the woman!" was my uncle's energetic rejoinder. He felt his case getting desperate; but continued, more mildly, "What spirit of mischief has taken possession of you to-night, Kate? Positively you are a tease. Humph! never in love? Why, girl, I have never been out of it since I had a thought above buttons. Got into it I never could tell how. Suspect I must have been mesmerised. At any rate, love has been my evil genius; and a precious fool it has made of me. Yes, a fool! Humph! I don't think I was ever anything else."

This was rather more than I had expected from 'Uncle Nathan,' and I felt my eyes opening to an unnatural extent while he thus gave vent to his feelings.

Had I all along been mistaken in supposing that 'Uncle Nathan' had been preserved intact from the tender passion; and were his peculiarities the result of an entire and abstract bashfulness? or was this bashfulness only a consequence and component part of an over-sensitive and delicate subjection to that passion at once the bane and elixir of life?—were the thoughts which flashed through my mind, while my uncle, seemingly alarmed at his confession, kept pacing the room at a ridiculous rate.

I had often observed that very bashful persons, of either sex, were generally susceptible of more delicate and enduring attachments than those of a bolder nature—attachments partaking more of the finer elements of love than is usually current or appreciable in this dreadfully gross and material age, when even our very courtships and marriages are degenerating into mere conventional engagements. The fact had hitherto escaped my notice; and I was now to learn, for the first time, that 'Uncle Nathan' was an additional confirmation of the truth of this observation.

CHAPTER II

"Ridiculous! isn't it, Kate?" said my uncle, suddenly stopping short in his pedestrian exercise through the apartment. "You do think me a fool; don't you, darling?"

"I am sure I don't, uncle," I replied. "I rather think that you are only coming to your senses. To be sure, you have cheated me famously all these years I have lived with you. I thought you never had loved; and I confess I am all curiosity. Do tell me why you aren't married?"

He was looking steadily into the fire, and for one moment a tear dimmed his clear blue eye.

"It wasn't to be, Kate," he said, with a sigh. "Some fates are fixed, and nothing can change them."

"Nonsense, uncle. We make our fates. God overrules them—if we are his children—for good; if rebels against his laws, he suffers the fates we make to become our punishment. That blind belief in fate brings us into innumerable evils. But, tell me, did you lose the object of your love?"

My uncle resumed his seat beside me; and taking a small locket from his breast, put it into my hand, saying,—"I haven't opened it for twenty years, Kate. I don't need; the original is ever with me, night and day. "Her bright smile haunts me still."

I opened the locket, and beheld a countenance in which were blended, with the utmost simplicity and girliness, a soul-expression and womanliness of thought rarely to be seen, and indicating at once strength and beauty of character in the highest degree.

"You loved her, uncle?" I said, returning the locket.

"Dearer than life itself, Kate. But I wasn't to have her. Three days before that fixed for our marriage she died. My darling Mary! my first, my only love!"

"You never loved again, uncle?"

"Who ever loves again, Kate? Doesn't the poet sing—

"The first joys of the heart come never back again!"

and it is true—too true. We never passionately and absorbingly love twice in our lives; no, no, Kate. "All is not gold that glitters;" neither is all love that bears the name of love. Believe me, no feeling in our nature has so many spurious imitations passed off under the genuine name. After a short pause, my uncle continued:—"Years after the death of Mary Saville, I felt my life a blank. I did not try to forget her—she was part of my being, and the attempt would have been vain. Still, I knew that for many reasons it would be advisable to marry and settle from the wandering life I had been leading, in order to blunt the poignancy of my grief. I became intimate with a family in the south of England. The heads of the family evidently wished to promote a marriage between their only daughter and myself. She was apparently amiable and good-tempered; and I seemed in no way disagreeable to her. To acquit myself in a very lover-like fashion was an impossibility, and would have been a useless deception. Your sex, Kate, are generally quick to fathom the amount of real affection given to them when they are in earnest about it. Still, Miss Melville seemed contented and happy with the attention she received from me; and there was seemingly a tacit understanding between the whole family and myself as to our probable future relationship. According to my usual custom, I set out one evening to pay my respects at Elm Lodge; and decided to make a formal proposal for Miss Melville's hand that evening. On my way thither, as fate would have it, I suddenly came in sight of Miss Melville, walking with a young gentleman whom I had sometimes seen at the Lodge. I saw at a glance that they were lovers; and felt that if she did consent to be my wife, I had not her heart. I could not go on. I had loved, and been loved with all the ardour of a pure and unfettered heart; and anything less in the memory of that love seemed sacrilege. I retraced my steps homeward; and, two days afterwards, set off once more on my travels. And that is how I am not married, Kate. Now, I am such a bundle of peculiarities, I am not worth any woman's acceptance; but yet you are right, Kate. "It is not good for man to be alone."

Here we were interrupted by Betty bringing in the tea-things at last; followed by Grimaldin, raising his back and purring with as much energy as if the wheels of creation were to be turned by it. A double knock at the door announced the Curate, who usually drops in of an evening to discuss the affairs of the nation, and capture queens and bishops on the chess-board.

'Midst all the folly, conventionalism, and wickedness of life, lives there a man who has not stowed away (it may be in some very obscure nook of his heart) the memory of one pure, natural, undivided affection? one spot at which, when he secretly and seriously looks, he blushes it may be for the sins and follies which have robbed his heart of its one faith and purity, and shaded it with a moral turpitude at which, in his solemn moments, he shudders—contrasting what he is with what he might have been? I don't believe in the existence of such a man; and therefore don't fear appealing to a universal sympathy with my 'Uncle Nathan.' It is true he had escaped the snares of vice and pleasure, with which too many seek to blunt the poignancy of disappointed and unreciprocated love. He had nevertheless, in a great measure, been lost to society and even to himself. For years he had been morbidly cherishing the memory of feelings which, in active development and reciprocity, would have made life an oasis; but which, warped and repressed on the heart like the mistletoe on the oak, secretly undermine the mainsprings of life and happiness.

I can plainly perceive that, ever since my uncle's involuntary confession, he looks a little shy of me. He seems to fear having committed himself. His newspaper is more than ever engrossing; and, when I give him his coffee, his hand does not always appear to be so steady as it was wont to be; while a timid, furtive glance, as his eye occasionally meets mine, seems to deprecate any further allusion to the subject.

But it is of no use. I have resolutely set my mind on making a benedict of 'Uncle Nathan,' and what a woman wills, she will do. It is quite clear my uncle never will summon courage to marry of his own accord. If I could manage the affair without his knowledge or consent—just as you give a bolus concealed in jelly to a child—it would be all very well. As it is, I have to watch my opportunity. We often fail to accomplish our designs by paying too little respect to the prejudices and peculiarities of others—rudely driving against and breaking up when we might otherwise, with more tact and discretion, mould to better purpose. A skillful general keeps his own counsel; therefore I don't tell 'Uncle Nathan' that my young friend Dora Mortimer is, in my secret designs, destined to be the future mistress of Brier Cottage. A loving heart and true has Dora; though, in respect to 'Uncle Nathan,' she is a most incorrigible tease. By some spell or other she always manages to keep him stationary in the room with us when she drops in to spend an evening. She contradicts him without mercy, laughs at his little oddities, and gives them such a ludicrous aspect that at times he is forced to join in the laugh against himself. Gravity or gaiety becomes Dora equally well; and a very infidel is she in respect to hysterics, hypochondria, or ennui. Our Betty declares that 'It's clean rideekless in the maister no to see that Miss Dora is jist cut out for him!'

But I do think that some such idea at times disturbs his cogitations, and will ere long take a more tangible form. I have sounded Dora on the subject; and though it wouldn't be fair to tell what passed on the occasion, still I may tell that visions of a marriage trousseau and bridal favours do most seriously affect my alums, and furnish me with what I can perceive is by no means a disagreeable topic of conversation to my uncle, as he sits over his coffee in the morning.

A. M. N. YOUNG.

OUR EARLY POSTS.

To gain a proper idea of our national progress and development, and to ascertain the difficulties through which it has passed, there is no better way than to contrast present conditions with what any of our boasted institutions were a few centuries ago, and trace the moving panorama as it rolls on from more exciting days to our less demonstrative but more earnest times. With none of these institutions are we more familiar, and with none has there been so great and rapid an improvement, as that of postal intercourse between continent and island, however distant—between man and man, however dissimilar in language and habits. The desire for such an interchange of communications proved itself early to be a necessity with every nation having pretence to any degree of civilization. Cyrus early established a post, for facilitating the exchange of intelligence between the Court and the provinces of the vast empire of Persia. Ascertaining, first, how many leagues a good horse might travel in a day, he caused stables to be erected at various stages; so that the couriers might be relieved on their journey by fresh men and horses. The posts were thus enabled to travel night and day; and the ancient world was astonished at the speed with which intelligence was transmitted from one end of the empire to the other. Marco Polo, on his early visit to China, found there also a system of posts—said to have been in existence for nearly a thousand years—far superior to anything of the kind he had ever heard of in Europe. A regular transmission of letters can be traced as far back in China as the year 230 B.C.—the time when one of their emperors brought all the petty princes within the jurisdiction of the supreme government, and found it necessary to have a constant and immediate intercourse with the distant corners of the land. The Romans had a similar system of postal reliefs on their great highways; but it was never designed for public benefit, and was solely reserved for messengers of state and ambassadors.

In Europe, the want began to be much felt toward the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries—the invention of printing, reformation of religion, and a flourishing commerce having enlarged the necessity so much as to cause the adoption of regular and stated means of transmission. Traces of an earlier post, however, are to be observed in several statutes of Edward III.; but there was not anything like regularity for several centuries later. So long ago as 1543, a post existed which carried letters from London to Edinburgh in about four days; but this which was something remarkable for the time, did not last long, and the mercantile communities had to employ private persons for the carrying of letters—much after the same manner in which runners are still employed in those sequestered districts at a distance from post-towns.

During the middle ages, the ordinary correspondence of the two kingdoms travelled at a snail's pace and was conveyed by the common carriers, who traversed the country with trains of pack-horses walking in single file, or with waggons for passengers and goods. By these, only moving by day, communications could hardly be exchanged between York and London in less time than a month—these cities being then as practically separated as Liverpool and New-York now are. A system of posts so early as 1600 had been established in Scotland; this was, however, only at places where relays of horses might be had for travellers, and where the occasional duty was performed of forwarding letters in connection with public business. This was at first limited to a few of the principal lines of road throughout the country—there being previously no regular transmission of letters, and what little there was being wholly in the hands of non-official parties. The posts used by Queen Elizabeth travelled at the rate of seven miles an hour in summer and five in winter—not bad travelling, considering the state of the roads throughout the country at this time. One of the earliest authentic journeys of this nature was that accomplished by Robert Carey, a young Englishman, who carried the news of the death of Elizabeth to King James VI. at Holyrood—leaving London on the Thursday, and reaching Edinburgh on the Saturday night; probably the most rapid transit between the two cities prior to the days of railways, being a ride of 400 miles in the daylight of three days.

In 1635, a regular letter-post was established for providing an interchange of communications between Charles I. and the Scottish Council, during the turbulent period of his reign; and the cavalier supporters of the king often showed their loyalty by their rapid carrying of despatches to and from the royal army. Previous to this, a foreign post had been in use for merchants; and the person to whose charge this had been confided received instructions to establish the home post between London and Edinburgh, to go thither and back in six days, suppressing at the same time all private posts on the route. This order the king was pleased to extend to various other distant parts of the country. The mode of conveyance was, as before, by persons on horseback; indeed, this continued to be the general way up till about seventy years ago; and it never was considered a safe post, as the mails were often lost and occasionally robbed. Not long after the establishment of this post by King Charles, we learn that a stage-coach ran between London and the Scottish capital; but letters were not likely to be sent by it, as, while the stated horse-post rode the distance in about three days, the coach was on the way for nearly three weeks. We next hear that in 1642 a postal route was set up between Scotland and Ireland—a considerable intercourse having sprung up between the two countries, owing to the sending of troops there to put down the Irish Rebellion.

The post in England had been almost ruined by the civil war; but was revived so effectually by the Commonwealth in 1654, that it yielded a revenue on lease of £10,000 a-year. It thrived so ill in Scotland, however, at the same period, that the government was glad to give a long lease for nothing to a private individual; but it underwent considerable improvement at the Restoration. It was put under the care of one Robert Mean, who had been commissioned to establish a number of provincial posts: the Privy Council regulating his charges—any letter to Ireland being charged 6s. Scots, to Glasgow 2s. Scots (two-pence sterling). Scotland had then but one postal centre; so that all letters from London to Glasgow came by Edinburgh, and were thence despatched at such times as were convenient. This continued till Palmer's mail-coaches began to run in 1788; although Glasgow, when Mean was postmaster, was, and had been long before, a great commercial and manufacturing town. Mean suffered greatly from competition; for we find him applying for warrants against sundry persons who carried letters on foot to his injury. This occurred frequently; for the Council repeatedly issued proclamations against letters being carried by private persons, between places where post-offices were established, although they were allowed where there was no stated post. The regular carriers themselves were not above temptation, it being a common complaint that they did a considerable business on their own account. Mean was also induced to regulate a post between Edinburgh and Inverness—going and returning twice a-week to Aberdeen, and once a-week to Inverness, 'wind and weather serving;' the letters being charged for according to distance—all communications so far north having hitherto been very irregularly conducted.

The rates of charge for these early posts were always high. In London, however, a penny local post was for some time in existence during the reign of Charles II., and was carried on by two men, who experienced great opposition from the government. It was eventually taken out of their hands, and conjoined with the general post. In Edinburgh, in like manner, an eccentric genius, named Peter Williamson, started a penny post about 1780. Its success was so great that the government bought it up for a good sum in 1793.

Every now and then the various postmasters were called before the Council, in consequence of the bags coming in with the seals broken; and occasionally daring robberies were effected, although, from the known carelessness of the post-boys, property of any value was seldom intrusted to them—thus rendering the booty in most cases almost worthless. The mail to France, on the short distance from London to Dover, was frequently stopped—sometimes even before it got clear of the environs of the metropolis. In the following instance, political motives were assigned for the purloining of the mail-bags:—Two men, with masks on their faces, stopped the post-boy at a solitary moor near Haddington, on the great line of road to England. Holding pistols to his breast, they threatened to kill him if he did not instantly deliver up the bags. There being no choice but to yield compliance, they bound him to his horse and then rode off with their spoil. Two persons of the name of Seton were suspected of this affair; and the Sheriff of the County proceeded to their house to arrest them, but could not find them. Assuming an innocent appearance, they went to the Sheriff's house next morning, to see why they were sought for; but the Sheriff, after examining them in the presence of the post-boy, thought fit to place them in confinement. They were confided to the charge of a bailie; who, presuming that they were really innocent from their going willingly to the Sheriff, was not particularly strict, and locked them into a room in his own house, leaving them in charge of two of the town-officers. Being Sunday, the officers were, as usual, required to walk before the magistrates to church; and, while so engaged, the two Setons took the opportunity to make their escape. The Privy Council imprisoned the bailie and the officers on the charge of aiding the prisoners' escape. One of the Setons was caught on board a vessel bound for Holland, but ultimately succeeded in escaping condemnation; the other was never heard of.

It was not till after the Union that the Scottish post was ever able to do more than pay its own expenses; and it was then placed, by Act of Parliament, under the control of that of England. Foot-posts to provincial towns then began to give way to organised horse-posts throughout most of the country; and stated hours for despatch were regulated—the gradual settling down of the country, together with a rapid increase of commercial activity, soon causing a proper degree of care in the regulation of so important a means as the post. The turnpike roads began also to be improved, and stage-coaches to run on the leading routes. For long they only travelled by day—as, during the night, the ruts and ditches of the ill-made roads made the journey perilous to coaches, endangering life and limb. We gather from 'Pepys's Diary,' in his account of a journey from London to Bristol, that 'guides' were necessary for enabling the early travellers to keep the right path; and this shows to some extent the bad condition of the roads in those days—the interior of the country in many parts being little better than a wilderness. The stage-coaches, however, for more than a century after their introduction, were not used for the post—the letter-bags being still conveyed by boys on horse-back, who travelled at a very ordinary jog-trot—never hurrying themselves, loitering with every passenger they met, and gossiping with the innkeepers; besides the liability they were under of summary stoppage by footpads or highwaymen, who, after plundering the bags of whatever of value they might contain, would deposit the remainder in the nearest ditch. The progress in Scotland by way of stage-coaches seems to have been very slow—the communication, for instance, between Edinburgh and Glasgow, so late as 1749, being still by means of a covered cart, which went twice a-week from one city to the other, taking a day and a-half to the journey! At length, in 1784, the first regular mail-coach started from London to Bristol; and at this time letters leaving the capital on the Monday did not reach Glasgow till the following Sunday evening. But these early mails never did attain a higher speed than ten miles an hour—which was then deemed the highest rate with which speed and safety could be combined; and instances were currently reported of persons who had died suddenly of apoplexy from this rapidity!

The mail-coach, with its dashing appearance and its attendants in scarlet and gold-lace, when at its perfection, was an object of wonder and exultation; but this again has been supplanted by our iron roads and their iron steeds—a less romantic but more effectual method than any of the former plans; and the post together with the more modern telegraph, as they now exist, may be considered a means of civilization only inferior to the art of printing, the steam-engine, and the mariner's compass.

D.

THE OLD DESK.

I OPEN'D a desk so worn and old,
It breathed but of damp, and dust, and mould.
For years it had lain in an old bureau,
Forgotten or hidden long ages ago;
And the lock, with its rusted strength, gave way,
To tell its dark secrets to garish day.

And letters of love and passion there
Lay folded by with a wondrous care;
While the hand that had penn'd each frantic line,
With the hopes and the visions such loves entwine,
Was cold as the mockery of eyes that now
Would look on such tales of love or woe.

Oh, why are these traces of happiness gone
Left ever in keeping to mortal one?
Why let in the light to a hidden grief,
That ne'er in its agony sought relief,
By telling its sorrows—so sad, yet true—
To the careless throng or the trusted few?

Oh! bury them, burn them. Never keep These faded relics; but let them sleep
In the calm repose of a bygone life,
That sought not to tell of its inward strife,
Save to the heart whose life-pulse beat
With a like response. 'Twas well; 'twas meet.
Let the records of bygone happiness lie
In the sacred depths of past mystery!

Amid these relics of Time there lay
Two locks of hair—one fair as day,
The other as dark as night; and they cling
Together as if new life they'd bring.
Oh! the sunny light of that golden tress
Could tales of dark misery now confess,
As it curling lies in its beauty there—
Once kiss'd and bless'd with a trustful prayer.
But the heart that once beat lies lowly now.
'Neath the impress of Time and a broken vow!

In a secret drawer that I open'd now,
Some wither'd heath lay lank and low—
A treasured link of years ago;
A flower whose beauty, once bright and gay,
Had pass'd like its owner—away! away!

A tiny ring, with its ruby red,
Sparkled and flash'd in its satiny bed.
It cared not for Time and its vanishing trend,
As it breathed but of life, while its owner was dead!

A miniature lay in its time-worn case.
Oh, the sweet, sad look of that angel face!
Few summers had told on that fair, young brow.
Oh! why is its brightness long-shadow'd now?
Oh! where is the light of that fond, loving eye?
Or that sweet smile of beauty once hovering nigh?
Like a faint gleam of heaven—just born to die!
Oh, close it! oh, close it! I cannot look more!
Oh! why do we keep these sad relics of yore?

In a further recess, half-hidden from view,
Was the sweet, sad sight of a baby shoe,
All faded in colour, and worn, and stain'd—
As if tears had wash'd out what of love remain'd;
And a broken toy. But who shall tell
Of that mother's lone grief by that baby-spell!

Oh, close the old desk. I will never look more
On these heart-breaking relics from days of yore!

E. L. F.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK,
13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, London, E.C.; and 32 St.
Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

ELDERWICK'S MISCELLANY.

No. 11.]

SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1862.

[PRICE 1d.]

FRED HARPER'S LEGACY (Continued).

CHAPTER II.

THE day passed happily away. A favourable wind enhanced the pleasure we felt in our recent escape from the dangers of the storm—the perils we had encountered enhanced the pleasure we felt in the prospect of the speedy termination of our voyage.

But our satisfaction was not fated long to last. We were seated at supper; we were talking of poor Ned Brown, the second mate, who had been washed overboard, when we heard the voice of the look-out man shouting—'A sail on the weather beam!'

Shortly afterwards, we heard him again—'Another sail on the weather quarter!'

The curiosity regarding even the smallest incidents which the monotony of a long voyage is calculated to inspire, caused us to hurry our meal and hasten upon deck. The sails were distinctly visible, bearing directly down on us. There was a thin fog or rather haze over the surface of the sea, which had concealed them from view; and they were now close upon us. One was a rakish-looking vessel of about two hundred tons—very low in the water, schooner-rigged, and painted green; the other was a larger vessel, painted black, and rigged as a brigantine.

'Curious-looking craft!' exclaimed the captain. 'What can they be? Do you know, Cox, I don't like the look of them at all.'

'Nor I. Give me the glass a moment, sir. You never saw a merchantman like that schooner; and the other is little better.'

'What are they doing here, I wonder, on the course they are?' said Telford.

'I can't fancy,' said Cox. 'I don't see any one on the deck of either. Stop; there goes a flag! They are Dutch colours, I think; but they are no more Dutchmen than I'm a Hindoo. I fear, sir—yes—we'll know it too soon. I may as well eat with it at once. They're pirates!'

Telford gave a sudden start. 'Cox, it can't be!'

'It can be, sir, and it will be; and, what's more, before dark the Rosarie, her crew, and her cargo are theirs. We have one chance, but it is hardly worth trying—to run for it. The ship was never much of a clipper, and she isn't in the best condition now; but if we could keep clear of them till night, we might give them the slip. But I fear it is hardly worth trying—they will be down on us in no time.'

'But we will try it, though,' said Telford. 'And if that doesn't do, we'll fight for it; and, if we are taken, we'll die game. All hands, make sail!'

The crew obeyed with an alacrity which showed that they, too, had their suspicions of the strange craft. The studding-sail booms were run out, and the sails set, and away we scudded.

But still they gained on us; for that they were pursuing us was now evident. Our masts creaked and groaned with the weight of canvas; two of our back-stays snapped with the strain; and a large sea taking us, our foretopgallantmast broke with the jerk, and fell upon the deck.

A shot now came booming along from the brigantine—falling short of us, however, astern. The Dutch flag was lowered; another was seen running up to the peak; it blew out—it was the Black Flag! Our fears were then but too well grounded—they were pirates! I thought of Flora; the fearful fate which awaited her—the fearful fate which awaited us all—if we fell into their hands. I went below. She still slept. Exhausted by the anxieties of the previous night, she had lain asleep on a sofa in the cabin the whole afternoon. How lovely she looked! She half-opened her eyes, and murmured my name. Oh! to think—but I could not bear the thought.

I went to my cabin; and, taking my pistols from their case, I loaded them carefully. Selecting a cutlass from among those which were ranged along the beams, I strapped it round my waist, and stuck my pistols in the belt. One look at Flora, and I went on deck. The crew were mustered in the waist of the ship. Several of them had already armed themselves with the muskets, pikes, and cutlasses which had been ranged round the inside of the companion; while, among the rest, the captain was distributing arms and ammunition from an old arm-chest which had been brought up from below.

Anxious looks were turned to windward. They had visibly gained on us; but night was drawing on, and, from the appearance of the sky, it promised to be dark. The wreck of the foretopgallantmast had been cleared; and the ship still made good way.

'Now, men,' said the captain, 'I have told you what those craft after us are; and you know what that means—you know what you have to expect. None of you, I dare say, ever saw any one walking the plank. Neither did I; but we have all heard plenty about it, and I fear some of us may know what it is before long. We may, however, keep clear of them till night, and then we may get off in the dark. If they overtake us, you know as well as I do that we haven't much chance against so many as these fellows will have on board; but we may beat them off for all that. If we fail—look for mercy from the sharks! Now, men, go to your stations; and remember that every one of those wretches you bring down is a bloody murderer out of the world. Fight to the last man—the flash of a pistol or the stroke of a cutlass any day before a slippery plank and a watery shroud.

Each man went silently to his post. The two small carronades, which we had as signal guns, were run out. The men loaded their muskets, stripped their selves to the waist, and bound their handkerchiefs round their brows—the knitted brow and compressed lip telling the nature of the feelings which stirred within their breasts.

Still the pirates gained on us. We would soon be within range of their guns. All hope of escape seemed now to be gone. I went below to waken Flora. She must soon know the worst; and I wished that she might have a gentler awakening than the noise of the firing when it began.

'Flora!' I whispered.

'What is it, Fred? Where are we? It hasn't come on to blow again, has it? No. I feel it quite different from what it was, though the ship does roll a good deal. You gave me such a start! But what is the matter? You look so wild; and—pistols—why—what is the matter?'

'Flora! a terrible fate awaits us. I care not for myself; but when I think of you, it drives me mad. Oh, why did the storm abate?—why did it not drive us to the bottom?'

'What is it, Fred? I know of nothing that would warrant you behaving in that way. Yesterday you hardly seemed even to care when we were threatened with all but certain death; and what could be worse than that? and now you are like a madman!'

'But this is worse than death—worse than a thousand deaths! Then we would have perished! Each other's arms; now they will tear us asunder; as you—O Flora!' I threw myself down in an agony of despair.

The loud boom of a gun roused me. There was a crash as of a breaking spar, the loud flapping of sail, and something fell heavily on the deck. I started up, drew my pistols from my belt, and rushed to the companion-ladder. Flora caught me by the arm—

'What is it, Fred? That noise—what was it?'

'Pirates! They are on us. Let me go!'

She did not speak. Her grasp tightened on my arm; she gave a slight start, and that was all. Her composure wrought like a spell on me—I was calm in a moment.

'Fred! give me those pistols.'

'Why—what, Flora! what do you want them for?'

'To defend myself; and for another purpose, if we are taken.'

'What do you mean, Flora?'

'They will do for myself. It is a fearful thing to say—it is a fearful thing to think of; but, if we are taken, I will do it.'

'Flora! Flora! It is indeed a fearful thing to say. I will not—I cannot give them to you.'

'Then you will not give me the means of defending myself—of defending myself against these men! Give them to me, Fred! you can get others.' She took them from my reluctant hands. 'I will not go on deck; I will stay here and defend the door.'

The roar of discharging guns told that the pirates had poured a broadside into us; and the crashing of the timbers and the sound of a falling spar told that it had taken effect. A loud cheer sent the blood rushing to my heart; it sounded close aboard of us. I drew my cutlass, and rushed on deck. The larger of the two vessels was close upon us; the schooner was farther to windward, but she was rapidly coming up. On board the brigantine I could discern the dark faces of the pirates as they loaded their guns—the conspicuous figure being a tall man, apparently their commander, in a large boat-cloak and a Spanish smbrero, who stood on the poop carelessly smoking a cigar—his seeming nonchalance forming a strange contrast to the scene around him.

We discharged our carronades. They had been well pointed. The shot swept their deck. Again we loaded; again we fired. There was a bustle and hurrying on their deck. Their captain stamped his foot; and, addressing something to his crew, jumped from the poop. Almost immediately afterwards, they hauled their wind and poured a broadside into us. Several of our men were wounded. We carried them to the fore-cabin; but no one waited to attend them—our own danger was too imminent, and our numbers were too few for that. The brigantine was now within musket-shot of us—her rigging swarming with men, who galled us by their fire. We loaded our guns with musket balls, and fired. Several of them fell from the rigging—some of them into the sea. Our men tried to raise a cheer, but it died away upon their lips.

The pirates ceased firing—they were preparing to board us. Again they hauled their wind, and poured a broadside into us, breaking our main-topmast at the top. Our way was lost. They were under our stern. Their grappling-irons caught us. Like a breaking wave they rushed over our bulwarks.

I have an indistinct recollection of standing before the companion-hatch fighting, till I was knocked down from behind by a blow from a handspike. The scene is confused in my memory—the flashing of pistols—the gleaming of cutlasses—the yells of the pirates—the faint cheers of our men—the cries of the wounded—the groans of the dying—the smoke, the blood, and the din!

I remember, as in a terrible nightmare, trying to raise myself from the pool of blood in which I lay. I saw them dragging Flora from below. She was deadly pale; her arms were bare; her dress hung torn around her. She struggled with them. I tried to rise, but fell back on the deck. I looked around for some of our men to aid her; but there were none. The pirate captain held her by the wrist. There was a pistol in his hand; he fell beside me—dead! They hurried her away. She cast a wild look round. I heard a piercing shriek;—and swooned away!

(To be continued.)

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. II.—DUNCAN BAN MACINTYRE.

'COIRE CHEATHAICH' was composed by Duncan Ban Macintyre when in his prime. It was published in the first edition of his poems, which were taken down by a clergyman, to the poet's own dictation, in the year 1768. Duncan Ban was then forty-four years of age. He lived for thirty-one years afterwards, never very far from the scenes in which he took so much delight—of which Ben-Dorain was the centre, with Coire Cheathaich on the one side of it, and Glenorchy, his birth-place, on the other. For six of these years he served in the Breadalbane Fencibles—holding the rank of sergeant, but not considered a very enthusiastic soldier. Then, on the disbanding of that regiment in the year 1799, when he was 75 years old, he was provided by the Earl of Breadalbane, at his own particular request, with a place in the City Guard of Edinburgh. This body seems to have been the object of mingled fear and ridicule. In his poem, 'Leith Races,' Ferguson, 'the bauld and slee,' as Burns calls him, speaks of the poor old Highlanders who formed it with as much bitterness as humour:

'Their stumps, ere we'd to fillegs,
Are dight in spatterdashies,
Whase darkent hides scarce fend their legs
Frae weat an' weary plashes
O' dirt that day!

"Come, hae a care (the captain cries),
On guns your bagnets thrav;
Now mind your manual exercise,
An' march down raw by raw."
And as they march he'll glowr about—
Tent a' their cuts and scars;
'Mang them fell mony a gauy snout
Has gush't in birth-day wars,
Wi' blude that day!

Her nanesel maun be carefu' now;
Nor maun she be mislead,
Sin' Baxter lads has seal'd a vow
To skelp an' clout the Guard.
I'm sure Auld Beekie kens o' nane
That wou'd be sorry at it;
Tho' they shou'd dearly pay the kane,
An' get their tails weel sautit,
An' sair thir days!

'Duncan Ban of the Songs' served with this corps for seven years. Ferguson surely had no idea that a poet so sweet was to be included in the number of those men for whom he desired so little good. He would have wished, it is to be hoped, a better fate for his musical brother than the tender mercies of the Baxter lads, if he had.

In a short account of Duncan Ban's life, prefixed to the last edition (1859) of his works, it is said:—'He remained in the City Guard till about the year 1806; being then enabled—by means of his little savings and the profits of the third edition of his poems, published in 1804—to subsist in comparative comfort during the remainder of his life. He died about the 14th of May 1812, aged 88 years. The precise day we have not been able to ascertain; but the records of the Greyfriars' Burying-ground, Edinburgh—where his remains were laid—fix the date of his interment on the 19th.'

At this time, Sir Walter Scott was in the first blaze of his reputation; and the Edinburgh Review was absorbing all the Whig talent of the kingdom. Its editor knew a great deal, and was quick and clever; but he did not know that—in the very city where he lived, and within a few minutes' walk of the scene of many of his triumphs—on the 19th of May 1812, in the Greyfriars' Burying-ground, were laid the mortal remains of a poor old man, who had been visited, away among the distant Highland hills, with a gleam of 'the light that never was on sea or shore;' and who, without knowing the letters of the alphabet, sung some strains which have lived thus far, and are not likely to be willingly let die—at least whilst a tongue can speak the venerable language they have moulded into such artless melody, or a Scottish eye remains to look on Coire Cheathaich.

This singular genius carried the same gifts with him to Edinburgh which had distinguished him amid his own moors and hunting hills. A song which he composed, called 'The Praise of Dunedin,' shows the qualities of minute observation and felicitous expression which he displayed with such effect in 'Coire Cheathaich.' There is not, perhaps, much poetry—not much to stir the feelings or exalt the imagination—in that song; but it has got a simplicity and quaintness which are at least amusing. Dr. Johnson was highly pleased with the account of a St. Kilda man's visit to Glasgow, especially that part where the man takes the Cathedral for a great cave. The impression which Edinburgh made on the shrewd-eyed bard we are now engaged upon is not without its attraction also—when he speaks of the well-born gentlemen, with their powdered hair and wigs; or of the pretty ladies, with their stays and patches, their ribbons and high-heeled shoes; or of any other subject. To learn the mode in which a fresh unsophisticated mind looks on things we are perfectly familiar with, and to know the associations with which it involuntarily links them, is to every intelligent thinker a peculiarly charming study. With this view, the song of 'Dunedin,' by Duncan Ban, is now offered:—

'Tis a great town Dunedin—
It charmed me to be there;
A broad and hospitable place,
And pleasant everywhere.
With a garrison—a battery—
A rampart tight and good—
A Castle—and great houses
Where camps right often stood.

A Royal camp stood often here;
And beautiful 'twould be,
With troops of horsemen plentiful,
To guard it faithfully;
And every one so disciplined
In every art of war—
Before you got a rank like theirs
You might search near and far.

Here's many a gallant gentleman
Who's polish'd and well-bred;
Wears powder plaster'd on his hair
To the crown of his head;
With folds and plaits, and many curls,
Well woven, overspread;
And, on the top, a bunch like silk
When the card has smooth'd its thread!

There's many a noble lady
A poor man here may meet,
In gown of silk and satin
That sweeps along the street;
And every pretty thing wears stays,
To keep her straight and spare;
And beauty-spots on her fair face,
To make her still more rare.

Each one, as well becomes her,
Pol to among the rest;
And proud, and rich, and ribbony,
And round, and gaily dress'd.
The clothes on the young maidens,
Just showing to your eye
A strong and pointed well-made shoe—
I thought its heel too high.

When I went to the Abbey—
It was a noble sight
To see the kings in order,
From King Fergus, as was right;
But now, since they are gone from us,
Our Alba wants the crown—
No wonder, then, her once gay Court
Is like a desert grown.

There is a lantern made of glass,
And a candle in each place,
That yields a light to every eye
Around a little space.
Nor less a cause of pleasure
Are the instruments they play,
That give a sweeter music
Than the cuckoo does in May.

A stately sound the coaches make,
With their trotting and their whirl;
The hard-hoof'd, smooth-paced horses
They always keep a stir—
They frisk and raise their heads on high
In their spirited career;
Not such our heather pastures,
Or the wild moorlands rear.

In the close of the Parliament,
There the same horse is shown,
Still standing where he used to stand,
On the bare way of stone.
They've bridled him and saddled him,
And set the King thereon,
Whose was the right of all these realms,
Though they've banish'd far his son.

The great House of the Parliament
Is worthy a good view;
There reasonable gentlemen
Deliver judgments true.
They have a power given them
Will last them many a day—
To hang the faulty up on high,
And let the good away.

And here a Healing-house I see,
Where the best leeches go;
And cure each kind of suffering
That limb and body know.
The man who is in want of health,
Whom leeches long attend,
Here is the place for him to come,
And keep him from his end.

Dunedin is a bonny place
In far more ways than one—
A town that must not yield to it
In this whole realm is none.
So many gentlemen are there,
Of tribute-raising line—
Men who may daily quench their thirst
With the good Spanish wine.

Though great and long the distance
From Glasgow unto Perth,
Yet am I sure, although I saw
Each mansion there of worth,
I could see none more charming
Than the Abbey or the Bank;
Or houses rich and large, whose guests
Might be of kingly rank.

It frequently pains one to notice the trifles which often creep the mind; the silly little incidents which move the heart; and the poor chit-chat which frequently forms the conversation of far too many of those whose lives are passed away from great towns. Yet the blue sky bends over all; and the kind earth spreads its broad bosom before them; and perhaps there is a great, rough, roaring ocean near them, which ever fills the air they breathe with that immeasurably greater than organ melody which there is only One Hand can play. There are millions of things in the country which ought, one would think, to elevate humanity; and which seem scarcely to be the thought of by many of its habitual residents. It is to be feared that we have more than one rural district, at this very day, into which new ideas have not entered as old feelings and fine fancies have been dying out. The country, on the whole, must have been far sadder a hundred years ago than it is now. Then there was something stirring in it, which was felt to be worth living and worth dying for, and which might knock at a man's door and summon him at any moment to be up and doing. Life and death were calling him. Then, too, there were old customs which were cordially honoured, and sincere beliefs which were entertained with genuine awe and fear. The country offers much less chance than formerly for so true a love, so unaffected a devotion, so pure a sentiment, as those which lived in the poetic breast of Duncan Ban—now starting up in a poor man's heart, and working themselves into external life, to form a pleasant and a lasting possession through generations for him.

As selfish love, a true devotion, and pure sentiments, can rise any sort of life—especially when they are united with something of an intellectual turn. Such love and devotion, and such pure sentiments, appear to be very beautifully manifested in that song of Duncan Ban's, called 'The Last Farewell to the Hills.' In it there is, at the same time, a sort of intellectual pensiveness which is very charming.

After an absence of some years, the Poet visits the haunts of his youth and vigorous manhood. He spends a whole day in traversing Ben-Dorain, near which he was born; on which he had a thousand times hunted the deer and wandered pleasantly, feeding his thoughts with music taken from the bards of other days, with whose works his mind was well stored, or drawn from the sweet unpremeditated fountain of his own inspiration. On this occasion he composed a song, the most pathetic and touching of his compositions; indeed, a really beautiful and graceful poem he left it. This song is interesting, not only on account of the humble condition of its author, whose total want of education did not prevent his feelings and reflections from being attractive, nor his expression of them from being eloquent and delicate; it is interesting, also, when we consider the great age of this poor man at the date of his composition, 19th Sept. 1802. Duncan Ban was then 71 years old. Very few poets have lived to that age. Still fewer have composed any of their best poetry so late in life. There is a sadness even in the title of this ballad of fading years, 'The Last Farewell to the Hills.' It is the only one, I think, of Duncan Ban's poems which has been carefully dated.

THE LAST FAREWELL TO THE HILLS.

Ben-Dorain I saw yesterday,
And trod thy gorges gray;
Each well known hill I looked along—
Each glen and grassy way.

Ah! 'twas a joyous thing of yore
To tread that mountain high,
As the sun rose o'er the morning hoar,
And the deer were belling by!

The pride with which they'd sweep away—
How charming and how gay!
While fawn and doe, they heedless stay'd
Near the fresh fount to play.
I heard the red deer bellow round—
The black cock, red cock crow;
I think than these no sweeter sound
Can morning ever know!

Then cheerfully I'd dash away
The many brakes to roam;
I sought them with the peep of day—
'Twas late ere I went home.
The breath of those great mountains
Was health and strength to me;
A draught from their fresh fountains—
What real life 'twould be!

At times I'd spend a little while
In some lone shieling near,
With sport and mirth, and laugh and smile,
And woman's kindness dear.
Alas! 'twas not in Nature's power
That such blithe joy should last—
Too swiftly came the parting hour;
I sigh'd, and onward pass'd.

And now old age has struck me sore
With its long lingering blight;
My teeth are fresh and sound no more—
Alas! my fading sight.
I could not now give eager heed
If the chase should cheer the day;
Whatever now should be my need,
I could not haste away.

Yet though my hair be hoary white,
My whiskers thin and gray—
My dogs pursued the headlong flight
Of proud stags many a day—
I ween the chase still charms my heart;
But, if it swept this heath,
I could not do my wonted part
With this remnant of my breath.

How ill, ill could I drive it now—
As once I used to do—
O'er glen and dell, and mountain brow,
Rough stream, wet mosses through.
Ill could I join a social throng,
And share their autumn cheer;
Ill could I sing a pleasant song
At falling of the year.

'Twas then the spring-time of my days—
A thoughtless time indeed;
'Tis only our good hap always
Supplies our every need.
In that belief content I live,
Though far from rich I be;
For George's* daughter, she will give
My meat and drink to me.

And, yesterday, I trod yon moor;
How many a thought it moved!
The friends I walk'd with there of yore—
Where were those friends I loved?

* 'George's daughter' was the musket which Duncan Ban carried, in King George's name, as a member of the City Guard. The gun which he had used among the hills he called 'Nio Colseam,' or 'Colseam's daughter.' It affords a singular illustration of the unassuming simplicity of his character, to be told that the situation of which he speaks so contentedly was worth only sixpence a-day.

I look'd and look'd; and sheep, sheep still,
Were all that I could see.
A change had struck the very hill;
O world! deceiving me.

When I turn'd round from side to side—
Oh, dear! I felt not gay—
The heather's bloom, the greenwood's pride,
The old men were away.
There was not left one antler'd stag,
There was not left a roe;
No bird to fill the hunter's bag—
These old things all must go.

Then, wild heath-forests, fare-you-well!
Ye wonderful bright hills!
Farewell, sweet spring and grassy dell!
Farewell, ye running rills!
Farewell, vast desert! mountains grand!
With peaks the clouds that sever!
Scenes of past pleasure, pure and bland,
Farewell! farewell for ever!

Sept. 19, 1802.

Duncan Ban lived for ten years after this; but he did not, so far as I know, ever visit the hills again. It ought to be mentioned that he is the author of what is generally considered the finest love song in the Gaelic language—'Mhairi Bhan Ogi' or 'Fair Young Mary!' It is quite characteristic of the man that this song, which is full of love and affection, was composed not for his sweetheart, but for his wife.

THOMAS PATTISON.

THE CHATEAU DE VILLEMAR.

It is now many years since circumstances required our family—consisting of my father, my two sisters, and myself—to reside for a considerable period in France. We became, during the latter part of that time, the tenants of Mademoiselle de Villemar, the only remaining representative of one of the families of the Vendéan noblesse, whose estates had been situated in the 'Boisage'—a part of France familiar to the readers of Madame de la Rochejaquelein's touching and interesting history. The Chateau de Villemar was all that now remained to the grandniece of its last occupant; and, in one wing of the ancient and dilapidated building, she was willing to give that accommodation to foreigners which she would have refused to any of her compatriots. The Chateau consisted of a centre with two wings, and was built more in the Italian than in the French style of architecture. Of the gardens and terraces there remained hardly any trace—the Revolutionary tempest had swept over them with too desolating effect. The trees, which nearly surrounded it, excluded with their wall of foliage almost any view of the neighbouring country; their swinging branches darkened the windows, and beneath their shade the dank grass grew high; while the sunless walls of the house were covered with the lichens and green mosses which delight in such situations. The left wing of the mansion alone was divided by a considerable space from the enclosing wood; which space was bounded by a lofty hedge of closely-clipped yew—the sole remaining evidence (with the exception of a little kitchen garden) of former horticultural glories. The household of Mademoiselle de Villemar consisted of herself; an old retainer, who united in himself all the offices of a staff of men-servants; and his daughter Marie, who was the attendant, and, in a humble way, the companion of the lady of the mansion. They occupied the lower rooms of the main house, which were entered by what had been the grand front; but was now a neglected, grass-grown space. The left wing, of which I have spoken, appeared entirely deserted. To the right one—our abode—as was gained by a separate door, opening from a paved court-yard at the back. Mademoiselle herself not certainly convey the idea of a personage representing an ancient line of nobles. Her medical attendant—physician of V—, who had first suggested our application to her—informed us that her grandfather, brother of the last Count, had been an 'émigré'; her father had brought her up in very reduced circumstances; and that it was not until comparatively late life that, quitting Paris after his death, she had taken her abode at the Chateau. She appeared to me a woman of about forty-five—tall, slender, and lithe in figure; very black hair; dark, brilliant, piercing eyes; and lips of remarkable redness. The dress was always the same—any colour about it being invariably some shade of crimson or scarlet. She seemed to be more occupied with her ménage, and the conduct of her business affairs, with any other subjects; though an occasional flash of pride, or expression of bitterness, revealed her consciousness of what she might have been, in painful contrast with what she was.

I can still picture to myself the bright autumnal afternoon when, with our effects—not a very bulky load—the two country carts which conveyed them—we arrived at Villemar. Pierre, the old factotum of the man received us in the first place, and conducted the men and their carts to the entrance of our abode; and, after departure, Mademoiselle de Villemar herself appeared to bid us welcome, and deliver up the keys of our rooms, which she proceeded to show us, with a curious mixture of business matter-of-factness and ceremony. The door opened at once into a low brick-floored room, broad windows, admitting a flood of sunlight from the west, which penetrated between the trunks of the trees outside. The room was panelled with wood, painted two shades of dingy olive green; but this was lost in many places from the walls, and, with the crumbling plaster which had fallen here and there on the floor, it presented a neglected, comfortless appearance. From this for entrance a door-way led into a lobby; whence an old-fashioned staircase—in several short flights of steps, broad landings between—ascended to the next floor which were the two adjoining bed-rooms assigned to father and sisters, and the large comfortable apartments were to use as a parlour. Quite detached from these, situated in a lobby from which another wide open stair led to the large dreary attics of the house, was the room appointed to me. A lofty door next to it communicated with the main part of the Chateau; but this, landlady informed us, was always kept locked. How I remember that narrow room, with its panels, like all the rest, of dusky green; its few old landscapes let into the wall; the windows, without a view, at the end; and feeling of utter isolation with which I used to enter that night after night, when I had parted with the others what always seemed a hopeless length of time! I should mention that the French servant we had brought with us to sleep with Marie, and occupy by day the little entrance-hall; on which some alterations were to be made to render it available for the purposes of a kitchen. I spent the afternoon of our arrival in arranging our personal possessions in their future places, so as to give our rooms as much an air of home as possible; and at last, weary and worn out, I sent Nanette away—the rest of the family having already retired; took up my lamp; endeavouring not to observe the weird shadows it cast as I crossed the debatable land which separated me from my kindred; and, finally, shut my door, with a glorious sense of relief and security. But the 'eerie' sensations from which I was suffering pursued me into my slumbers; and I can still recall the dreams of that night—the terrible and vivid consciousness of being in the Chateau—of being compelled to rise and go up-stairs alone—alone! through all the wide shadowy place, until I came face to face with the mysterious terror which haunted it! What this was I could not realise; something vague, unearthly, it seemed to be, that might meet me at any turn—that I might come upon at any moment. I felt thankful when the morning broke; and resolved, if possible, to ascertain from Mademoiselle de Villemar such particulars of the former inhabitants of the Chateau—with whom I felt my dreams to be in some way connected—as should give my thoughts at least a tangible ground to rest on. But this was by no means so easy of accomplishment as I had supposed. Towards strangers, such as we were, she was naturally reticent concerning the history and fortunes of her family; and I had to rest satisfied until more practical interests occupied my mind, which they soon did, to the exclusion of its fanciful apprehensions. We soon became habituated to the quiet and solitude of our abode; and found a pleasant neighbour in our hostess, with whom we sometimes exchanged visits. I became satisfied that the rooms entering from the doorway next to mine must occasionally be used by her or her maidants; as I used to hear, at all hours of the night, such as of persons moving or talking in them; sometimes the rustle of a silk dress against the locked door as I passed; and once the heavy measured tread of a man going for hours ceaselessly to and fro. Had Pierre ever served in the army; and was he rehearsing some midnight watch of former years? Mademoiselle was not a person to be cross-questioned with impunity; and thus it came to pass that I never cared to ask her. It gives me a strange shudder now to think that I used to find a sort of companionship in my lonely room in these evidences, as I then believed them to be, of human vicinity.

The month of November had come. I had accompanied my father to V—, where he was to remain on business for two days. It was already afternoon when I reached Villemar on my return. I approached the Chateau from that side which, as I have mentioned, was separated from the wood by an intervening space. The deep shade of the trees and the gloom of the yew hedge excluded from it much of the remaining light; but there was enough left for me to distinguish the figure of a woman in a pale dress, who was apparently seeking earnestly for some object which she had lost. I advanced towards her, intending to offer my assistance, when I observed with surprise that her white robe, down one side of which a long rent was visible, was of the fashion of the last century. A sudden chill came over me. I could not move or speak; and while I stood there as if in a nightmare, she disappeared round the corner of the house, still intent on her search. As I reached our rooms—I must confess in some agitation—I met Mademoiselle de Villemar just quitting them. She cast on me a look of keen scrutiny, which changed into one of rather triumphant satisfaction as I hurriedly returned her greeting and entered.

My sisters informed me that she had spent the afternoon with them; had been extremely conversable and pleasant; and had finally culminated by inviting us to visit with her the remaining portion of the Chateau next morning, and afterwards to do her the honour of drinking chocolate with her in her own rooms. I could not dismiss from my mind the singular encounter I had had with the unknown lady, but did not mention it; and my silence was ascribed to fatigue after my long walk.

Next morning, punctual to her appointment, Mademoiselle appeared, at the hour she had named, armed with a ponderous key. The girls were in high spirits at the prospect of a little variety in their somewhat monotonous life. We proceeded to the door next my room. It opened into a very long and lofty saloon, extending the entire length of the main building; a range of windows occupied one side, and it was panelled with dark wood, but quite destitute of furniture or the least trace of human occupancy. A heap of broken boards and other rubbish was piled in one corner. At the opposite end, another doorway corresponded with that by which we had entered; but the door had been wrenched from its hinges, and the vacant gap alone remained.

'A charming place for a ball!' I remarked, with a miserable attempt at hilarity. 'But I should think, Mademoiselle, that you must find this large apartment rather cheerless for daily use.'

'Think you that I occupy these rooms?' she inquired. 'No, no; it is not for me to dispute their possession with those who have a better right to them than I.'

We had reached the doorway on the opposite side. It opened on the principal staircase; one side of which was, however, walled up, cutting off all communication with the lower part of the house. From another side, a long passage extended through what I imagined to be the left wing of the Chateau; on either side of which were doors, placed at regular distances from each other, the frames and panels of which were painted in the same shades of olive green as had been employed in our part of the house. A short continuation of the stairs led up to a lofty archway; and here, without ascending them, Mademoiselle paused. 'I must not take you farther,' she said. 'To intrude there might be neither safe nor agreeable.' Her words were in perfect accordance with the indescribable feeling of weird desolation which pervaded the place. Hardly comprehending them, and yet feeling that they could scarcely refer to any living inhabitants of these deserted chambers, we followed her in silence back through the saloon; and I felt relieved when the key grated in the lock—shutting us off from the region on the other side. Once seated in Mademoiselle's own comfortable rooms, the unpleasant impression left by our visit to the uninhabited part of the Chateau gradually left us. She was pleased at our admiration of a cabinet of fine old china which decorated her sitting-room; and observed that its contents, and the only picture left to her, were preserved by the care of one or two humble friends of her family—all else had become the prey of the Revolution. She rose and led us to a little ante-room, where an oil painting hung. It was a half-length portrait of a young lady, dressed in white. The fashion was that of the end of the last century, and it suited her style of beauty. The dark hair hung in soft curls round her brow; her complexion was fair and colourless; and her deep soft eyes and delicate features had an expression of melancholy sweetness and dignity. 'It was strange that her portrait should have been rescued when they hated her so well,' remarked Mademoiselle de Villemar. By degrees she related to us the history of this, the last Countess de Villemar.

'Marie de Coulanges was the daughter of a Vendéen proprietor, and had been brought up in all the sincere devotion and enthusiastic loyalty which characterised alike the nobles and peasantry of her native province. She reached womanhood at the time when the anxieties and troubles of the Revolution were beginning to agitate France; but no apprehension of danger to the royal family had as yet called into active exercise the devotedness which needed but such a stimulus to sacrifice all things for the cause of king and country.

'My granduncle, the brother of my grandfather,' continued Mademoiselle de Villemar, 'was heir to the property of one of the richest families of the province. I may speak of this now; for the time is not long when even our name will follow the rest, and be forgotten. The Marquis de Coulanges and the father of my granduncle had arranged that a marriage should take place between these two young persons; and, after the young Count Philippe had completed his studies at the Ecole Militaire, and had spent some time in travelling abroad—visiting your England, also, amongst other countries—he returned to France, and Mademoiselle de Coulanges became his wife. He was a noble-looking man, I have heard my grandfather say—very tall, very strong, and brave as a lion; but also possessing the temper of a demon. In these days, one might have that as much as he pleased, so long as he gave the peasants only the benefit of it. Madame la Comtesse was good and gentle. Her father, whom she loved best on earth, had said to her—"My child, I wish that you should marry Count Philippe. You shall love him, and be a good wife to him, as is the fashion with the ladies of Coulanges." And she, knowing only that it was her duty to do so, obeyed him in this as in all things. They had one little son, Henri—beautiful as an angel, my grandfather has told me. To his mother he was the great comfort and solace of her life; and when the temper of M. le Comte had the bad taste to accompany him even to the presence of his wife, she found in the boy her consolation. During his residence in England, Count Philippe (as he still was while his father lived) had imbibed many ideas of liberty, which appeared very singular to the gentlemen of the province, who remained, for the most part, content with things as they were—living beloved among their tenantry, who were treated by them quite differently from the peasants of other parts of France. By-and-by, the old Count, my great-grandfather, died; and thus Count Philippe had still more of his own way. He corresponded with many of the philosophers and liberal leaders in Paris; and the distance between him and the other gentlemen became always greater. Poor Madame la Comtesse! It became very sad for her; and still more so when, after remonstrating with her husband, the old Marquis de Coulanges and he parted in terrible anger, and he forbade her to see or even to write to her father. Meanwhile, the troubles of the Revolution continued always on the increase. In 1792, the King was murdered; and next year the war broke out in La Vendée. You know how the fury of the Convention fell on our unhappy province. In the Chateau de Villemar, the chiefs and soldiers of the Republic found a ready welcome; and the Countess had to receive and entertain those whose hands were red with the blood of her best friends. The Count, her husband, who was now fully committed to the party of the People, knew in what direction her sympathies lay; and, because he loved her as well as his selfish and imperious nature permitted to him, he was the more furious that she favoured the cause he had now learned to hate. He tried all means to change her opinions; but what she saw passing around her made her but the more deeply attached to what was to her dearer than life. About this time, a fresh effort was made by the Convention to check the war in La Vendée. It was impossible for Madame de Villemar to avoid hearing the discussion of plans for the destruction of the Vendéan chiefs and army, by her husband and his friends; and, knowing these, she more than once prevented, by warnings conveyed at the peril of her own life, the success of such plans. By means of faithful Royalist peasants, the Countess had kept up a dangerous communication with her father, who was one of the Vendéan generals. It was November of that fatal year. It became necessary to make the Marquis de Coulange aware of some arrangements affecting his safety; and, unable at the moment to find a messenger in whom she could confide, Madame de Villemar prepared herself to commit her letter to a Royalist soldier, who was to receive it at a place appointed in the woods near Villemar. It was the afternoon. Leaving Henri in the Chateau, she went forth alone, reached the rendezvous in safety, and found the messenger waiting. But, on proceeding to take the letter from its place of concealment in her dress, it was gone! Mastering her apprehensions, she dismissed the man with a message, and returned to search for the lost paper. Yes, Mademoiselle; in the space near the yew hedge she is often searching for her letter in the evenings, about this time of year—n'est-ce pas? But she did not find it; she was never to find it. Another had saved her the trouble. She re-entered the Chateau; and, ascending to the saloon, found there several officers of the Republican army, with a stranger, who was presented her as Citizen Carrier. Her little son, her darling Henri, ran to meet her; and, leaving her uncongenial guests pursue the conversation which her entrance had apparently interrupted, she retired to her own apartment there to pursue in vain her search for the missing letter on which, she well knew, so much depended. Next morning she was seated in her boudoir, by no means devoid of anxiety; and Henri was amusing himself beside the Young ladies, this room was situated in the upper story of the house, entering by the archway you saw this forenoon, and thus commanding a view of the grand entrance to the Chateau. While engaged in trying to recall the place where she had last seen her precious letter, a noise outside attracted her attention. Going to the window she beheld passing, in charge of several files of Republican soldiers, her father, her brother-in-law, and several officers of the Vendéan army known to her from her childhood. Filled with alarm, her first impulse was to proceed down stairs, when the entrance of her husband in a state of great excitement, and accompanied by Carrier, arrested her steps. "I congratulate the Republic on possessing a citizeness so devoted to its interests as the writer of this," said the latter, holding towards her the missing letter. "We shall see," he continued, "what rewards the nation reserves for those who serve it so faithfully." He left the room; and the Count, turning on his wife, broke into furious invectives against her for what he termed a betrayal of his honour. Helpless, friendless, deserted—she was reminded of the one unchanging love which remained to her by the close clasp of her boy, who was clinging to her side. At this moment, Carrier re-entered, with a party of soldiers, and desired that Citizeness Villemar should be removed. The emissaries of the Republic had little trouble in performing their task, but as they tore the boy from his mother, his desperate grasp was only loosened by the giving way of the slight material of her dress, leaving a long rent in its folds.

'That afternoon, she and the other prisoners were taken to Nantes.

'Do I need to tell you more?

'You can picture to yourselves the mockery of a trial, at which Citizen Coulanges and Citizeness Villemar, and many besides, were found guilty of conspiring against the safety of the Republic; the brief interval, during which father and daughter were not allowed even the poor solace of being together; the melancholy procession of hurdles, each bearing its load of victims to the foot of the scaffold on which the guillotine reared its ghastly shape; and the sweet pale face and white-robed figure, passing with such dignity and resignation to that cruel death! Poor little Henri! After the terrible scene of separation from his mother, his incessant entreaties to be taken to her became intolerable to his father, who sent him to Nantes, to the care of a widow lady, a relative of his family. Citizen Carrier's animosity to the enemies of the Republic extended wide, and spared neither sex nor age. Henri and his protectress perished together in one of those "noyades" in which the waters of the Loire swept their thousands of dead to the sea!

'But this his father never knew—he had already quitted Villemar for ever. They have told me that, before he left, he used to pass long nights pacing up and down the salon, like an unquiet spirit. He took service in the army of the Republic, to which he had offered up so much; and lost a life which had become a curse to him on the Bridge of Lodi.

'Is it any wonder that they have one by one returned to Villemar? You, Mademoiselle, have doubtless guessed by the upper part of the Chateau is dedicated to these reminiscences.' Mademoiselle de Villemar turned to me. 'Al!' she continued, 'the sound of these rehearsals is so touching when one has listened to fusillades under one's windows by night; and the dying groans that followed were those of your best and dearest!'

My father's information, on his return from V—, that we must immediately leave the Chateau de Villemar for England, was heard without regret by any of us, except that due to a parting with its owner. Our associations with the place had become too painful to render a longer residence there agreeable. Mademoiselle de Villemar's friend, the physician, afterwards told us that her only brother had fallen a victim to one of those terrible, secret midnight executions which were believed to have followed the celebrated coup d'état of Louis Napoleon. Mademoiselle then resided in Paris; and had no doubt actually heard the discharge of musketry which admitted of so painful an explanation.

A. B.

THE VACANT CORNER.

I WEND my way to the dear old church,
And sadly think of thee;
I gaze at the old familiar place;
But the radiance of thy fair young face
Shall beam no more on me—Annie.

Slowly, slowly my tears well up,
As the solemn psalm is sung;
While in my ear its cadence rings,
A still small voice to my sad heart sings,
'Whom the Lord loves die young—Annie.

I hear, like a dreamer, the voice of prayer
Addressed to the heavenly throne;
I see, in my dream, an island fair
And a snow-white marble tablet, where Thou sleepest all alone—Annie.

J. P. H.

NATAL.

THE traveller approaching the south-east coast of Africa, between the parallels of 29° and 31° south latitude and 31° east longitude—after perhaps a tedious and it may be a tempestuous voyage round the Cape of Storms—has his heart gladdened by the glorious sight of the colony of Natal, with its bold Bluff and bush-covered Beres studded with villas, guarding the entrance to its noble harbour; its lovely slopes of waving verdure; its gently undulating coast-line, covered with grass to the edge of the ocean; its natural terraces, towering with abrupt grandeur and giant steps thousands of feet above each other, closed in by the magnificent range of the Quathlamba Mountains—with the broken outlines, the varied tints, and brilliant atmosphere;—forming such a picture as would require a combination of the power of a M'Culloch, the gorgeous colouring of a Linnell, and the serial effects of a Danby, to reproduce it on canvas.

'So wondrous wild; the whole might seem
The scenery of a fairy dream!'

But while Natal possesses these external attractions in such an extraordinary degree, that the writer, in his many extensive wanderings over the globe, has never seen it excelled in picturesque beauty, they by no means constitute its only claim to notice; for it will be found to combine a delightful and varied climate, a most productive soil, a peaceful native population, and many social and other advantages not usually found together—thus rendering it a most enticing field for suitable emigrants.

Natal, which is about the size of Scotland, may, from the nature of its ascent from the sea—in a series of terraces—be divided into three different zones of climate. The first, or coast line—the tierra caliente—reaches about 12 miles inland, and yields every description of tropical produce; and it has been indubitably proved that here sugar can be grown cheaper than, and of quality equal to, any in the world. Coffee, arrow-root, cotton, &c. all grow luxuriantly and well along the coast lands. The second zone is more temperate, and is admirably adapted for horses and cattle, as well as wheat, Indian corn, potatoes, &c. It stands upwards of 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, and extends to about twelve or fourteen miles beyond Pieter-Maritzburg—the capital and seat of government. The third zone is about 3,500 feet high, and is, par excellence, the grazing country—cattle and sheep, wheat and oats, thriving admirably. In this district the winter is frequently severe, with frost and snow; thus giving, within a comparatively limited area, almost every variety of climate—a spécialité which may be said to be quite peculiar to Natal.

If any further evidence were wanting to prove the extraordinary capabilities of this colony, it has been afforded in the most complete and satisfactory manner by the marvellous collection displayed in the Natal Court at the International Exhibition—so creditable to this enterprising young colony, as the sole representative of South Africa at South Kensington; and also to

Dr. Mann and the other gentlemen who collected and arranged it. We do not hesitate to say that every one was surprised at the extraordinary variety, the general excellence, the comprehensiveness, and the systematic arrangement of that collection—which included, inter alia, tea, coffee, sugar, rum, tobacco, arrowroot, wheat, oats, Indian corn, maize, candles, soap, oils, cotton, wool, preserved fruits and meats, ornamental woods, skins, ostrich feathers, ivory, &c. Such a catalogue, however incomplete, must surely satisfy the most extravagant demands of the most exacting and doubting inquirer.

The general aspect of Natal is exceedingly grand and picturesque, with its fine bay, its waving verdant straths, its magnificent range of mountains, its extraordinary and peculiar geological formation, its beautiful park-like groups of trees, its gorgeous flora, its kloofs, its copious and never-failing network of rivers, its grand waterfalls—some of them 2,000 feet high—all tending to render it something very different indeed from the Sahara so generally conjured up 'in the mind's eye' when 'Afric's burning sands' are spoken of. Unlike the Cape Colony and Algoa Bay district—where rain is most eccentric in its movements and cannot be depended on, sometimes not a drop falling for years—Natal is blessed with regular periodical rains, which revivify the whole face of Nature, and, as the Yankees say, ensure 'great water privileges.'

The Zulu Kaffir may be called the native of Natal; but in reality he is not so, for the aborigines have been all but exterminated in the former bloody native wars. The present 'natives' are nearly all refugees; and this is an important consideration, as it affords an unquestionable guarantee for their good behaviour and the complete ascendancy and security of the white population. They are, generally speaking, a docile race, and easily governed, when treated with ordinary fairness; and although their relative numbers, 250,000 to 18,000 whites, are naturally apt to lead to some distrust, yet there can be no doubt but that the Kaffir is too keenly alive to the advantages of our Government, and has too much to lose in the shape of cattle, &c. not to make him a peaceable member of society. The Kaffirs in general are possessed of very logical minds, and are a thinking people, and eloquent in the highest degree; in fact—in the Zulu country to the north of Natal, where it is ruled by an independent king—it is one of the greatest possible treats to hear a Kaffir arguing his own cause before a native court; the appropriate gestures, the sonorous and impassioned address, the soft and beautiful language, and the logical reasoning, coupled with the general accessories—judges, audience, scenery, &c.—all combining to produce a scene not likely to be forgotten, and conveying a very high idea of the talents and capabilities of the race.

No notice of the natives of Natal would be at all complete without some reference to their notions on religious subjects. Much has been written on this point, and many a different version given; but the writer of this, from long and close observation, has no hesitation in giving the following as the Kaffir creed:—They believe in one sole and Almighty God whom they call UTIKO; but that he is too exalted to interfere in the affairs of men, and leaves human interests to be governed by human beings during life and also after death. In fact, they have a belief, no doubt rather confused, in the transmigration of soul from men into snakes; and they therefore hold these reptiles sacred. They believe that an animity existing during life is transmitted to and continued by the representative snake after death. They also offer sacrifices and meats to their departed chiefs; at which time the whole tribe chant their praises, and remind them that although they have left them, they are not forgotten nor allowed to starve. In the Zulu country, some horrible human massacres have taken place on the occasions; and it was to escape from these barbarities that so many have fled to Natal, where they find security for life and property. It is easy for the unthinking and unreasoning looker-on to smile at and mock their simple belief; but let any one who knows their language enter into argument with them, and reasoning from natural facts alone, he is no mere logician who can hold his own with them; and when we hear that the learned and able Bishop (Colenso) of Natal has, from the simple questioning of a Kaffir, been led to deny the authenticity and inspiration of the Pentateuch, the Zulu Kaffirs may well have the credit of an equality in natural intellectual power with their white brethren. However inevitable, it is still lamentable to think that a race so noble must give way to the indomitable perseverance and necessity of the white man; and there can be no doubt that, no distant day, there will be no independent Kaffir occupier of land in Natal. As the requirements of the colonist demand it, the Kaffir must retire back into the interior with his flocks and herds, or remain as 'the hewer of wood and drawer of water' to the European settler; for it is of no use attempting to disguise the fact that it is absolutely impossible for the whites, in their increasing numbers, to agree to co-settlers with the Kaffirs. Let pseudo-philanthropists say what they may, there is an ineradicable repugnance in the European towards the black man which will for ever prevent assimilation or amalgamation; and the Natal Government are playing a dangerous and foolish game in attempting to give the Kaffirs 'tribal titles' to the land, as it cannot prevent the inevitable dénouement, but will only tend to render it more difficult to deal with the question when the time for a settlement arrives. Without professing to be either 'a prophet or the son of a prophet,' we believe we are safe in predicting that before many years pass, the rich, prolific, Zulu country—which contains enormous tracts of the finest sugar land—will become part and parcel, and by far the most valuable portion, of the colony of Natal. Philanthropists may then rejoice, for the Natal merchants and traders will open up trade with the interior, and by this means put a check to the nefarious Mozambique slave trade, which has its chief outlet at the Portuguese settlement of Delagoa Bay.

Having said so much about the climate and native of Natal, it may be mentioned that the whole coast is singularly free from storms. The outer anchorage is admirably protected from westerly gales by the bold promontory called 'The Bluff,' which forms the southern side of the entrance to the magnificent harbour of Port-Natal, where the town of Durban is situated. The north-east winds, which generally blow alternately with the south-west winds, are never too strong for a well-provided vessel; while the south-east winds, which blow right on the coast, are of rare occurrence; and, when they do come, they never, in nautical phrase, 'blow home,' although the heavy sea that accompanies them shows that it must be 'blowing great guns' further south. Indeed, the writer, from long experience and observation in Natal, has never seen a gale in which a vessel with good ground-tackle could not easily hold on in the outer anchorage of Natal. Great conveniences have recently been added to the resources of the port, by the establishment of a powerful steam-tug and the employment of Masulah boatmen, &c. Extensive and expensive works are also being carried on, for the deepening of the bar at the entrance to the port. As to the utility of these works, however, there is considerable difference of opinion. While the predominant party hold that the operations will be thoroughly effectual in removing the serious impediments, others contend that, being wrong in theory and practice, they will rather increase than diminish the difficulty. It is to be hoped, however, that when these important operations are finished, they may prove entirely successful, and then Port-Natal will take rank with the finest harbours in the world. Great improvements have also been effected in the interior of the colony, in the formation of roads, building of bridges, &c.—one bridge, over the Umgeni, near Durban, being about to be built at a cost of £12,500. An omnibus runs regularly between Durban and Maritzburg, a distance of about sixty miles; and a railway, about three miles long, runs along the sand-flat, from the bay to Durban. It is evident, therefore, that as the requirements of the sugar-planters and farmers demand it, the facilities for the transport of machinery to and produce from the interior must be still further developed. In the march of improvement, that relic of Dutch-dom—the lumbering 'Cape waggon,' with its span of fourteen oxen—will, doubtless, give place to some more speedy and efficient mode of conveyance; and Natal, emerging from its present comparatively slow-but-sure mode of progression, start into redoubled life, and go-ahead as it ought and must.

It may now be asked—'What classes of emigrants are most suitable for Natal?' and 'Which will Natal suit?' In the first place, the invalid 'seeking after health'—particularly those troubled with premonitory symptoms of consumption—will find Natal a true 'sanatorium'; as, from the temperature being so equable, the disease soon yields to the balmy influence of the climate. But there should be no delay; for neither Natal nor any other place can avail when the pulmonary organs are in the advanced stages of disease. In these cases, truly, 'delays are dangerous.' In the second place, to those who propose settling in Natal, a few words of advice and encouragement may be acceptable. It is a frequent occurrence, in this commercial country, where speculation is so rife, for a man to be plunged suddenly from affluence to poverty, and that probably from no fault of his own, but from the ordinary vicissitudes of trade. It may be he has a wife and family depending on him; and loss of fortune, loss of trade, and loss of social position, present a weary, dreary prospect before him—'a long lane with no apparent turning.' Seeing little or no prospect of providing for his family here, he resolves to emigrate. To such a man, without capital, Natal offers no encouragement; and he ought not to go there unless he has previously secured some permanent employment, as the expense of house-rent and living is considerably higher in the towns there than it is in this country; and while he would have to endure many privations in all probability, his chances of employment would be infinitely less than in England—clerks, bookkeepers, and that class being always at a great discount in a colony. Another class that is not required, except to an extremely limited extent, is the labourer—that is, the labourer 'pure and simple,' because, between Kaffirs and Coolies (the latter having been recently introduced from India), there is no estate which, with proper management, cannot obtain sufficient labour of that sort, and at rates which would be altogether insufficient for a white man; besides, the climate is rather exhausting for a European out-door labourer. Ploughmen would always command good wages; and there is a constant demand for skilled mechanics—such as blacksmiths, bricklayers, carpenters, masons, &c. at large wages compared with those obtainable in this country. Those, however, who are particularly wanted for the colony at present, are capitalists with not less than £500, and as much more as possible. Such parties, whether applying their capital to trade or farming, would, while doing the colony immense good—by helping to develop its vast resources and increase its productiveness—at the same time benefit themselves to an extent which might be equalled but could not be excelled in any other quarter of the globe.

One special and most important word of warning to all emigrants. Do not on any account take out goods on speculation to Natal. This cannot be too strongly urged; as, from the limited demand for merchandise in the colony—owing to the small population, and the supply being kept fully up by the enterprising merchants there—those who do indulge in a little private speculation in this way, thinking to increase their capital by the profit expected from it, almost invariably find the market overstocked—even when, as is seldom the case, they take out the proper kind of goods—and are compelled to realise at a heavy sacrifice. Let them, therefore, take nothing except what they may require for themselves, but invest their cash in good bills on London; which are always a safe venture, with neither risk, nor freight, nor charges, and invariably command an immediate sale in the colony, at a handsome premium.

In concluding our notice of this most interesting, thriving, and valuable appanage of the British Crown, we may state generally that the colony is so new, that an observing and intelligent man can always discover and develop some line for himself, and it must be his own fault if he does not succeed; and any one who has resolved to proceed to Natal should adopt as his motto—'Temperance, Energy, Perseverance, and Integrity,' and, honestly abiding by it, for him everything is possible. He will receive a hearty welcome from a hospitable, warm-hearted people—free from all jealousy and silly conventionalities—into a country so beautiful, and with a climate so delightful, that he may well exclaim, as he looks around him, 'My lines have indeed fallen in pleasant places!' A. F.

SUB-EDITORIAL PHILOSOPHY.

WEARY OF BREATH.

WHEN the last article has been handed over by me to the attendant sprite of the case-room—when I have respectfully wished my great chef, the editor, good night—when the last reporter has rushed breathlessly in, and asked me as a favour to extend his short-hand notes of an important public meeting, on the plea of wishing to join a few friends at supper at 'The Nell Gwynne'—when I have firmly but respectfully declined, on the ground of no individual but himself being able to decipher his short-hand notes (which excuse he believes to be false, but which is nevertheless true, parole d'honneur)—when I have dreamily watched him furiously and sulkily penning away, his excited figure (wrapped in an Inverness cape, the sleeves of which are continually getting in the way of the point of his pen) becoming less and less distinct in the cloud of tobacco smoke which surrounds us both—when he has faded away altogether, and in ten minutes emerged triumphantly out of the smoke, grasped my hand, exclaiming—'I say, old fellow! Excuse my temper; there's a good chap! I must acknowledge, in fairness to you, that my memory has served better than my short-hand notes. But forgive me. Can't you step round to "The Nell?" I'm going to sup with Howker, Broadasides, and a few more fellows. They'll be delighted if you join us. Let the P.D. call round with the proof for correction. You'll be back again before the paper goes to press;—there's a good fellow, come!'—when I have grasped his hand affectionately (he is a good fellow, Silversides), and answered him in the following words:—'Silversides! I respect your talents as a reporter and theatrical critic. I admire and envy your power of graphic description in the matter of launches, railway accidents, houses falling in, and awful conflagrations. I am astonished at the cleverness of your pen-and-ink descriptions of eminent burglars, pickpockets, and murderers, as they appeared when they walked into the dock (usually with a firm step); and the change in their general expression, which you can so glowingly describe, as they descended the stairs after sentence had been pronounced. I am touched to the heart when I hear that plaintive song—written by you, and set to music by your friend, Beeswacks—of "Gush along, gush along, swift-flowing gutter!" I am amazed at your versatile talents—deprecating, however, your absurd attempts at playing leading tragedy characters in amateur performances, however charitable your intentions may be in so doing. And, in short, I love you as a brother, and respect you as a cotemporary journalist. Nevertheless, Silversides, I shall not accompany you to "The Nell Gwynne;" for this reason, that something might go wrong, and I would catch it severely in the morning. Go thou, however. Be happy; and when you have finished the oysters, the cutlets, the devilled kidneys, the broiled bones, and the stout, and are quaffing the flowing bowl, and puffing the fragrant weed (by the way, that one smells nicely), perhaps you and the rest of the fellows will think kindly, and drop a tear to the memory of your ill-fated confrère, who is obliged to smoke in silence here, in order to see the paper go to press. Go, Silversides! with my blessing.' When Silversides has gone to his supper, and I have refilled my pipe, then do I sit down and form a fragrant cloud, through which I can see out into the darkness, and up to the clear blue sky. Dreamily do I watch the smoke upcurling from my pipe, crawling up to the cornices of the roof, and stealthily and slowly disappearing. It is the witching time of night! A monotonous moaning sound and a tremulous motion of the walls and floor of my room tell me that the printing of the country edition of the paper has commenced. The great press is throwing off its copies by thousands. Where is its food for to-morrow to come from? Lo! that is already provided. I shall come here to-morrow at mid-day; and by four o'clock I shall have found enough accidents by flood and field, murders, battles in old and new world, divorce cases, fires, burglaries, fraudulent bankruptcies, forgeries, Parliamentary proceedings, heartless desertion of husband from wife, of mother from child; suicides from love, from impending ruin, or from woman's faith and man's deceit; elopements, phenomena, short biographies of eminent men, who mayhap are even now, as I write, breathing their last; chronicles of the works or doings of a fresh race of eminent men—orators, statesmen, warriors, writers, inventors—whose lights are beginning to emerge from the bushel, to burn flickeringly and feebly, or brightly and steadily for a time, then to be quenched for ever—leaving bold or faint footsteps on the sands of time, that after ages may follow in the track!

As I write now, within sound of the great machine, behold I am harassed by a query. It thunders forth in every revolution of the wheel which keeps the machine going. I see strange faces, looking out of the tobacco smoke which surrounds me, who seem to strain their ears for the answer to the query which they put to me. My room is papered with cartoons from Punch; and a very prominent figure in those cartoons is a middle-aged gentleman, with a deep designing look, a cunning eye, and a prominent hook nose. I have him here before me, in every variety of attitude—in the act of attempting to steal a box of sardines—as a wolf in sheep's clothing—as a policeman—as Mephistophiles himself, &c. Would you believe it?—he seems to pucker his mouth, compress his brow, and put the query to me. Britannia, the pride of the ocean, is here also. Her expression is entreating. Can't say whether it is from a bona fide curiosity to know or from a desire to preserve unanimity with her illustrious friend of the hook nose, but she has a decided expression of entreaty, and the query which I mean seems issued from her lips—'What is the world about; and how many actions which are being performed at the present moment will in course of time come to be chronicled for good or evil in future editions of this paper?' In my sub-editorial capacity, I cut the following paragraph from a cotemporary. Very probably the rash action was committed at midnight, and whilst I was smoking here in silence, am torturing myself with the eternal query—'What is the world about at the present moment; and how many of its actions will come to be chronicled for good or evil in future editions of this paper?' This was one of them. If I could have heard as far as St. Paul's Wharf Steamer Quay, I might have been answered by a low hoarse broken cry, a dull plunge, and gurgling shriek—the poor sinner's despairing cry, terrified at her own rash act:—

A TALE OF WOE.—On Tuesday, an adjourned inquest on the body of a poor girl, eighteen years of age, name Hannah Brooks, who was drowned at St. Paul's Wharf Steamboat Pier, on the 17th ultimo, was resumed. Mr. Hann, the summoning-officer, handed to the Deputy-Coroner the following touching letter, which had been sent to the girl's mother:—'John Archer! I hope you will not drive another poor girl to an early grave, as you have done me. It is through you that I have done this; for I could not bear the shame you have brought me to, and the laughed at me for being a poor silly fool to you. I hope

God will forgive me for this act that I have done; and I hope that God will bless my sisters, brothers, and my mother and father. Mother! You cursed me when I was a girl, and your curse has clung to me; but I hope you will not curse my sisters, in case it may cling to them as it has to me. May God forgive me this crime I have committed! You all thought that I should not do it, but I hope the Lord will have mercy on my poor soul; but I could not bear the disgrace, so you may blame Jack Archer for your poor girl's miserable end. None of you will grieve for me, I know; for you said that I had brought you to shame and disgrace. While I write this, I am shedding bitter tears to think that I should be so wicked. I have not got a friend in this world to speak to me or give me a kind word. No. I may go on the streets before my mother would give me a bit of bread. Jack Archer said that I might go on the streets for my living, after being what I have to him for two years and a-half, and then to be cast off! O God! have mercy on me, and forgive me my sins! I have gone to meet my Maker, and I hope the Lord will forgive me and take me! Mother, pray for your poor girl, and kiss my poor sisters for me; and let them have my books between them. My poor brain is all on a work Jack Archer! When you see my poor body, I hope you will look at me and say—"That is through me," which you well know is a fact. I would rather die like this than do as you told me. Good-by, and God bless you! Those are my last words. May the great God look down in mercy on me! O heavenly Father! have mercy on me! O God! look down in mercy on me! My name is Hannah Brooks, No. 1 Bromley-buildings, Bread-street Hill, City. The jury returned a verdict—"That the deceased died from drowning in the river Thames, while in a state of unsound mind, brought on by the gross and cruel treatment of Jack Archer."

They picture to me the cruel career of the unfortunate girl, Bromley-buildings, Bread-street Hill, City, is not very aristocratic residence. Most probably the girl was employed at some business—flower-making, or millinery, or dressmaking. Doubtless, Jack Archer is a well-looking, straight-limbed, likely young fellow; with a reputation for being a jovial sort of a blade, fond of a lark; and with plenty of money to carry out his plans. Jack Archer may be engaged in the City; and, like many jovial City clerks, he may have been fond of smiling and occasionally talking to the girls who pass him on his way to the office. I know the type of young bloods; and I have a pretty good idea of the sort of conversation which takes place between them, when they compare notes as to their morning's rencontres. 'Very harmless!' indulgent people might say. 'Young men will joke and laugh with girls;' and they have no doubt the girls encourage them. We shall see the result of this innocent pastime. Young Jack, or Tom, or Bill, on his way to his Colonial office, in Eastcheap or Fenchurch-street, makes a daily habit of smiling and nodding to the young girls who may be passing en route to their places of business, as shop-girls or milliners, in Cheapside, or St. Paul's Church-yard, or some of the wholesale warehouses about Friday-street, or Wood-street, or Aldermanbury. Probably the young women may be from the country (as are the greater per centage of London shop-girls), and have been warned against encouraging the attentions of strangers, whether male or female; or their parents may be residents in London, and have forbidden them doing so. But young girls, when they commence to earn good wages, and are able to keep themselves, very soon get independent notions; and, after a year or so of out-door work, they are gradually allowed the freedom of their own will, which shows itself often in an increased desire for dress; in occasional purchases of small articles of jewellery, to be smart and showy; and in attendance at private dancing-classes. It is at this portion of their career that the Jack Archers begin to cast their eyes upon them, in their walks to office. Jack Archer is good-looking, is smartly dressed, wears a profusion of jewellery, is free in his manner, and is altogether a very nice young fellow. The morning rencontres begin to be looked forward to with anticipated delight by both parties. The young girl thinks he is a very nice-looking fellow indeed, and asks her companion's opinion, who indorses it; but thinks in her own heart that the other young fellow, with whom she herself exchanges smiles, is, if anything, a trifle better-looking. However, it is agreed that they are both of very gentlemanly appearance—which is a great deal in their favour; and in this word 'gentlemanly' lies the secret. The great ambition of those young girls is to be thought ladies par excellence; and it must be acknowledged that they are very good counterfeits. Their occupation being a great deal among ladies, they imitate the originals very closely; consequently, it is not to be wondered at if they begin to be in a manner ashamed of the male society in which they move at home—whether artisan brothers or acquaintances. Very often—I may venture to say invariably—are the parents or guardians of the girls themselves proud of the genteel appearance of their daughters or wards; and assist them as much as possible to keep up the illusion. Then commences the acquaintanceship with the Jack Archers—the results of which are occasional visits to theatres, suburban excursions, dancing parties, surreptitious visits to casinos and music halls, hot suppers, eternal devotion on the part of the Jack Archers, late hours, increased confidence in their own power of touching fire without being burned—glare, glitter, excitement! Heaven help the girl!—she falls at last!

Flight from home soon follows. Jack Archer thinks seriously of it—perhaps lives with her till she loses her situation—puts off the fulfilment of the promise of marriage—laughs at it—gets tired of her at last—and, with a fiendish cruelty, recommends her to try another lover, and abandons her for ever. Then follow the heart-broken overtures to be restored to her father or mother's house—the stern refusal and curse—the wild remorse and despair—the gradual stripping of all her finery to provide food—the poor starved suppliant again refused—clandestine interviews with a compassionate sister, who may be able to supply her with a little money till she is detected—actual starvation—wild hints at self-destruction, which are treated with contempt by her parents, who refuse her a morsel of bread—recommending her to do what she likes for a living!—the last saleable article in her possession pawned—paper and envelope purchased—retiral to some remote river coffee-shop—the wild heart-broken epistle penned—the figures in the shop seen indistinctly like visions—the gas darting innumerable streaks at her tear-blinded eyes, preventing her from reading the straggling characters which she has just written—the wondering look of the inmates of the coffee-shop as she walks out, leaving her cup of tea untasted, with a marble sternness in her pinched features and sunken, black, reddened eyes which tells that grim despair has possession of her heart—the posting of the letter—the walk through the dark streets, perhaps muddy and slushy—the awful coldness and solitude of the wharf—the taking off her bonnet and shawl—the tying of her dress about her, to ensure instantaneous sinking—the last wild prayer and frightened look around her—the plunge into the cold water—the regret, and longing for life again—and the waters closing over—choking, blinding, and crushing out her miserable life!

Jack Archer may belong to the class which I have just named; or he may be worse. There are also plebeian Jack Archers, in corduroys and fustians (possibly this Jack Archer may be of that class), who waylay and entice unwary servant-girls (possibly this wretched woman may have been of that class). They may be seen lounging round the railings of your house—their hands in their pockets, their caps very far over their eyes, and often a white clay-pipe in their mouths. They would fain appear decent working-men; but, if you watch them, you cannot fail to observe that there is a peculiar sly, slinking look about their general expression; and that they are addicted, when they meet your gaze, to staring vaguely about, as if in search of a particular number; or retiring into the shade of the trees in the square, where you may notice them, in ten minutes, earnestly talking to some of the servant-girls—their hands still in their pockets, and still sucking at the freshly-loaded pipe, which they make a pretence of trying to light if you happen to pass. These are the sort of Jack Archers who smuggle themselves into your kitchen; and who, if one happens to go down to that apartment, are seen nervously twirling their caps, and looking about as if they would feel grateful to the roof if it would fall in and cover them from your sight. These are the Jack Archers whom the trembling and confused Mary represents as her cousin John (which is an untruth). Beware of those characters!—they mean no good to the girl. If they did, they would have a franker look in their face; and they would not be seen slinking about the door like burglars or pickpockets. They are another of the class who bring the Hannah Brooks to shame and self-destruction.

I hope that Jack Archer does not belong to another class—of which I am going to speak—who bring about consummations such as are chronicled in the paragraph, because this class have quite enough on their heads already. This is the class who are at present 'sowing their wild-oats;' and who will, in process of time, give over sowing wild-oats, and drift quietly into middle age and respectability, and croak over the reputation which they have fairly earned of having been wild rakes in their day. This is the class who, in the meridian of life, sit long over their punch or port wine, wink leersly out of their blood-shot fishy eyes, and nudge each other's bloated, apoplectic sides, exclaiming—'Ah, Jack! what a sad dog you were in those days, to be sure! What a lot of conquests you've made in your day; eh! you dog, you! Ha, ha!' And then Jack's fishy eyes will leer delightedly, and he will gurgle out—'Doan't now; doan't, ole boy! Indeed, you made deal more conquests than I; you know you did. Come now, confess. Ha, ha! Remember that girl with the Grecian profile? Milliner's girl, by Jove! Cost me mint of money. Perseverance, you know, overcomes difficulties, as the copy-books say. Faint heart never, etcetera, you know, as the saying is. Turned Tarter after fairly limed, though. Got too expensive for me!—couldn't stand it in those days. Poisoned 'erself at last, by Jove! Egad! milliners' girls with Grecian profiles are rum 'uns! Pass decanter, Jack, ole boy!' And then both their wicked old sides will shake with internal convulsions, and their watery-red orbs ogle each other delightedly. These men married with a reputation for gallantry; and were liked for it by the simpering drawing-room beauties whom they espoused—who protested that their mammas were of opinion that reformed rakes made the best husbands, and heard the miserable saying intoned by their friends and acquaintances. These are the old school of roués; fast sinking out, to make room for the modern school—the languishing lackadaisical dandies—with silky beards and mustaches—who lead club-bachelor lives, and write letters to the Times on the absurdity of beginning housekeeping on three hundred a-year—who are epicures in lust, and call the blasting for ever of female reputation conquests and affaires de cœur; and cannot count the instances of those conquests on their ten fingers without commencing anew at the thumb from which they started! These are the men who are so nice about their reputation, and hold courts of honour, by which they try each other by codes and rules, revised and approved of by most competent and blameless noblemen and gentlemen of England—who live at home in ease, and through long practice have a nice discrimination in detecting the smallest blot on the escutcheon of their neighbours! O upright judges! how much we honour you! Be strict. Show no indulgence to those base and miserable moneyed wretches who repudiate bets known and proved to have really been made, no matter upon what trivial subjects—who, being palpably insulted, refuse to call out and shoot or be shot by the insulter! Spare them not! Cut them in the public street, blackball them in your clubs, know them no more; and then, in an atmosphere untainted by the breath of such dishonoured and recreant knights, you will be able to discuss freely, and with lightened hearts—the heavy duty of justice having been discharged faithfully—your own blameless and reproachless lives.

Shall I talk about the other results besides suicide of these conquests and affaires de cœur? Shall I discourse about the future lives of the Hannah Brooks who do not commit suicide, in the sense of putting an end at once to their lives? Nay; hold! I am going further than my province. I shall run the risk of being tabooed for treading on forbidden ground.

There is a terrible air of reality about this sad letter of Hannah Brooks. 'Mother, pray for your poor girl, and kiss my poor sisters for me; and let them have my books between them! None of you will grieve for me, I know; for you said that I had brought you to shame and disgrace. No. I may go on the streets before my mother would give me a bit of bread.' I can't help pitying that father and mother as much as I pity the daughter. I can't help thinking, also, that in the repetition of the Lord's Prayer (if they ever do repeat that prayer), they must come to a stand-still at the words—'And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us.'

R. L. G.

SACRED POETRY.*

BY THE EDITOR.

A STIGMA of mediocrity attaches to the bulk of what is called sacred poetry. Dr. Johnson expressed his dissatisfaction with the general run of achievements in this line; and his opinion has been frequently re-echoed. No doubt there is a good deal of doggerel in our denominational hymn-books. Nor can it be asserted that Isaac Watts is entitled, in point of poetical merit, to stand on the same shelf with Chaucer, Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton, or even with many of the lesser lights of song. It would, however, be a transparent mistake to aver that poetry of the loftier kind is inimical to religion. On the contrary, when freed from the conventional trammels of mere hymnody—with its stereotyped phrases and cramp-

* 'The Book of Praise,' by Roundell Palmer.—Macmillan & Co. 'Time's Treasure; or, Devout Thoughts for every Day in the Year expressed in Verse.'—Edmonston & Douglas.

ing metres—it is indebted for its grandest inspirations to the beauty of Christian doctrine and the contemplation of God in the universe.

All really high poetry is, in a sense, sacred. Some of the more transcendent passages in Shakspeare and Milton are worthy of the lips of saints. Wordsworth and Tennyson overflow with sacred utterances. The ardent and pious breathings of the human soul—in its prostration of sorrow or exaltation of rapture—have nowhere found more beautiful, more sacred expression than in the pages of certain of the great masters of the lyre, whose names are unknown in Methodist hymn-books and other pious collections.

If it is essential to Scriptural religion to abstract it from the ordinary concerns of life and the ordinary feelings and interests of humanity, then, we fear, must the talisman of its moral influence be broken even when wielded by the highest genius. The language of such a purely abstract religion must necessarily be cold. Nearer and dearer themes must out-champion it in the arena of eloquence and song. Woman's love, childhood's innocence, the loveliness of virtue, the charms of natural scenery, the grandeur of freedom, the glory of patriotism, the deeds and the deaths of heroes, must all supply more potent materials to move the heart and make the blood tingle in the veins. The very unvaryingness of the abstract language of praise, cast in definite and unalterable moulds of doctrine, can hardly fail to deter men of really brilliant talents from seeking distinction in a field foreclosed against any display of originality. Hence, perhaps, the poverty of our modern songs of praise contrasted with the richly resonant strains of the old Hebrew bards.

Nevertheless, such really fine things in the shape of sacred songs have been written by George Herbert, Addison, Watts, Cowper, Mrs. Barbauld, Kirke White, Bishop Heber, James Montgomery, and others, that we are tempted to admit the truth of Dr. Johnson's dictum only to a somewhat limited extent. When properly culled, our collections of sacred poetry—using that phrase in its most restricted sense—have still high, although, poetically considered, not certainly the highest claims to our regard. Along with much indifferent and some despicable verse, our English literature can undoubtedly boast of a goodly quantity of respectable and indeed highly meritorious sacred song adapted for choirs and precentors.

This is well, and supplies what would otherwise be felt as a want. All good men and good women, amid the trials and despondencies of this world, are subject to moods of mind which incline them to sacred meditation; and to sensations of the heart which find their natural expression in breathings of thanksgiving, trustfulness, or praise. Within the last few weeks, two eminent lawyers—Sir Roundell Palmer, Solicitor-General of England, and Lord Kinloch, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Scotland—have each come forth to the public with a volume of sacred verse. That of the former is entitled 'The Book of Praise,' and is simply a careful and well-selected selection of the best English hymns, ably prefaced; while that of the latter is entitled 'Time's Treasure,' and is wholly original, embodying, in careful verse, a series of devout thoughts for every day of the year. Sir Roundell thus assumes the character of editor; Lord Kinloch that of author. Both, however, are in the same vein—impelled doubtless by the same feelings, influenced by the same motives, and pointing to the same end. The circumstance of two such busy men of the world, amid the turmoil of an arduous and engrossing profession, appearing simultaneously as humble and devout labourers in the field of sacred literature, is, to say the least, impressive, and calculated to operate as a strengthening example in spiritual and unworldly directions.

While commending the volume of Sir Roundell Palmer as an elaborate and admirable compilation, we naturally turn with chief interest and expectation to the 'devout thoughts' of Lord Kinloch. Here everything is new and fresh. We cannot say that the poetry is altogether Miltonic. It wears the features of a too overmastering judgment, and thus lacks the freedom and brilliant movement of a perfect inspiration. But it has much of the quaint beauty, and subtle spiritual tone of Herbert's 'Porch.' Take, for example, the following, which he calls

THE UNKNOWN GOD.

A stranger once I met, of aspect stern,
Of whom 'twas told that, if I did but learn
His real nature, I should love him well;
But still I found that aspect stern repel,
And would not once go near him, truth to tell.

At last I found that he, unknown to me,
Had done me service; then I thought 'twould be Fit that I thank'd him: so to him I went,
And found uprightness with such sweetness blent
I gave him all my heart; nor since repent.

Lord! when Thou stranger art, we treat Thee so;
We think Thee stern in aspect, till we go
More close to Thee; then find 'twas our ill sight.
When all Thy holy grace we know aright,
Love Thee we must, e'en in our own despite.

Very fine, too, in its way, and as profound in human affection as it is lofty and trustful in piety, is

THE LOSS OF THE LOVED.

Which wouldst thou lose
Of all thy dear ones, now so bright around?
Lord, didst Thou ask me this my heart to sound,
I could not choose.

Some I may see
More ripe for Heaven, and thus more fit to go;
But, more they are Thine own, alas! they grow
More dear to me.

Fain I would sue
The whole to keep, but know 'twere vain request.
Choose, Lord! Thyself the offering; what is best
Most is Thy due.

And still I pray,
Spare them awhile; justly, O Father! Thou Call'st them to home; yet, in Thy grace, allow
Some further stay.

One other brief snatch is all for which we can afford space. It bears the title

NOT LOST, THOUGH NOT SEEN.

The bird that mounts in upward air,
Fades at the last from view;
Yet is full surely singing there,
Though hid 't the heaven's blue.

The saint, that always higher roars,
Passes at death from sight;
Yet then as surely heavenward goes,
And sings at unknown height.

All the pieces are succinct in plan and form, and very various in measure. They will not perhaps remove the Johnsonian reproach; but, taken in connection with the compilation of Sir Roundell Palmer, they will at least serve to show that minds of the highest culture, even in this busy nineteenth century, are not above attempting to elevate the character of our purely devotional poetry—thereby acknowledging, in the face of all men, an humble obligation to abstract themselves at times from the world, and draw near to the Creator of the universe with the intense of adoration and praise.

WAYSIDE THOUGHTS.—No. II.

BY THE LATE JAMES MACFARLAN.

THE death of the good and true, though it may cause a momentary sorrow, yet never fails to bestow an after joy. We sprinkle the new-made grave with tears, and after many days go back to find them flowers.

WHILE the mythology of Greece obtained in the world, it was reckoned that the poets received their immortality from the gods. The changes of time have now shown us that those gods owe their immortality to the poets.

THERE is a strong dash of the vagabond in human nature. Unless one gets over this nomadic predilection, he will go to sea, or turn out a strolling player. Life has its age of tents and continual shifting; but, when reflection begins, we become fixed down, and set about building houses.

IN the stillest night, when the great world lies asleep, ever in some lonely room the midnight oil is burning. In silence and in solitude there is the student awake and at work; and, though the feeble light of his lamp may pale before the earliest beam, that other light born of his labours may stream far into the future, and help to illuminate the ages.

A MAN speaks many words in his life-time; and, could he recall the whole on his death-bed, he would derive most pleasure, not from the brilliant sayings and wit-flashes at great tables and in festive moments, but from those words spoken in quiet places—hope for the fallen, comfort to the distressed, and those real charitable sentiments of which we are unfortunately so sparing.

HOOD'S POEMS.—It is sometimes a hindrance to a man to have two distinct qualities; and this seems to have been eminently the case with Thomas Hood. While he lived, the world scarcely expected anything from him but puns and whimsicalities; while his own heart was strongly drawing him towards tears and subtle fancies. 'Hood's Own' and 'The Comic Annual' are full of strange fantastic things; but yet they suggest something more. It somehow seems like genius cutting grotesque shapes from the paper on which it had purposed to write burning thoughts. There is an air of sadness, too, hanging about some of the jests, as when a death's head smiles.

THERE are ever false prophets in the world, and books and men highly pretentious. But somehow we still feel confident that the man will not outlast his laced coat, nor the book live longer than its elegant binding. The endless epics of Blackmore and of dead authors are consigned to the catacombs; while 'Paradise Lost' and the 'Seasons' stand mailed and marshalled in classic libraries; or turn up, ragged and dog-eared through veteran service, in city garrets and country cabins. A man may travel over Arcadia or Sahara, but we will learn the result of his journey by the flowers and fruits he has gathered on his way.

No production of Shakspeare baffles the grasp of our intellect so much as the tragedy of 'Hamlet,' and this because it represents the entire perplexities of the human mind. He is not the delineation of one man but of many men. He exhibits in his five acts a thousand experiences; and hence, what are the many sides of human nature seem inconsistencies in the compass of a single character. Philosophy at one moment, and superstition at another. Pure faith now, and anon scepticism. Decorum, eccentricity, humour, tears, love, hatred, agony, on through all of these into the very maelstrom of madness. A terrible embodiment of all that humanity thinks and feels, or has ever thought and felt. In the highest effort of one like Shakspeare, we could scarcely expect it otherwise. He could only give us a condensation of his own universality.

THE true poet, it is said, will seldom be at a loss for materials, wherever he is. Shady groves, and winding rills, and rosy cheeks, are the stock-in-trade, the stage properties, of indifferent rhymesters. Take these from them, and you leave them nothing. A pale and emaciated seamstress sewing shirts in a miserable London garret, or a woman throwing herself madly over Waterloo Bridge at midnight, to the common eye had nothing at all poetic in them. Indeed, the ideal which is supposed to be the poet's dream-world was wholly wanting—all was stern reality. A newspaper paragraph would have seemed to most the only fitting record of such scenes; but the genius of Hood observed them, and henceforth they became immortal. Goldsmith's flute, Burns' mouse and daisy, or the old coat of Beranger, are mean and common things; yet they become exalted and beautiful by association—as the goose, the lizard, the crab, and so forth, indicate to us blazing constellations.

SCRAGGS wrote an epic, many years ago, which nobody cared to read. The other day I picked up a copy (at an old book-stall), ominously clean, and with uncut leaves. Poor fellow! like many others he died in the hope that posterity would do him justice. There is doubtless a good deal of consolation, and at the same time much delusion in this dependence on posterity. The truth is, posterity has a great deal to do, and the work is continually growing on its hands. Has posterity looked after those hundred children of Lope de Vega? or does it still care for Sir Charles Grandison and Clarissa Harlowe? The authors of the day are filling libraries at the top of their bent, and these will all be left to the charge of posterity. What chance, therefore, remains for poor Scraggs? It is forlorn, however, that we can never know how posterity treats us. If we did, would it give Scraggs any consolation to see one of posterity's many members now sitting down to wade through his neglected epic?

EYLOMEL.

Up the morn the red was creeping,
Mists across the plain were sleeping,
Sedges dark and low were weeping
O'er the beauteous Eylomel

There she lay amid the shiver
Of the sedges on the river,
Gleaming white, but silent ever
Golden-tress'd Eylomel.

Far away, where leaves were swaying,
Tender hearts for her were praying—
Little lips their lesson saying:
'Bless, O God, our Eylomel'

Dark the waters o'er her streaming,
Ghastly white the pale face gleaming,
Silent all the sedges dreaming,
Side by side with Eylomel!

WILLIAM BLACK.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention, but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, London, E.C.; and 22 Enoch-Square, Glasgow. Sold by all Booksellers.

look after ourselves, I tell you. We parted from the brigantine yesterday; it came on to blow again, and we lost sight of her in the night.'

'Then I will never see her again!'

'There is more than her that neither you nor I will ever see again, I fear. If we ever see the face of a civilised Christian again, it's more than I expect;—if, before many days, or hours either, we may not be where we wont even see the faces of the wretches among whom we are.'

'Why have they spared us so long?'

'Because they want us. We did for their commodore and three of their lieutenants. I understand navigation; and they want me. The fellow who commands this craft has been down two or three times at me; but I wont listen to him, and I don't intend to. They lost a great many of their men in the brush with us. They have scurvy aboard, too, and a number of their hands laid up. They would have kept our fellows, but they fought to the last man—they were all either killed or wounded; so they ransacked the ship, and blew her up.'

'But how have they spared me?'

'They took it into their heads that you were surgeon to our ship. I suppose they thought, as we had passengers, that we had one; and they want some person to look after their sick and wounded. The fellow I told you of was asking me about you, and I let him believe that you were our surgeon. If you can keep up the character, you are safe; and I don't see why you should not—you used to manage well enough on board the Rosaria.'

'But you—Will you avail yourself of what they propose?' said I.

'Never!' said Telford. 'I will die first. But, Harper, do you see that lamp? Little would make me take it and blow up the bloody craft and her villainous crew.'

'Ha! Ve—ry good! Villanous crew! Here's one of the fraternity come to pay you a visit.'

A pannel, which I had not before observed, opened in one of the bulkheads, and a middle-sized, thick-set man entered. He was indeed a villanous-looking wretch. He had but one eye, and it had a vile squint—its repulsive expression being heightened by a red beard, which stuck out short and stumpy round his mouth. The place where his other eye had been was red and puckered, and passing over it and down the side of his face there was a broad scar, which in its course assumed three or four different hues. He wore a coarse gray frock-coat, a large slouched hat, and heavy sea-boots. His only visible weapon was a small stiletto, fastened in a leather belt which encircled his waist.

'And so you thought of sending the old spectre to Davy Jones, did ye? We're very much obliged to you for your most charitable intentions; but, as it would hardly be quite consistent with our comfort to allow them to be carried into execution, we will be under the painful necessity of leaving you, during the time you are to tenant this cabin—of leaving you in the dark. Ay! and so you—what's your name?—

you've got better, have ye?—resuscitated, as we say in the learned professions! You had better look sharp and get well as fast as you like: we want you—t of our fellows dead this morning. Your chaps, Captain, gave it us. I have taken many a craft; but sink me! yours beat all creation. This chap here gave me a smash on the head;—I feel it fixing yet. A that jade who shot the commodore—'

'Murdering villain!' I cried, 'speak not of her!'

He turned slowly round, and glared savagely at me—a light seeming to flash from his eye. Gradual however, his face assumed its original expression, and he continued in his former tone—'Ha! I see. 'Tis the wind in that quarter? But that game's over. Bloody Jack has her snug under hatches for a while. I wonder where he can have got to with the brigantine! But, Captain, you must make up your mind to one thing or t'other, and that precious soon. I want a mate, as I told you before. We're short-handed! Skin me, if your chaps hadn't kied up such a row, they might have been all snug about us. But, as I told you, we have another lie craft—as tidy a little thing as ever hoisted a flag and I think Bloody Jack wouldn't mind giving to you by-and-by. Have you thought on't?'

'As much as ever I intend to think of it,' answered Telford; 'I refuse it. Will I sell my soul to save life? No!—not if it were to save the life of my little daughter, if she be alive; or to bring her back to life if she be dead.'

'Ha!' said the pirate—'then the little fair-haired thing is a chick of yours, is she? Then we have handle; and what's more, we'll turn it. Perhaps sight of her might help to bring you round a point or two—eh?'

'They have her then—my poor little Ally!' claimed Telford when the pirate had gone; 'but even if they should—but no; bad as they are, they would not do that. But even if they should, I'm firmly resolved to have nothing to do with them. But, Harper, it would not be so bad in you; it would not be so decidedly wrong as it would be in me. I could, I think, do all they want of you with a conscience.'

I thought of Flora. It was my only chance of seeing her again, or ever being able to assist her. I might escape together. It was repugnant to all feelings to be among those wretches; but in view of the death which I knew awaited me if I refused—such a death!—I feared my resolution might not be able to resist. I was sufficiently acquainted with surgery to sustain the character which they believed I held; indeed, I had been acting partly in the capacity of surgeon on board the Rosaria; for, having originally designed for the medical profession, I attended a term at one of the London colleges, the circumstances connected with the death of an elder brother had caused me to abandon the intention. These few months of study probably saved my life.

'Yes,' I said; 'I do not see that my duty would call me to sacrifice myself. I might do some good among those miserable wretches; and, besides, this is my only chance of ever— But I do not see that you either should not give in. If you don't, I will take your life to a certainty. You might as well take the command of that vessel he spoke about once; and then you could easily take her into port, and escape.'

'No, Harper! no. I never could do that. I joined them, I would be true to them; and join them I never will. But here comes little Ally!'

The child was lowered down through a hatch into

Her little arm was in a sling—she, too, had been hurt. She gave a frightened look round; and, seeing her father, flew into his outstretched arms.

'O father!' she said, 'where have you been? I thought I was never going to see you any more; they were such wild-looking men! they frighten me so! But your head sore, father!'

'Not very sore, darling; but your arm, my child! What is the matter?'

'Oh, it isn't much, father! It was when they were taking Miss Ellis away. Oh, father, wasn't it dreadful! I felt something sharp on my arm, and when I looked it was all bleeding; but one of the black men took it up, and I don't feel it much now at all. But was it not dreadful, when they were fighting and coming at each other you way? Oh, father, will they kill you too?'

'I do not know, darling,' said Telford. 'Oh, what will become of my child! Harper, the sight of her almost makes me waver.'

'But I do not think they will harm you, father,' said Alice. 'They are bad men, I know, for they were so fearfully; but I do not think they would harm you, father.'

'You do not know them, child! Harper, if they take my life, you will take care of her; and if you ever make your escape, you will not leave her behind. Promise me, Harper?'

'Promised; and he seemed satisfied.

'Well,' said the pirate, entering as he had formerly done, 'have you made up your mind?—the Jolly Roger of a morning promenade on the plank—one chance! If you vote for the plank, why, then, and the little one before you to clear the way; and that doesn't help you to decide on what's reasonable, I don't know what should.'

'You surely cannot mean what you say!' said Telford, raising himself in his berth. 'You would not make the life of a helpless child! It would do you no good, and it would not influence me. I know my duty, and whatever may come of it, God helping me, will do it.'

'Eh! You think we won't do it! We've done such things before, and we'll do them again; ours is the trade to get one's feelings refined. Why, I don't think no more of drowning a chit like that than I do of pitching a dead rat into the lee soupers. We'll bring you to, or there isn't a flying-fish in the Gulf of Mexico. And now, you there—tooth and nail! get up! We want you; another fellow dead would be a loss, too. So get up and come along. You're able enough, d—n you!'

With the exception of the dizziness in my head, I felt comparatively well. The den in which I lay was close to suffocation. Glad of an opportunity to escape from it, I rose and dressed myself. There was stiffness in my left arm—it had been grazed by a ball—but I had little or no pain.

'Now then, Lancet,' said the pirate, as I put on my coat, 'come along! Little one! you stay where you are.'

He drew back the pannel, and made a sign for me to get out. From a small compartment, in which were old muskets, coils of rope, and broken hand-axes were heaped, a ladder led up through a hatch in the deck.

'Mount,' said the pirate. 'Show the scuttle overboard; off with it altogether!'

I found myself in the 'tween decks of the schooner. The hammocks were slung all round—dark and grisly men staring out of them. Groans and cries of pain were heard on every side; and lolling tongues and bloody lips told plainly that death, also, was busy

'Here are some tools for you. The medicine chest is aft there; you will get lint and stuff in it. Begin with him.' He pointed to a hammock where lay a fine-looking young man of three or four and twenty.

'It's my sub. One of you shot him in the side. I'm afraid he's far gone; but do for him what you can. When you have done with him, go to the others; but him first—he is more to me than all the rest. Here, Danby!' he said, to a negro who stood by with a lantern in his hand, 'bear a hand!'

'You've come at last,' said the young man; 'I thought you were never going to come; you're too late now. However, I'll let you try it; it's only sending me out of the world an hour or two sooner. The bullet is just under my arm—there. Oh! the blockheads have been trying to take it out; but, curse them! they've sent it further in.'

His wound seemed to be of an extremely dangerous character; and from the weak and feverish state in which he apparently was, I feared there was but little prospect of saving his life. However, I succeeded, though with some difficulty, in extracting the bullet; but had hardly done so when he fainted. For some time he lay insensible. His life seemed to be ebbing fast away. But, with a quivering motion of the limbs, he gradually revived.

'I am going,' he murmured; 'I feel the blood ebbing from my heart—fast, fast! I feel myself sinking—sinking down to hell! Oh, my mother! had I but listened to you, this would never have been! What a life I have led! O God, when I look back!—O Lord, have mercy on me! Pray for me—pray—my soul—my soul—my lost soul!'

I felt an irresistible impulse rising within me; and I prayed. Whether, like that of the dying thief, my prayer was heard, I know not—he never spoke again.

I would fain have waited beside him, to render such aid as was possible in the circumstances; but the others raised clamorous cries to have their wounds dressed. There were men of every nation there—English, Spanish, French, and Portuguese—black men and white men; but all more or less fierce and brutal. They swore oaths which made my blood run cold, cursing me as I dressed their wounds.

When I had done, I was glad to seek relief from the stifling air of the place, and went on deck. Twilight was deepening into night; but the clouds in the west were still fringed with gold. The sea was boisterous from the recent gales—heaving in huge swelling waves. The schooner was only a few miles from the coast; she was beating out to sea, however, on the larboard tack. Dispersed along the deck was the pirate watch—one group seated in the waist mending a sail, singing a ribald song as they wrought; some standing round the capstan playing at cards; others lying asleep between the guns. The pirate captain lay stretched on the poop, smoking a short black pipe, and reading a newspaper which he had spread on the deck before him. He raised his eyes, saw me, and beckoned to me. I walked aft—the man looking carelessly at me as I passed, but taking no further notice of me.

'Well, have you got them doctored? What's your name?'

'Harper.'

'Harper—ha! How's he—him I showed you. Bad—eh? You must save him—must, do you hear? I can't do without him. The rest of them, curse them! I can't talk to them. Is he very bad?'

'He is, I fear, beyond all human aid.'

'What d'ye say?' He jumped up, and stamped his foot on the deck. 'It cannot be—it must not—it shall not be! Poor Ralph!' he added, in a softer tone. 'He was the only one I ever cared for—man, woman, or child. But if he goes, somebody's life must pay for his. That skipper of yours—it was his cursed obstinacy in fighting his ship that did it; and he should pay for it. But,’ he added, ‘that cat wont jump. We want him too much for that. But if he doesn’t give in, then, by —! we’ll have it out of him. Now, d—n you! we’ll go down to supper.’

He led the way to the cabin of the vessel. It was a quaint, curiously furnished place. It was carpeted with a rich matting, apparently of Chinese workmanship. The seats were covered with skins of the seal, the buffalo, and the tiger; the bulkheads with elephants’ tusks, backbones of sharks, and skulls of various animals. A large brass swivel stood on each side; pikes, muskets, and cutlasses were ranged along the beams.

‘A bit of a snug place, eh? Kitten! bring that supper, and tell big Ben to come up.’

The boy, having placed some meat and biscuits and two or three bottles on the table, opened a hatch in the deck and shouted something down. Shortly afterwards, there was a strange subterranean noise; and a head, with large black beard and small bloodshot eyes, appeared in the opening of the hatch. The eyes lighted on me—their owner stopped in the act of ascending.

‘Who are you? and what the — do you want?’ he said, in a voice of thunder.

‘Never mind him, Ben,’ said the pirate. ‘Come up and take your supper quietly. Ha! drunk again! Now this wont do—not by a long way.’

‘And who gave you the right to speak to me? How many days ago is it since you were little better nor I? And now that the commodore’s gone on his long cruise, you think you’ll have it all your own way; but I’m — if you do. I’m a better and a bigger man nor you—ye ghost of a half-starved midge! one skylight blocked, and a squint in t’other!’

The pirate turned, and regarded his mate with that look which before had made me quail; and slowly putting his hand into his breast, he drew forth a heavy horse-pistol, cocked it, and presented it at the head of his mate.

‘Hark ye!’ he said, in a low deep voice which sent a creeping sensation through me—‘hark ye! another word, and your brains spatter on that bulkhead!’

The other was cowed; he turned away. ‘Bring in that supper,’ he growled; and taking one of the bottles from the table, he dashed it at the head of the boy; but he avoiding it, in a manner which told that it was not the first time he had had occasion to practise the evasion of such missiles, it broke in pieces on one of the guns.

‘Now, Ben, lock up!’ said the pirate. ‘We’ve had enough of this; grog isn’t got for nothing. Kitten, gather up the bits, and swab up the liquor. And, Ben, sit in, and let’s have no more of this sort of thing—I wont have it!’

We ate in silence. The pirates drank large quantities of wine; and I began to fear that, as it took effect, it might occasion a renewal of their quarrel; for a succession of half-suppressed growls on the part of the mate seemed to indicate that the words of his superior still rankled in his mind. We were interrupted, however, by the entrance of the negro who had assisted me among the wounded. ‘The young lieutenant had come to again,’ he said; ‘but he had not spoken—young massa was not long for this world.’

The pirate swore a terrible oath, and started to his feet. ‘Follow, quick!’ he cried, and with one bound he was on the deck.

I followed him to where the wounded lay. The young man’s eyes were closed; he lay quite motionless; he had relapsed into insensibility. I felt his pulse—it was still; I raised him up—his head drooped upon his breast; I put my hand upon his heart—it did not beat; it had ceased for ever.

The pirate covered up the dead man’s face, and, turning away with an oath, flew up the stair. Having given some directions to the negro, I stole away to my berth. I felt sick and weary; my arm was stiff, so that I could scarcely move it; my head was dizzy and painful. Telford had fallen asleep. Alice still sat by his bed; she, too, slept. Her hand was locked in her father’s; her little wounded arm was round his neck. I gently disengaged them. Lifting her up, I placed her in my berth; and, covering myself up in a sail which I found in a corner, I laid myself down on the deck, and was soon fast asleep.

CHAPTER IV.

How long I lay I know not. When I awoke, daylight was streaming through the open hatch. The pain in my head was gone; I felt much refreshed and invigorated. I rose; I looked into the berths. They were both empty. A horrible suspicion crossed me. I thought of the pirate’s threat. Oh! what if he had already done it!

I hastened on deck; and oh! never can I forget the sight—a narrow plank laid across the bulwarks. On the end of it, over the sea, was little Alice. She was on her knees, holding the plank with her hands; and as it dipped in the waves, as they came washing her naked feet and casting the spray over her, she gave a childish cry, and cast an imploring look towards her father. He stood between two of the pirates—his nostril quivering, his chest heaving. He drew back as if struggling to restrain himself from rushing forward—conscious that any interference on his part might only serve to precipitate the fate of his child.

‘What do you say now?’ said the pirate. ‘Mind, you needn’t think we wont do it. As I told you before, we’d think no more of letting her go than of shoving a rat through a scupper-hole. It’s only to say the word, and down goes the plank. So, come along! what do you say? the Jolly Roger, or —’

‘I say what I have always said, and will say to the last,’ answered Telford. ‘I will not do it. You may take my life—you may take the life of my —; but you will not—you cannot do that! Take my life; but as you have a soul to be saved, and as you hope for mercy, spare—oh spare my child! My child—will no one—O my God!’

‘Stop your preaching,’ said the pirate; ‘soft sawdust wont do here. It lies with yourself whether we do it or not. What do I care? What is a chit like that dead or alive to me? But if you don’t give in, I’ll do it! Now, one or t’other—a berth in as tidy a little craft as ever ran into a Spanish galleon, and the little one along with you, remember; or both of you walk! Mind, we’ll do it!’

Telford did not speak, but he trembled like a leaf—his hands opening and closing in a convulsive motion.

‘You’re dumb,’ said the pirate. ‘Then, here goes! Now, men! ready—once, twice!’

The plank moved—the child swayed upon it, rushed forward. ‘Cowardly wretches!’ I cried. ‘Would you take the life of a helpless child?’

‘Eh! what’s that?’ cried the pirate, advancing towards me, and shaking his huge fist in my face. ‘What’s that you say? Another word, and I’ll fel you to the deck! Do you think that because we wanted you and kept you when we blew up the rest of your lot, that we’ll let you kick up a mutiny whenever you take it into your head? No. We’ll serve you the same as the rest, if you don’t take care. So mind your eye; or tramp, walk—one, two, three—splash!

Further interference would be worse than useless: I drew back into a corner—my heart beating in my throat. The motion of the plank was beginning to make the child feel giddy. I thought every moment she would lose her hold. She looked towards her father—'Father! father!' she cried. 'Save me! save me!'

With a herculean effort, Telford hurled the men who held him to the deck, and rushed upon the two who held the plank. He grappled with them—others rushed forward—a scuffle ensues—a shriek—a splash—the child is gone!

I saw her floating away. She disappeared—rose again, parting the hair from her face, and gasping for breath. She stretched both arms towards us. Her father gave a fearful cry; and, throwing off his coat, rushed to the side of the ship. But he was held back by the pirates. The child saw him, and again stretched out her arms, but a wave swept over her. She sank again—never more to rise. A sickening sensation came over me—I sank upon the deck.

When I recovered, I found a group of the pirates around me. They assisted me to rise. I looked round. Telford was not there.

'Ay! ye're looking for him, are ye? But you'll look awhile before you see him. He's food for the sharks by now. Went down bravely, with a shot at his heels. He was a tough one, though—he was; and to his colours as he'd been fighting with a knife round his neck. Pity Yankee Bill couldn't bring him persuaded! For my part, I don't see why he wouldn't. I only wish I'd ha' got the chance.'

'And a fine thing you'd have made on't,' said another; 'you as doesn't hardly know a quadrant from a marlinespike. But it seems this here concern is some sort of kick they calls duty; though blow me I can see through it at all! He seemed plaguy fond of the young one, though.'

'Ay, it was too bad the drowning of her; though I don't know if Yankee Bill would ha' done it if the father hadn't ha' interposed.'

'I ain't so sure about that, mate,' said a third. 'I've seen him do as bad as that afore; and you'll see him treated as that again, if you live long aboard o' this craft. But, mates, I say, we should have struck out; it isn't chancy, I've heard tell—and Big Ben'll tell you the same—to drown young ones like her. If before long we don't have a squall, or some'at that'll make us quake in our boots, I'm blowed.'

'It won't be a squall, shipmates, how's ever,' said a man with a grisly beard and a weather-beaten face. 'It strikes me it'll be something next as bad, or worse—a calm. I've been on them coasts before, and I knows them; there's currents here would drive the best ship afloat to the bottom. The bit of air we live is dying away; and, if I'm old enough to know a thing, there's no more coming; and we're nearer to that than shipmates, than I'd care to be in any weather.'

'By —, I believe you're right, mate; and here's the skipper come up—he don't like the looks of it neither.'

'Bear a hand there! Run out the studd'n'-sails, come, and set the sails! Look alive—in the waist there! Do you hear?'

The order was obeyed; but the sails had hardly been set when the wind died wholly away. The water lay like a log in the water—the sails flapped against the masts, as she rose and fell on the waves. The land was some leagues distant; but, to the northward of where we lay, it swept away out into the sea to the westward. There was serious reason to fear that the southerly current which swept along the coast would drive the vessel ashore. Unless, indeed, a breeze should spring up, there was but little doubt that, before many hours, she would be driven ashore. The coast all along was rugged and rocky; there was a heavy sea running; there could be but small prospect that, once among the breakers, she could hold long together. But the almost certain destruction which I knew awaited us, should this happen, had no terror for me. I rather welcomed it than otherwise; for, now that I believed that Flora was all but lost to me for ever, I felt that death itself was to be preferred to a life spent among those wretches. I looked forward with a strange pleasure to what seemed to inspire terror in the rough and hardened natures around me.

Night closed in bright and starry; but still there was no wind. We could distinguish a faint rolling sound—it was the breakers among the rocks!

The boats were hoisted out and manned to tow the vessel; but although the men exerted themselves to the utmost, she could make no head against the united force of the swell, the current, and the tide, which now ran against her.

The pirates seemed to feel the full peril of their position. The rude oath, the ribald jest were hushed. Anxiously they turned their eyes to the coast, or bent their ears to listen to the still increasing roar. The moon rose, but still there was no wind; a few straggling clouds hovered in the east, but they were still and motionless.

'Didn't I tell ye how it would be?' said the mate, as we sat at supper. 'Didn't I tell ye I never saw any good come of meddling with little things like you? But you would have it your own way; and a pretty kettle of fish you've made of it!'

'Could I help it?' said the pirate. 'Wasn't it himself that did it—not I?'

'And didn't I say that there was no good in going after an old hulk like you was? And what did we get? A few bloody bales not worth stowage; and lost our commodore to the bargain—though —! I suppose you don't consider that much of a loss. And here we are now—driving as fast — as a four-knot current and a sea like Mother Howley's cauldron can drive us; while, if we had held on our course, we might have been snug round the Horn by now.'

'And again I say—what had I to do with that?'

'But, hark ye, Ben!—you haul in the slack of your jaw, or, —, I'll make you! I won't have it! And, hark ye, Ben! I'm master here; and I'll be obeyed. So, now, you go and keep them at the pulling. Keep them at it—do you hear?'

The mate struck the table with his hand. 'You be' — he began; but the strange fire gleamed in the pirate's eye—he rose sulkily, dashed his chair on the deck, and slowly ascended the ladder.

'Ay!' said the pirate, when he had gone, 'they may pull and pull till they snap all the lines in the ship; but they won't keep her off. Before dawn she's on the rocks; and then it's a swamping of the boats, and a swim for life. And this isn't the rig for that sort of thing! We'll need some rhino, too, among the Araucanians.'

From a locker in one of the bulkheads he produced a small mahogany box; and, opening it by pressing a spring which had been concealed by a plate on the top, he took out one or two jewels, apparently of considerable value, and distributed them about his person. Having taken off his boots, he put on a pair of light shoes. He then threw off his large outer coat. He was heavily armed. A long dirk hung in a belt round his waist; two large pistols were fastened in a belt of sealskin slung over his shoulder; a smaller pair were fastened in his waist-belt. These he threw off; and, having divested himself of one or two articles of his dress, he again put on his coat, and seated himself at the table.

He seemed unconscious of my presence; for I had withdrawn into a corner, and seated myself on one of the seats. For a long time he sat, his elbow on the table, his head resting on his hand. There was a fearful look in his eye—anger, fear, remorse, by turns written in his face.

'I didn't do it!' he muttered; 'and what if I did? I've done worse before; and, if it hadn't been for this mess, I'd do worse again. But I'm a fool. What had she to do with it? There's a little wind and as much swell for the honest merchantman as there is for this cursed craft. Ha! honest! I was that once; what am I now?—liar, thief, murderer! What will I be to-night at midnight? I know not; and, by —, I care not!'

He poured out a large quantity of wine, drank it at a draught, and threw the goblet from him.

For a long time I watched him. There was a wild fascination in his look. I could not take my eyes from him. Gradually, however, a languor crept over me, and I fell into a dozing sleep. I heard, indistinctly, the clink of the glasses as he drank, and the heavy thump of his hand as he struck the table in a passion. The consciousness of these was blended with vague recollections of Flora, Telford, and little Alice—the voyage, the storm, and the fight. As my sleep deepened, my ideas became more defined. I dreamed of Flora. We were kneeling together at the altar. She wore a long white dress. Her bosom was bare, her brown hair clustering round her neck. A sweet smile beamed upon her face, but a tear-drop glistened on her eyelash. I held her hand. I kissed her lips, and she was mine. I wakened with a start; there was a pistol-shot—something splashed on my face—I put up my hand—it was blood!

'I told ye I would do it, and I've done it. Who was going to stand your everlasting lingo? I stood it too long. But, —, I hope he isn't dead. I didn't count for that.'

We lifted him up—the ball had entered his forehead—death had been instantaneous.

'I didn't count for this!' said the pirate. 'Ben had his way, and it was hard to bear; but I didn't mean this for him; and, —, this is not the job one would like to have fresh on his hands where we may be in an hour. Here, you there! Do you hear? Go up and send some one down to take him out of that, and to wipe up that blood—quick!'

I went and delivered his message. We were quite close to the land. I could plainly descry the jagged rocks along the shore. The long line of foam which skirted it was under our bow. But away to the southward there was a bank of cloud rolling slowly towards us—there was a breeze springing up. I felt mingled joy and disappointment as I saw it. I had welcomed the thought of death; but now that it had assumed a definite form, and stared me in the very face, the instinct of Nature made me shrink from it. I feared, however, that the breeze might reach us too late. There were sunken rocks running for some distance out into the sea—here might be seen the black point of one rising out of the water—there a patch of foam, marking where another lay. We were already among them—we were in danger every moment of striking; and, if we did, there was but small hope of our lives—for the schooner could not hold long together, and no boat could live through the surf. There was a rock close under us—so close, I had not noticed it before. 'Give way! give way!' shouted one of the pirates. 'Give way! or we're on that sea! Give way! give way for your lives!'

The men in the boats strained at their oars. There was a hurrying along the deck, for they scarce knew what they did; some of them were pale with fear, others flushed with wild excitement.

'Give way! give way! give way for your lives! But, by —, it's too late!'

She rises on a wave; it carries her along; down she comes again;—a crash like an earthquake shakes her fore and aft. She has struck!

The breezes came rolling towards us; our topsails filled. The sails were put aback; but she remained fast, crashing on the rocks, her sides gored and torn by their jagged points. She filled rapidly and, as she did so, her bow being fast, she settled down by the stern. She could not hold on long—the weight of water must soon part her amidship. When the men who were in the boats saw that the ship was likely to break up, they attempted to cut the line by which they had been towing her, so that they might retain possession of the boats; but, before they could effect their purpose, they were hauled the side by those on board.

Wild confusion now pervaded the ship. The spirit room had been forced, and many of the pirates were in a state of brutal intoxication. They crowded the boats. One of them was filled; but she had hardly left the ship's side when she swamped and sank. Some of the men regained the ship—the rest were drowned. The pirate captain jumped into the other boat. He was followed by some of the others; each had a pistol in his left hand, a drawn cutlass in his right. Some more attempted to enter—they were shot down—some of them dead. They shoved off. They had got two boat-lengths from the ship, when two of the pirates were seen standing on the bulwarks, stripped to the waist, with naked cutlance between their teeth. They waved their hands, and jumped into the sea. Others threw off their coats and followed. In the crowded state in which it was, the boat could make but little way. The overtook her. They had the advantage of numbers—those in the boat the advantage of position. Two of them got into the boat; they grappled with two of the others. One of them succeeded in hurli his antagonist into the sea; the other two rolled over the gunwale together. More of them got in—each as he did so, turning on those in the water. To add to the fearfulness of the scene, the pirates who remained in the ship—that they might obtain the boat for themselves—seized their muskets, and fired on indiscriminately. The sky became overcast; but the black outline of the boat could still be distinguished. Terrible oaths and frightful yells rent the air. No a pistol-flash reveals a bloody and distorted face falling back in the boat—now, two dark forms struggling in the water, striving which will send the other first into eternity. One dreadful cry—the boat is sunk! The sounds of horror die away—the gurgling shriek of one solitary sinking wretch alone is heard—then all is still!

The ship swayed violently on the rock—her timbers creaking so that I thought every moment it would part. I found two small spars on the low deck, and lashed myself between them—having, I prevent their being taken from me, possessed myself of the musket of one of the pirates who had been shot. I prepared to throw myself into the water. I was already on the bulwark, when, with a terrific noise, she parted. Down, down I sank with her—the sea closing over me with a fearful rush. I thought I never would rise again; but the buoyancy of the spars bore me up. Breathless and exhausted I reached the surface. I heard cries around me; but could distinguish nothing in the darkness. The waves bore me along—now sweeping over me, now raising me out of the water to the waist;—but such was their violence that one of the spars, to which I had tied myself, broke loose; and before I could lay hold of it, it was swept away: the other was too small to sustain me, and I sank. By a vigorous exertion of my hands and feet, however, I rose again and supported myself for some time. But again I sank. When I rose, I was close to the shore; my strength was failing. I could scarcely move my arms. I felt myself sinking, when a wave swept me on before it, and dashed me on the shore. When it recoiled, I found myself on a sandy beach. The next wave did not reach where I lay; but another might. I quickly unloosed the rope which bound me to the spar, and crept farther up. I was beyond the reach of the waves, and laid myself down, faint and weary, in the cleft of a rock.

I tried to sleep, but in vain. I was too cold and sick; my head was dizzy with the wild excitement of the past hour. I even began to think that my mind was wavering; for I believed I heard loud oaths and yells, as of some one in his death-struggle. And yet I was conscious that they could exist only in my own imagination; for if any of the pirate crew still survived they must long ago have reached the shore.

At length a glimmering light overspread the sky—it was beginning to dawn. I lay beneath an overhanging cliff, which, encircling a small sandy bay, reached in two rocky points out into the sea. The waves still came thundering on the shore; there was a trizzling rain falling; the sky was dark and lowering. I tried to rise, but my limbs were torpid and chill. After one or two efforts, however, I succeeded; and found, once on my feet, that I could walk a little. The shore all along was strewn with pieces of the wreck, casks, boxes, and spars; and here and there the bodies of some of the pirates. On the beach, beside me, was the larger of the two boats. I started back, for at my feet, half protruding beneath her gunwale, the pirate captain lay a mangled corpse. He had held on to the boat when she sank; she had risen again to the surface, and he had been carried ashore with her; but she had fallen bottom upwards, jamming him between her gunwale and the beach. The cries I had heard had not, then, been the work of my imagination, but a dreadful reality. There was a hollow where he lay, as if he had been trying to scoop himself from under the boat. His arms were stretched out before him, his hands grasping the sand; his body was half turned round, as if he had made the last effort to extricate himself; his head hung back; his eye was staring open; his teeth were set; his hair was clotted with blood.

I turned away. Coming down the face of the cliff were four or five curiously-dressed figures. They were Araucanians. They had seen the vessel on the coast the previous day, anticipated her fate, and had now come down to share the spoil.

They took me to their village. I lived among them for six weeks, when, some of the tribe being about to proceed to Valparaiso with cattle, I obtained permission to accompany them.

I remained in Valparaiso for eighteen months. But I could stay no longer; the place was too much associated with the memory of her whom I had loved. I left it; but wherever I went she haunted me still.

What was her fate I never knew. I never saw her more. And yet, why should I say that? Often, often do I see her. Often does her smile support me when tempted to yield to despair; often does her sweet voice cheer me when my heart is low. Often do I see her in all the sweetness of that summer evening, when her eyes filled with tears, and she turned her face away as I told her that I loved her. Often does she hover in dreams round my pillow—now we sit with arms entwined beneath the orange tree, where the crystal lake reflects the myrtle and the mantling vine—again we wander together through some shady grove, and listen to the murmuring of brooklets and the melody of birds. I would not resign these visions for aught the world could give; and yet, they are but dreams!

A SECOND WALK IN PRAGUE.

BEFORE leaving Prague, I determined to see the spot from which it is said to derive its origin—the Wysserad. But, first, I was led in another direction by some friends of mine. We went along the new quay called the Franzens-quai, after the late Emperor Francis; and in his honour it is adorned by a very handsome monument. It is seventy-four feet high, and rises out of a great octagonal fountain, from which the water pours in beautiful fulness. It is hollow, open on the four sides, and exposes to view an equestrian statue of the monarch. Below him are eight columns, bearing figures symbolical of arts, science, and commerce; lower still, are fifteen figures, representing the fifteen circles or provinces of Bohemia. The quay appeared to us a much more agreeable walk than any which we had ever seen of a similar kind in a town. This arises, I think, from Prague's not being so great a capital as to have banished, by stone and brick and pavement, every picturesque adjunct of country life from the Moldau. There are in it large écloses, or weirs, by which mills are turned. It has several pretty garden-covered islands, where, in the evening, bands of music play, and people go to take coffee and ices. The side opposite to that on which we were is attractive with the residences and gardens of the nobility, and is crowned by the finely-planted hill of the Lorenzberg.

Thither we bent our steps. We crossed by a very ornamental chain bridge to that part of the city called the Klein Seite, which may, I suppose, be named its west-end, or fashionable quarter. Our purpose was to take a walk in the park of Prince Kinaky; and no sooner did we approach its handsome gates than a burly porter in livery threw them open to us, bowing as if he had been waiting there solely for our convenience. This obliging Prince admits the public on holidays, and strangers at all times, to his grounds. They are kept in better order than any I have seen in Germany; and I have beheld none so beautifully situated as these. They lie on the north side of the hill of the Lorenzberg, which is ascended by winding roads and paths. The villa, a large modern one, is about half way up; a great deal higher are the conservatories; and far above all are great rocks, left in their natural state, for those who choose to climb. From these we had an enchanting view of the city; and as we silently contemplated it, music from the band of a regiment, passing along a street deep down below us, arose, so softened to our ears, that we could listen to it with pleasure, and forgot that it had aught to do with the horrid din of war.

When we descended from our elevation, and returned to the town, we went into a restaurant for some refreshment. This I mention on account of the amusement the payment afforded some of our party, new to Austrian money. Biscuits, ices, lemonade for four, paid for by several bank-notes! Yes. Our bank-notes were of the value of ten kreutzers, or fourpence! I was told that sometimes the peasants had to tear these notes in half, when they had smaller sums to pay than ten kreutzers; and those paper rags passed current!

One of my friends wished to look at another new monument in Prague, erected to a German monarch; and we re-crossed the river for that purpose. I had seen it frequently in my walks, and always certainly with a degree of interest which I could not feel for the man whom they have delighted to honour on the Franzens-quai. One hears everywhere, on inquiring about old edifices and foundations, of Charles the Fourth, Emperor of Germany and King of Bohemia. He seems to have done more for Prague than any other of its sovereigns. He built that part of the city called the Neustadt, or New Town; and the monument to him stands close to three of his great works—the Bridge, the Metropolitan Church, and the University. The latter was founded by him in 1348; and it was to commemorate the fifth centenary of that event that the monument was intended. It is thirty feet high, twelve of them being in the king's statue, which surmounts the whole. He has in the right hand a roll—the grant for the founding of the University; the left hand rests on his sword. In four Gothic niches beneath are statues symbolical of the four Faculties. It is altogether a noble and suitable decoration for the spot on which it stands. It was completed just before 1848, but remained covered up with deal boards until the proper day in that year for its solemn inauguration. At least it was so intended. But there come sudden events which sport with the intentions of men and monarchs. It was very quietly unboarded in 1849. When the day appointed in the previous year for the great ceremony came round, Prague's students were fighting with Austrian troops, defending against them the barricades on the bridge; and the people of Prague were in tumult in that fine street, which cuts through the new town, called the Wenzelplatz. It is decorated in one place by a statue of King Wenzel; in another, by the eternal Saint Nepomuk. Around these, many stormy and bloody scenes took place in 1848. An unfortunate accident precipitated the rising of the people, and was made use of to exasperate the Austrians. This was the death, by a chance shot, of the Princess Windisgratz, daughter of Prince Schwarzenberg. Hostilities between the people and soldiers being thus accelerated, the latter were the more speedily successful.

From the Emperor's monument, we walked to the Clementinum—the colossal building of the Jesuits. About the middle of the sixteenth century, Ferdinand the First brought them to Prague, to be a counterpoise to the Hussites; and he gave them the Dominican cloister of St. Clemens. To this they did not long confine themselves. Their boundaries were continually swelling out, until their possessions brought them an income of two millions and a-half of florins. But in 1618, the States or Parliament of Bohemia commanded them to leave the country. Five years afterwards, another party being in power, they were recalled. Again, before ten years had passed, they were ordered to depart, when the Saxons had successfully invaded Bohemia. But the end of the terrible thirty years' war came; and in this part of Germany at least the Imperialists were successful. How they used their success is too well known. And now the Jesuits came back to Prague, and set to their work in earnest—the work of completing their vast building. It occupies one side of a street; has three gates, seven courts, four large and two small towers; and includes two churches and two chapels, besides the cloisters and colleges of the order. To obtain ground for all that, there were given up two narrow streets, seven small squares, two gardens, thirty-two houses, three churches, and a Dominican convent. However, after all the labour of those clever heads and toiling hands, the Jesuits were once more ordered to depart—to leave Bohemia for Bohemia's good; and their great building was secularised. This was in 1773, by the Emperor Joseph the Second. Since it came into the hands of the State, it has been divided into various departments, for scientific and artistic purposes. One of the uses, not contemplated by the Austrian Government, was, that a part of the Clementinus should serve the insurgents of '48 as a prison-house for the Imperial Governor, Count Leo Thun. He was arrested by them at the corner of a street near it.

There I thought fit to leave my friends, and fulfil my intention of visiting the Wysserad; but it was too far to walk there, and I took a carriage. As I drove along thinking of all that I had seen and of the persons whom I had met in Prague—natives of the place or residents in it—I did not wonder at what I had remarked in them that they eschewed all conversation on political matters. The wounds which have been dealt their patriotism is yet too fresh to bear any handling; and if here patriotic feeling has been crushed, in other parts of Germany aspirations towards political freedom have been as ruthlessly stifled. Everywhere the Germans seem to me in that exhausted state—wanting all energy—which follows unsuccessful revolt against despotism; and even where did I hear, in families, of rebel sons and brothers who had found a refuge in the United States. From the thoughts I was diverted by observing that I was now in a part of the city that was new to me—the long, pleasant suburb of the Wysserad, poorer-looking than the Jewish quarter, which I had visited, but not so dirty as that.

I was driven to the citadel, which is now properly the Wysserad. But this high hill, at the foot of which the town lies, was once the seat of all the grandeur that belonged to Bohemia in the early ages of her history. I am told that a queen was the foundress of the monarch and that she took for her husband a peasant from the plough. Afterwards it was the custom, on the death of a sovereign, for the leaders of the people to assemble a field before the Wysserad, and elect a new king from among themselves. He was carried in triumph into the castle on this hill, placed on the stone seat of Libussa, the ancient queen, and his investiture was made by putting on his feet the shoes, and on his shoulders the wall of her ploughman husband;—a simple ceremony, which may have been served very significant to any true king—any true servus servorum. Here were held the assemblies of the Estates of Bohemia, and here justice was administered. It is called, in the early national poems of the country, 'Libussa's Judgment Hall'; and one of the chiefs of the olden time chanted a song in its honour, beginning, 'Hail thou, our sunlight! stout Wysserad!' Charles the Fourth surrounded it with new walls and towers. But in this castle his son, King Wenzel, or Wenceslaus, we name him, underwent excitement and alarm, which are said to have been the cause of his death. To the valiant Zisca, the one-eyed—who was afterwards the victor in a hundred fights, and who had been his chamberlain—the king is said to have acknowledged that, had he the power, he would avenge the disgrace inflicted on Bohemia by the execution of Huss at Constance. Zisca left the court, sounded the disposition of the people, and soon brought the assembled burghers of Prague, well armed to the Wyserad, before the king, to whom they cried, 'Here we are, O king, with our weapons! Show us the enemy; we will fight for thee!' But Wenzel, filled with fear at what had been done, ordered them to disarm. He could not, however, cause his commands to be obeyed, and then ensued those scenes of violence in the city which terrified him to death. He was succeeded by his brother, Schiund, between whom and the terrible Zisca began that series of contests and bloody reprisals which lasted for five years.

On the very spot on which I stood, many fearful incidents of the varying fortune of the war had taken place—on this spot, so rich in ancient legends! And what is it now? The hill is crowned by the high, dark, ugly walls of the arsenal. Not a tree, hardly a patch of green grass, was to be seen. All was as still, and dreary, and stupid, as it could be made by the Austrian police. 'Never mind!' I said to myself. 'Fret not thyself because of the ungodly! Get on that elevation, and look away from this dull hill. Look, while the glow of the setting sun is on the town, as it lies there below you! Look at the gold tints trembling on the trees of the Lorenzberg! Behold the Hradschin, with the Cathedral, and all its buildings and towers! The new town, the river, the islands—music ascending from their gardens—make a striking contrast to the dismal quiet of the Wyserad Hill. Hear, now, the bells! First one, then another, and another, and another; every bell voice—soprano, tenor, bass!' They make, together, an evening concert very delightful to the ear at this distance.

As I must descend from this height—so poetic in its nature, so stupid in its present. The poor suburb was at first dingy and ill-lighted; by degrees it brightened—brightened on to the gaudy day of streets with numerous people filled with men and officers amusing themselves with billiards and dominoes—brightened on still, for now I came to many others enlivened by music and the society of ladies. I returned to my hotel by the brilliant Wenzelplatz, lighted by two rows of gas-lamps down each side, and six great gas candelabra down the centre. This made a great deal of glare. Still, there seemed to me a want of more light in Prague; for, when I took up the newspaper in the hotel, I found this paragraph:—'Prague, June 25. Government has forbidden the bringing out of the fifth volume of Palazky's History of Bohemia.' All who know that the revered historian has by his efforts discovered hitherto unused and unsuspected sources for the History of George of Podiebrad, will deeply regret the loss to science caused by this prohibition. But they, also, who know the learned nature of the work—that it is adapted solely for the most enlightened circles—will find it difficult to understand the necessity for it. M. M. L.

VICTOR AND VANQUISHED.

Owe, crown'd the victor with a loud acclaim
Of sullen multitudes who laud his name,
Dying in flash of seeming triumph;—here
Lay his proud plume and sword upon his bier!

One, smitten with defeat and life-long scorn—
Poor, lonely since his dreary natal morn;
Haunted by fears lest Heaven might fail to save;—
Lay him in silence humbly in his grave!

There, as they lie beneath the cold bright stars—
That deck'd with trophies, this with slime and scars;
Clasp hands, divided brothers! Let dead eyes
Wait the same dawn of peace beyond the skies!

J. W. E.

MODERN ENGLISH HISTORY.*

WE are desirous to start on friendly terms with our readers, and therefore we warn them that the following observations—which, within our moderate limits, must necessarily be brief as well as very general—are not to be regarded so much as a critical examination of the work that has suggested them, as desultory reflections, not perhaps very valuable or very novel, which, however, we think the present a fitting opportunity of recording in our pages.

We have no difficulty in announcing our opinion that true or reliable English history has been written for the first time within the last thirty years. The various histories of this period are as different from those which preceded them as can well be conceived, considering that the object of both is the same—viz. the truthful relation of events, and correct appreciation of the character of the actors in these events. Though entertaining this opinion, we are not forgetful of the merits of Hume, or of his predecessors and more immediate successors in the field of English history; nor do we intend to convey the slightest doubt of any historian's determination to write honestly according to his own convictions. No historian is intentionally untruthful. He cannot—dare not embody falsehood in his narrative. On the contrary, we are satisfied that he sifts and considers evidence, and draws conclusions, with what he deems strict logic and candid veracity. We are satisfied that he narrates events as he conscientiously believes them to have occurred; and that he sketches characters with what he regards as scrupulous justice. Why, then, do we decline to concede to English history, prior to the period we have indicated, those qualities of truth and reliability without which history is a fable or a romance?

It is only within this recent period that writers have resorted to the true sources of faithful and reliable history—contemporary letters and family and private documents. Look at the authorities referred to by Hume! They are either previous narratives or published State papers. The mass of written testimony, in public and private libraries and in family archives, he never examined. Before him, the materials he used had been used by other writers; and with these materials he was content. The great distinction between him and his predecessors, as well as the great merits of his narrative, may be ascribed chiefly to the older writers having examined their authorities with a view to support their own preconceived opinions, or under the influence of strong political feelings; while Hume brought to his examination of the same authorities, the calm and almost impartial investigation of a philosopher. He approached their consideration without having formed a previous opinion of the results to which his labours might lead. He commenced these labours as an independent as well as a philosophical historian. During his progress, his feelings may have frequently influenced his judgment. He may have drawn conclusions neither strictly just nor altogether free from a bias which, perhaps, to himself was not perceptible. But we give him credit for an honest belief that his conclusions were fully warranted by the authorities before him. And when he presented these conclusions to the public in his animated narrative and chaste and graceful language, the public for the first time perused a history of England of singular distinctness and elegant diction, which, with all its shortcomings—and after undergoing the ordeal of a century's criticism—still fascinates its readers.

* 'The Popular History of England.' By Charles Knight. Vol. VIII.—London: Bradbury & Evans. 1892.

State papers, before the present century, were generally written to conceal motives, to defend reprehensible acts, to blacken or brighten historical characters, to obtain or secure advantages over others. They are, therefore, deceptive sources of information to the writer who exclusively relies on them. Treaties, again, are the dry embodiment of negotiations, exhibiting none of the motives of the negotiators, or of their secret instructions, or of their own and their employers' characters, or of the means by which they accomplished the success of their measures, or defeated those of an opponent. Yet such papers and treaties, the contents of 'Rymer's Fœdera,' 'Thurloe's State Papers,' and similar collections, were the materials on which Hume constructed his interesting narrative. On no such limited foundation does the modern historian require to base his labours. England is full to overflowing of family correspondence, family documents, and family narratives. Scarcely a historical name is now without its illustrative collection. And to show the extreme importance of these materials of history, it has only to be mentioned that the nobles and commons of England have, since the days of King John, been more largely, more continuously, and more intimately mixed up with the management of her affairs than the people of any other European kingdom. In addition to these collections, also, the archives of the nation have been thrown open to every inquirer; and even facilities for inspection have been and are daily afforded to historical students. And he who has examined the various treasures, now so accessible, will readily bear witness that they have changed the popular opinion of many actors in our historical drama, and have enabled the readers of the present day to form very accurate notions of the men and events of bygone times. How many corrective touches in his portraiture, how many qualifying or expanding observations and illustrations in his narrative, would have found their way into Hume's history, had he written in 1862 instead of 1752!

The present age demands and therefore obtains from its historical writers thorough research among original letters and documents. This is the spirit of the time—its form and pressure; and by it these writers are influenced, if not guided. It is quite possible that they may not be aware of, and may not acknowledge, this influence over their thoughts and writings; but its presence is nevertheless apparent in both. Accordingly we find, on the part of modern writers, an extensive and generally impartial examination of original documents, which is not observable in the histories of our older writers, who, having the stereotyped materials before them, and being pretty well acquainted with their nature and bearings beforehand, set themselves to build on these materials a fabric of their own construction, and garnished with their own devices. Thus, prior to the time of Hume, Echard and Carte wrote histories as if determined to exalt absolutism and defend tyranny; while Rapin, Burne and others, saw nothing amiss or requiring amendment in the imperfect monarchy they found. Hume, however, approached his subject in a philosophic spirit, evincing independent judgment and sound reflection, and avoiding both extremes of his predecessors; but the materials he consulted were limited and did not enable him even to enter into, much less to develop, the inner life of history. Beside the tendency or tone of his age was to philosophize upon, rather than to inquire into, the character and events of our country's annals. Before he commenced his work, his whole life had been spent in philosophical pursuits; and his opinions, which were those of an inquiring philosopher, had been fully formed. Accordingly, his exquisite narrative exhibits his own philosophical spirit and that of his time in every page. That spirit has disappeared, as our times require thorough investigation of original letters and documents, and thorough sifting of the evidence they afford, as well as clear and honest deduction from all the facts ascertained. Hence we secure greater truthfulness, greater accuracy of portraiture, juster appreciation of events. Macaulay affords illustration of our argument. His researches appear to have penetrated every corner where testimony was to be found (and into some corners where, we think he should not have looked for, or at all events used the testimony he found); and the result is a lively graphic narrative, placing many characters and events in a very different light from that in which previous historians had left them. 'Tis true that he had almost untrodden field before him; for Smollett's continuation of Hume is a hasty, inaccurate compilation written at the command and for the pay of the booksellers. And our old friend Campbell the poet mockingly issued his Annals, in continuation of Smollett, as an anonymous work. Mrs. Catherine Macaulay's history is a series of extravagant tales, as Belsham's work is rabid and shallow and one-sided; both writers having commenced and completed the labours with a view to illustrate their own peculiar political theories.*

Had our space permitted, we would have asked our readers' indulgence for a particular application of the few preceding remarks to the historical writing of the present century—Mackintosh, Lingard, Macaulay, Hallam, Palgrave, Mahon, Froude, Massey, and others, as well as for a brief examination of the individual merits—contrasting them with their more popular predecessors; but we find that for the present at least we must content ourselves with the limited illustration of our argument afforded by the History of Hume. Perhaps, in regard to the contrast alluded to, it is not very necessary that we pursue it farther, for, most fortunately for the interests of truth, modern readers require truthfulness and accuracy of statement, founded on ample research and judicious examination of original documents, much more than elegant writing and graphic portraiture. In these essential qualities, the histories of our own time commend themselves to most favourable notice, a few more so than the 'Popular History' of Charles Knight.

We have failed to convey to our readers the impression made on our own mind, if anything more.

* Mrs. Macaulay's 'History of England from James I. to the Brunswick Succession' was published in 1783, in 8 4to volumes. Belsham's 'History of Britain,' in 12 vols. 8vo., in 1806.

were now required to be said by us than that this history fully and satisfactorily develops the characteristics we have ascribed to the narratives of modern writers. The concluding volume comprises our annals from 1812 to 1849, but our opinion refers to its predecessors as well as to it. We briefly, then, and deliberately state, that the whole work affords abundant evidence of the author's careful consultation and judicious use of the varied, ample, and reliable authorities to which he has had recourse—of intelligent truthfulness—of sound reflection—of flowing diction—and of a cautious spirit of observation, more inclined to extenuate delinquencies than to 'set down aught in malice.' It is almost superfluous to add that a manly moral tone, an independent, calm examination and impartial dissection of conflicting testimony, pervade the work. We may therefore safely assure our readers that the narrative now completed in the elegant volume before us, eminently fulfils its title—'The Popular History of England: An Illustrated History of Society and Government from the earliest period to our own times.'

We cannot part with the work, whose progress we have watched with no slight interest since its commencement, without asking our readers to peruse the following brief extracts, from a postscript to the narrative, which have touched our sympathies, as strikingly illustrative of the simple candour, the upright judgment, and the warm heart of the generous author. He seems to have finished his interesting labours with mixed feelings, akin to those of the historian of the 'Decline and Fall.' 'Between the years of eleven and twelve at night I wrote the last lines of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden on the banks of Lake Leman, says Gibbon, who, after referring to his 'joy on the recovery of his freedom and perhaps the establishment of his fame,' gave way to an irrepressible feeling of pain as he thoughtfully added—'I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion.'

'I have thus (says Mr. Knight) completed a labour of seven years, in writing the history of my country from the Roman period to a remarkable epoch of the reign of Queen Victoria. With a reverent heart, I thank the Supreme Controller of all human designs that He has permitted me, in reaching a prolonged term of the life of man, to carry forward my purpose to its close.

'In referring, from time to time, to the irrevocable results of this long-continued occupation—irrevocable, because this history, of four thousand pages, has been produced at periodical intervals, thus precluding the power of revising it as a whole—I am conscious of errors that might have been corrected under other circumstances; but I am not conscious of any material want of harmony between the earlier and the later portions—certainly of no essential discordance of principles and feelings. Whatever may be the defects of this narration—stretching over nineteen hundred years of recorded time, and comprehending a vast body of facts, of whose quantity and varied character the indexes, full as they are, will give an inadequate conception—I am warranted in saying that it is the only complete history of England—a library history and not a school history—which is the production of one writer. With the exception of three chapters, the "Popular History" has been wholly written by myself. This unity of thought, whatever may be the knowledge and ability of a historian, must have a certain value beyond what may be attained by a division of labour. Being the production of one mind, the due proportions of the narrative from the first chapter to the last, have, I trust, been maintained.

'Of the spirit which has animated me during the progress of the work, and has sustained me through the difficulties of my task, I will venture to say a few words. I had a fixed purpose in view when I commenced it. I addressed myself, not exclusively, but with a steady regard to those of either sex who were entering upon the serious duties of life. Passing from the elementary works that had been used in the course of ordinary education, there were hundreds to whom a fuller history—not dry, nor didactic, nor written with the prejudices of party or sect—would be an acquisition. Feeling my responsibilities to be increased by the fact that my duty was to impart knowledge and not to battle for opinions—my desire has been to cherish that love of liberty which is best founded upon a sufficient acquaintance with its gradual development and final establishment amongst us; to look with a tolerant judgment even upon those who have sought to govern securely by governing absolutely; to trace with calmness the efforts of those who have imperilled our national independence by foreign assault or domestic treason; but never to forget that a just love of country is consistent with historical truth; to carry forward, as far as within the power of one who has watched joyfully and hopefully the great changes of a generation, that spirit of improvement which has been more extensively and permanently called forth in the times of which this concluding volume treats than in the whole previous period from the Revolution of 1688. I doubtless have failed, in many cases, in the accomplishment of my leading purposes, but the wish to effect these objects has been always present.'

MYSTERIOUS!

I REMEMBER, Alexius, some years ago, sitting with you after dinner before a clear fire, when as yet the curtains were undrawn, and the cold gray shadows of an October evening fell across the lighted floor in long broad bands of darkness. The gloomy day was rapidly departing; wave after wave of deepening obscurity flowed through the windows. Outside were two old withered trees creaking and swaying in the noisy wind; which, although at times it died away into silence, presently woke up again, and rushed past the house with a long melancholy cadence, like the wail of a lost spirit. It was the hour when the shadows of the past gather round our thoughts; when the worldliness of the most worldly sinks before the rising within us of the truer man; when faith is not stigmatised as credulity; when the old childish apprehension of the dark and unknown returns unbidden and unbuked; when the angel of mystery stirs the pool of our hearts, and leaves behind, in the troubled waters, the undefinable sensations of a nobler, diviner life!

Busied with our thoughts, we preserved a long silence; and when you recommenced the conversation, it was with no uncongenial spirit that I heard you discoursing of ghosts, apparitions, larvæ, simulacra, visions, deceptiones visus, &c.—all those shadowy interpositions of the supernatural—those intersections of the two orbits of the material and the unearthly—those inarticulate utterances of the distressed spirit which, deprived of its usual medium of communication, seems as yet to be unacquainted with the nobler language of the soul. Learnedly you spake; and I, like Adam after the discourse of the angel, still sat, 'listening to hear.' At last, concluding your narratives, you rose from your chair; and, turning towards me with a smile, observed:—

'I despair, though I talk much about spectres, of ever seeing any. Unlike women—who, unsought, will not be won—ghosts seldom or never delight the eyes of those who chiefly wish to behold them. Where they are least valued, there they pay their visits like tax-gatherers. They are the seven months' children of the mysterious; and delight in making their appearance at a time when nobody expects them. But they have never preferred such unforeseen claims on my notice. On darkest nights; or, better, on nights streaked by such pallid cloud-muffled moonshine as deepened every shadow that lay under the hedges, or spread its ample gloom around the trees growing by the wayside; or standing alone and silent in the field, no flitting of mysterious shapes, no melancholy visage of the regretful spirit, has struck a nameless emotion of awe and terror into my blood. In vain have I called upon the "airy tongues which syllable men's names" to resume their old and weird vocation. There has been neither voice nor cry. For aught I knew, the air might have held in solution a thousand spiritual essences; but no bright precipitate of soul shot at my feet into visionary form and feature; no ancient brows of time-honoured wisdom, revered and beloved in the eyes of my youth, appeared before me, crowned with the solemn silence of the night; no sweet sister-face, wept for in the tears of childhood, flashed the instantaneous lightning of its beauty across my path and passed into the gloom. Alas! no. A maid over a washing-tub, a man gathering peas in a garden, shall suddenly come face to face with the Unknown—shall, in their unscientific phraseology, "see something." For once in their lives they shall "shake with thoughts beyond the reaches of their souls." But you and I, my friend, must be content to walk, all our lives through, outside the charmed circle. We possess not the secret; we know not the "open sesame" of the spirit-world. The cross-tempered fairy of our nativity refused to endow us with the second sight. Our vision is basely singular and limited. For myself, if I see but an inch beyond my nose, it is the greatest length some of my good-natured friends will allow to the longitude of my observation.

'But now prepare to hear a tale of mystery. Bid the incredulous spirit avault, disperse, dissolve in thinnest air! Refuse even to be philosophically suggestive of causes for this and explanations of that. Shut your unbelieving eyes, and open your widest mouth of credulity, and see—I follow the childish formula without defending its strict accuracy of expression—what friendship pops into it. The tale is of myself and my wife—softly inexplicable, sweetly incredible; containing no sensation incidents, no flashing of stontian fire, no reverberation of sheet-iron thunder, in the desperatest abysses of interest into which the bold mind of the modern reader plunges, not to snatch but to revel in a fearful joy. Not of this complexion is my story. 'Tis merely, Hal, a strange, quiet, domestic mystery—not startling, but suggestive. A mild, tender, visionary halo of the supernatural hangs round it—a lovely light of the miraculous, like that mystical and beautiful appearance which the air assumes when the first shadows of a moonlit night mingle with and deepen in the slowly-departing glories of an autumn sunset. Pardon the apparent poetry of that long sentence. I have been thinking of my wife. The rhetoric of the lover graces yet the poor phrase of the husband.'

Saying this with a laugh, you went to the further end of the room; and, opening the doors of an old cabinet, took from a recess a chalk drawing. When you laid it before me, I had no difficulty in recognising the familiar lineaments of your countenance—the open brow, clear eye, straight nose, and firm mouth. It was a capital likeness, though a most poetical one. Throughout the whole expression floated (I can use no more significant word) an undefinable beauty and tenderness—the shadow of some ecstasy of feeling; the bloom, rose-like, of your mind, that had been converging, in dreams or softest reverie, with thoughts ethereal, transcendental. So gracious a manifestation of yourself, to tell you the truth, had seldom been vouchsafed to me. Yet occasionally I have noticed some such unusual and ideal charm in your countenance; as, when you have been under the influence of some delicious strain of music or poetry; or when your cheeks have been flushed by the eager air of the Downs, and the glowing hues of a fine sunset have met and rested in your face. Was it that your soul then glimmered in some diviner beauty through the bars of its prison; or that the lamp of the flesh had for a time suffered the immortal fire to glide, unimpeded, through its thinner and more transparent medium?

'You think it flattering?' was your remark.

'Flattering is hardly the word,' I answered. 'It is your countenance, but idealised; as if the painter, looking into the stream of imagination, had seen the Narcissus of your face peeping over his shoulder, and so portrayed it.'

'Maybe you are not far from the truth,' was your reply. 'But what will you say when I tell you that this drawing was made before the artist had seen me, and yet was meant to be a true, real likeness of your friend? What shall you say when I tell you that an unwedded wife drew this as the portrait of an irresponsible husband? What shall you say when I tell you that both husband and wife, without having heard of one another, without having spoken to one another, were yet mysteriously in love with one another, and as much convinced of that fact as those persons ought to be who, according to the advertisement, are always about to marry? What shall you—?'

'What shall I say to this, &c.? I don't know what I shall say,' I replied; 'but what I shall do is to force you gently into this arm-chair; and forbid you to stir, on pain of instant demolition by this poker, till you have unravelled the mystery.'

'Well, then, begone digression; begin sweet narrative! When I was a child, my parents took me with them on a visit to the cathedral city of —. Very vague are my recollections of our stay there. I have only an indistinct remembrance of wandering alone through the narrow streets, and stumbling by chance into the Cathedral-close. There, like an exhalation, rose before my eyes the grand old western entrance, with its rich carving, its mingled exuberance of floral and legendary device, its quaint old saints standing in their niches, with little stone canopies over their heads. Gloomily rose above these the vast bulk of the tower; and, soaring up beyond that, the cloud-piercing spire—to me apparently rising of its own will into the heavens, so light, so airy and graceful was the structure. I remembered that I tired my eyes and strained my neck in looking up at it. Who can tell what thoughts stir vaguely but powerfully in the heart of a child? I had some notion even then that that slender spire was meant to symbolise the religious aspirations of the soul; and to show how, like that stone-imprisoned flame, the fire of the heart should burn and mount towards heaven. When I had tired myself with looking at the outside of the Cathedral, I opened the door of the porch and peeped in. But the great dusky nave, with its range of slender pillars, daunted me. I was but a young lad, remember! and the idea of walking alone in that abyss of building—all its vast silences huddling on my young imagination a thousand suggestive terrors—was so repulsive, that I gave the place but a cursory, half-startled look, and returned in haste to the hotel where my parents were staying.

'Years passed away. Many fresh remembrances pushed aside my old childish impressions. They returned, indeed, at intervals; but I thought little of them, and seldom invited their recurrence. Consequently, there was something inexplicable in the fact that, soon after I had completed my five-and-twentieth year, I began to be visited by a remarkable series of dreams, the subjects of which either repeated or implied the incident of my old visit to the Cathedral I have mentioned. I used to find myself, with grave sweet melancholy, pacing the well-swept walks which skirted the majestic pile of its eastern apse; or wandering through the solitary cloisters, whose thick-ribbed arches, as I passed along, closed up behind, and grew into vast and shapeless pyramids of stone. Once my dreams represented me in the form of a weary, worn-out, aged man, poring over the inscriptions on the tombstones in the nave—knocking with my staff at these gates of the grave, as if beseeching entrance. Then followed confusion on confusion. I was rapt here and there without will or guidance. Friendly faces, young and old, flitted past me; and I became involved in the midst of some wild turmoil of waving banners, lengthening processions of singing boys clad in white stoles, and swinging golden censers, tall stern bishops and beetle-browed black-looking priests marching solemnly along, and bending on me looks of dark displeasure—looks heavy with the weight of an eternal censure. But I let them look! A sense of happiness hereafter to come, with strange beneficent compensation, drove away effectually the shadows of that imaginary curse.

'It is true, however, that I woke, morning after morning, no nearer apparently to the solution of these visions. Nevertheless, I felt convinced that something more definite in meaning was in store for me. There must surely come play to all this prologue; some bread of truth to this sack of fancy. I bided my time, and dreamed on.

'At last there came a night on which the genius of my troubled slumbers unravelled the skein of his intentions, in shape and consistency to their meaning, and then broke me for ever. Once more I stood alone in the Cathedral choir, watching sadly the decaying fires of the day as they reddened through the painted windows. Already, overhead, the slender shafts which supported the roof shot far up into impenetrable gloom. Brown gleams of light shone along the carved oak of the choir-stalls. The gilt spikes round the tombs of cross-legged warriors and crosiered abbots began to speck the darkness with a vague dull glitter. Silence deepened; and, in awe and expectation, I seemed to be waiting for the solution of my dream. Suddenly, I know not how, the whole choir was lit up by wandering lights, springing out of the walls and swinging in cressets let down from the roof. The organ began to play; and, in a moment, choristers in their white garments appeared in their stalls, officiating priests stood up at their desks, the bishop sat on his throne, and a numerous congregation filled the pews. Then, from the singing choir, the solemn chant rose on its too harmonious wings; the shrill boy voices vied among themselves in springing into the hollow roof, where the dim silences met and hushed them into softest murmurs. In concert with them I also sang; and, at my side, reading from the same book, a young girl, veiled, took up the divine strain, and waited in its sweeter melody towards heaven. Who could she be? I turned by an irresistible influence to catch, if possible, a glimpse of her face. Even while I was in the act of so doing, methought the whole building began to swell into vast, immeasurable proportions; the great walls on either side slowly widened into deepest space; the glittering organ-pipes went travelling at a vast speed into farthest obscurity; and the east window, receding further and further, at last appeared to stop only on the verge of the horizon, and I beheld the dusky face of the remote city as if pressing against its sullen transparencies. Then, also, disappeared bishop, officiating priest, choristers, and congregation. Then, also, lifting her veil, and revealing for an instant a vision of dark melancholy eyes, pale brow overlaid by black but shiny bands of hair—a whole expression of sweet and mysterious loveliness—my companion, with mild beseeching glance, floated away into the night. Methought there was hope and the dawning of love in that lingering gaze. Within my own heart stirred the first shiver of a new awakening life; and, stretching out my hands towards the retreating vision, I vainly attempted to follow—but, with a great cry, awoke.

'I cannot tell how powerfully I was affected by that imploring look. It followed me into my usual business; looked up at me from my writing-desk; passed like a shadow between me and the book I was reading; met me round the corners of streets; found me out, like Wisdom in the market-place, and sent me abroad peeping under every bonnet with a head in it which I encountered. I have forfeited my character as a gentleman through it—I have alternated with a costermonger, and been justly reviled at a fish-stall. How could I be always explaining that I was in search of the El Dorado of a fair woman; that an elusive countenance, like some peculiar and facial ignis-fatuus, was ever dancing before me in highways and byways, in courts and corners, in a cook-shop, in a church, in Westminster Abbey among the tombs, in Whitechapel, on the dirty kerbstones—rising to sing a ballad at Evans', and beginning a lecture at the British Association? And years passed on; but I never overtook my tormenting spirit. I began to grow melancholy. My friends avoided me. They called me a man possessed—a demoniac with a fixed idea. Fixed!—why, I was chasing it all over England!

'At last, in the course of my travels, I found myself, about two years ago, at Ilfracomb. Although the season had hardly commenced, yet spring in all her beauty had long arrived. I soon became acquainted with the magic of her presence, so lavishly exhibited on all the scenery round. Oh those long, delicious, solitary walks! over green height, down flowering lanes, across clear sands and shingly, shell-piled beach!—those misty mornings, when out into the baths of the cold air I plunged, to watch from some sea-looking hill the gloomy waters brighten, as the first tremulous beams swept over them like a wind!—those shadowy evenings, when the white moon, looking all chilled and comfortless, rose over the brow of the green crags; and, hurrying across the heavens, sank low into a bank of sullen clouds, just as the day began to break! Amidst these varied delights, I began to grow a little ashamed of my late extravagant pursuits. Reason, also, convinced me that the same good genius which had inspired my dream could also bring about the fulfilment of its silent prophecy.

'I discovered a quiet retired spot among the rocks, where—like a gulf of stones, crags, boulders—the narrow beach ran up into the land, and was bounded by the slopes of lofty hills, green to their base. My favourite amusement, when I visited the place, was to lie stretched on the shelving verdure, behind a huge mass of stone standing bolt upright, and just high enough to cover me with its shadow. Here, one hot day in June, after bathing, I sat down and began to read. But my reading was such as is mildly persuasive of repose—when your mind wanders foolishly in and out of a long sentence, like a maze; when, in turning a leaf, you forget all you have just read, and suddenly discover the book to have dropped out of your hand, and yourself awaking from a half-hour's doze. It was thus with me on this particular day. Nature, also, was in the conspiracy. I remember noticing the great white clouds sailing lazily over my head; the broad belt of shining water undulating before me like some mighty snake. There were no sounds but such as strengthen silence—a flutter of life in the oreaking grass; and the sullen roar of the departing tides, “plunging backward from the land.” How long I slept I know not. What aroused me was the murmur of voices, interrupted by low bursts of laughter. I was still half asleep, and never thought of stirring. After a time, I heard these words:—

“And so you really dreamed of being married! How delightful! When, did you say?”

“About three months ago; when you were staying at Aunt Hannah’s.”

“How clear and thrilling fell the words on my ear! When had I heard that voice before? It went on:—

“I dreamed that I was ranged in line before the altar rails, along with my father, yourself, a strange gentleman, and the equally strange bridegroom. I had never seen him before, I felt convinced; yet I feel as if I admired him. Is there anybody about?—these men are so vain! I felt as if I liked him. Let me whisper it in your most secret ear—I felt as if I loved him!”

“Bravo, Clara! Well, I never! Love a man you have never seen!”

“I assure you I did not at all feel the inconsistency in my dream. The sweet compulsion of marrying a perfect stranger came so strangely recommended by his own generous good looks; by an indefinable persuasion that mine was a heaven-appointed union; and, above all, by the perfect acquiescence of my dear good father in the entire proceeding, that I never gave a single thought to the strangeness of my position. Besides, you know, nothing surprises us in dreams. It was with all possible willingness that I held out my left-hand finger for the ring; and was heartily vexed when, just as he was going to pronounce the mystical words, I heard Susan opening the door, and saying—‘I have brought your hot water, miss.’”

“How very provoking!” answered the other. “But I am very glad your spectre bridegroom was good-looking. Can you describe his face?”

“I can do better. I can show you a little chalk drawing, which I finished this morning when mamma and you left me to receive that tiresome good old Mrs. Smith. I have it with me in my sketch-book.”

“The two voices were silent. Obeying an uncontrollable impulse, I rose on my feet and looked over the upright stone I have mentioned. Just below, on a ledge of the rock against which I was leaning, were seated two young ladies examining the aforesaid chalk drawing. The face of one was plainly visible. No; I had never dreamed of that quiet gentle countenance. But who was the other—the artist—bending over her drawing in graceful attitude? I must behold her face at all hazards. It is not rudeness; it is necessity. Now or never will I lay this haunting spirit, unpossess my soul of its beautiful demon, annihilate the fair and fatal Frankenstein of my dreams. “Your pardon, ladies! You are so near me that, with a little exertion, I stretch out my hand and take from under your eyes this likeness of—myself!”

“The younger sister shrieked. The other, whose countenance flushed all over with high indignant colour, turned round and looked me full in the eyes. As she looked, the angry suffusion passed away from her face—the angry words died in broken murmurs on her lips.

“It is Providence,” I said, at last, “who has appointed this meeting! No accident produced the dream of your marriage or made you portray this ideal resemblance of me—your spectral husband! I, also, have been wandering England through to discover the face which, years ago, haunted my slumber, and now looks on me in all its beautiful reality. Now we have met, I care no longer. I defy Fate to part us.”

“The two sisters—though after much solicitation they gave me their name and address, yet with true English reserve; a reserve comically heightened by their half-fearful, half-incredulous sense of the mysterious—left me with grave and courteous salutation. As for me, I saw them depart without anxiety, without a wish to detain them. The game was being played out, and Fate at last had placed the winning cards in my hands. No fear of the issue. Now she had brought me so far on the way, she would not, she could not desert me.

“Nor did she. On my return home I found an old College friend waiting for me. By him, a man of an extensive acquaintance, I was introduced next day to the father of my lately discovered mistress. In six months we were married!”

A. S.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. III.

THE words and music of many of the most popular Highland songs seem very frequently to have been twin births of the one passionate experience; at least they bear, for the most part, a very striking resemblance to each other—a sort of kindred look and expression, which marks their near relationship. In them, Music and Poetry are truly wedded, till they become of one sound and nature and are helps meet for one another. Especially is this the case with the chorus and with one or two verses of the lyric—such as we may suppose might be struck off in the first heat of emotion. Sometimes, for a few lines, it would almost appear as if it were difficult to say where the music begins or the words end, they blend and fit so curiously together. This, I suppose, must be partly attributed to the nature of the Gaelic language, which, without being particularly soft, is very flexible, and full of vowel sounds. But it must also be attributed, in a certain degree, to the musical genius of the people—which I look upon as decidedly evident, and one of their prominent characteristics; though, of course, existing as yet in a very uncultured state.

The Highland melodies are often of the most touching beauty—sometimes wildly melancholy, sometimes exuberantly gay. They remind one more than anything else of what Mr. Carlyle says so happily of Burns’ songs, when he calls them ‘fitful gushes; warblings not of the voice only, but of the whole mind.’ Springing full-formed and at once out of some real emotion, the few sweet notes that form their music might pass for the plaintive or cheerful tones of some singing creatures who had been gifted indeed with melody, but denied the use of articulate language to express their overmastering feelings; and who were therefore fain to utter them as the birds do—yet with all the difference of a profound and intelligent consciousness. These little gushes of melody have passed down from age to age, exciting or soothing kindred feelings with those that were their own origin—like pure fresh fountains that look so clear and sweet they at once excite a wish to taste them in those who at the moment need them not, and help to quench the longing thirst of those who actually do. There is little or no art manifest in the arrangement or finish of these airs; they are consequently to be regarded rather as germs of sweet music than as perfect melodies. As a rule, they have but one part, which is sung over and over again throughout the whole song—no matter how long it may be. This, in English, would of course be felt extremely tedious, however sweet might sound the little fragment that had to be conned so often. So the air has been less considered in making the following translations than the poetry. In the first one retained, however, both music and meaning have been adhered to with scrupulous fidelity. This song is sung to a beautiful and winning air; which, like many other Highland tunes, requires only the delicate and reverential touch of some true genius in that charming art that speaks a language known and felt by all men to become a melody as deep, as noble, and expressive as 'Auld Robin Gray,' or 'The Flowers of the Forest,' or any other of those national and lyric gems we are all so fond and proud of. It is a pity that such a work of interest should not, at least, be attempted, as would be this development of passionate sweet sounds. May it be done some day, and done as it ought to be, discerningly and well!

THE GILLE DUBH, CIAR DUBH.*

Once o'er the wide moor wending,
Or round the green hill bending,
Gay words and wild notes blending
Spread far my good cheer;
For then my heart, light-leaping,
In waking, in sleeping,
Had no dubh, ciar dubh keeping
Its joys far from here.

Now, oh that together,
Dubh ciar dubh, dubh ciar dubh,
We faced the rude weather
On hills bleak and blue!
Some peaceful spot near me
I'd choose, and there cheer me;
No gray beard to fear me,
And thou in my view.

Thy health-draught, if drinking,
My gille dubh ciar dubh,
Mud-pools to my thinking
Like sweet wine would be;
Yet though I've no power,
If some had the power,
They'd take thy wild flower
From thee, love! from thee.

My bonny dubh ciar dubh!
Let sharp tongues assail thee,
One heart will not fail thee
That knows to be true.
Dubh ciar dubh! dubh ciar dubh!
Though poor, poor thou be,
No rich old man can please me
Like thee, love! like thee.

My gille dubh! kind one!
I never will leave thee;—
I'd choose thee, believe me,
Amid thousands five;
Should they stand on the heather,
All ranged there together,
Like thee should I find none
With whom I could live.

In sadness oft sleeping,
I wake up, half weeping,
Such wild dreams come creeping
Over me, dear!

* Pronounced 'Gille doo, keear doo.' 'Gille' means a young man, and 'dubh, ciar dubh,' dark, dusky dark.

I've heard the old folks say
That grief makes the hair gray;
Then, gille dubh! this love may
Make mine so, I fear.

This song was composed by a lady. I don't know whether it spoils the sentiment, or gives it another interest rather, to be told that one who sung so sweetly and loved so well did actually marry her 'gille dubh ciar dubh' in the end. Such is said to have been the fact, at all events.

The love of place is a marked characteristic of the Scottish people. Perhaps in no other country in the world, except Palestine, has the scenery of the native land been ever sung of with so much impassioned ardour. Almost all our distinguished poets have done something in this line; and I dare say every one of our nameless bards has at least added his mite to this treasury of national glory. It was one of Burns' principles of composition to 'sing auld Coila's plains and fells,' and nobly has he done so. Whatever place he and Sir Walter have touched, they may be said to have made interesting for ever.

I am very happy to be able to give the following verses in this place, as they celebrate a fair and beautiful island—the ancient home of the Macdonalds, and the home of many a brave and worthy man and kind good woman since—though it has, so far as I know, been till now unknown to song, by name at least. It has been said, I believe, that Islay never produced a bard. This is by no means the case. Though none of the more celebrated poets, whose works have been collected and published, were born there, some of the sweetest songs and finest music now floating ownerless in the Highlands first saw the light in Islay. I myself heard a native of that island—a poor man, a keeper of cattle—sing, more than once, a most spirited song of his own, full of poetical description, and overflowing with cordial affection. It was composed in honour of his master's son, absent in India; and was alike creditable to the head and heart of its humble author. Nor is this a rare exception. Whether the author of the song now given deserved to be called a bard or not, I do not feel called upon to determine. At any rate, he loved his 'mother Islay' warmly. Let his affection, then, consecrate the little lyric that enshrines it. In Gaelic, the name of this island is spelled without an s—Ilà. How the s came into it in our English spelling I am not aware; but I adhere to our ordinary orthography at present.

O Islay! sweet Islay!
Thou green, grassy Islay!
Why, why art thou lying
So far o'er the sea?
O Islay! dear Islay!
The daylight is dying,
And here am I longing,
And longing for thee!

O Islay! fair Islay!
Thou dear mother Islay!
Where my spirit, awaking,
First look'd on the day,
O Islay! dear Islay!
That link of God's making
Must last, till I wing me
Away, and away!

Dear Islay! good Islay!
Thou holy-soll'd Islay!
My fathers are sleeping
Beneath thy green sod.
O Islay! kind Islay!
Well well be thou keeping

That dear dust, awaiting
The great day of God.
Old Islay! God bless thee,
Thou good mother Islay!
Bless thy wide ocean!
And bless thy sweet loe!
And Islay, dear Islay!
My heart's best emotion
For ever and ever
Shall centre in thee!

The following extract, from Mr. Campbell's 'West Highland Tales,' may be read with some interest in connection with the above:—

'No Highlander, if his friends can help it, is buried anywhere but at home. Coffins may be seen on board the steamers, conveying to the outer islands the bodies of those who have died on the mainland. It is a poetic wish to be buried amongst friends, and one that is in full force in the Highlands to this day. The curse of Scotland may occasionally intrude even on such solemn occasions; but a funeral is almost always decorously conducted. In some places, as I am told, a piper may still be seen at the head of the funeral procession, playing a dirge. There is no want of reverence; but death is treated as an ordinary event. I have seen a man's tombstone, with a blank for the date, standing at the end of his house while he was quite well. It was lately said of a man who went home to die, "he took his own body home," and so he did.'—Vol. i., p. 235.

There is a much-admired production of the Celtic muse that goes by the name of 'Mali bheag Og,' which may be rendered 'Young little May.' Who the author of it was, I don't think has been well ascertained. Its story is nearly the same as that of the ballad of 'Kirkconnel Lea,' and resembles in some respects the Laureate's 'Oriana.' The slaying of young and lovely women accidentally, forms the theme of several of Ossian's episodes; one of which, at least—that of 'Fainasollis and Mayro Borb, the King of Sorcha's Son,' or 'Stormy Borbar,' as Macpherson calls him—has all the appearance of considerable antiquity, as may be plainly enough seen from a version of it published in Appendix 15 to the Highland Society's Report on the Poems of Ossian. Indeed, this most heart-rending misfortune is one which we might expect sometimes to hear of in a state of society where the red genius of war appeared armed and openly at the board, the hearth, the trysting tree, the hunting field, as well as in his own more legitimate scenes, where the softer sex might escape meeting with his valourship. What can we conceive more natural than wrath driving fiery and inflamed spirits, with the tools of death always at their command, into instant and ill-placed strife; and women, as they would be sure to do, shrieking, and throwing themselves before the weapons? More than one strong man must, in past days, have felt his angry soul frozen into despair from hot fury in a moment when he saw the tender breast his hand had blindly wounded sobbing out its life-blood; and the poor pale face he liked the most to look upon turned forgivingly upon him, in the last gleam of life's reflection, full of love and pity that were inextinguishable by death.

The hero of this melancholy Gaelic song we have now to do with met his mistress clandestinely on a Sunday evening, in a lonely glen near her father's house. Her kinsmen waylaid him; and, furious at his attempt to carry off their relative, attacked him with their swords in her presence. She rushed between her friend and her angry brethren, and was killed by a chance blow of her lover's hand. He was immediately taken prisoner, confined, and condemned to death. The night before his execution he sang as follows:—

MALI BHEAG OG.

Canst thou feel for a captive's sigh,
Young little May!
Condemn'd by thy friends to die,
Young little May!
Though thy soft eye of heaven's blue,
Thy lip of the honey dew,
Never more now can bless my view,
Young little May!
Oh, the sad trusts that fatal day!
My own little May!
Its blood will not wash away,
Poor little May!
Why, before thy sweet, startled face,
Just touch'd by thy meek embrace,
Did our fell foes beset my trace,
Dear little May!
'Twas for thee that I trembled then,
Kind little May!
Though surrounded by cruel men,
Sweet little May!
But oh, that some hostile blade
This hand on the ground had laid
Ere that wound in thy side it made,
Brave little May!
Then didst thou lie so low,
Pale little May!
Wild flower, that so sweet did grow,
Loved little May!
Like glimpses of the sunny glow,
In mild morning risings low,
Such brightness thy face did show,
Lost little May!
Oh, the deep love I gave thee,
My own little May!
Oh, could it not save thee,
My choice little May!
How thy hair like the sunbeam,
Thy cheek like my heart's stream,
Rejoiced my last flattering dream,
Dear little May!
Through the world I could roam away,
Loved little May!
To meet thee some distant day,
Dear little May!
I could run, I could leap then
As the deer of the mountain glen Bounds through the flashing fen,
Choice little May!
Cur'd be thy kinsmen's spite,
Sweet little May!
That forbade me thy love—thy sight,
Dear little May!
But were their love as mine is, dear!
Oh! ne'er had I languish'd here,
Wringing this bitter tear,
Bright little May!
Yet now were I safe from death,
Dear little May!
Cumbrous would be my breath,
Sweet little May!
Much better to die, and go
Where no blood—where no blood can flow,
O my God! than thus wall thee low,
Dead little May!

THOMAS PATTISON.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK
13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St
Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDIE WICKS'S

MISCELLANY

No. 13.]

SATURDAY, DEC. 27, 1862.

[Prior Id.

SUITED FOR THE SEASON.

BY THE EDITOR.

How oddly does it fall out that those periods of time most calculated to remind us of time's lapse, should be devoted to festivity and laughter! Yet it seems to be the usual practice of mankind to hold anniversaries merrily. The jovial Christmas, occurring as it does in December, renders that otherwise dismal month brighter and cheerfuller than May. It would seem as if summer had forsaken field, grove, and sky, in order to kindle its genial warmth in man's heart, and give out from thence its innumerable joyous carols. The daylight dies early; but Christmas makes the December midnight vocal as with ten thousand nightingales. Such epochs are everybody's birth-days. What more natural, as we journey along the great highway of life, than to 'rest and be thankful' at every recurring milestone—not failing, perhaps, to mark the distance we have proceeded—but still mainly intent on exchanging congratulations with our friends, lightening each other's load, brightening each other's hopes, and interchanging good wishes for the ways which must be traversed alone!

There are, in this lapsing winter of 1862, great clouds of sorrow hovering over portions of the land; but transfigured, made radiant, and cheated of their fearfullest tears and thunder, by the light of the heavenly charities. Oh that they could be dispersed and melted wholly away in the blaze of our Christmas yule-logs! Hopeless we may perhaps be of any such bright consummation, yet the least of us may do something towards that end. Preparations as for an unparalleled campaign against cold and hunger—wheresoever and in whatsoever secret places these may be waging their murderous warfare—are already making on all sides. The bakers, the butchers, and the poulterers are piling their statistics to triumphant heights. We should like to see set forth, in figures, the number of packages of fish, fruit, game, and good cheer generally conveyed this week on the 'up-lines' and the 'down-lines.' The barrels, boxes, and bundles would, we are sure, if collected into a heap, 'make Ossa like a wart.' If to these we add the clothes, the blankets, and the coals—not to speak of the tea, the tobacco, and the snuff—liberally distributed—these last mostly in the workhouses—we may be able to form some tolerable notion of the amount of comfort diffused among those who, as old Wither sings,

'Hardly all the year
Had bread to eat or rags to wear.'

For the moment, therefore, our Christmas is of sovereign efficacy to transform the country at large into the semblance of one wide many-featured household. Industry in some places is dead, but Christmas is everywhere alive. And so even this dark year will, if the oracles lie not, go out like an overturned candle at blind man's buff, amid the liberated glee of children. It will be chased to death by hobby-horses. Penny trumpets will bray at its funeral. Pop-guns will bury it with military honours. Jumping-jacks will dance upon its grave. Its memory will be drank from beakers 'with beaded bubbles winking at the brim,' and from bowls bobbing with roasted apples and odorous with spices.

The ancient custom of placing an enormous log of wood on the fire on Christmas-eve, was of course intended as a comfortable security against the 'drear-nighted December' out of doors. Charles Lamb contends for 'a huge, heaped-up, over heaped-up, all-attracting fire,' as the proof positive and crowning glory of the season. Sometimes the yule-log, or yule-block, was a large lump of coal—anything, for light and heat. In the houses of the wealthy, candles were burned, 'turning,' as the chroniclers have it, 'night into day.' Then, how buxom, pudding-making housewives would bustle about; and children, let loose from school, dance and clap their hands in the very ecstacy of anticipated delight! No wonder there was merriment then. The wintry weather served to whet the appetite; and hence the jolly feasting which formed so large a part of the festivities. Harken to a lay of the times:—

'Now thrice-welcome Christmas,
Which brings us good cheer,
Minced pies and plum porridge,
Good ale and strong beer;

With pigs, geese, and capons,
The best that may be;
So well doth the weather
And our stomachs agree!'

In the old English manorhouse, Christmas must have been a time when the heart was apt to get the better of the more sober judgment. Every mansion had its 'lord of misrule' or 'master of merry disports,' whose business it was to get up all sorts of disguisings, masks, and mummeries to amuse the beholders. Songs, dances, and revels were indulged in with a kind of furor of joviality which knew no bounds; and many, we may well suppose, were the mad pranks played at these mirthful gatherings. In Scotland, at the period of the Reformation, the Christmas custom were denounced as Popish and sinful. 'Ye will say sirs,' exclaimed an old Presbyterian divine, 'good old yout-day; I tell you, good old fool-day. You will say it is a brave holiday; I tell you it is a brave belly dry!' In those venerable times reputed 'good,' it may be that there were excesses. But manners, even more than customs, have undergone a change. The mumblings and maskings are seen chiefly in stage pantomimes, but the hearth-warmth and the hearth-warmth remain. Christmas is still

'Christmas, the joyous period of the year.'

The boar's head, the wassail-bowl, and the holly are not wholly extinct. Still does the fire crackle cheerily and redden grandly in the squire's hall; still are madcap girls kissed under mistletoe-boughs; and still plum-pudding, and snap-dragon, and hot-cockles, and riddles, and forfeits, fill the hearts of the young with a delight which it makes the old happy to witness. Long may it be so; and long may all classes, even the poorest, be enabled to sing—

'Without the door let sorrow lie;
And if from cold it hap to die,
We'll bury it in a Christmas pie,
And evermore be merry!'

To the promotion of this wise end, we dedicate the present entire number of our 'Miscellany.' Science tells us that the snow of winter serves to keep the earth warm. We need not science to tell us that the darkness burnishes the face of the stars. The brightest eyes, moreover, are those which are fringed with the darkest lashes. Wherefore it comes about that the clear spirit shines forth most triumphantly amid the darkest surroundings. Men may build themselves cells, and clothe themselves in sackcloth; but the world itself is not a cloister, nor does the deep shade of December possess, to the intelligent eye, any tinge of ascetic gloom. If, therefore, the merry Christmas brightens our home-fires, it is only in a noble sense that we may read sacred precepts in their light. The year closes that human hearts may open. In the grasp of every neighbour's hand no impulses are awakened within—thoughts as of grass hairs stirred—emotions of a common frailty and common brotherhood quickened into life—sensations as of wings lifting above all selfishness, implanted high-souled aspirations kindled to be nearer heaven and God! To the sessions of such sentiments I beseechingly summon our readers, and wish them, and all, 'a merry Christmas'—not, we confess, without a hope that the perusal of the pages which follow may serve to make it merrier and better.

ALL I DARE TELL ABOUT IT SOMETHING FOR CHRISTMAS TIME

BY ALLAN PARK PATON.

CHAPTER I.

Not worth a farthing in the world!

I trust, kind reader—as you are called, with more less truth—that you were never at such a low ebb this. I have been. I may not tell you how, save that was connected with the error of my youth, and was but chiefly of foolish pride; but I shall tell you when a where, and some remarkable things that came of it.

What I am about to relate happened in a certain year, in the month of December. I was, at the time, staying in a small country village, in that county of England which is renowned for 'wood and water, law and gospel, old maids and mustard;' and the name of mine inn was 'The Seven Stars.'

In my wanderings through the northern counties, staff in hand and knapsack aback, I had passed or put up at many a hostelry, and been struck and amused with their various names. Of what may be called the national and noble kind, I had seen 'The Royal Tent,' 'The Crown and Rose,' 'The Crown and Mitre,' 'The Duke of York,' and 'The Granby Arms;' and of the zoological there were 'The Old Red Lion,' 'The Black Lion,' 'The White Bear,' 'The Spread Eagle,' 'The Buffalo,' and 'The Dolphin.' I had marked several of a spotting sort, such as 'The Bull and Dog,' 'The Fox and Partridge,' 'The Hare and Hounds,' and 'The Fighting-Cocks;' some of a social and satisfying character, as 'The Punch-Bowl' and 'The Shoulder of Mutton;' and two or three facetious ones, among which were 'The Gaping Goose,' and the veritable 'Cat and Bagpipes.' I had met, also, many of names so thoroughly English, and in keeping with the dear old fair land, its legends and its people, that they were songs and pictures to me; and belonging to this class were 'The George and Dragon,' 'The Robin Hood,' 'The Elm Tree,' 'The Bush,' 'The Green,' 'The Three Blue-Bells,' 'The Bashire,' 'The Grapes,' 'The Wheat-Sheaf,' 'The Barley-Sheaf,' 'The Spotted Cow,' 'The Bay Horse,' 'The Fleec,' 'The Golden Cock,' 'The Plough,' 'The Woodman,' and 'The Jolly Waggoner.' Three only had I found named after heavenly bodies—'The Sun,' 'The Half-Moon,' and the 'Seven Stars;' and, under the roof of the last of these, the strange adventure I have here to tell began.

The Seven Stars.—A cheery steady place, you say—its gleaming windows shining a far welcome along the winter road to the wearied traveller; its ever open door sending into the surrounding gloom a hospitable and seeking-looking ray—the eyes of its buxom landlady and pretty maid sparkling with kindness, and its quaint old glass and furniture glinting with happy lights. Nothing of the kind. "There's soomthin' in a nemm," as Shakspeare says, a Shrewsbury shopkeeper the other day remarked to me, on my inquiring what was the meaning of 'glischorine,' displayed in his window (used for very fine machinery); but nothing in this astral name agreed with the subject of it. Save for its kitchen or public room (of which more hereafter), I had never crossed the threshold of a more unhomey lodging.

It was evidently an ancient house; but, with newly whitened front and frequently closed door, resembled some cunning old man remembering or meditating murder. Its rooms were small, low-roofed, pannelled with black oak, and uneven and patched in the floors. A stair which led to the bed-chambers was also of black oak, and had a heavy balustrade, grotesquely carved. It sloped to the left, the other side having apparently sunk; firm clinging was required to manage up; and at every mounting step, the old dark monster creaked and whined in the most unearthly manner. Equally communicative were the floors, however lightly trodden; and with no bolting and stuffing could I succeed in keeping the window and door of my own room from shaking.

It was certainly a dreary little place. I shudder as I recall it. Still, it was not there I saw a hospitable spectre, and am able to tell of some ghosts celebrating Christmas.

The public room or kitchen which I have mentioned was the redeeming feature in 'The Seven Stars.' It wore of nights almost a blithesome air. It was clay-floored, with open rafters overhead, along which several guns and rods were ranged. There was a fireplace, nearly the width of the room, and which those of the company who required a light had to approach with hand-shaded faces. Its glow, however, seemed to have no effect upon the landlady—a silent, sour, stout, and coarse-looking woman, whose duty it was to superintend the square boiler, and to mix at it, in due proportions, the 'whisky punch,' which was almost the universal drink. A large vacant space was kept before the furnace; along the sides of the apartment, and at the far end of it, were settles and benches of plain wood; and in one corner, opposite the boiler, was a tall straight-backed cushioned chair.

Well do I remember the last night that I spent in 'The Seven Stars.' I had been its inmate for about a week, during which my days had been passed in waiting anxiously for a letter of forgiveness and assistance from home, and in wandering about its neighbourhood (visiting, among other things, its remains of a Roman camp, its old chapel with oaken pews and gaudy hatchments, and its churchyard, on one of whose simple tombstones I saw, for the first time out of Shakspeare, the name Ophelia); and my evening hours being spent in the said kitchen; the company assembled wherein was generally a strange one—for regular attenders, the gamekeeper and his boy, the sexton, one or two of the villagers, and the squire—and for casual visitors, a pedlar, a tramp, or traveller, like myself.

On the night in question, I recollect clearly who were there. There were the gamekeeper and his boy; and, at a bench opposite to them, one whose

'Delight on a shiny night

In the season of the year' was well known, but who had been cunning enough to avoid hitherto the snares of the law; there was a little wizened Newcastle man, who sang songs in what seemed to me Arabic, and called the hostess 'hinny;' there was one of our 'hardly entreated brothers;' one of our 'conscripts upon whom the lot fell,' in slouched gray hat and clay-coloured clothes, whom I had seen that noon by the roadside devouring his dinner—a junk of brown bread and slice after slice of a raw leek; there was myself; and, in the tall straight-backed cushioned chair, ever reserved for him, there sat the squire.

The party was an odd one, but the last-mentioned of its members was its strangest feature. Here was Sir John Brynton, principal proprietor in the neighbourhood, and lord of Danby Hall—a place encrusted with knightly history, surrounded by natural beauty, containing love and respect for him, and enlivened by youth and accomplishments; and yet, almost every evening, at a set hour, were his nag's hoofs heard at the door, and he made his appearance, leaning on the arm of one of his waiting men, in the kitchen of 'The Seven Stars,' to take his seat in the chair beside the large fire, to smoke his long pipe (which his servant took from the mantelpiece and filled for him), to drink his glass of ale, and to chat and gossip with all comers. He was a tall slim old gentleman, with long narrow head, silver hair, and 'wide blue eyes as in a picture,' dressed in the fashion of a quarter of a century before; and in everything that he did and said there was that which showed natural dignity and high birth. He spoke comparatively little; and, when his voice was heard, it was generally listened to with a strange deference. During my sojourn, I conceived a great admiration for the squire. His weak but musical tones were a kind of charm to me, and some words which he muttered brought me out of a reverie, even that night.

For that night I was in a reverie, and a sad one; and sat by myself in a far off corner of the room, drinking and smoking, as were all the others; but wondering where and how I should have to pass the next night, and with some shrewd suspicions that it might be with a craving stomach, and within one of the neighbouring woods. For this I knew, if to-morrow's post brought me not the long-hoped for letter, I should really and truly be without a farthing in the world, or the prospect of one. The little that remained in my pocket, previous settlements and private calculations told me, was enough to defray the expense of my bed that night and my breakfast on the following morning; but, the post not bringing me the word on the morrow's afternoon, I knew that I must start then from my present quarters—for there was no mercy or faith in the nature of my hostess, to whom I saw that my aimless stay was an unsatisfactory mystery, while my want of luggage was a painful fact—and that I should be, for the first time in my life, positively without the means of either food or shelter.

What awoke me from my dreamy musing was a long sigh from the squire, accompanied by these words:—

'Dear! dear! to-morrow night we'll have Christmas-eve again, and the ghosts will be gathering at the Old Park. Sir Ralph will be receiving guests, according to his promise.'

Here the gamekeeper, a fine ruddy-faced young fellow, taking his pipe from his lips, looked across the room to the too well suspected poacher, and cried, in a half merry, half sarcastic tone—

'Bill, my lad, wont you try it again?' The answer to which was growled, as if by a wild beast—

'No. I'll be blessed if I do!'

This didn't seem to daunt the questioner; who, with a wink to his boy, continued to address the company:—

'Perhaps, gentlemen, some of you don't know that, last Christmas-eve, a lot of us were sitting in this room, and Bill Selby there was here, too; he had new come to this part of ours, and we're very glad he did come, and hope to get better acquainted.' This was said with a malicious twinkle, that hinted of handcuffs, and was responded to by a defiantly upsent wreath of smoke, which, however, took the shape of links. 'Well, some began to speak about the Old Park, and how the house in it, which has been closed more than a dozen years, always blazed out at Christmas time; and how the ghost of Sir Ralph Ebdon, come from foreign parts, kept it up there; and how any one was bidden, and welcome to go and join them on Christmas-eve, who could declare, on soul and conscience, that he wasn't worth a farthing in the world. And some of us told how, now and then, one who was as poor as this had gone up to it in the night, and joined the doings there; how these had always been well to do afterwards; but how never a soul who got in was heard to tell what he had seen; and how, now and then, one who wasn't down so low had gone out of fun or madness, but had never got far past the great gate; when up got Bill Selby and says, he never saw man or devil that he feared; and that he would go up to the old gate, and bang the rum old knocker on it, and if it didn't open, he would get over the walls, and be hanged to them! and that he knew very well all the ghosts he'd see in it, for he had felt the smell of the herd when the wind was fair.'

During the recital so far, I had, with considerable curiosity, watched the poacher's face; and although he to veil it with his smoke, I saw that it was gleaming of its shaggy eyebrows and coarse beard with a dead whiteness, and that the fingers, which had begun with indifferent-looking devil's tattoo, were continuing sound through natural trembling. I feared there would be a burst of rage and dangerous struggle; but the mind had apparently passed away entirely from the narrator, and gone back to the circumstances of the night which he had referred to, and some dreadful thing got an iron clutch of his memory.

'So,' continued the gamekeeper, 'up he got, emptied his pockets, got the mistress there to mix him a dose of rummer, asked us all to sit an hour, and started in a snow. A plucky thing it was, no doubt; but Bill knew what came of it. We sat long enough, but he knows himself if he came back again, and what he saw up the valley for he's never told us yet.'

I had still watched the poacher, who had remained engrossed by his own thoughts; and whose agitation increased every moment, until here he sprang to his feet as if in fever, and dashed his tumbler into a thousand splinters on the table!

His vision, whatever it was, seemed to have reached utmost vividness, and to be scared by this; for, standing a moment or two with somewhat of a morose expression, he begged pardon—said they must excuse him—that it was a kind of infernal nightmare he had (he had evidently forgotten the gamekeeper's narrative), settled with the landlady, muttered a 'good night' as is the custom; and, asking the labouring man to be his bit of company as far as the stile, left 'The Stars,' and myself and some others of its inmates, in a strange state of bewilderment.

There was silence for a little while in the room, which was at last broken by the low, mild, gentlemanly voice of the squire saying,—

'Ay, poor fellow! it was bold work, but foolish. was well seen he was a stranger in these parts, or he would have believed, as we do, the story of the Old Park.'

'But what is the story of the Old Park, sir?' I inquired, the probability of my being utterly penniless on the morrow having inspired me with a singular interest in the subject.

'Well, gentlemen,' he replied, 'I can tell it well. Sir Ralph and I were friends in our young days. how goes the time, Simon?'

Here the waiting-man hoisted by a silver chain, to the depths of his corduroy knee-breeches, a stupendous watch, with a face like a horrified doll's, by means of which very closely he was enabled to answer—

'It wants twenty minutes, your honour.'

'Ah, then, there's time,' continued the old gentleman, 'and here's the story of the Ghosts at the Old Park as well as I can give it.'

CHAPTER II.

'Small as it may be, compared to many, yet the Old Park is of a good size still. There are few estates in the county so rich and well wooded, with sweeter bits of water in a fairer lawn and manorhouse. Some of you will know very well that (though, since the death of Sir Ralph, nobody belonging to the family has lived at it, and it is only been in the hands of an agent—and a shrewd close one he is) its farms have gone on for the last dozen years increasing in value. In all other respects it changed property now from what it was in Sir Ralph's time; although the house itself, and its own grounds which may be two or three miles square—are just as they were that day he left.

'Among our many old and good families, there is none older or better than the Ebdons. Our county history tells what they were in the past—how bravely they bore their part in the war with the Scots; and how much of their blood was poured out freely at Neville's Cross. Knightly and generous were they all; and the courtesy, bravery, and liberality of the best of them seemed to have met in Sir Ralph at the wrong time. He was a good many centuries too late of coming—a man born out of the season; and his odd, wild, hearty ways, and ever open hand, were not for our time. They could neither be understood by the world, nor justified in the modern state of things. It would have required the Old Park as it now is to back Sir Ralph's warm heart and free hall. No man in all England was more thoroughly English than he—in fearlessness, gentleness, hospitality, and love of our old country sports and games. About twenty years ago, he was one of the noblest-looking fellows that human eye could light on—had the best stud and pack, and the best manor in Durham, and was the most beloved in the neighbourhood; and, twelve years ago or so, when he left us—though his trouble had begun to tell upon him—there was not a man, from the Tyne to the Tees, who could hold a hand to him, or do a kind thing so kindly, as he was.

'He had become poor, and what on earth could stand up to him, there was everlasting company at the house, and everything in the best of style, and Tom, Dick, and Harry came at all times; and so, by degrees, the Old Park had over heels in debt, to the delight and hope of the three rich cutlers or hobbin-makers—keen as eagles, and with the souls of buttons—who had come to the house, and who felt that all they could do was a mere shadow to the show and welcome of Sir Ralph.

'But the full extent of his ruin came on him suddenly. He was not of a nature to understand that soon, and perhaps never thought seriously he was going behind. I remember the night on which he first came to me in all; and how it was brutally pressed on him; and then he made up his mind to go;—for all this happened, in an hour, and it was on a Christmas night, nearly a dozen years since.

'Everybody in Durham knows how Christmas was always kept at the Old Park; how, at that season, the whole county we may say was one scene of merriment from the end; and all made welcome, whoever they might be. Even of keeping our national festivals well, it seemed to be Sir Ralph's desire to keep it better than any; and there was one of the ancient customs that was not religiously observed. Indeed, partly for what they might see of the olden days, and partly for the unfailing hospitality of Sir Ralph, there were few of his neighbours, many miles about who, at Christmas time, when so many people like to be at their own homes, did not meet at the roof.

'I am here, gentlemen—for some of you, I know, are new to these parts—I should tell you that, besides the bravest of the brave, and the kindest of the kind, Sir Ralph Ebdon was one of the oddest men that I ever met. He played pranks which those who did not know him well ascribed to madness; but he never, in any of his odd, intended mischief or pain to others; and one of the ways in which this oddness manifested itself was that which he gave the general invitation I speak of. Long before Christmas-eve, in every year, there floated over the gateway one of the old family banners as a general welcome; and, Heaven help us! I believe it hangs there now.'

'It does,' said the gamekeeper. 'I saw it yesterday morning.'

'Ay! and the gate itself will be showing its sanctuary knocker; for every year at this season, as I am told, there is seen upon the gate a monster-faced iron ring, like that upon the Minster porch down the way, with which the poor souls who claimed sanctuary at St. Cuthbert's shrine used to rouse the monks through the night.

'Well, Christmas time at the Old Park was always a wonderful time. But when last held there—I mean by living beings—it was more wonderful than ever; and on this account:—

'Sir Ralph, who was a bachelor, had an only sister, a widow, whom he loved so dearly that he would have searched heaven and earth for what would comfort and please her. Yet in the spring, when the rooks were at their noisiest, and the swallows had come—all about the Old Park bursting with new life and hope in the very air and sunshine—news came to him and us of poor Hilda's sudden death. She had one child, a daughter, whom Sir Ralph shortly brought home with him; and from whose young mind, during the rest of the year, he had—covering up his own grief—endeavoured in every possible way to remove the cloud that had so early shadowed it. A child's loss and sorrow are soon melted under kindness and amusement; and it was with the continued object and hope of reconciling his niece and heiress to her change, and of interesting her in what had been from time immemorial an observance in the family—ay, and with a good deal of religious feeling under it all—that Sir Ralph determined to keep the succeeding Christmas, and even with more than the usual amount of innocent pastime and pageantry.

'I am old, gentlemen—I am old; but I cannot forget that night; for I was there, and there was one with me whom I often miss. Simon! fill my pipe.'—Here there was a pause, while the serving-man obeyed the order; and several of the guests in a far-off corner of the room, including myself, took the opportunity of getting nearer the fire and the neighbourhood of the old gentleman, who, after a few puffs, continued, with closed eyes.—'It has become like a dream to me in some things; but parts of it stand out clear. I can still see the noble avenue of old limes—it was our last drive up! A couple of miles long it is, and so lofty that I often felt giddy looking to where the branches met; and it was clustered that night with different-coloured lights from the gate to the terrace! I can still see the moat gleaming over with floating lamps; and the front of the house itself—every door and window fringed with leaves, and streaming festive glare! I can yet see the noble hall—its walls glancing with mail and trophies—its carved chestnut roof hung with green glistening ivy and holly and pearly mistletoe—its wide chimney, with the elm block glowing on the hearth—its long board, bright with Christmas candles, and groaning with the rosemary-decked wassail bowl and tall flagons of spiced ale; and the silver platters with the ribboned boar's-head, and trenchers laden with peacock-pie, and roast-beef, and turkey, and capons, and venison, and all good things! I can yet hear the legendary stories and yule songs; and see the old merry games and dances that had spirit in them, and have nearly died away! Above all, I can see my dear friend Ebdon galloping hither and thither, with the golden-locked, laughing little Ebba set upon his broad shoulder—himself the heart and soul of the happy multitude. And, indeed, it was a multitude; for the noise of the preparations had spread far and wide, and all kinds of folk had come, ay, and among them some who in their own breasts hated Sir Ralph—not county men, but strangers—your “moneyed people,” who had found their way into this quarter through the misfortunes or follies of the old families.

Of this lot there was one who seemed to bear a particular malice to our host, for which neither I nor any of his friends could ever account; but it was supposed that some of the thousand odd things he did and said had been misunderstood by this fellow, and had galled him. It afterwards came to light that he had been for many years not only indirectly encouraging the lavish expenditure at the Old Park, but securing for himself a prevailing influence over it; and even then, when received unsuspectingly and warmly, he had managed to bring suddenly before Sir Ralph the prospect of apparently inevitable ruin, and at the very moment when the festivities were at their height. How it actually happened, or what conversation led to it, none could tell. For my part, I think the scamp must have taken too long a draught of the lambs’-wool or the old October; but nobody will easily forget the effect it had upon Sir Ralph, who went to his library for awhile; or the sad surprise that fell upon the company, as, in his parting words to the guests, and draining his usual cup to them, he said, with a strange voice and white face:—

“I have been told to-night that this will be the last Christmas that shall be kept by me or mine at the Old Park; and this pleasant news, that I am not worth a farthing in the world! That I don’t know. I’m not sure of that. Things may be made right yet. I may not be able to do this, but I’ll try; and though I die—mark my words!—we Eldons have kept Christmas for hundreds of years, and I’ll keep it again—ay, and keep it under the dear old roof, too—although I come from the grave to do it; but, from this day, no uninvited guest shall join me here, unless he, on Christmas-eve, comes freely, as on soul and conscience, without a farthing in the world, as I am said to be. Hopeless poverty will be the passport. And so, God bless you all! Good bye.”

And, gentlemen, we all know what was the end of it. The Old Park, after a short time, was shut up; Sir Ralph with his niece went abroad; and word of his death came a few years afterwards. The niece is still said to be living in some out of the way part of Italy; but, strange to say, she neither communicates with any one hereabout, nor has she ever come to the place. She was a child, of course, when she left, and had seen little of it or us; and besides, she may have come to feel a bit on account of the position it was in. It has remained in the hands of an agent whom Sir Ralph sent—a close man, like a ghost himself for silence—but who has acted so wisely with it that it is now worth thrice as much; and is, we hear, just about clear of its burdens. Yes, the lands are all different, but the house itself and its own grounds remain the same. Except in this [here the sulky landlady gave a deep sigh, and one or two muttered exclamations were given], that for nights before it, strange dull sounds, as of carriages arriving, are heard in this part; that every Christmas-eve and Christmas night since that one the house has been lighted up—hundreds have seen it; Bob, you have! Here he turned slightly to the gamekeeper, and his motion was acknowledged by a nod. ‘And voices have been heard, and a good many have gone to try Sir Ralph’s invitation, if it were true; and some have passed the night there, but nobody knows how; and more, like our friend who has left us, have gone there from folly, and been rejected, nobody knows how; and—and—and by St. Cuthbert! I don’t know what to think of it; but a truer man than Sir Ralph never lived, and ghosts to-morrow night or not, here’s to him!’

Whereon the squire rose from his chair—drank the remnant of his ale—bowed in a stately manner to the guests—handed his pipe to his servant, who put it back upon the mantelpiece—donned his gray beaver—and, taking his staff in one hand and putting his other on Simon’s shoulder, left the room.

Several comments on the narrative were commencing, but I did not wait to hear them. Making my salute to the company after the usual manner, I left the kitchen and sought my chamber—dragging myself up to it by the old oaken sloping stair, all the carved faces upon which seemed endowed with even more than their usual goblinish expression as I passed. In bed I long lay quite awake, in vain trying, by different positions, to induce sleep forget for awhile my fearful extremity. At last, kind of shallow slumber must have stolen over me, suddenly found myself struggling up, and sitting listening for a sound which had disturbed me. Slipping the floor, I stole to the lattice and gazed out. It begun to snow; and, in a dreary glare shed across road from part of the ground floor, probably from kitchen fire built up for the night, I saw the sparks flakes wavering earthward. As I stood, the sound had attracted me, though still dull, became plainer; pressing my brow on the glass, I gazed out, with strange fascination.

As I did so, upon that lonely road untravelled by coach, there passed—a momentary vision!—the shape of a great carriage, drawn by four horses, and crowded with white FIGURES, motionless and silent!

CHAPTER III.

I must have, in the early morning, fallen into sleep; for, just as I woke, the inn clock struck eleven. Getting up, I found the panes of my lattice ‘iceazoned’ and dim; and having, with my breath, made part clear, I looked out, and saw the earth swathed in dazzling white.

Here, at last, was the day of my fate; and it seemed wear a cold, cruel smile. Never yet had I been dependent on a stranger for food or shelter, and rather than an unpaid meal or bed to that scowling dame below, I would die in a ditch. If the expected letter did not come in the afternoon, I would start—no doubt of that; but whether or to what sufferings or end, who could tell? I was some time on my bedside, clutching my chest, in endeavour to keep down the ‘climbing sorrow’ which crept and almost choked me. At last, I roused myself, and, having dressed, went down stairs for breakfast, with as careless an expression and manner as I could assume.

It was a forced meal; and when it was over, I resolved to pass the hours till post-time in a long walk. Emerging the porch, I stood for a moment or two, and glanced about upon the changed scene. With the exception of few impressions of village clogs, the pure, smooth lining of the road—whose line was hardly discernible unbroken. The sun shone brightly, but it was bitter and, setting off at a rapid pace, I walked miles after miles as if possessed. Under their new aspect, even the things that had become somewhat familiar to me during my sojourn in the neighbourhood, were strange, and at almost unrecognisable; and, in my march of deep melancholy, occasionally woke up from my brooding, in parting. I had really never visited before, and from which I carefully to retrace my way, guided by my own foot. But, puzzling as the ways were, I hurried along, down-bent head, and poring upon the spotless snow, which, generally speaking, I had been the first to see. My mind was greatly troubled. In life I had still clung to; there were many in the world who were for me; and I could hardly realise the probability being entirely cast off for one fault and left to stand alone. Feeling and pride fought together; but, whatever contest leaned, it could not now affect the present. Kind and kin and old home were hundreds of miles off, and whatever rank and wealth were there, want and were impending here. I was bordering on dire need, but to beg of living man I would not! Of my former life not a few had died uncomplainingly in dungeons of war; and there was enough of the old blood in me to make me meet my approaching enemies—cold, hunger—like a man, and die a lonely death, if need should lie under my snow-folds as quiet and resolute as the sculptured figures of my knightly ancestors, yonder, under their marble coverings in the dim light. In a kind of mad mockery, I laughed aloud at the thought and tossed my head defiantly.

Here, again, I was in a road where I had never been, and stood looking about. It lay between high beds and lofty trees. Behind me, the end of it was lost in wintry haze; but my solitary footmarks were traced far away; and in the direction before me this way took a bend. It was evidently an unfrequented and, as I stayed, I was impressed with the unearthly silence—it was still as death. If a snow-wreath had fallen from a branch or twig, or a cock had crowed from some farm homestead, or cattle lowed, or even an insect hummed, it would have been a relief to the ear. But no, there was a weight of silence; and I could distinctly hear my heart beat. When and where could I have got into this deserted road, and whither could it lead? I should go, perhaps, by going forward to where it took the new direction, and I strode on.

In a few minutes, however, my speculations on this matter were drowned by my personal troubles; and I passed again into my dream of suffering, till, my glance attracted, I found my course effectually interrupted by a great oaken GATEWAY, set in heavy carved stonework; from the centre of which there drooped, motionless, a thin, thin silken banner, with faded tints and glintings of broken and tarnished gold over it, and displaying—instead of real holly leaves—these words, 'IF WITHOUT A WELCOME IN THE WORLD, WELCOME!'

The Old Park, Sir Ralph Ebdon, and the ghosts that kept Christmas—the squire's story of the previous night, which, like many of the other tales and arguments heard in the kitchen of 'The Seven Stars,' had passed away from my mind, occupied with its real troubles—looked back upon me in a moment. I was riveted by a strange sense of mystery; and the longer I looked at the ancient portal towering before me, and over my head its stony standard, in which age and youth, and the past and present seemed represented, the more awed I became.

It was evidently an unused entrance. No marks of any kind disturbed the white glistening surface between it and the snow lay up against it in a billowy wreath, and mosses and sprays from the neighbouring trees and shrubs straggled across its borders. Grottesque heraldic carvings, carved in stone, grinned down angrily from the corner above; and in the centre there rose a turreted arch which was two small windows, void of glass, and dark and matted with accumulated dust, weeds, and moss of every kind. It had been an ancient gatehouse, and it had seen in the south. The dark door itself, in its strength and closeness, seemed set on holding inviolate its momentous secret; and upon it, fixed as high as a man of middle stature could reach, was a ring-knocker of wood, twisted and wrought into a fantastic visage, the expression of which was one of fiendish rage.

With this country legend, embodied in the squire's narrative, have any truth in it? Beyond all doubt, this was an entrance to a deserted place, but what of the serene aspect upon my head, with its quaint invitation in fresh hues? As I continued to scan it, one portion after another of the story of the Old Park came back to my memory, until the whole was vividly recalled; and then, as if to crown all, the midnight spectacle of that great arch, covered with its white, silent figures, flashed upon me. Every moment thereafter my curiosity became more intense, and along with it there grew and strengthened an insatiable fascination, that, in the event of no tidings arriving—in which case I would require to go somewhere—I should come back to this spot at night, and test the mysterious WELCOME. I had small belief in ghosts, and little fear of finding them; but there was something in it, that it might be a country trick worth dispelling. At the next, to a homeless man the roof even of an abandoned farmhouse would be better than the bare sky or the bare of a hedge or tree. Under the influence of my growing interest, I by-and-by found myself—having left the road and passed the lofty walls—skirting the high thick hedge now which succeeded, and stretched on for a long distance; but it was itself so intricate, so clustered and covered with decayed creepers and weeds, sprays of brambles and clumps of ivy, and on the inner side had such a mass of miscellaneous growth, that I went far without reaching the side, after the strongest efforts, even to get a glimpse through. My want of success only piqued me, and I continued to skirt and search the boundary for a long while, with no better result. At last I came, quite unexpectedly, upon a part which seemed more penetrable; and here I thrust myself into the hedge and partly through it, and was effectually prevented from getting farther by a mass of thorn, which, like an arresting arm, held me back. From where I was, however, I managed to gain an opening of a few inches, and obtained a view within; but all I saw was part of an army of straight, gigantic boles of oak, beech, and birch; with intermediate floor-spaces of soft, brown moss and vegetable decay, the growth of ages; and forest aisles stretching far and terminating in gloom and mystery.

As I looked, I started to hear a distant sound, which, although low, was certainly growing clearer. It was a VOICE, too—beyond all doubt a voice! but of steps there was not a rustle! Bending my head to the right with some difficulty, I thought I caught flitting among the pillar-like trunks the appearance of figures. Such they were, I was soon satisfied; and in a few minutes there moved smartly, and almost on tiptoe, across the open space opposite me, an erect, hale, ruddy-cheeked gentleman, wearing a low hat with up-turned sides, and having his hair powdered, drawn back, and bound behind in a queue. He was dressed in a blue, square-skirted coat, with brass buttons, and waistcoat and light breeches of a fawn colour; and wore a pair of tasselled Hessian boots, which he touched lightly with his whip as he went. I saw him distinctly!—ay, and heard him too! for, during the few moments of his passing, he sang, in suppressed, but clear, hearty tones; and these were the words:—

'Once more, without noise,
My merry, merry boys,
Bring the Christmas-log to the firing.
And my good dame—she
Bids you all be free,
And drink to your hearts' desiring!'

As he vanished on my left, there followed a party of men, bearing among them, upon their shoulders, a great block of elm. They were black-haired, brawny, ruddy-faced yeomen; and although not a whisper was audible, and their tread was unheard, the countenances turned towards my quarter seemed beaming with sly and secret delight. With the twinkle of a pair of large blue eyes, the deep grin of a pair of rosy cheeks, and the white glitter of teeth, close set under the burden, they were gone!

Had this been a dream? The awful silence of the woods was again unbroken, and their brown-floored aisles seemed once more the home of solitude. Yet I had surely seen living and happy men, if ever such there were! Ghosts? If you was the dead Sir Ralph—and certainly his appearance suited the description of him—and these his phantom servitors, I, for one, would not fear to meet them at the very heart of night, and return drinkhail to their wassail!

But it was strange; and the vision only added to my curiosity. For one fact was now plain—THE OLD PARK WAS NOT DESERTED. It had its visitors, let them be living or dead; and, if circumstances so fell out that I had to leave, and I went to it, it would not altogether be a fool's errand. I would not be acting solely upon an alehouse gossip; for, had I not heard and seen enough to warrant a trial?

To look upon the house itself, if possible,—that desire was now born, and kept fast gaining on me; and under it I very soon found myself again engaged in my inquisitive circuit, like a weasel searching for a cranny in a wall. But this time I had to go far without discovering another weak point in the enclosure. Still I held on, and searched industriously. After a while, I began to despair of success, and thought of finding my way back to the road, which must now be miles away.

One other desperate attempt I resolved on—thicker though I found the fence to have become, although the plantation was getting sparser; and if I failed, back I should go to 'The Seven Stars,' and a certain knowledge of my state. Acting accordingly, and fending my face with my elbow, I crushed into the mass of thorns, stems, withered twigs and leaves, and masses of ivy and weeds; and, working with my shoulders as one works through a dense crowd, I once more found myself able, through a small loop-hole, to see within; and lo! about half a mile distant, and fairly fronting me—half castle and half manor-house—a quaint, straggling pile of towers, gables, windowed ranges, and arched entrances—the residence of the Ebdons—with all its many chimneys smoking briskly.

Through the belting of wood close to me—and which was opener, and had a broad shrub-bordered walk stretching up through it—I saw it well, and gazed with wonder at the odd, old building, naturally the subject of so much surmise. The longer I looked, the more assured I became, from the whole air of it, that it was the abode of living creatures, and not the haunt of phantoms; and I was muttering—‘Ghosts! well, they must be a new kind!’ when my notions, rapidly becoming prosaic and unromantic, were dispelled by what seemed to me, in very truth, the quiring of angels.

A full clear voice rose singly, and seemed to poise itself on wings of rapture; and, ever and anon, as it ceased, there came as in response a concourse of sweetly blended sounds that, enriching the air for a few moments, lapsed suddenly. Then again the one voice flowed up, clearer and even mellow, rising like some stately pillar or smooth crystal jet; and again burst that beauteous chorus, as if it were the column’s flowery capital or the rainbow-hued spray of the returning fount. The strain was solemn yet rejoicing—it had at once the strength of devotion and the trembling of tenderest feeling; and my spirit within me thrilled by it as by some powerful charm, I beheld this vision:—

On my right—up the walk, among the trees and shrubs, in the open space between which lay, in peaceful neighbourhood, the sunshine and the snow—there advanced slowly a young woman, leading a little cherub-like child on either side, and followed by a band of children—some hand in hand, and others with their arms twined lovingly round their neighbours’ necks. Her head, of fine proportions, was uncovered; and her pale golden hair, kept high over her temples and led behind her ears, thereafter flowed rippling over her shoulders, and clothed them as with bright chain mail. She wore a simply-fashioned purple gown, beneath a cape of fur, which, kept open by her outthrust arms, revealed the full grace of her tall figure—void of all ornament, save a small brooch, which flashed upon her belt. Her little companions—who were warmly clad, in rich colours, and carried light open willow baskets, filled with Christmas roses, caryophanths, and arbutus, or garlands of ivy, and holly, and laurel, set with blushing ash berries or the fair pearls of the mistletoe—looked up to the sky; and, with their large eyes filled with holy wonder, and their faces glowing with what appeared unearthly hues, they sang, or waited for the moment of their singing; while she who led them, and lovingly guided the youngest of the flock—only able to lip their praise—gazed upward with an expression which, to my fancy, was all heaven!

With the words of the singing becoming distinct, I recognised an old Christmas carol dear to many an English heart; and, as they passed before me, pacing and swaying to the notes—she, with her azure eyes fixed upward in a rapt gaze, sang the lines:—

‘Herdsmen beheld those angels bright,
To them appearing with great light,
Who said, “God’s Son is born this night!”

and then, on the utterance and mellow dying of her last note, there rose from the cherub-like train, in a wave of rich harmony, the words

‘IN EXCELSIS GLORIA!’

to cease sweetly and suddenly, as a summer shower does upon a bed of flowers. Again rose the single voice:—

‘This King is come to save mankind,
As in Scripture truth we find—
Therefore this song have we in mind.’

and once more swelled, and abruptly ceased, the

‘IN EXCELSIS GLORIA!’

Their forms I followed eagerly, as they became more distant on my left; by-and-by, it was merely glimmerings of purple, scarlet, green, or gold among the thickening shrubs and trees which I caught, and at last they were entirely lost to me; but I still continued to hear the holy hymn ascending and sinking, until it finally gave way to silence.

I left my hiding-place perplexed beyond all words, but my being seemed lighted up by that celestial picture; and the fair and stately maiden, with her retinue of innocent holiness and blooming health, was shrouded in my illumined memory as in a golden frame. Were these spirits? It was more difficult to answer; but if so, they were good angels; and not only did my doubt as to returning at night become still less, but I even detected myself desirous to do so; and, strange change! hoping that I might have tidings.

It was, indeed, with eager haste that I soon found myself retracing my steps; and with one other parting look at the mysterious gateway, with its hanging bann and a shake of the head that meant ‘We shall perhaps be better acquainted ere long,’ I hurried down the long road, entered the ways known to me, and in the afternoon—by which time it was rapidly getting dark—reached the village, and was once more under the unfriendly roof ‘The Seven Stars.’

The postman had passed, and had brought no letter for me! Hope from that quarter, then, was gone; and so seating myself in the kitchen, I ordered my last meal there, at which I sat for some time, dreaming of the heavenly face. This ended, I asked my sour hostess for my bill, which was hastily forthcoming. My settlement of it, while it pleased, seemed to astonish her, and my anxious calculations had been correct. When I laid down the last coin due to them, I was farthingless; and the fact gave me an odd feeling of relief. I then mentioned that I was about to leave—a statement which seemed to shock my host, a good-natured sot, and which even caused his unsocial wife a kind of pang, for ‘Not to-night, master!’ she asked with actual feeling in her voice; added, ‘Better take the road in the morning.’ But ‘I mistress,’ I answered, my cheerful tones and manner plainly puzzling them; ‘I am going now;’ and so, with careless ‘Good-by!’ I left the door, and when I did the sky was overcast and not a star visible.

By the time I was fairly out of the village, it was so dark that I had great difficulty in recognising the way, and, I went, night seemed to gather on the earth in one black fold after another, that almost extinguished the glimmering of the snow. Yet I trudged on, not like a despondent outcast dreading phantoms, but like a lover hastening to keep tryst. Although I had, through the daytime, no particular objects, sufficient, I thought, to make sure of my return, I failed at first to find the lonely road leading to the Old Park, and much time was lost ere I felt certain that I was once more upon it. At last I knew I was; and, gazing on eagerly, my heart beat quicker as once I caught distinctly the sparkle of distant lights, as from a mass among the trees. I pushed on, and ere long recognised a few yards before me, the GATEWAY. This reached stood a moment and listened. The silence was complete and I seemed to stand in the most perfect solitude.

In the gloom which, like the Egyptian darkness might almost be felt, and the painful silence, something of a giving and dread, I will confess, came over me; but it was only for a minute or two, and then my resolution returned.

Feeling with my hand across the gateway, I came to the iron ring; and, clutching it—deathly cold it was!—I drew it out, and struck it back boldly. It made a loud, dull growl-like sound, that grated on the stillness. This scarcely ceased when I was conscious—more from leaving my hand than anything else—that the great gate was opening inwardly; and, following with my fingers one of its retiring leaves, I passed in, and heard it, with pitying sigh, close behind me.

Then I stood and looked on; but I could merely distinguish, or fancy I distinguished, the commencement of the spacious avenue of limes of which Sir John Brynt had spoken in his story. A few yards on, it was black as a wolf’s throat; and I tried to pierce the abyss in vain.

While I did so, something—WHITE AND FIGURE-LIKE—glimmered for an instant, seeming to cross from one side to the other.

My head tightened, and a cold creeping went over it; but next moment I tried to make myself believe that could only have been some restless wandering deer, that an overweighed branch had shed its pure burden and setting my teeth, and holding stiff arms down at side, with rigidly clenched hands—I passed forward in the gloom.

A MUSICAL CINDERELLA.

BY WILLIAM FREELAND.

PROLOGUE.

AFTER numerous stale protestations, my own little boy, who bears the brilliant name of Silvertongue, and that other boy whom I call Sphinx, had just gone to bed.

Silvertongue, I may as well state, is so called from the exceedingly clear and metallic ring of his voice. You never heard such a voice. It glides into the heart of silence like a dagger of sound, but without causing any pain beyond the introductory jag. Getting used to it, you rather like it—at least I do; and, indeed, to tell you quietly in your ear, although I have been a good deal up and down the world, I never yet heard a voice that could match with that of Silvertongue. You may call this prejudice, or domestic bigotry; but just come you down one of these fine nights and judge for yourself. If the little fellow does not banish all doubt from your heart, why, then, you must be a heretic of flint. To tell you the whole truth, however, I must say that Silvertongue is inclined now and then to be a bit of a chatterbox; and his mother and I used seriously to wonder, about the beginning of the year, whether it would not be a good idea to take him to the (late) Great Exhibition, and show him off as the newest solution of the theory of Perpetual Motion.

Now, imagine a neat little chap, with deep dark eyes—deep beyond the reach of physiognomical plummet; not very big nor very old—about three feet of the one and five years of the other; silent as a diplomatist at a foreign court; and with a head of the Andean stamp and granite quality—peaked, ridged, and balanced with bumps in such a manner as might make the ghost of Spurzheim leap from his shroud;—though Heaven forbid that he should ever do so! Imagine this, and you have an imperfect vision of Sphinx, whose name, however, is not founded on these qualities, but on the atmosphere of mystery which surrounds his personal history. His biography would— but thereby hangs a tale, which I am not yet at liberty to relate. When I do, however, let certain Egyptians look out for Red Sea squalls!

Well, after almost unconquerable opposition, both these little fellows had gone to bed. Silvertongue was caught by sleep in the middle of a song, so that he lay all night with a half-finished melody on his lips, dreaming about strangled nightingales. Sphinx, as usual, lay like a block of dark Luxor marble, only now and then emitting a moan, as if from the mysterious depth of a pyramid.

I had just finished reading the latest letter from the Times' correspondent at Athens, giving a history of the revolution which sent King Otho and his Queen home to their friends in Germany. Much I pondered on this event, and on the general inconstancy of fortune; and I confess that, while entertaining the opinion that Greece was well rid of her Bavarian experiment, I imagined that it must have been a peculiarly hard shock to the poor foolish couple to be compelled to flee from the wrath of their people, and take refuge on board a British ship in one of their own harbours. From thinking on modern Greece, I was insensibly led backwards, along the chain of history, to the time when the soil of that famous land was the favourite haunt of deities, and men of faultless form and godlike genius. Memory becomes dark or radiant according to the theme of meditation. As I half-reclined upon my chair before the fire, my mind became slowly filled with a brilliancy of light, and was thrilled with an intensity of feeling, which only the remembrance of gods could produce. The Times slipped from my hand, and I was fast sinking into that trance of semi-conscious ecstasy in which the soul becomes inspired with the faculty of divine vision and boundless power—capable of seeing into the heart of things which common mortals regard as mysteries, and of performing actions utterly beyond the province of humanity. I walked on the upper slopes of Olympus, surrounded with incomparable shapes, whose utterance seemed enlarged and glorified to an almost inconceivable degree. The language was so ineffably divine as to be beyond human endurance; and it was therefore a partial relief when I felt laid within my own a small soft hand, which I fancied could only be the hand of one of the human descendants of those bright Intelligences of the Mount. There was something in its touch so familiarly human, and yet so much more than human, that I turned quickly to see the owner of it, with the involuntary exclamation, 'O Jupiter!'—which was answered by a feminine voice, which said—

'O father! you have been gazing at that picture again! It is too beautiful. I shall have Walter the artist to take it back, if you don't answer me next time.'

Wasn't this a pretty piece of business. Here was no daughter of Jove after all, though a dearer reality. This was my own Athene, whom I thus playfully distinguish, from the singular resemblance she bears to a portrait of the mythological lady of the same name, with which my brave artist has made perpetual heaven in the picture that so wrests me from my commonplace self in certain visionary moods.

'Beautiful, indeed, Athene! But not too beautiful, since there is something still more beautiful. Should you ever again think that I lose myself rather deeply in that scrap of canvas, just plant your own head between my eyes and it, and the glamour will vanish in half the twinkling of your own blue eye.'

'Oh! that would be magic!'

'Yes, my dear—natural magic. But what's your wish, Athene? I see that there is some unsatisfied desire in your eye. What is it?'

While I gathered up the Times, she reminded me of a promise, which I had made two days before, to relate the early history of a certain celebrated singer. So, as little Silvertongue was absent in the land of dreams, pitying the throttled nightingales—as Sphinx was nearly stone dead in the valley of Egyptian Thebes, only occasionally emitting a mysterious Memnonian moan; and as the House-mother had just contrived to fascinate that celebrated baby (of which you may have heard) into a prehistoric slumber—it struck me that I could hardly be better employed for the next hour or so than in settling this little score of storyology, which I had run up in a moment of good nature. Chair in the centre position—slippers (unembroidered) planted at true toasting distance; House-mother on the right, with a critical twinkle in her eyes; Athene on the left, all faith and expectation, and crowned with her Saxon splendour of massy ringlets—I sat before the comfortable fire, and thus began:—

CHAPTER I.

A PRESENT FROM INDIA.

'When was it, Athene, that I told you the story of "Hawk's Nest"?'

'About seven weeks since, I think. Oh, I have it! It was on the very night when aunt's portrait came from Australia.'

Then you are wrong as to the weeks, for that was three months ago. Your own portrait, I expect, will have reached Golden Creek by this time; and it is not unlikely that your aunt and her friends may this very night be discussing its merits—whether it is the picture of a good-tempered girl, or only of a shrewish little vixen. Couldn't I enlighten them on that subject, eh? But about 'Hawk's Nest.' Do you remember me mentioning the name of Flowerdale?

'Oh, yes; quite well. That was in Mellowshire, on the west coast of England. There was the village of Tenderlynn, with its old steeple—older than the white-headed sexton, who was the oldest inhabitant; and there was the clear Pool Water, flowing round the church, by the cliffs, into the south corner of the bay.'

Well remembered! That is the very spot. In this same beautiful village of Tenderlynn, not a great many years ago, there lived two dashing sisters, named Louisa and Caroline Welltone. Vale Cottage, in which they resided, was their own property; and, having a handsome provision from Government, on account of certain brave services rendered in India by their late father, who had been an officer in a regiment of cavalry, they held a rather respectable position in Tenderlynn society. Their father was killed during a raid against the Sikhs—an event which had so deep an effect upon their mother, that she took fever, and died before she could reach Calcutta, on her melancholy return to England. One black-edged letter brought to the two girls tidings of the death of both parents—that they were now orphans, and alone in the world. Wasn't that a very serious case, Athene?

'Ah! very sad, indeed. Both father and mother dead, and so far from home; and Louisa and Caroline not to see them die! What should I do if mamma and you were dying so far from home? And then Sphinx and little Silvertongue! who would take care of them?'

[At this point, the House-mother broke in with some well-timed counsels which need not be repeated here; but the sum of which was, that to the soul of faith all things are sure, if not clear; and that the bitterest cup of suffering, while it may seem to inflict new agony, is medicinal of some other pain, if not of the very pangs which it produces at the time—leaving a new vigour and purity in the heart after the bloody sweat is over. Old, old homilies, indeed; yet always original when spoken with earnest lips.]

Well, Athene, when the two Welltones received the news of their father and mother's death, they were living in another part of the country. But they soon afterwards came to live at Tenderlynn; and I am sorry to say that neither of them seemed to be so greatly affected by the sudden and woful death of her parents as you might have expected. They were a pair of very handsome ladies, to speak the full truth; and as they were both exceedingly fond of gay dresses, it was not long before their solemn mourning attire began to be superseded by the livelier spring hues of fashion. The manner in which they gradually changed their dress, was, in truth, very like the way of Nature, who, beginning with black winter, slowly advances into the cheery time of buds, and then passes on to the full glory of flowery summer. When Louisa and Caroline Welltone had entirely thrown off their gloomy costume, there was not a more splendid couple in the whole village of Tenderlynn—a fact which they knew perfectly well, and of which they resolved on making the best use. The result of their fine schemes was to infect the whole of bachelordom—that's all the young men, you know—with a Cupidemic or heart disease. None of the afflicted creatures, I am happy to say, died of the sickening disorder, although many of them bore the stings of it to their central flesh for many years. But it was one of the most curious things that, although these beautiful Tenderlynn belles attracted flocks of admirers, it seemed to be quite beyond their power to get themselves led to the sacred altar of marriage. Everybody admired them, nobody would marry them. This I could never understand, for they certainly did seem to me to be as likely pair as any in Flowerdale, or even in wide Mellowshire. Social philosophers—these are the wise men, Athene explained the difficulty by saying that the Misses Welltones were too extravagant; and that their style of living would have quickly ruined the most prosperous young man in Tenderlynn. The consequence was that the most prosperous young man went half-a-mile farther up the valley and married Jenny Fenshaw, the blacksmith's daughter, who was a very quiet little maiden indeed, and altogether unostentatious; but who, in spite of these serious drawbacks, made one of the very best, most careful, and most handsomely wived that a sensible man could desire.

I ought to have told you before this, Athene, that the Welltones had an uncle in the Indian Civil Service—that is, he was in the employment of Government, but as a soldier. This uncle, whose name was Patrick Wyntoun, was a widower, supposed to be wealthy, and the father of one child—a daughter, named Fanny Wyntoun, fully ten years of age. The only proof which the Welltones possessed of their uncle's riches was based upon the annual present which he usually sent them about Christmas. This merry season was approaching; both the young ladies were growing nervous, and at odd hours would commence discussing the probable character and value of the expected package. I rather suspect that the dashing sisters were at particular time unusually hard up. Whatever the Indian present might be, therefore, it could neither come soon nor be too bulky.

At length, one morning within a week of Christmas the postman was seen advancing towards their cottage sight which set their heart into a high state of nervous palpitation. This, they declared, must be the usual heralding the Indian hamper. Let her it certainly was, and from India, too; but its contents only revealed that these extravagant sisters could no longer expect to receive either letters or presents from the East. Their uncle was dead! He had died of a fever caught during a journey down the Jumna, from Delhi to Allahabad. The letter was written by a friend of Mr. Wyntoun, who attended him in his illness, and received his last brief instruction which related chiefly to the future of his poor little daughter Fanny, who had been living with friendly neighbours in Calcutta during her father's long absence in the interior of the country. It was Mr. Wyntoun's earnest desire so ran the letter—that his daughter should be sent home to England and to the care of her cousins—the Misses Welltone, Tenderlynn, Mellowshire. It was a great shock to these expectant ladies to learn that their uncle had died shamefully poor—leaving little more, indeed, than would decently fetch Fanny home; and that the present which they would receive from Calcutta should be, of all things on earth, a living creature! and one, too, of their own species! I am ashamed, Athene, to have told you so wicked a thought; but I really do think that if their poor little cousin had been a monkey instead of a maiden, she would have been a great deal more welcome to the gayest, though neither the wealthiest nor the wisest cottage in Flowerdale. The monkey would have proved immensely attractive to the young gentlemen of Tenderlynn; while Fanny, it was already anticipated, would only be an unmanageable encumbrance.

It was, therefore, with feelings of disappointment and chagrin that Louisa and Caroline Welltone waited the arrival of their orphan cousin from India. But it was a fortunate thing that the child happened to reach Vale Cottage on the very day before Christmas. At that season all hearts, even the flintiest, open somewhat to the genial sacred influences of the time. Everybody about Tenderlynn was in the excitement of preparation for the morrow's festivities; and, consequently, nobody had time or room for the expression of the heartless thoughts of the head. Fanny Wyntoun's reception was, indeed, hardly what it might have been; but, taking all things into account, it was by no means unkindly. For the present, at least, the sisters exerted themselves with a fair show of heartiness and good nature, and contrived to make their cousin's position comfortable, if not perfectly happy. The black-eyed, dark-haired little lady had just entered her eleventh year; and, although the shadow of her father's death still lay on her memory, she enjoyed her first Christmas in England with evident pleasure. She was greatly liked by the Christmas party at Vale Cottage. Her sad history; her quiet, graceful appearance; and her very peculiar charm in her manner—which everybody felt but nobody could explain—created in her favour a decided and honourable feeling of friendship. This feeling was deepened in the hearts of the guests by the style in which the little child sang a couple of songs. They were extremely simple things—one a cradle song, set to music, which seemed to have been blown across a field of poppies; and the other, the song of the sea-wind, which had something so altogether rich and strange in its breezy melody, as at once to flood the mind with a beautiful vision of the sea. Both of these songs little Fanny learned from her Hindoo nurse, Aldee—a woman who had been brought from the Upper Ganges to watch over the delicate infancy of the English child.

At the conclusion of the party, Fanny was a general favourite; but, unhappily, not a particular favourite of her cousins, who were rather piqued at the deep interest which all seemed to take in the Indian waif—so they called her—that had been sent to them from the land of the rising sun.

CHAPTER II.

NIGHTINGALE, MERMAID, AND GHOST.

Did you not tell me, Athene, when we visited Tenderlynn, two years ago, that you liked the village so much that you could dwell in it for ever? I do not wonder at that. Of all the sea-villages I know, it is by far the loveliest. Tenderlynn is the mildest nook in Mellowshire, and Mellowshire is the mildest county in England. Couched in the innermost bend of a bay, with a range of romantically tumbled cliffs to the north; to the south, the most radiant of sandy beaches; and, behind, the great woods and gentle hills of Flowerdale, receding slowly and gradually from the sea, as if unwilling to be placed so far inland from the shining brine—it is a nest in which the Fairy Queen might have set up a new throne, and forgotten that there was any other land of Faery. It is a place which no one can choose but love; and like you, Athene, I love it very dearly—so dearly, indeed, that often in the middle of the crowded street it starts into my mind like a sudden vision, when the city vanishes into its own dusky air, and for a brief but delicious interval I wander on the self-same sands where, you remember, we used to race and scamper, or watch the distant ships as they melted, like white-winged pilgrim doves, into the dim light of the evening sky.

If boys and girls, and men and women, could be happy at all, would you not think that it should be in beautiful Tenderlynn?

'Ah! surely it should. I should like so much to return to the dear old town! How very, very happy must Fanny Wyntoun have been to have a home in so sweet a place.'

Nay, there you are mistaken. The pretty little maiden was quite otherwise than happy—she was, indeed, extremely miserable. You open your eyes, and seem to wonder at that. I am sorry to say, Athene, that there is nothing in the sad truth so very wonderful after all. The sorrow of the world is more than you think, or can yet know it to be. I, knowing the griefs of men, do not wonder at them; but to me it is always a sad thing to see children so young as Fanny Wyntoun so deeply unhappy as she was, even amid the peaceful beauty of Tenderlynn. But grief is no respecter of persons, times, or places. It will enter the heart of a king in his palace, on his coronation-day, with as little compunction as it entered the tender breast of poor Fanny.

But you ask with your eyes what was the reason of Fanny's unhappiness? Her cousins did not love her. This was the source of all her woe; and a poisonous source it was. After that Christmas night, when the child made so many friends by her singing, both Louisa and Caroline began to regard her with an evil eye, as if afraid that the little Indian would before long supplant them in the affection and admiration of the young gentlemen of Tenderlynn. But any person looking at the three together would have had no fear of such a terrible result. The two sisters were tall, and exceedingly handsome; while their cousin was a small thin creature—the veriest reed beside a couple of great chestnut trees in full blossom. Yet these fair sisters had one notable defect. They resembled certain Abyssinian birds, which, so far as shape, size, and plumage are concerned, are all that the vainest of birds, not excepting the peacock, could desire. When you see or imagine these splendid creatures, it is almost an insult to be told that they are as tuneless as the pebbles of the Nile, on which they perch and pick at the sacred mud. Yet so it is. It was just the same with the Welltones, who thus singularly belied their name—the Welltones having, in music, no tones whatever; while the frail and insignificant Fanny possessed the purest soul of music—which is surely one of the divinest gifts which the Heavenly Powers can bestow upon mortal man or woman.

Thus it came about that Fanny was disliked, hated, neglected, and so rendered miserable. Being entirely dependent upon her cousins, she was employed about the cottage; and she was compelled to work, and did work with all the quiet diligence of a good servant. Her education was entirely neglected; and had it not been for the early training which she received in India, when her father and mother were alive, she might have been as ignorant as the commonest drudge of the kitchen, for all that her cousins cared. Nor is this the worst. While her cousins dressed like fine ladies, attended balls and parties, had parties of their own in Vale Cottage, the little slave, although of their own flesh and blood, was held so much in the background, that at last she ceased altogether to appear at any party where her selfish mistresses wished to come out in undisputed splendour. So cruelly hard did Fanny's position become, that it was quite clear she was not only over-worked, but also under-fed. You may well start, Athene, and doubt the truth of what I tell you. But it is all too sadly true—true as the gospel of sorrow.

For awhile at first, the people about Tenderlynn, whom the Welltones knew, were loud in their praise for having given their poor cousin a home. But the word home was too sacred a word to apply to Vale Cottage, so far as Fanny was concerned. To the happy, the word home is a full heaven of joyous recollections. The remembrance of her home in Calcutta—with all the tender blandishments of a father, a mother, and a nurse's love—only served to make Fanny's present situation more awfully wretched. For you must know, Athene, that it is not the memory of past joys, but the hope and expectation of future happiness, that can make our present misery endurable. Neither mind nor body can live on the memory of past feasts. Alas! Fanny was almost destitute of hope. She seemed to be fixed in the middle of a wide moor, beside a dismal pool, alone with the demon of despair, who was devouring her heart, and prompting her soul to commit an unspeakable crime. Yet the poor child, though neglected by human kindred, was not deserted by the good angels which attend on the sad soul of oppressed and tempted innocence. It was well for Fanny Wyntoun that she had been born of noble and wise parents. They taught her a great many good things, which she now remembered and cherished as the most precious jewels of her Indian childhood—they were the sole fortune which her father and mother were able to leave their delicate little girl. One of these things—the one which she had been most carefully taught—was the habit of saying her evening and morning prayers. These were so very simple in expression, that no doubt they might have been laughed at by the careless Welltones, had Fanny not taken care to repeat them in secret. Simple as they were, however, they brought to the child's heart great floods of consolation, on which she was lifted far beyond the darkness of her mortal misery. This was like a good little girl; and as mamma and I have often told you, Athene, all little maidens who remember their prayers so regularly, as Fanny did in her sorrow, are sure to find comfort and strength to do their worst as well as their best duties; or, as your friend the poet rather curiously says:—

'Prayer lightens and brightens and mightens
The heart and the mind and the soul.'

So Fanny's heart was greatly lightened of its weight of grief; her mind became clearer, so that she was able to know the right from the wrong; and her pure soul was strengthened more and more to grapple with her darkest sufferings, and make the best of the worst in the spirit of man's tenderest and truest Friend. One of her prayers was in verse—two stanzas only of which I can remember. Perhaps you would like to learn it. It is not so simple as the one which Silvertongue, Sphinx, and you can repeat. But hear it:—

FAITH IN SORROW.

Dear Father! who art, ever nigh
With holy hand and healing breast,
Oh! hear me—hear me while I cry,
And send me patience, peace, and rest!

Within the shadow of my grief
I wait for Thy divine relief.

Though blind with woe, I feel, I see
That Thou dost keep Thy promised trysts;
My soul is raised; I walk with Thee—
One hand within the hand of Christ!

But Fanny gained some consolation from another source. The simple songs which she had learned on the banks of the Ganges, from the lips of her mother and her nurse, often flowed into her memory, like voices from a distant land and a far-off time; and it was really wonderful how they soothed her in her sorrow, as she wandered among the cliffs of Tenderlynn bay, or hung like a dreaming flower over the grassy brim of the beautiful Pool Water. Of course, the poor child was too much of a drudge to be allowed many of these wanderings. Whenever she did enjoy them, however, her position always seemed for a time a little less dismal than the reality. Many curious stories are told about Fanny's wanderings and singings among the rocks, or in the woody hollows. Her voice was one of the most melodious that ever was heard in the dells of Tenderlynn; and in the twilight, when she sat on the edge of a rock overhanging the slumbering gulfs of the bay, chanting some weird Indian airs, the more superstitious of the boatmen and sailors mistook her for a mermaid. In truth, she was known in the village as the Nightingale, the Mermaid, and the singing Ghost—the last name being applied to her in derision by her tuneless cousins. I remember well—But what is this? Is Athene actually asleep?

'No; I am wide awake. I was only thinking how fine it must have been to hear so sweet and sad a nightingale singing in the dark wood.'

I have heard her singing in a much pleasanter position but not as Fanny Wyntoun—where, instead of trees and seas, she had thousands of human ears to drink in her miraculous strains.

'Not as Fanny Wyntoun! What, then, was her name and where was it you heard her?'

I shall come to that presently. But mark, first, what occurred to Fanny during her last twilight song on Tenderlynn cliffs. This is the turning point in the little Indian's career; and ought to be interesting, if I can do it justice. It was on a delightful evening, about the end of August, that the neglected little child had slipped quietly from Vale Cottage, and took a roundabout way to her own peculiar seat among the rocks, which now bears the name of 'The Mermaid's Cliff.' The spirit of the girl was exceedingly sad; for, on that particular day, the heartless Welltones had used her with unusual harshness. More keenly than ever did she feel the misery of her dependent condition; and, as she sat on the bare rock in silence, she looked across the sea with a sad, scared face, as if in search of something she could not discover. Her memory was busy with the past. In the dark, deep yet waveless agony of her mind, her early home, by the mighty Indian stream, was the only human vision that relieved her moods of awful abstraction. Her soul was clothed in the blackest shadows of melancholy; and even in spite of her infantile faith, she was on that night near the edge of despair as of the dark oily sea at her feet. Indeed, for a moment, in the mental perplexity of the child, the two seemed to be only one perilous, heart-piercing edge. It was a fearful situation for so young and so sad a heart.

But the darker moods of youth seldom continue long at a time; and so, after awhile, the clouds of melancholy which overhung Fanny's mind began to shake and move as if blown by a wind; and then they turned and twisted and showed little rifts and gaps, through which she caught occasional glimpses of white light—a vagrant star or two and something like a silver skiff sailing in a sea of steely blue, carrying a beautiful round shadow, like a prophetic in the mouth of a prophet, the fulfilment of which would flood the land and the sea with light.

So Fanny grew less sad; and it was not long before she began to warble, in a soft irregular undertone, stray notes of some strange melody. By-and-by her voice swelled larger and broader, like light spreading from a centre, and the luscious tones seemed to break like waves up the cliffs, but float like enchantment over the misty sea. It was an Indian song, which she and her nurse used to sing together—the one leading and the other replying—its name being ‘The Wind’s reply to the Stream.’ Just as she had finished her part of the song, she almost fell into the sea with terror to hear a clear mellow voice sing the identical answer which her nurse was accustomed to make in the happy days of childhood! She started to her feet and peered into the waves, for it was from the sea that the voice was sounding. True to the character of the music, the voice now rolled out the windy melody as if it would shake the sleepy brine into bearded billows, and toss the ships from their anchors; and then it would pause and moan, as if wearied by its long wrestle with the deep; but, continuing fitfully to writhe and sigh, it illuſively passed away into the cool vacancies of the north.

To Fanny’s mind, so apt a reply to her song seemed a most wonderful thing, and was for a time altogether beyond her comprehension. Although more masculine in its higher tones, she imagined that the voice sounded sometimes marvellously like that of her Indian nurse. At length she heard the splash of oars, as if approaching the shore, slightly to the left of where she stood above; then she caught sight of a boat, containing two figures—one at the oars—the other, muffled like a woman, sitting at the helm;—at which the half-frenzied child descended the rocks to meet the skiff, with the strange fancy in her heart that she was about to meet an old friend.

As she reached the shore, the figures had landed; and she at once perceived they were only a couple of strangers—a lady and gentleman—who had been out in the bay, to enjoy the cool beauty of the evening. Yet although they were utterly unknown to Fanny, as well as she to them, they were both so kindly, and so remarkably shrewd, that they contrived to extract the child’s history from her in a twinkling, which she related without the smallest hesitation. Their actual reason for landing at this particular point of the bay was, if possible, to discover the owner of the voice on the cliffs, to which the gentleman had so promptly replied. He seemed to be perfectly acquainted with the music; and, indeed, with all kinds of music; and he professed himself both delighted and astonished to hear one of his favourite melodies apparently sung to him out of the clouds. The lady and gentleman took an immense liking for Fanny—as all kind-hearted sensible persons would have done. Both spoke to her as if she had been their own child; and, very naturally I think, it came about that Fanny conceived a most confiding regard for them. So, at last, the gentleman asked her suddenly if she would like to go with them to London. She was rather taken aback by the question, and took some time to recover herself. Even then she hesitated, notwithstanding the lady’s kindly persuasions. But they did not press her to answer finally—they would wait till to-morrow, when they would call at Vale Cottage, and discuss the question with her cousins, whom they appeared to have every hope of convincing of the propriety and advantage of the scheme.

That night, Fanny was a little later than usual in going home; and her already brimming cup of misery was made to overflow, by the ill-tempered abuse of the Welltones—one of whom, in her evil passion, struck the thin reed of a girl, making her stagger till she fell, and almost breaking her heart.

That night, Fanny did not forget to breathe her simple prayer, after which she went to bed; and dreamed that the King and Queen were coming to visit her.

Next day, it turned out precisely as the sea-sent stranger had foretold. The Welltones parted with their little cousin with not a single feeling of regret. I am really ashamed, Athene, to tell you the truth this time; but the truth of the matter is, that these hard-hearted women were glad to get quit of their last Indian present, merely because they could not eat it, or exhibit it at Mellowshire county ball, in the shape of some splendid feather, or as a bit of priceless lace.

Two days after this, Fanny Wyntoun took leave of Tenderlynn, and, with her new friends, soon arrived in London; where she was taught the principles of music, and the principles of everything that goes to make a real Christian lady.

CHAPTER III. CINDERELLA THE SINGER.

Are you a good jumper, Athene?

‘Only middling. I don’t think I could leap over Farmer Boulton’s little mill-stream. Fred Escombe can fly over it like a wild deer. And, besides, though he was to fall into the water, Katie Hasley, the dairymaid, says that Freddy is such a duck of a boy he would be sure to swim.’

Indeed! I am not so sure about that. Fred Escombe has no downy feathers to bear him up, although I am quite certain that he is sometimes a little goose. Neither has he web feet, which are the great duck propellers. I remember, at least, before he began to wear shoes, that his toes appeared to be distinctly separate, just like the toes of Silvertongue. Perhaps, however, the webs began to grow upon him; and being ashamed, he put on shoes to hide his relationship to the ducks. People, you know, often wear boots and shoes for other than mere reasons of comfort. But, about jumping—do you think that you could leap over a mill-stream eight years wide?

‘That would be a funny jump! Who could do that?’

Well, you could do it, with a little help from your memory. How old are you just now?

‘Eight years, next April.’

That is the very wisdom of the mill-stream I was talking about. Now, suppose other eight years were come and gone, how old would you be then?

‘About sixteen.’

Quite right. Ah! then will come the golden age. Should you live, you will then be a tall girl.

‘I shall be as big as Helen Escombe, who is going up to London next week to live for three months. Shall I go to London, too, when I am Helen’s age?’

Perhaps you may. But I see that you can jump over a gap of eight years pretty well. That is just what I desired.

‘Why did you wish me to look so far forward?’

You shall see.

It was about eight years after Fanny Wyntoun bade farewell to the beautiful village of Tenderlynn, along with her new friends, Philip Rhondo and his lady-wife. Such were the names of the strangers. Now, this Philip Rhondo was a celebrated musician. He could not only make music, but he could also sing it, and perform it on more instruments than one. The flute, the violin, and the organ were his favourite instruments; but nothing delighted him more than to take command of a host of performers—whom, with the aid of a little silver baton, with a jewel in each end, he led to many a splendid triumph. At that time, there lived not his equal in England.

He was also very clever in judging whether any particular voice was capable of being trained to do great things. This was the reason that, from the boat in the gloom of the sea, he was able to detect, in the voice of the little mermaid, the spirit of one who could be little less than a wonder. You see, then, why Philip Rhondo was so eager to take Fanny Wyntoun with him to London. Both he and his wife (who was one of the very best of wives) determined to act as if the helpless girl were their own child—a resolve which, I am happy to say, they carried out in the kindest and most liberal manner. Nothing that could be done was left undone to perfect Fanny in every accomplishment that becomes a lady. But the good musician took especial delight in training into full blossom the musical genius of the little Indian. So, at the end of eight years, when Fanny had reached her twentieth summer, she was as good, and as handsome, and as accomplished a lady as any good, handsome, and accomplished gentleman could desire to set eyes on, with or without the aid of an opera-glass. Fanny had a style of beauty which the minute inspection of the strongest glass could not lessen.

You may well imagine that it was not long before the tongue of Rumour began to wag on the subject of Fanny’s musical powers; and also about her origin—what she was, and whence she came. As the time approached when her genius was to be tested before one of the shrewdest and most critical audiences in the kingdom, the tongue of Rumour was completely blistered, from the point to the very root, by the tremendous work it had to perform in gossiping to the great long ears of the Public—which it is awfully difficult, if not impossible, to satisfy. What idle people are capable of devouring, in the matter of pepper-and-mustard reports, is altogether marvellous! I verily believe that the ears of Gossip are as deep as the Black Gentleman's dice-box, which is reputed to have begun, long before the invention of Lucifer-matches, to devour the fortunes of gamblers, liars, and backbiters; notwithstanding which, it is currently reported to be even yet about twenty million miles deeper than the bottomless pit of Macbeth's witches, in the dismal dells of Acheron.

What Rumour did invent about the new 'star' who was about to burst upon the world with twenty-comet brilliancy,—it makes me laugh every time I think of it. One story represented the unknown Fanny as the daughter of an Italian noble, whose fortune went to the dogs only three days before himself—his only child being thus left in beggary, and compelled to sing for a living. This story was a favourite among Italian refugees in London, who were at that time extremely fond of upholding their country as the mother of every excellent thing except freedom—a statement which was, of course, an entire mistake, freedom her own divine self being everywhere the mother of all excellence; thus showing that the virtues of which the poor refugees boasted must have been second-handed ones after all—Italian shadows of English realities.

In reply to this story of Italian Rumour, English Rumour was wont to wink knowingly, and exclaim—"I know better. I know as well as you the difference between vermicelli and silk-worms, or Pope's-eye steak and Bull-beef. The fact of the matter is this, and you may rely upon it!—One evening, a few years ago, as a great English tenor singer—you know whom I mean—was passing along the street from the theatre, about half-way home, he heard a tiny voice mewling in the gutter, as if engaged in some discussion with Death. Scanning the object closely, yet cautiously, he found a little cherub of a child, wrapped in a yard of blanket. Now, the great Tenor's heart was more than usually tender, for the gods had been propitious to him that evening; so, he took the helpless creature home to his grandmother, who, on seeing the contents of the blanket carefully unrolled, shouted—"Saints!" and "Bless my twenty-five wits! what a lovely child!" concluding with the stern expression—"The heartless slut!" meaning the person who, in the face of all the stars, had dared to desert her own flesh and blood so heartlessly in the streets of the city. But the old dame gave the child bread and milk; and, when it grew old enough, the great Tenor gave it teaching—reading, writing, and music—what you will; so, between them both, here is a singer come with news from heaven, to shame the beladame Falsehood from the world, and make us saints!"

Were not these pretty forgeries, Athene? The making of the moon out of green cheese is nothing to them.

But, to tell you the truth, my dear, there was a very great interest indeed taken in the new prima donna, whose name was at last published as Cinderella. So absolute a change from Fanny Wytoun may surprise you, Athene; but, at that time, it was quite customary for both ladies and gentlemen to adopt professional names, which was done from the most honourable of motives.

By good chance, I happened to be in London at the time; and, more fortunate still, had the remarkably good luck to procure a place in the stalls. The night at length arrived, and I declare to you, Athene—and to you, also, Mother of Immortals—that I never did behold such a tremendous theatrical siege. I wonder to this day why the people escaped being completely pounded into human jelly, by the rush on rush that was made towards the theatre—the largest, by-the-by, which the city yet possessed. They did escape, however; and, when the house was rather inconveniently crammed, it presented a spectacle of splendour which would have made the French fashionable world, even under the beautiful Empress Grégoire, turn up the whites of its supercilious eyes in a sort of millenarian ecstasy. It would, I assure you. Take the two most celebrated books of modern times—"The London Directory" and "Burke's British Peerage"—and pick the best names from both, and you will be quite certain of having the cream of that famous audience. There were three dukes, and their enthusiastic duchesses, who travelled two hundred miles to be present at Cinderella's first opera. If that does not convince you of the immense sensation which was then produced in London—nay, even in England—I have only to finish you off by stating that the very Mayor of Tenderlynn, with four of his aldermen, and one or two other people, not worth naming just yet—all came to London with as much fervour as certain famous pilgrims used to trudge to the shrine of Canterbury!

I am perfectly afraid, Athene, to describe to you the character of the performance. The opera was composed for the occasion by Cinderella's truest friend, Philip Rhondo, who sat that evening on the orchestral throne, wielding the little sceptre with the jewel in each end. Never before, I believe, did that little instrument sparkle and flash with such imperial radiance, grace, and intelligence. It actually seemed to move of its own accord, like the staff of a prophet transformed into a living serpent, for the sheer purpose of confounding all disbelievers in the musically divine supremacy of Cinderella. If there was really any truth in this idea, it was perfectly successful. Mr. Rhondo's work was declared by the Times, the Athenæum, and other musical authorities, to be the most delicious piece of operatic composition which had been produced for fifty years; and the new prima donna was lauded as being the greatest that had ever appeared in England. The latter criticism was at least emphatically true. I will not, because I cannot, describe my own sensations under the spell of Cinderella. I shall merely mention that it made knightly warriors forget their stars and garters, and duchesses forget their zones of gold and coronets of gems—a couple of the most marvellous things which have occurred since the institution of Rascaldom in England by Sir Mordred, King Arthur's wicked nephew—of whom I read to you only the other evening, in Mr. Tennyson's golden 'Idylls,' which ought to be recommended to all saints worthy of the name.

At the conclusion of the piece, there burst forth such an awful series of bravos and cheers as make these feeble words of mine the most beggarly rags of English. It was three thousand shouting like one. Never was the blazing word 'triumphant' more properly applied to any musical performance than to Cinderella's 'first appearance.'

But now, Athene, one of the most curious features of the evening remains to be told; and I have purposely avoided earlier mention of it, in order that you might see it when the dust of applause has cleared away. Near the conclusion of the second part of the opera, when Cinderella—who represented the character of a neglected and cruelly-oppressed maiden—had reached one of the most pathetic and heart-melting passages in the piece, the whole audience became completely fascinated and spell-bound under the liquid expression of her melodious woe. I never beheld so many people whose very existence appeared so visibly to hang upon the continuance of the singer's voice. It put me in mind of a huge ship, full of people, carried up a great swell of the sea, and suspended for a brief space—a space in which time seems, in the agony of the imagination, to stretch into eternity. At this breathless juncture, several sudden but half-smothered cries of pain rose from the middle of the pit, and were heard in every part of the theatre. Being in the stalls, I distinctly heard the name 'Fanny Wytoun' gasped out several times, by the person or persons whose involuntary exclamation had disturbed and somewhat angered the rapt audience. At that time, I knew nothing whatever of Fanny Wytoun, not even the name; and I was therefore altogether in the dark as to the meaning of the expressions. That part of the opera immediately afterwards came to an end, and before the ringing cheers had entirely died away, I observed that one lady in the pit had fainted, and was carried out, attended by another lady and one gentleman, both of whom were ghastly white. I at once concluded that it must have been one or all of that party of three who had uttered the painful cries. This guess was perfectly correct; but I did not learn the fact till several years after, when I was told the whole of this curious story.

Now, who do you think these three were—who, of all that vast assembly, appeared to be the only persons who knew the private name of Fanny, and who seemed also to be peculiarly affected by her singing? Can you not guess, Athens?

'No; I cannot think who they could be.'

Well, they were neither more nor less than Fanny Wyntoun's cruel-hearted cousins, the Welltones, all the way from Tenderlynn. What do you think of that, my girl? Wasn't it very like a judgment on the foolish pair? The gentleman who accompanied them was the husband of Caroline, she who had fainted. About three years after Fanny had vanished from Tenderlynn, this one dashing belle—finding it impossible to catch the eye of the banker, at both of whom she had set her cap—was compelled at length to sacrifice herself upon John Ashville, a jolly master-butcher of the village, who, in spite of his wife, had so thriven in the world, that he was now an alderman, and was able, therefore, to accompany his musical friend the mayor, to see and hear the mysterious Cinderella. John Ashville was kind enough to take his wife's still unmarried sister, Louise, to bear her company to London. Of course, all thought of Fanny had vanished from their minds. She might have been bad for aught they knew, or seemed to care. When, therefore, they discovered in the full-blown rose of womanhood, which Cinderella did now most truly appear, the worthless bud that they had so ruthlessly thrust at their door, they felt as if they were suddenly consumed by an avenging angel. The discovery of their new wooed but now triumphant cousin struck them to the heart like a sword of lightning.

They went back to Tenderlynn a madder couple than they had come to London; and I think that their wisdom, if any, was slightly increased.

From the first night of her appearance, Cinderella was all the rage. There never was a singer like Cinderella. The very walls of London seemed to blossom with the name of Cinderella. Her name was in everybody's mouth, and her image was in everybody's heart. Every fellow all fell in love with Cinderella. It was like a truth that one or two actually went mad from the great and the beautiful prima donna; and from good authority that, before she was six years before the public, she had received six offers of marriage—one of them from a duke! I do not wonder at this—it was the natural homage which beauty, grace, and greatness, combined in a youthful maiden, would fail to command.

Cinderella, without being insensible to the genuine admiration they implied, resisted all such advancements, at whatever quarter they came. So, for two years, she pursued a most successful career, visiting the principal English and Continental cities, always accompanied by her accomplished master and benefactor, Philip Aldee, who, being otherwise independent, followed her pupil, through pure love of the divine art, and, after she went, smoothing her way in matters of consequence was necessarily ignorant.

CHAPTER IV.

OLD FRIENDS AND NEW TIES.

'Fie! wink! wink! Why, Athens, you are almost at it. Just keep up for two minutes more, and I shall have the rest of the story as short as little Typoo's tail. Now, say, you shall finish it yourself. You observe this is an old Times newspaper for December 24, 184—.' It is at the first column, and read what you see at the end of the second with a pen.

'That's about marriages!'

'Well! whose is the one you see marked?'

'Hurrah! hurrah! mamma, it is Cinderella's! Here is the 23d inst. at St. John's Church, City, by the Very Rev. Jewel, assisted by the Rev. D. L. Ashley, Edwin Rhondo, Under-Secretary to the Governor-General of India, and only son of Philip Rhondo, the composer, to Cinderella Fanny Rhondo, only surviving child of the late Patrick Rhondo, of Her Majesty's Civil Service, Bengal.'

'That not satisfactory? You still appear to be somewhat puzzled. Here, then, is a paragraph in the Morning Post of nearly the same date as the Times' announcement, which I think will effectually resolve the apparent riddle of the marriage. Just allow me to read it:—

'MARRIAGE OF CINDERELLA.—The marriage of our greatest prima donna with the son of our greatest composer is, in many respects, one of the most notable events of the present season. As our readers are already well acquainted with the English part of Cinderella's biography, which is altogether unique in its pathos and its triumph, we refrain at present from making special reference to it. It will be remembered that, on the death of her father, Mr. Patrick Wyntoun, Cinderella was sent home to England, at a very tender age, to the care of two near relatives. That she brought with her almost nothing for her future maintenance is a fact also quite patent to the public; but the reason of it has hitherto remained a mystery. We are in a position to supply the true explanation. Before he died, Mr. Wyntoun was engaged in a law-suit, involving property to the value of a hundred and twenty thousand pounds. The case was an exceedingly protracted one, and promised to rival some of our more famous Chancery suits. So much money did Mr. Wyntoun spend in seeking justice, that when his sudden death occurred he was nearly penniless. His daughter, as we have seen, was sent to England. By good fortune, it fell to the lot of Mr. Edwin A. Rhondo to complete the arrangements for Miss Wyntoun's departure from Calcutta—a duty which he discharged with such effect and delicacy, as to secure many additional comforts for the child during her tedious voyage. Mr. Rhondo, we believe, has been in England at least once since that period; but it was at a time when he could know nothing of the miserable condition of Cinderella at the village of T—. His last absence in India has been the longest; and he was thus only made acquainted with the fact that his father had picked up his former acquaintance, about six months before her debut on the stage of — Theatre. He returned to England in time to witness the triumphant reception of Cinderella. There were two special features about Mr. Rhondo's return which we have great pleasure in recording in conclusion. He brought the gratifying news that Mr. Wyntoun's law-suit—having been continued by two Calcutta merchants, close friends of the deceased—had resulted in favour of Cinderella—which, it was surmised, would be as good as seventy thousand pounds to her, after the payment of all expenses. But, besides bringing this news, Mr. Rhondo had actually brought Cinderella's Hindoo nurse. Faithful and tender-hearted Aldee had never forgotten the child whom she had suckled and tended from its birth on the banks of the Ganges. She watched with eager interest the course of her late master's law-suit; and when it was finished in favour of his surviving daughter, and knew that Mr. Rhondo was about to return to England, she besought him with such irresistible pathos to take her to see her dear English child, that he determined to accede to her passionate desire. We believe that Aldee suffered greatly on the voyage; and we have been told that the meeting between the two long separated friends was one of the most indescribably melting scenes that was ever witnessed by human eyes.

Our task is done. The reader can easily imagine the beginning of that mutual attachment between Mr. Edwin A. Rhondo and Cinderella, whose happy consummation took place only two days ago.

If anything could possibly be imagined to sadden the bridal ceremony, it would perhaps be the absence of Aldee. This most loyal and affectionate creature only survived her arrival in England about six months. But, knowing that her child was safe, the Hindoo nurse died happy, trusting in the merciful Father of all living, whom she had been taught to worship by the parents of Cinderella, in happy days long ago on the banks of her Indian stream.'

EPILOGUE.

Narrator.—Come now, both of you, tell me whether you are satisfied with the fortunes of Cinderella? Were they too great or too small—too easily won or tardy in coming?

House-Mother.—It is my opinion that the end is altogether satisfactory; but you were rather tedious in arriving at it. I do not think that Cinderella's fortunes were a bit too great—nothing being too great for one so sensible, patient, and good. Cinderella, like all of her superior genius, was evidently greater than any possible fortune. Besides, to such persons, fortune comes neither too soon nor too late—coming, as it generally must, as the rigid consequence of severe and patient though active endurance, sometimes amounting to as black and as fiery a sweat as any African slave ever poured from his manacled soul and body.

Athens.—It was very neat of young Mr. Rhondo to bring home news of the Indian fortune. And then to think that he should fetch dear old Aldee from the banks of the Ganges; and then marry Cinderella, whom he had met so many years before! It was very neat. But it is a fine story. I should like to hear Cinderella in one of her favourite operas. But does she sing at all now?

Narrator.—Not very often; and, when she does sing, it is as much for the benefit of others as for her own good. She is one of the most charitable women in England. Only think of her having privately saved Louisa Wellstone, one of her bitter cousins, from actual beggary. Louisa married a commercial-traveller, who took her to the south of England, where they lived comfortably enough for some time. But Jack Highway seemed to be constructed on the principles of the steam-engine. He was always drinking, but never satisfied; always steaming, but never advancing his own fortunes; till at last he came into horrible collision with another Jack Highway, and, after a frightful attempt to tear each other's wheels off, burst each other's boilers, and do a hundred other terrible things, they tumbled over an embankment into a deep ditch, where they were found next morning, fastened to each other with the hooks of death, their mouths overflowing with congenial mud. There being no damages for such disgraceful deaths, Louisa and her two children were left entirely destitute. Cinderella had them quietly looked after, and made quite comfortable, so that the selfish cousin never so much as suspected that the relation she had so deeply wronged was her kind benefactress. That is only one of Cinderella's secret and silent charities. I ought to say, in conclusion, that the great singer is everywhere respected, and by everybody beloved. She received many splendid tokens of admiration, some of which were from persons of distinguished station and birth. But the most highly-prized of all her treasures is a beautiful bracelet, set with gems, which was presented to her by Her gracious Majesty, our own beloved Queen—whom the Heavens continually bless!

House-Mother.—Amen!

Athens.—Amen!

Narrator.—My tale is told. (Clock strikes.) Good night, Athens; that is eleven o'clock—which is a full hour beyond your usual time.

Athens.—Good-night, papa; and don't let that picture bewitch you any more.

(Exeunt House-Mother and Athens—leaving Narrator sitting before the fire, with his eyes fixed on the very picture against which he has been warned. He consequently goes off into a mythological brown study, in the course of which he wanders up the glens of Olympus; and, singular to relate, comes to the edge of a burning crater, into which he is about to tumble, when his wife pulls him back by an occipital lock, whereat he awakens, and finds himself sprawling on the floor—saved, by a hair, from falling into his own fire. Has a hearty laugh, accompanied by the Mother of Immortals; smokes a weed, in which said Mother declines to share; and then retires to bed just as the midnight steeples are proclaiming that Christmas morn—while as the angel of charity—is winging her way from the under world, to make known to the sons of men that there may still be another living chance of redeeming the dead past.)

CHRISTMAS.

HAPPY Christmas! gladsome Christmas!

Thou art with me once again;

Crown'd with red-ripe holly berries,

Hope and beauty in thy train.

Canst thou tell me, canst thou tell me,

All the changes thou hast seen—

Smiles on brightly beaming faces,

Shades where once such smiles have been?

Doest thou miss the voice of dear ones,
With their sweet and loving tones?
See around thee vacant places
In our dwellings, sad and lone?
Hast thou pass'd the darker dwellings,
'Where so silently they sleep?
Hast thou thought on all who loved them,
Left behind to wait and weep?

Didst thou see the smile had faded
From a tender mother's face?
And the look of anxious watching
That was resting in its place?
Didst thou miss a sound of laughter,
And a step of bounding glee?
Did she tell thee, sadly, fondly,
Of her brave boy on the sea?

Hast thou stood beside the sick bed;
Watch'd the swiftly ebbing breath—
Seen the faces we love dearly
Shadow'd with the shades of death?
Cherish'd souls away are passing,
In a brighter land to dwell;
Voices which so oft have hail'd thee
Now must murmur forth 'farewell!'

Merry Christmas! happy Christmas!
Didst thou leave the halls of gladness
To effuse thy joyous smiles
O'er the homes of want and sadness?
Didst thou cheer the heart, nigh bursting
With its sorrow and its sighing?
Didst thou gather fondly round thee
Little hungry children, crying?

Tell me, tell me, dear kind Christmas!
Hast thou been where true friends meet;
For methinks I see thee smiling
Warmly, while they warmly greet?
Whisper softly, thy old Christmas!
Hast thou been—? My heart says where:
Didst thou look on aught that told thee
I was loved, remember'd there?

Didst thou know again, old Christmas!
That young girlish face so fair;
Know again those laughing blue eyes,
And those dancing curls of hair?
Why that look of thoughtful rapture,
Beaming with such trusting pride?
She has knelt before the altar—
Happy, guileless, blushing bride!

Sly old Christmas! kind old Christmas!
Hast thou in the chambers crept
Like a fairy, with thy love-gifts,
When the little nurslings slept?
Brightest eyes have shone yet brighter;
Sweet young voices raised a cheer;
Tiny feet have danced still lighter
When they knew that thou wast near.

Hast thou seen the little strangers
In this world of joy and care?
Didst thou smile upon them sweetly—
Breathe a blessing and a prayer?
Look around, thou dear old Christmas!
Speak to me of all that's past
Since we saw thy hoary visage,
Since in joy we hail'd thee last!

A. F.

*. The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention, but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 14.]

SATURDAY, JAN. 3, 1863.

[PRICE 1d.]

THE LIGHT-RAY.

A POPULAR LECTURE.

Two seasons ago, a course of winter lectures was instituted; and it was recommended that they should relate, for the most part, to common things, or things of ordinary and familiar occurrence. To assist in carrying out this judicious suggestion, I made choice of the 'Water-drop' as the subject of a lecture which I was invited to contribute. The treatment of my theme appeared to meet approval; and this approval, I apprehend, resulted chiefly from my careful avoidance of all mere dry details of science. Glancing very briefly at the variety of phase and form in the water-drop, and the conditions under which this variety is produced, I proceeded to consider the marvels of life and force which reside in it. As I passed along, I endeavoured, according to my ability, to notice some of the more remarkable co-relations of moral and physical truth that naturally presented themselves to me; and my lecture, in its entirety and unity, was intended to indicate how much of beauty and sublimity surrounds the commonest object, when it is regarded not in itself alone but also in its manifold associations. In brief, it was my aim and purpose to throw a veil of Poetry over the dry bones of Science; and to show that the twin spirits of Truth and Beauty walk this earth, and are to be found of all who earnestly and reverently seek communion with them.

I now propose to consider the light-ray, that common yet strangely mysterious thing, whose properties and effects we learn—to the small extent that we can learn them—through the faculty of vision and the results of daily observation. But here, at the very outset, a difficulty meets me. It was an easy task to speak of the water-drop under its simplest forms and conditions, because it is a thing we can see and touch, and of whose nature and structure we have direct sensible evidence. But the light-ray, in its essential nature, is a mystery to the child and to the philosopher alike. It is an unseen agent, marvellous in its doings, whose path we can ascertain, and some of whose operations we can trace, but whose physical constitution has hitherto eluded all research. A few of its most striking properties can, however, be readily determined; and these will suffice for our present purpose. Let it, then, be supposed that we are standing in a long dark room or gallery, and that a window at one end admits a small stream of sunlight through an aperture in the shutter; and that this stream of light traverses the room or gallery, and strikes upon the wall at the farther extremity. Very little observation will convince us that the path of the light lies in a straight or right line; for, whatever be the shape of the aperture—whether round, square, or triangular—that same figure will be formed on the wall. We shall next observe that when the light strikes the wall it is thrown back or reflected in every direction; so that, in what part soever of the room we stand, the bright space of the aperture can be seen; and if we place in succession upon the spot where the figure falls, variously-coloured papers, we shall see that the light is variously thrown back, according to the quality and colour of the ground. Hence, we learn that light is subject to a law named Reflection; that from almost every surface some portion is thrown back, and enters our eyes; and that this light varies in intensity according as the surface is more or less adapted for reflection. Let a piece of thick plate-glass be fixed over the opening through which the light enters, and we shall notice a very remarkable effect. The figure of the aperture will be sensibly changed in position; and consequently the light itself must have been diverted from its original course or path. Here, then, we have discovered another great law to which light is subject, named Refraction. By the simple experiment instanced, and by a few others of like character, we learn that the path of the light is uniform in the same medium, but is changed as it passes from one medium to another. Thus, it has one direction as it passes through air, another when it enters water, and a third when it is transmitted through glass. This refraction or breaking back of the rays of light by successive media, differing in density, produces wonderful phenomena in the material world, to which we shall hereafter refer. When the light is refracted under peculiar conditions, as in the case of its transmission through a prism, the effect is to disperse it over a considerable space, and cause it to exhibit a series of brilliant colours, ranging from red, through the yellow, and down to the violet. This phenomenon has long been regarded, and that by the highest authorities, as a demonstration that light consists of a number of separate and independent elements—that is to say, that it is not simple but compound in its nature. After years of thought and experiment, I am disposed to question this decision; but we are not now to enter into an examination of theories. Let it suffice, for the present hour, that one of the effects of refraction is to resolve light into variety of colour. Pursuing our observations, we next place a finger over the aperture, and exclude the light, and at that instant the figure disappears; and when we remove the finger, it is as instantly seen again upon the wall. This in itself is sufficient to indicate another property of light—namely, its velocity of movement. Lastly, in the process of gathering up elements of thought, we are to consider that light must be one of two things—it is either a material body, bearing some resemblance to the scent of a flower; or it is a motion or velocity transmitted through a material medium, analogous to the wave force travelling through water or air. We have no analogies that can lead us to any other opinion concerning it. Now, we have already seen that the same quantity of light falling upon different surfaces is differently reflected; and that from one surface a larger quantity is thrown back than from another. Hence, the inevitable inference that more or less of the light enters into every body upon which it falls; and since it is an unquestioned fact that a body receiving more or less light in many cases transmits none, it is demonstrable that matter absorbs light and retains it. And, whether light consists of material corpuscles or rapid undulations, it cannot enter into and reside in any body without altering its constitution, either by adding to the matter that composes it, or by acting upon it as an energetic force. Before we proceed further, let us look at the few rough foundation-stones we have laid, and then raise our edifice as best we may. We have discovered that light moves in right lines; that it is reflected or thrown back from the objects upon which it strikes; that it is refracted or broken back in its passage through media of different densities; that it can be dispersed into a series of brilliant colours; that it travels with great velocity; and that it enters into, and is more or less absorbed by, the bodies upon which it falls.

Every person feels and admits that there is a wondrous beauty and majesty in Nature, as revealed to us by the sense of vision. Hill and dale, ocean and air, with their multiform and manifold objects, whether presented to us bathed in sunlight or shrouded in storm; whether contemplated at the sunrise or at the sunset hour, or under the effulgent radiance of a summer noon; in each and all we recognise manifestations of Omnipotence and a love divine. They appeal to our inner nature by a living argument universally intelligible, and grave on our hearts the truth so well expressed by the poet, that to man, walking in the dignity of his manhood, and feeling as man, 'the earth is beautiful.' And wherefore is it beautiful? Because He that created the earth and all that therein is, robed it with the light, and poured over it, in bounteous streams and in harmonious relations, 'the rich hues of all glorious things.' The thoughtful mind is continually being led to see and acknowledge an order and design in Nature, and an exquisite adaptation of all the parts to the whole. And the dependence and fitness of things is impressively shown by the action and reaction of light and matter upon each other. Consider for a moment what this earth would be if all the rays that fall upon it were absorbed. Operations might be ever going on beneath its surface, and looking towards long cycles of change in its constitution, but on and above the surface all would be chaotic blank. If man were present under such a condition of Nature, how cheerless would be his lot! Sun and stars, and other lustrous things shining by their inherent light, would be the only objects of vision; whilst earth and sky would be wrapped in profound darkness. Or, suppose that the light were uniformly reflected, and that one monotonous light covered the entire landscape—how wearisome and unlovely such a prospect would be, you may infer from the appearance of the earth when its wintry mantle of snow spreads far and wide. And yet again, suppose that all objects were perfect reflectors; that, in place of modifying and diffusing the light, they were mirrors, giving to the eye only images of the luminaries: the earth would indeed, in such case, be crowded with stars like the firmament; but the relations of man to man, and of man to Nature, could have no existence. The thoughts I have suggested are trite and commonplace; yet it is by occasional reference to such truisms as these that we are led to the Infinite power and Infinite wisdom in all the arrangements of material things.

But the beauty of the earth, as manifested to our sight, results in so large a degree from the conditions under which the light is reflected, that beauty derives much of its breadth and permanence from the operation of the law of refraction. If the sun's rays pursued one uniform path, if they passed from one medium to another without any change in their direction, there could not be perfect diffusion of the light: objects would be brilliantly illuminated on the surface exposed to the rays, but the ground, and all things immediately behind them, would be under eclipse. The landscape would thus be broken up into harsh masses of light and intense shadow. It is true that objects might, in some instances, be so associated and situated, in respect of each other, that reflection of the incident light would unite and modify the shadows; yet these would be exceptional cases, and of rare occurrence. But we have the law of refraction, and let us give a moment's glance at its effects. You will bear in memory that the path of the light-ray is continually changing as it passes successively into media of different densities. Now, the atmosphere is the great medium through which the light comes to us; and its density is not uniform, but, on the contrary, it is continually increasing as it approaches the surface of the earth. Hence, when a ray of light enters our atmosphere, it passes through an infinity of media before it reaches the ground, and its course, in place of being a right line, becomes a curve. We shall presently see the value of this curvilinear motion. Let us first endeavour to comprehend what the atmosphere is—that view of the ocean in which we live and move and have our being. We cannot see it, yet we feel its force; and we know it to be a form of matter so subtle and so transparent that it eludes the visual sense.

Now, although its particles are small beyond our conception, each one receives the light, and reflects it in every direction; and thus the illuminated hemisphere of our globe is covered with myriads of radiating points; and it is here that refraction unites its forces with those of reflection. The diffused and scattered rays, reflected by the particles, are thrown back into the general body of the air, under every variety of angle, to suffer infinite variety of refraction, until, by the interchange of the forces, the entire atmosphere is saturated with light. Everything on the earth is surrounded with this diffused light; and the direct solar rays, falling upon some portions of the landscape, and more highly illuminating them, produce those alternations of light and relative shadow that are so pleasant and delightful to us. But the light is not only reflected and refracted, under conditions that cause it to be uniformly diffused over that portion of the earth upon which the sun is shining. By a further action of these forces, and more particularly by refraction, it is more or less dispersed, and conveyed to our eyes under such modifications as are needful to give us true apprehension of variety of colour. We see, then, that by the co-operation of two laws the colour and structure of all natural objects are made known to us; and the entire landscape, of which they are component parts, is exhibited to us as a beautiful unity. Nor this alone: every hour of the sun's diurnal arc is characterised by new tints and hues; and, from the majestic rising of our day-star to its culmination, and thence to the final and effulgent glories of its setting beams, we have a varied and harmonious series of sublime phenomena. Other effects of refraction remain to be considered. We have already noticed that the sun's light comes to us through the constantly increasing density of the atmosphere, as through an infinity of different media; and that its course is, in consequence, a curve, and not a right line. The issues of this natural effect claim our earnest attention. Using the technical language of science, I might tell you that the sun is seen by us in the direction of the tangent to this curve; but I am quite sure that such language would be unintelligible to many of my hearers; and I therefore prefer to say that the apparent position of the luminary is determined by the last refraction, or by the direction in which the particle or wave of light is moving immediately before it enters the eye. The general effect of this action is to cause apparent displacement of all the heavenly bodies. But we must confine our attention to a single point—its influence on the distribution of light over the entire globe.

Before the sun actually rises above the horizon of any place upon the earth's surface, it reaches a point whence its rays strike upon the upper part of our atmosphere, and are refracted towards the earth in the curvilinear path before mentioned. The sun's visibility to the inhabitants of such place is the result of the rays he sends forth entering their eyes. But we have seen that only one direction of movement in the light-ray can be apprehended, namely, that which it takes at the moment it reaches the organ of vision. Hence, all the rays that combine to make the perfect image of the sun come to us apparently from a point in the heavens which that body does not really occupy. The consequence is obvious: we see the sun for a certain interval before he rises, and for a like interval after he has set; and long before the rising and after the setting of the sun, a modified illumination, produced by the refraction of the air, and known as the twilight, either ushers in the dawn, or prepares us for the shades of night.

I think I may assume it to be a fact known to you that the sun's apparent path around the earth is not the same at all places. At the Equator and within the Tropics the sun is sometimes overhead at noon, and at all times his meridian height is great; while his continuance above the horizon in the neighbourhood of the Equator is uniformly only twelve hours, and at the extremities of the Tropics it never exceeds fourteen hours. But in high latitudes his noon-day height is much less, while his longest diurnal course extends from eighteen hours to entire days, weeks, and months. Now, the influence of solar light and heat upon the earth depends in the one case upon the sun being either absolutely or proximately vertical; and, in the other case, upon the varied length of the day. We are now prepared to estimate and appreciate the effect of refraction in modifying, and to some extent equalising, the supply of light throughout the globe. In the neighbourhood of the Equator, and in the Tropical regions of the earth, the intensity of sunlight is so great that it needs to be relieved and contrasted by a long interval of darkness. Hence the equal or nearly equal length of day and night, and the brief duration of twilight, in those countries. But as we ascend into high latitudes, and penetrate within the Arctic or Antarctic circle, circumstances are totally different. In our own country, and in neighbouring and kindred latitudes, the sun's influence is less powerful during the day, and is continually varying from one day to another; and while this vicissitude gives us the grateful alternations of the seasons, it also limits the diurnal light at certain times to a very few hours. This reduction of the day is greatly modified by the refraction of the atmosphere, which continues the sun's light until he has reached a perpendicular descent of eighteen degrees below the horizon; and, according to the greater or lesser obliquity of his apparent motion, an interval, reaching from hours to days and weeks, is required to accomplish this limit of descent. As a single and striking instance of the value of refracted light or twilight, let us take the winter of the extreme north, which has been so graphically described by Arctic navigators. In the island of Spitzbergen, which reaches to nearly the 80th degree of North latitude, the sun continues for four months beneath the horizon; and, for this long period, total darkness would hang over that region were it not for the extreme brilliancy of the moon and stars, the permanent lustre of the Aurora Borealis, and the mitigating influence of an extended twilight. For a considerable time after the sun has ceased his diurnal rising, his descent beneath the horizon is only a few degrees, and hence a refracted light of varying brightness endures during a large portion of the twenty-four hours; and, even in the very depth of winter, there is a feeble twilight of six hours. We see, therefore, that a northern winter is not absolute, unbroken gloom. By comparison, indeed, with more favoured parts of the earth, it is cheerless and desolate; and, to those accustomed from infancy 'to see the sun shine every day,' it is oppressive and almost unendurable. On this point we have the testimony of Dr. Kane, who tells us with what anxious expectation he and his brave associates looked forward to the termination of winter in their icy solitude. He makes jubilant record of the returning light:—'Thank God!' he writes, 'I have this day again beheld the sun!'

(To be continued.)

THE TROUBADOURS.

A CHRISTMAS STORY FOR LITTLE BOYS AND GIRLS.

CHRISTMAS night had come down upon the Grange, and upon the Grange trees, and upon the Grange lawn, in a very orthodox manner. The laurel leaves were rimmed with silver; the pond behind the twin mulberries was a foot thick with ice; while all the holly trees, and the apple trees, and the cherry trees were thick and silent with their load of hoarfrost—looking as if each individual branch had been swathed in light and feathery wool. But inside the windows, whence streamed clear jets of orange light upon the lawn, the little Smiths were having their Christmas dinner; and I need not say that where the little Smiths were, there also were shoutings and laughings, and noises of the most miscellaneous description. Mr. Edward Smith, their father, was the 'squire' of that district; and had gone over, with his wife, to have their Christmas dinner at the rectory—leaving their elder daughters with quite a houseful of young people to amuse and feed. And then, of course, Emily Smith and Jane Smith, for their own amusement, had invited over Kate Sylver and Mary Jane Sylver, with one or two others; so that they had a very nice party indeed. Kate and Mary Jane Sylver, however, were a little more quiet than usual that evening; and perhaps I could say what made them at times so thoughtful and distant,—but I shan't.

Now there came unto the hall-door of the Grange two itinerant musicians, who had been escorted thither by Mr. Jobbs, the man who fed the squire's ponies nearly as well and faithfully as he fed himself. Jobbs thought the two banjo players were young gentlemen—friends of his master—who were playing what was a very common trick on Christmas nights down in those parts. But when he opened the door, and let a blaze of light fall on their faces, he saw that they were merely two of those miserable sham niggers who go about race-courses, or through villages, playing and singing for coppers. Wherefore, Mr. Jobbs was virtuously indignant, and was about to dismiss the poor men with improper language, when he was stayed by his young mistresses. They pitied the thinly clad shivering niggers, whose fingers had no need of paint, seeing that they were blue and benumbed with cold. So it was arranged and agreed that the two men should wait in the hall (under guardianship of the stern Mr. Jobbs), opposite the open door of the dining-room, that the young people might hear them sing.

Whereupon the younger of the niggers, in a voice that surprised every one by its sweetness, sang this song, while the elder accompanied him with his banjo:—

All is hush'd, and lone, and still,
Save the murmur of the rill—
Creeping slowly to the sea,
Murmuring so wearily.

Now the golden day is done,
And the golden-laden sun
Slumbers softly into rest—
Creeping down the crimson west.

Night-winds howl and rave no more
By the spirit-haunted shore;
But the sea-wrack's floating band
Idly stretches o'er the sand.

And the twilight pale and clear
Sleeps above the silent mere;
And the weary, sorrow-press'd—
They, too, slumber into rest.

This song pleased the girls, but wearied the boys; seeing which the elder minstrel twanged his banjo, and sung another and more cheerful song. But, first, I must tell you that of all the girls who looked grave and almost sad when the former song was being sung, none of them looked so sad and yet so pretty as Mary Jane Sylver; and the other girl said she was thinking about Harry Smith, who was now in the great city of London with his brother Ned. And this is the song which the other nigger sang:—

Oh say not in thy pride, old man! that youth is weak and vain;
Know that thou wouldst wish, old man! that thou wert young again!

The dream not that by length of years men reach to life Elysian,
Nor matter in thy pride of heart that youth is but delusion!

O well I know that thou, old man! hast dream'd many a dream;
And thoughts have flash'd across thy heart in many a sunny gleam;

Thou say'st thou early mightst have seen they could not prove but bootless;—

O well I know whose fault it was that render'd them thus fruitless.

The many things thou thoughtst of then wear now a different look:

'Old age must eye see further into Nature, man, and book!'

Thy present view of life and things I know to be a new one—

But hast thou ever ask'd thyself which was in truth the true
one?

Thy say 'the thoughts of men are wide'—tush! put a couplet into rhyme,

Thy words and asses ever will the senseless jargon chime!

Thy narrow view of life hath youth; old age hath much the worst
one.

Thy age, and joy, and love, and light, all dwell within the one!

The boys were delighted. That was the song for them.
They plunged their hands into their pockets, searching for all the well-worn coppers that had therein been tossing up and down for weeks past. But Mr. Jobbs, with an official scowl, interfered:—

'Come, moi masters, happen as ye'll be a-gettin' drunk with them there coppers, an' ye have over many on 'em.
Tas't well that:—'

He was going to eject the poor niggers when they had about very few coppers; but the girls once more interposed. They pleaded for one other song, and the strong Ned's relented. It was the younger of the minstrels who sang this time; and I think he must have made the song during the interval, seeing that there is some resemblance between the names 'Moradeen' and 'Mary Jane.'

Oh come, my own, my love, my sweet!

Oh come, my purple-crown'd queen!

I wait, I listen for thy feet—

I wait, my peerless Moradeen!

Oh starry are thine eyes, my love!

Oh starry are thine eyes, my queen!

And crimson are thy lips, my dove—

My love, my dove, my Moradeen!

The moonlight sleeps above the wave,

The moonlight sleeps above the green;

It sleeps above the rose I gave

To thee, my dear-eyed Moradeen!

And now the stars are out, my sweet!

Come down, my love-enthron'd queen!

I wait, I listen for thy feet,

My own, my proud-eyed Moradeen!

The younger of the two Misses Sylver burst into tears.
And the little girls came, wondering, around her, with manifold questionings and exclamations; but she refused to reveal the cause of her unhappiness. Suddenly, however, there was a loud 'Law!' heard in the lobby, and everybody turned, only in time to see the younger of the niggers seize the balustrade, and bound up stairs, leaping three steps at a time, followed by the other nigger, who cried out, in quite a different voice:—

'I say, Jobbs, tell Tom to fetch some hot water to father's bed-room!'

And then, what cries there were, and rejoicings, and shoutings! For everybody knew that the niggers were Ned and Harry Smith; and all the little boys momentarily expected to hear Jobbs ordered to take the dog-cart down to the 'White Hart' for their trunks—in which, as all the little boys knew, were wonderful spring-knives, and terrific sword-canes, and leathern-baited single-sticks, for them; and albums, and gold pencils, and such like fripperies for the girls. And what a kissing there was when the two niggers, now whitewashed, came down stairs! Why, everybody kissed everybody else all round, until several of the small boys were kissing the young ladies in quite a wild and promiscuous manner! Now, I don't object to kissing, when taken in moderation, and when fairly and honourably gone about, under the mistletoe; but on Christmas night especially the latter condition is altogether indispensable. I promise you Miss Mary Jane Sylver cried no more that evening! Harry Smith had brought her—What? Well, it is not right that everybody should know what Harry Smith brought; but it was very little, and very smooth, and round. And now, my little boys and girls, I end this story with a recommendation:—
Get a branch of mistletoe, AND USE IT!

WILLIAM BLACK.

GENERAL READING.

NOTHING is more common in the writings of the present day than intercalary assumptions of the knowledge possessed by the reader, of books alluded to in the course of the narrative or argument. Some go so far as to assert that all of us are intimately acquainted with Tupper's 'Proverbial Philosophy.' Everybody has read Clarendon's 'History,' of course. There is no one so ill-informed as to be ignorant of Grote's
'History of Greece,' especially the first two volumes.

Now, to borrow the language of slang, this is downright 'bosh.' Those who make such affirmations are evidently 'seedy' in the knowledge they have of the acquirements of their fellow-countrymen. Very few people have read through Alison's 'History of Europe,' Hume's 'History,' or even Macaulay's. The truth is, that books everybody knows now-a-days are short,
or they are novels. Long histories are known extensively as far as the first two or three chapters, or as far as the first volume, if it be of a moderate size.
In such cases readers will not now wait till the plot thickens and the interest grows. Patience is not now a common virtue—at least in the matter of books.
How different the state of matters a century ago!
Then the ladies were deeply versed in metaphysics and moral philosophy; knew Butler by heart almost;
and would have read through Schelling or Hegel at a sitting. Alas! the good old times! When will these fashions come in again?

Abstract thought, so much beloved by our great-grandmothers, is now esteemed lightly. It is of use, however, as affording a good subject of merriment among those who are so 'well acquainted' with the writings of its distinguished votaries. The mere mention of a fact such as that alluded to a little ago concerning our great-grandmothers, is sufficient to convulse with laughter the delighted reader. In a great dearth of wit, an oddity passes for a joke—

'Quam parva sapientia hic regitur mundus!'

For my part, I am inclined to think little of those who scoff at the philosophy of the human mind. Such must, indeed, be dishonest in their nature; for they do not know the subject they profess to criticise. Is not this gross dishonesty—dishonesty that would, out of prose or poetry, consign the utterer to shame and ignominy among his fellow-men?

But at present I would only ask the general reader of the present day two questions:—Have you read Milton's 'Paradise Lost'? Have you read Adam Smith's 'Theory of Moral Sentiments'? If you can answer in the affirmative to either of these questions, I have nothing more to say to you but that you are a well-to-do reader. If you answer both in the negative, then you are only a tippler in literature; and you may find the remarks which follow of some use.

What books are read now-a-days? In the general, those lately published—whether composed now or at any other time, provided they be new, light, and calculated to sit easily on the mind. As exceptions to this general rule, we should instance Shakspeare (we name him rather doubtfully), Goldsmith, a few parts of Cowper, ditto of Defoe, and a few others. The great favourites, after all, are the novels, as is well known. This fact is of itself, indeed, sufficient to prove our assertions; for those who read the best novels and the worst, as they appear, must certainly have little or no time for other sorts of literature.

The general reader of the present day stands very much in his own light. To prove this, we have only to state the delight experienced by those who read the two authors just mentioned—Milton and Smith. Of the former, we need say little; for, though few have read his epics, yet he could be criticised by any one, so well is he known, by proxy. Reader! were you ever, in imagination, in Milton's Pandemonium? Did you ever hear the Arch-Fiend debating with his subject peers—those great 'dominions, thrones, powers,' such as Beelzebub, Belial, Moloch? Did you ever, in thought, accompany Satan, as he winged his way to this new-created earth, and mourned, meanwhile, his abject condition, and tried to flee from hell—in vain, for 'which way he turned was hell: himself was hell'? Have you ever walked with manly Adam and tender Eve among the flowery glades of Eden? Did you ever listen to the story of the world, as it fell from the lips of the heavenly messenger? or did you ever share with our common progenitor his tacit and peaceful mournfulness, as he

'From Eden took his solitary way!'

If you have done none of these things, you have undoubtedly lost a rich treat—nay, more, a benefit to your heart and life.

Then, in regard to Smith's 'Theory of Moral Sentiments,' we say that it may be read as a philosophical treatise, or it may not. Happy the man who does both. A man may read it for its fine illustrations and explanations of the common occurrences of life. It abounds with illustration; and the whole is encased in a style as fascinating as ever was composed. But, believe me, the philosophy of the book is not difficult—perhaps easier than that intricate law-case in 'The Woman in White.' I give a specimen, which may be new to the generality of readers:—

'We sympathise even with the dead, and, overlooking what is of real importance in their situation—that awful futurity which awaits them—we are chiefly affected by those circumstances which strike our senses, but can have no influence upon their happiness. It is miserable, we think, to be deprived of the light of the sun; to be shut out from life and conversation; to be laid in the cold grave, a prey to corruption, and the reptiles of the earth; to be no more thought of in this world, but to be obliterated in a little time from the affections, and almost from the memory, of their dearest friends and relations. Surely, we imagine, we can never feel too much for those who have suffered so dreadful a calamity. The tribute of our fellow-feeling seems doubly due to them now, when they are in danger of being forgot by everybody; and, by the vain honours which we pay to their memory, we endeavour, for our own misery, artificially to keep alive our melancholy remembrance of their misfortune. That our sympathy can afford them no consolation, seems to be an addition to their calamity; and to think that all we can do is unavailing, and that what alleviates all other distress—the regret, the love, and the lamentations of their friends—can yield no comfort to them, serves only to exasperate our sense of their misery. The happiness of the dead, however, most assuredly is affected by none of these circumstances; nor is it the thought of these things which can ever disturb the profound security of their repose. The idea of that dreary and endless melancholy, which the fancy naturally ascribes to their condition, arises altogether from our joining to the change which has been produced upon them our own consciousness of that change; from our putting ourselves in their situation; and from our lodging, if I may be allowed to say so, our own living souls in their inanimate bodies; and thence conceiving what would be their emotions in this case. It is from this very illusion of the imagination that the foresight of our own dissolution is so terrible to us, and that the idea of those circumstances, which undoubtedly can give us no pain when we are dead, makes us miserable when we are alive. And from thence arises one of the most important principles of human nature, the dread of death—the great poison to the happiness, but the great restraint upon the injustice, of mankind, which, while it afflicts and mortifies the individual, guards and protects the society.'—(Part I. Sect. II. Chap. D.)

Does not the perusal of this passage incite you to the perusal of the work of which it is a part?

The strange taste of the general reader now-a-days may be explained by a reference to the spirit of the times. This is the age of penny posts and electric telegraphs. Men of business will now do in a day what would have employed for a week one who lived half a century ago. We can travel sixty miles in as many minutes, and faster. And so it naturally happens that we wish, and are in a manner forced, to do the same in regard to books. We read a three-volumer with lightning speed. We write—say twelve novels in the year. We read in twelve months—say as many volumes as were perused by Cicero in his life.

chanting over it as follows. The words were taken down as she repeated them.

Cagaran! Cagaran! loved little Cagaran!
Famous wee Cagaran! choice little man!
Goats wilt thou steal for me yet from the grassy glen,
Horses and heifers and sheep from the pen!

Cagaran, kind one! Cagaran, mild one!
Dear little Cagaran, hush! do not weep;
Goats thou wilt steal for me, bucks and wild ven'son;
The shore and the moor and the mountain thou'lt sweep!

So, hush thee and sleep now; hush! do not weep now;
Sleep thy small sleep, little dear, for my sake;
Sweet hast thou slept, then; soft hath it crept, then,
Over thine eyelids. Well, well may'st thou wake!

In this little lullaby, we have got a rather singular way for old age 'to dally with the innocence of youth.' Whether the song was popular and in general use, or only sung among the youthful caterans; whether it embodies the first principles instilled into the growing Highland mind two or three centuries ago; or whether it is a mere play of fancy, a bit of humorous banter on the part of the cagaran's grandmother, I have no means of determining with certainty. The production, such as it is, is unique in its way, and deserves being kept; if for nothing else, at least as a stray and strange relic of the times when 'the good old rule sufficed'—

'The simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.'

THOMAS PATTISON.

ONLY AN ARTIST.

'I hate Boats and Bainters.'—GEORGE SECOND.

Don't be in a hurry, Wilkins, to retire and become a gentleman, as I have been fool enough to do. It is no life for a man of any spirit, I tell you. I wouldn't give a good week in the old pitch and bristle line for a whole year of this humdrum. Here is a sample of it. Just see how I was annoyed last August, and all in the way of pleasure. My little Mary since her mother's death has, you know, had very much her own way with me. Well, she persuaded me to make a day of it with her in the Peak district, though I would much rather have run down to Liverpool to see how the produce markets were going. We of course went in our new four-wheeled concern—very slap-up and dashing, you may be sure.

Just as we were about to start, who should pay us a flying visit but young Dick Foggo, son of an old friend of mine. Foggo senior is a great merchant in foreign produce, but Foggo junior does nothing in that line except a considerable stroke of business in real Havanas—for his own proper use. He is a good-looking chap, but fast a little, and a trifle rough. Mary looked rather glum when she saw him—Foggo being no particular favourite of hers. Still, I could do no less than invite him to accompany us. Our journey going was dull enough. Mary pouted consumedly, and said little. Foggo and I kept talk up pretty well, but not to her taste. Our best jokes did not tickle her. She only yawned and looked tired when we did our best to amuse her. The forenoon passed in this uncomfortable way. Lunch at a roadside inn made matters no better. My little monkey was out of spirits, and would enjoy nothing. Foggo tried to enlighten her regarding 'events' about to come off on the turf. I threw out some notions about supplies of cotton, and business in general; and told what I think some very interesting anecdotes of my own rise in the world. It was no use. There was nothing but silence, or short dry remarks on her part, and she looked as if she would rather be somewhere else. We were going at a rattling pace along a rough part of the road, miles away from any house, when all at once we were brought to a dead stop, and the carriage nearly upset, by one of the fore-wheels coming off. None of us were hurt, and even Mary was not a bit frightened; but we all felt puzzled what to do. Foggo, after genteely hāding Mary and me out, stroked his whiskers carefully, pulled off his gloves, then drew them on again very tightly, and declared, in a knowing way, we were in a 'dooiced fix.' Buggins, the coachman, scrambled off by the lame side of the machine, and observed that he 'never knew no better come of them new-fangled patent haxles.' He had told master 'that 'ere long ago.' The linchpin was out and lost; and Buggins, after a tedious search, neither could find it nor anything to supply its place. I was quite helpless, and saw nothing for it but to wait till a blacksmith or wheelwright could be got to put matters right. But where to get one?—that was a puzzle. The nearest village was half-a-dozen miles off, and even there it might be difficult to find a tradesman able to repair the damage. Foggo repeated still more decidedly that we were in a 'dooiced fix,' and Buggins continued to condemn 'patent haxles' as of no use. This was all the assistance I could get from them; and Mary aggravated the case by laughing thoughtlessly at our awkward predicament. In this dilemma, up came a young man on foot, seemingly bound in the same direction as ourselves. He was a slight-made, genteel-looking chap, not over well dressed, but respectable. He wore a mustache and imperial, and carried a large portfolio in his hand, and a sort of haversack slung over one shoulder. I saw at once he was only an artist; and, when he accosted me in an easy off-hand manner, and inquired what had gone wrong, I thought the dog a little presuming. Still I could not help explaining our mishap, or refuse his ready offer to help us out of the difficulty. Mary looked at him smilingly, and Foggo with a frown intended to be freezing. Foggo, however, only froze himself; for the artist paid no attention to him, but received Mary's smile as payment in advance for the job he was about to undertake. In fact, though only an artist, he acted with all the ease and politeness of a perfect gentleman. With the confidence of a man who knows what he is about, and my tacit consent, he laid his sketch-book on the carriage seat, and took the full command of the work in hand. He directed Buggins to take the horses from the shaft, and keep hold of them till the repair could be done. Then he walked back a few hundred yards, on the carriage tracks, till he observed sure marks of where the wheel had begun to work off; and there, sure enough, he found the linchpin among the loose dust; and in five minutes more he had it in its proper place, the wheel on, and all right.

Foggo said, in an undertone, confidentially to Mary, that 'Surely this fellow must have been bred a wheelwright.' 'Yes,' was her reply, 'just as you seem to have been bred a tobaccoconist.' On exchanging cards with the artist, I learned that his name was Arthur Winton, and that he was by profession a landscape painter. He accepted my offer of a seat in the carriage with ready acquiescence, as a matter of course; and did not seem to feel the least out of place, though only an artist. Mary looked pleased, and Foggo deeply offended. A hint from Mary made the portfolio fly open at once; and its contents became the subject of conversation. They appeared to me to be mere scribble-scrabbles, not worth much notice; but Mary admired them vastly, and put endless questions regarding the scenery they represented. Winton described waterfalls, mountains, and glens; sunrises, moonlights, and storms, in a style that amazed me, and made my little monkey's eyes sparkle. Foggo's eyes sparkled too, but with rage rather than delight. He also tried his hand in the descriptive line, but made a sad mess of it—spoke of moors, ever so many miles across, where he had shot astonishing lots of game, and of rivers where he had fished and speared salmon till his clothes were as wet as water could make them. Failing to show off his sporting adventures in a favourable light, even in his own eyes, he became silent and sulky; and at length went outside, and took a seat beside Buggins, 'to puff a weed,' as he said, but in reality to blow off his indignation, which, by this time, had risen to high pressure.

After Foggo's retreat, the subject was changed to poetry. Here Mary came out surprisingly. In fact, though I knew her habit of poring over books, I had no idea what stuff she had been sucking in, till it all came out in a gush on this occasion. Shakspeare and Tennyson be hanged! The fine talk about them was more out of my line than even the nonsense about romantic scenery. What is the use of poetry, I should like to know, but to puff up flighty young fellows, and make silly girls dream with their eyes open. Mary's talk and soft looks at the artist not only surprised but alarmed me. More than once I gave her a stern look, intended to say as plainly as any words, 'Remember, child! he is only an artist!' It was all in vain. She replied in the same language, 'Isn't he beautiful? Isn't he clever? Isn't he a duck?'

My displeasure subsided into drowsiness, and, I am ashamed to confess, I dozed almost all the rest of the way. We reached home just in time for dinner; and without offending Mary, as well as seeming unmindful of the service he had done us, I could not avoid inviting Winton to take pot-luck with us. Foggo, of course, also remained; but his temper did not improve as the evening wore on, and the gracious manner in which Mary treated our new acquaintance became more and more evident. The upshot of it was that Winton managed to establish a footing in my house, which he has maintained ever since. I took an early opportunity of talking seriously to Mary on the subject. But I might have saved my pains. 'Don't you see,' said I, 'that Mr. Foggo is in earnest with you? You may have him at a wag of your finger. He is a man of large means and good connexion. If you want to be a lady, he is your mark. This other chap, Winton, is perhaps clever enough and agreeable enough in his way; but, bless you, child! he is no match for you. He is only an artist!' Her answer was a closer. There was no use in saying another word on the subject. 'I know,' she said, 'that Foggo is wealthy, but what would be the worth of his riches to me? He is of a nature that would make all the gold of California dross in my eyes were I to share it with him. Mr. Winton, I daresay, is poor in pocket lining. But though he has little gold, and is only an artist, he has the art to make all the world gold to me.' I believe, Wilkins, she has got all this nonsense out of her poetry books. Well, it can't be helped, I suppose; so I must just submit patiently to the prospect of having Winton for a son-in-law—though he is only an artist!

THE ROMANCE OF A SUN-PICTURE.

IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

MR. MELCHISEDEK PLAWTON, when first I knew him, was a short young man, a thick young man, a prosperous young man, and—as was acknowledged by all his friends and acquaintances—a good-humoured and facetious young man. So prominent was the latter feature in Mr. Plawton's character, that his friends and acquaintances gathered themselves together, one November afternoon, at 'The Hedgehog;' and, after deliberating two hours on the subject, and consuming so much liquor of various sorts that the landlord, in the fulness of his heart, promised his wife a new dress—agreed that he, Mr. Melchisedek Plawton, should be known, on and after that date, among their particular set, as 'Merry Melky.' Mr. Melchisedek Plawton, when first I knew him, was a thriving young stockbroker in the city, and our friendship continued till he was a prosperous middle-aged stockbroker, when it had so ripened, that the expression 'like two brothers' would convey a very feeble and faint idea of the well of affection which was hid in each of our breasts for the other's sole use. Our friendship was of the Damon and Pythias and Tam O'Shanter and Souter Johnny description, only, if possible, a shade more binding. Often, when we have, arm in arm (for mutual support), been vandering our way to our bachelor apartments from the club at 'The Hedgehog,' has he stopped under the shade of a lamp-post, and for the tenth time squeezed my hand affectionately, laid his palm on the breast of my shirt, and, bursting into tears, entreated me only to say the word, and he would proceed at once to Waterloo Bridge, and precipitate himself into the dark waters, as a slight proof of the love and affection which he entertained for me. Often have I stopped him in the same manner, and entreated him only to make one sign of acquiescence, and I would, without any unnecessary loss of time, immolate myself on the shrine of friendship, by putting my neck under the first cab-wheel that passed. But those proofs were not required. We never quarrelled, except once; and that was over a small loan, which he refused me under the plea of 'things being tight in the city,' when I knew that they were as loose as possible. However, I looked over that, and never referred to money matters again. It will spoil the strongest friendship.

Mr. Plawton was principally remarkable in the matter of whiskers, teeth, and gums. His whiskers were red, and his gums were red, and his teeth were white. He was proud of his teeth, and would have been fond of smiling, but that his mouth had fallen into the bad habit, in early youth, of opening too wide—showing, it is true, his pearly set of teeth, but bringing forward in very bold relief his red fangy gums.

Mr. Plawton was forty-five years of age when he made up his mind to matrimony. 'You know, old fellow,' he said to me, 'our friendship is all very well in the meantime; but we must consider that we are both getting up in years, and can't possibly nurse and take care of each other in our old days. I know that we have often sworn to each other that we would never let a woman come between our mutual affection; but, after giving the subject serious consideration, I have come to the conclusion that we have been mistaken; besides, I don't think an oath, made under the influence of 'Hedgehog' excitement, is binding. To the point—I deem it prudent to look out at once for a sensible, sedate person, with a view to matrimony. I don't mind confessing to you that I would like a widow; and I don't mind telling you, old chap, that I know a widow who will suit me; and, will you keep it a secret, if I tell you that I have proposed, been accepted, and am to be married in a month to the widow? and, as I have told you so much, my dear boy, her name in the meantime is Mrs. Crippets, and she has a well-furnished villa at St. John's Wood, which will be mine in a month, along with her charming self.'

'And her two boys and one daughter?' I said coldly. I had had intentions of proposing to the same lady myself, who was, indeed, an eligible match.

'Exactly so, my dear fellow. You know her, then? Isn't she a charmer? and hasn't she a nice little villa, and small capital in the three per cents?'

'She wears false curls and a weeping-willow brooch.'

'No, she don't; hair black, braided; cameo brooch—subject, Venus rising from the sea.'

Plawton was a benedict in a month, and the envied proprietor of Mangel Wurzel Lodge, St. John's Wood.

The more I reflected on Plawton's conduct in the matter of Mrs. Crippets, the more indignant I became. He had sworn to me a thousand times that he would never marry, and I had sworn the same thing a thousand times to him. He might have told me before he proposed, as I had intentions in the same quarter myself. Oh, how I regretted that I had not proposed a week or even a day before him! I know she would have had me. I was a frequent guest at Mangel Wurzel Lodge, and must confess that a few visits made me regard Plawton in the light of a mortal enemy. He was so supremely happy. I could scarcely disguise my feelings. In reviewing their conduct before visitors during the first six months of their marriage, I must say that it struck me often as positively indelicate. What would you think, kind reader, of a man who made a constant habit of kissing his wife before strangers? Plawton not only kissed her, he slobbered her—slobbered 's the word. What would you think of a man who would often excuse himself from his bachelor friends for a few moments on the plea of 'having to go and hook his wife's dress'? Plawton did this repeatedly before myself and a few more of 'the Hedgehogs.' They pretended to see nothing improper in this, but I could. I never looked on an article of Plawton's elegant furniture, but I reflected that it might have been mine but for his confounded treachery.

I am glad to say that I prevented myself from showing any 'temper;' but Plawton was happy, and by contrast I became miserable. Yet I am not a malicious man.

I had been absent from Mangel Wurzel Lodge a month, during which time I had neither seen nor heard from Plawton. I confess it was with a sort of fiendish joy that

I received from Mrs. Plawton, one morning, the following epistle:—

MANGEL WURZEL LODGE, Monday Morning.

DEAR MR. CRAWTON,—Would you kindly favour me with a visit at your earliest convenience? I wish to see you very particularly. My dear husband's conduct towards me has changed very much within the last few weeks. He is no longer the kind and affectionate creature he used to be. Would you please to make your visit as early as convenient? and oblige

Your friend,

JULIET PLAWTON.

I acknowledge with shame that I gloated over this epistle. If the reader had been within earshot when I received it, he would have heard me repeat, a great many times indeed, the words—'Serve her right for marrying such a nincompoop. Ha! I thought it would come to this. She might have known better. Yet I will go. She will want comfort, poor thing! I always considered Plawton a heartless wretch. Taste! She has none, or she would have rejected him at once, and waited on my proposal.'

CHAPTER II.

I went to Mangel Wurzel Lodge in the forenoon, when I knew the monster would be 'on 'Change.' I found her in tears. My rage at Plawton's perfidy increased tenfold when I saw her. What a figure! What grace! He must be a tasteless monster to neglect such a woman; and to think that, but for his broken vow not to marry, she might have been mine! True, I should have broken my vow in doing so; but if he was capable of breaking his, I had a right to break mine.

'Mr. Crawton,' she said, with the dewy tears in her eyes, 'my husband is a monster.'

'I knew it all along,' I said, blandly.

The dewy tears flashed in a moment like fireflies; her lovely frame quivered. 'You knew it all along, did you? It's false! He's gentle as a lamb!'

When I entered, and saw her in tears, I was forcibly struck by the resemblance which she bore to the picture of Helena sighing for love of Demetrius. When she had pulled me up in the manner I have just narrated, I could not help remarking the extraordinary likeness to the portrait of Mrs. Siddons, as Queen Cleopatra, when upbraiding the messenger who had the misfortune to bring information of Antony's marriage.

I was about to make some apologetic remark, when she interrupted me by relapsing into her former state of tears, and saying—

'Forgive me, Mr. Crawton. I know you are a friend of my dear husband's, and as such I ask your advice.'

'My dear madam,' I said—placing a chair for her, and seating myself beside her,—'speak freely. I am still a friend of your husband's. With reference to the little word still, which I have emphasized, madam, it will perhaps be more lucid to explain that your husband, madam, has wronged me. You have no doubt read Shakspeare. There is a passage in the fine play of "Julius Cæsar"—in fact, the quarrel between Brutus and Cassius (admirably rendered by Messrs. Phelps and Creswick)—in which Cassius says, referring to Brutus, "That you have wronged me, doth appear in this." I may say so with reference to your husband, madam; but still I know how to forgive; and I do forgive. I have no doubt your husband is now wretched—he is making you wretched—that is some reparation, madam, for the wrong he has done me; and I can now forgive him. Before, he was disgustingly happy; and I tell you frankly, madam, I did not like it.'

'Oh, Mr. Crawton! he is indeed making me wretched. I fear his heart is another's!'

'How, madam? Name your reasons. His heart another's! And have you any reason for supposing that the other's heart is his? Eh, madam!'

I will endeavour, as circumstantially as possible, to give you an account of the progress of the change which has led to this lamentable state of affairs.

'Proceed, madam, proceed!' I said impatiently.

There was no mistake about it. Plawton was making himself and his wife wretched. I could now forgive him in earnest, and pity him. It is a great consolation to be able to pity a man who has wronged you. If you can once convince yourself that you pity him, your wound is closed up. But if you can make himself and the world believe that you really pity him, you may consider the wound healed up, the scar gone, and no traces left. Pity is undoubtedly twin-brother to revenge. Oh! commend me, my dear reader, to pity!

'My dear Mr. Crawton,' proceeded Mrs. Plawton, 'you are no doubt as familiar with my husband's personal peculiarities as myself. You will therefore be aware of his passion for elocution.'

'His absurd passion for elocution, I should call it, madam. His voice is cracked.'

'It is; I don't deny it. You will therefore be able to sympathise with me when I tell you that it has been his nightly custom, when we are alone, ever since our marriage, to read over a play of Shakspeare's aloud—identifying each character by a change in the modulation of his voice. For a time his favourite reading was "Hamlet." You know the number of characters in the play. Hamlet himself had the distinguished honour of being interpreter in my husband's natural voice—that is bad enough, as you know; but what shall I say of the change to the accents of Polonius?'

'General expression and voice—aggravated case of delirium tremens,' I suggested.

'As bad, my dear Mr. Crawton; if not worse. But Ophelia's grave scene!'

'The reading of which by your husband in public, madam, would be sufficient to warrant a commission of lunacy being instituted against him at once.'

'I have had to put up with it, and with the hideous tones of his voice in all the rest of the characters.'

'Then I can truly pity you, madam, from my heart.'

'To come to the point, however, Mr. Crawton; about a fortnight ago, my husband came home about seven o'clock for dinner. He dined on'— 'What?' I asked, fearful that all this misery was only attributable to Plawton's digestive organs, and would pass away with his convalescence.

'Romeo and Juliet!'

'Good gracious!' I cried, starting up, and putting myself before the fire to guard the fire-irons. I thought she was mad.

'Compose yourself, my dear sir; I mean to say that he did not dine at all. When I hinted to him that the dinner was spoiling, he scowled and requested me to get me to a nunnery.'

'Been dining out?' I suggested.

'No, sir; my husband was as sober as you are at the present moment, but it was the first symptom of the great change. He read "Romeo and Juliet" that evening.'

'The brute! Enough to drive you mad, my poor lady. He was nearly expelled from "The Hedgehog" for persisting in reading "King Lear."'

'I could not help remarking that, in the character of Romeo, he infused a ghastly passion into the part that was positively astonishing. I took this as a compliment to myself, my name being Juliet, but judge of my amazement when I observed that, at the balcony scene, and at the other passionate parts, he was gazing rapturously at a small coloured photograph which he had on the left page of the book (unseen by me, as he supposed)! I watched him for a time, and saw the monster actually kiss the portrait, after the words

"Sweet, so would I;

Yet I should kill thee with much cherishing.

Good-night! Good-night! parting is such sweet sorrow,

That I could say good-night till it be morrow!"

He read no more of Romeo and Juliet that evening. I started up indignantly. "Give me that portrait!" I said. "I have been watching you, sir. Give it up this instant!"

'What!' he said, starting up, putting the photograph in his breast-pocket, and going into mock heroics. 'Part with the portrait of my sainted aunt! Perish the thought! Death rather!

"I'll say you gray is not the morning's eye—

'Tis but the pale reflex of Cynthia's brow;

Nor that is not the lark, whose notes do beat

The vaulty heaven so high above our heads.

I have more care to stay than will to go;

Come, Death, and welcome! Juliet wills it so."

'Come, sir,' I said, sternly; 'that is not your aunt's portrait. Deliver it up!' Would you believe it, his answer was—

'Madam!

"Whose tongue so'er speaks false,

Not truly speaks; who speaks not truly, lies."

'I could not get another word from him that evening; and since then his conduct has been getting worse and worse. I have tried every ruse to obtain that photograph, but as yet have been unsuccessful. I am certain, however, that he still has it about him. I am afraid that he has a liaison with the misguided creature. Oh, Mr. Crawton, may I ask your aid to assist me in unfathoming this awful mystery?'

It may seem strange that, after her absurd choice of a husband, I should pity this fair creature; but, nevertheless, it is true. I pitied her, and determined to bring that monster, the once 'Merry Melky,' to book for his conduct. I left her with the assurance of my sympathy, and the comforting reflection that I would have 'a few words' with her wretched husband on the subject of her great wrong.

Strange it is, but no less strange than true, that my heart was lighter when I left Joy Villa than when I entered it that evening. When I reached my office, I actually surprised myself, chuckling and imitating an Indian dance of joy.

I indorse Mr. Squeers' opinion, that 'She's a rum 'un, is Natur.'

CHAPTER III.

The next day I was sitting in my office, inditing an epistle which I intended to send to the recreant Plawton. I had a dim idea that it would be necessary to shoot Plawton; and I had made up my mind to do so if I found it requisite. I already saw in imagination the prostrate form of the infatuated little man writhing at my feet; and myself, with my stern look relaxed—justice having been appeased—bending over him, feeling for the spot where the leaden messenger had entered; receiving his last instructions as to the disposal of his body, and comforting him by the assurance that the great wrong he had committed against my peace of mind, by marrying Mrs. Crippets, was now atoned for—that I forgave him from my heart; and that he might, if he had a mind, die happy.

I heard steps coming up the wooden stair just as I had signed the note; and I felt a presentiment that the steps were those of Plawton. I was not deceived.

He entered.

I motioned him to a seat. He waved his hand, as if deprecating any intention of sitting down; and, folding his arms, looked at me with a melancholy expression in his eyes. My first idea was that he had been drinking. His face was dirty and unshaven. His linen was dirty. He had on a dirty paper collar, which, in consequence of the button-hole having burst, hung limp and yellow about his ears. When he divested himself of his hat, I observed that his hair was matted and unkempt, and stood up spikily, like the back of a red porcupine. As I regarded Plawton standing before me in that manner, I felt a momentary compassion for him. In the happy days of 'The Hedgehog' convivial meetings, I had often seen Plawton thus. I was accustomed to see Plawton thus very often, more particularly on the occasions on which he presented himself at my office to denounce some false friend who had declined becoming bail for him the evening previous. Plawton had a weird fancy for ringing bells and wrenching off knockers on his way from 'The Hedgehog,' which had led to a difference of opinion between him and the paragon of the night, necessitating the decision of a magistrate, and the consequent attendance of Plawton at the station-house till next morning. On those occasions, Plawton used to present himself at my office, for the purpose of refreshing himself with a bottle of soda-water flavoured with half a glass of brandy—the exertion of conducting his own case being fatiguing, and having a tendency to promote thirst. It was the remembrance of those days—when my old friend stuck to the orthodox British gentleman's pastime of wrenching off knockers and disturbing peaceful dwellings by a violent tugging at the street bell, instead of indulging in the more serious though British amusement of marrying, and then breaking his wife's heart by neglect—that caused me to have a momentary feeling of compassion for him. I confess that I may have been weak in yielding to this; but, as I mentioned before, there was no mistake about Plawton and his wife's wretchedness. You, kind reader! may have had the misfortune to get your pocket picked, or your silver plate stolen, or your best linen shirts pilfered off the ropes on which they were airing. Your breast leaves with virtuous indignation—you pay poor's-rates and taxes heavy enough in all sooth. Why should you be robbed? You become apoplectic with fury. Where are the police? Out of the way, of course, when wanted. You make a mental calculation how much you have paid for police protection since you became householder. The calculation brings out your wrongs in greater relief. You feel as if you could strangle the villain who has done you this wrong in your most sensitive part—your pocket. Suddenly a policeman appears with the trembling wretch, taken red-handed. 'Off with him!' you say; 'off to jail! Yes! it was from me. The property is mine. Off with him, at once!' and the officer sinks his knuckles into the neck of the culprit, and bowls him along to the station-house. You go to bed with a grim satisfaction. When you appear at the court next morning, you can't deny that you feel a sort of compassion for the poor wretch; and, but that his punishment is necessary for the protection of the lieges, would gladly see him dismissed 'not proven.' But if you saw him when his sentence has expired, and he crawls out of the prison pale, wan, and starving, don't attempt to convince me that you would not step quietly up to the miserable wretch, slip some loose silver into his hand, with an admonition to go and sin no more.

Influenced by this sort of compassion for Plawton, and knowing that copper or loose silver, considering his altitude in the social scale, would be an insult, I addressed him in the following words:—

'Good Plawton! cast thy nighted colour off,
And let thine eye look like a friend on Cawton;
Thou know'st 'tis common all that live must die,
Passing through nature to eternity;
If it be common, why seems it so particular with thee.'

The delicacy and consideration of my addressing him in those words of the immortal bard's, (need I say William Shakspeare?) will be seen at a glance by all intelligent people when I inform them that Plawton immediately took up the cue at 'seems,' and comforted himself greatly by delivering himself of the words put by the immortal bard into the mouth of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, commencing, 'Seems, madam! Nay, it is; I know not seems.'

'But tush!' he continued; and drawing near to my chair, he pulled out two sun-pictures or glass photographs, and held them before my eyes. I requested him to favour me with them for a moment, as at that time photography was in its infancy, and the figure on the glass could only be seen by holding the glass in a particular way. I noticed that the oldest and dimmest of the pictures was the likeness of an exceedingly pretty young lady, with curls, and a sweet Grecian profile. I noticed that the other was the portrait of his wife, late Mrs. Crippets.

'Well, Plawton,' I said, 'she is a nice young lady, and comes out stronger by contrast with your wife.'

'Cawton!' he shouted out huskily, seizing both photographs, and bestowing a glance of the most unmitigated scorn upon his wife's portrait, changing in one moment to the most beaming tenderness, as he regarded the photograph of the young lady, 'Cawton, look here, upon this picture and on this!'

'Exactly,' I said, interrupting him, coldly; 'you needn't go on; I can see at a glance, by the counterfeit presentment, that you're in love with this young lady, and are breaking your wife's heart.'

'To the death, Cawton, to the death I love her; break my wife's heart—bosh! too tough.'

Plawton's nose is ugly. It was uglier when he turned it up after making that remark.

'You are determined to prosecute this insane passion,' I said.

I should have felt disappointed if he had answered 'no'; but I determined to fight him—I mean, to challenge him to fight—if he said 'yes.'

His answer was—'To the death, Cawton! to the death!' and with a fiendish laugh he turned to the door and rushed down stairs, before I had time to challenge him to fight.

CHAPTER IV.

Immediately after Plawton had exited, I dropped the following note to his wife:—

CITY, Wednesday Afternoon.

MY DEAR MADAM,—I have just had an interview with the misguided being whom you have the misfortune to call husband. Your conjectures with reference to his insane passion are correct. I have seen the photograph, and I should fancy that the 'creature' is employed in one of the theatres—very likely in connection with the ballet. She is not by any means good-looking; but has a sort of plebeian fascination which I have no doubt forms the attraction in his eyes. I shall have the pleasure of waiting upon you to-morrow at quarter-past four p.m. I regret to observe that he is already beginning to lose all respect for himself or his appearance. For your own sake, endeavour to persuade him to put on a clean shirt and linen collar. Believe me, my dear madam,

Yours most sincerely,

PLANTAGENET CRAWTON.

I am inclined to think that I was rather an object of interest to Rebecca Ann Jane, the housemaid at Mangel Wurzel Lodge, on the evening of Saturday the 2d Dec. 18—. I wore a blue frock-coat, buttoned tight, to show the graceful fall of my back, and I also donned my yellow double-breasted vest with the mother-of-pearl buttons. I carried with me a winter bouquet, which I bought at Covent Garden. My intention was to show Mrs. Plawton that, in unting her fate to a wretched little stage-struck stockbroker, when she had the opportunity of having for her husband a tall, good-looking, essential-oil merchant like myself, she did wrong. She was alone in the dressing-room. I expected to find her depressed in spirits; but no! She rose to receive me with cheerfulness, even gaiety, in every expression of her lovely countenance. As I regarded the beaming lustre in her eyes when she shook hands with me, I felt certain that the unwonted cheerfulness was occasioned by my presence.

'Oh, Mr. Crawton! I can't inform you how thankful I am at your kind consideration of my condition. I feel as if I could burst into a flood of tears.'

'Don't, my dear Mrs. Crawton; pray, don't,' I answered. 'Never mention it. How is HE conducting himself now? Shall I be obliged to call him out?'

'Don't mention blood, Mr. Crawton. He is still my husband, you know; but a day will come. By-the-by, I have succeeded in obtaining the portrait; and she took from her pocket the photograph which Crawton had shown me in the office. I looked at it again. The girl was decidedly good-looking—a brunette in curls; but I thought it politic to hazard the opinion that there was a decided pert and vulgar look about her expression.

'She is, without doubt, a vulgar thing,' said Mrs. Plawton; and her eye twinkled again—whether maliciously, or with delight that I was of her opinion, I know not. Mrs. Plawton, I know, used to wear curls, and was also a brunette; otherwise, I should have said that nobody but vulgar people wore their hair flying about their back. If Mrs. Plawton had been a little less stout, her resemblance to the portrait would not have been very far off. We dined together, and I felt certain that I had made an impression. My suspicions were confirmed when, after coffee had been served, she sat down and warbled the following sweetly pathetic ballad, in a rich, falsetto voice, accompanying herself on the guitar, and with a peculiar emphasis on the words which made it very significant, considering my presence:—

EVER THINE OWN.

Though thy nose were a lighthouse in colour and sheen;
Though thy legs were both cork ones, thy whiskers sea green;
Though the hairs on thy head were sky-purple or blue;
My heart, dearest love! would beat only for you;

You, you,

My heart, dearest love! would beat only for you.

Tra la la, tra la la; sweet! the moon now is out,
It gleams on the river and gladdens the trout;
Let us roam through the turnip-fields, prancing so gay,
We can each eat our fill; let us haste, then, away.
Tra la la, tra la la.

Though thy home were a hen-coop, thy food straw or gram;
Though one eye had a squint, and the other were glass;
Though distorted thy form, and most hideous to view;
My pulse, love! would only beat faster for you,

You, you;

My pulse, love! would only beat faster for you.

Tra la la, tra la la; let us haste, then, away,

Where the haddocks and dolphins disport in the spray;

To the home of the herring, where mackerel play;

My skiff, love! is ready; we'll haste, then, away;

Tra la la, tra la la.

I spent an agreeable evening; and, at fifteen minutes past four p.m. I departed. On my road home, I met Plawton. He was standing on the kerb, surveying with every appearance of intense interest a row of scavengers who were sweeping the street. His gaze was not directed to any particular scavenger, but rested, in a melancholy philanthropic manner, on the whole body—as if he were accurately calculating how much it would cost to invite them all round to 'The Falstaff,' with gastronomic intentions. I touched him on the shoulder. He turned round; and, bursting into tears, placed one hand on the breast of his shirt, and, pointing to the row of scavengers, said—

'To what base uses may we not return, Horatio!'

'Tush! Plawton,' I said; 'this is unmanly.' His passion was either getting the better of his reason, or was leading him into drink. I was more convinced from what followed that it was the former.

'To think,' he resumed, snivelling—'to think of a peer of the realm being reduced to such a condition!'

'What do you mean, Plawton?' I asked.

'Don't you see him there, with the stumpy brush, the striped coachman's waistcoat, and the patch over his eye? That little man.'

'I do see a little man, with a coachman's waistcoat and a patch over his eye.'

'Don't you know him, Crawton?'

'No.'

'That was yesterday the greatest statesman in England! The man who, on a day's notice, could have undertaken the command of the Channel Fleet, and would have performed the duty satisfactorily! That, Crawton, is Earl Russell!'

'Nonsense, Plawton! There is no resemblance.'

'Care, Crawton—care—anxiety. His home—his heart's first home—was burned to the ground yesterday, and all his property lost—his title-deeds, cash, valuables, everything—reduced to beggary! It's sad, Crawton—sad, sad; but too true!'

'Come, Plawton, old boy,' I said, sympathisingly, 'let's go home; I'll walk back with you.'

'Will you?' he said, eagerly. 'Let's go, then. O Crawton!' he continued, pressing his hand to his brow, 'what nonsense I've been talking, to be sure. Forgive me, I feel as if this passion would drive me mad.'

I was really sorry for Plawton this time, he looked so genuinely miserable; and the remark about Earl Russell proved to me that it was slightly affecting his brain. I left him at his own door, and went home.

I did not see Plawton again till Christmas-day. He called at my office, looking very pale and thin. He had not recovered from the effect of his passion. The photograph was in his possession.

'I wish you to join us at dinner, to-day, old fellow!' he said. 'You are my truest friend, and I must have some one to talk confidentially to. The worry and excitement of those gay and festive scenes have no charm for me. I shall call for you at the office at five o'clock; and we can take a cab out. Dinner at six. Ah, Crawton! (looking tenderly at the photograph) this insane passion is killing me;—but, as the poet says,

“Who hears the falling of the forest leaf,
Or who takes note of every flower that dies?”

I have sought her in vain—in vain.

‘But think,’ I said, ‘of your wife, your dear wife, who waits impatient every day for your return to dinner. ‘Tis sweet, Plawton, to know there is an eye will watch our coming, and look brighter when we come.’

‘That depends, Crawton, on the brightness. My wife’s eye does, I acknowledge, watch my coming impatiently, and look brighter when I come; but the additional lustre is not attributable to affection. She is becoming a vixen, Crawton—a vixen.’

Punctual at five o’clock, Plawton was at my office with the cab. In half-an-hour we were at Mangel Wurzel Lodge; and at six precisely we sat down to dinner. My narration has nothing whatever to do with who were there—what was on the table—what Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Green, or Mrs. White wore—what vulgarisms Jones’ plebeian though pretty wife perpetrated during the course of the meal, to the horror of Fitz-Eustace Yawhaw; and the almost total collapse of that government swell when Mrs. J., in reply to a most condescending query which he put her after dinner, as to whether she would take a cup of coffee or not, replied that ‘she would prefer, hif it came to the same thing, a little gin with a mossel of sugar.’ I will not narrate the interesting dialogue which I accidentally overheard between the two Misses Sauerkrauts (whose carriage came for them at ten), in which they expressed their conviction that the whole affair was decidedly Brummagem (what they meant by that word, I couldn’t take it upon myself to say). I will not animadvert upon the discussions which the married ladies indulged in upon the subject of ‘servants,’ nor the pathetic wailing which they made over the gradual abdication of that race in favour of smart minxes with ‘airs,’ ribbons, crinoline, and impertinence galore. I will not even touch upon the strange conduct of that celebrated lyrical poet, Batterwhacks Hawkerton Snif, who came in late and dirty, with his eyes rolling as if he had been drinking—who glared at little Robinson, when that good-humoured little man offered to introduce him to a partner in the ‘mazy,’ as Robinson facetiously styles dancing—and who was seen to turn away, with his eyebrows contracted fearfully, and heard to mutter—‘Brainless clod! soulless, ephemeral composition of flesh and bones!’ (whether in reference to himself or Robinson, it is impossible to say)—who stalked about, speaking to nobody and muttering at intervals—‘Vanitas vanitatum!’—and who was at last sent home in a cab, in consequence of having partaken of too much old port. No! I will not say one word about any of these events. Why should I? What do you take me for? Do you think that I would violate the sacred laws of hospitality, by becoming a parlour spy or keyhole reporter, and sneering and carping at the peculiarities and pettinesses of people whom I mix among as a cotemporary guest? I am not a ‘chiel amang ye takin’ notes,’ and with a fiendish malignity vowing that ‘feth I’ll prent them.’ No; perish such base thought! I’d rather be a dog, and live upon the vapours of a dungeon! Therefore, I repeat, I will have none of this; but immediately jump to the great event of the evening.

It was about twelve o’clock. Plawton’s parlour and drawing-room had been thrown into one. Dancing, chatting, gossip, wine-sipping, biscuit-nibbling, apple-munching, nut-cracking, were going on as bravely as could be desired. I had missed Mrs. Plawton for some time; and, about half-past twelve, a note was put into my hand, by Plawton’s boy in buttons, with an intimation that ‘a party houtside’ ad requested it to be delivered to his master through my ‘anda.’ Plawton was sitting in a corner of the room talking to some of his guests, and, with a ghastly cheerfulness on his countenance. I caught his eye, and made a telegraphic sign for him to approach. I gave him the note to read: he did so. A deathly pallor overspread his features when he had finished—then an unnatural flush as he handed it to me. It was as follows:—‘The original of the photograph which you have in your possession will be in your garden, at the summer-house door, at quarter to one o’clock a.m. Meet her. The passion is reciprocal. She is ready to fly with you.’

Both of us paused a moment. ‘Let us retire to the scullery, Crawton,’ he said. ‘There is privacy there.’ We retired to the scullery.

‘Shall I meet her, Crawton? Shall I fly with her?’

The writing of this narrative is not partly but wholly a deed of penance. I confess, with the burning blushes mantling my face, that, under a pretence of censuring Plawton for even thinking of such a deed as deserting his wife, I in reality encouraged him to do so. Most artfully did I gloss over the sin of such an act. With Jesuitical finesse did I bring out all his wife’s imperfections; did cite precedents from the domestic history of the nobility and gentry of these and other realms, to justify him in rushing to his own destruction; did lead him on to the edge of the precipice whilst professing frantically to haul him away from the yawning abyss. For these acts I should, were this the fourteenth century, clothe myself in sackcloth, put peas in my shoes, and with staff in my hand, wallow by my side, and without a covering for my head, depart on a pilgrimage to the shrine of the very farthest off saint in the calendar. This being the nineteenth century, do I instead make a clean breast of it in the present narration, and throw myself upon the mercy of the great court of public opinion. I do not say, Rousseau-like, judge me as other men. I would not on any account take less blame to myself, because I am not the only precedent; but I would only put it to Smith—and in addressing that large family I do not risk becoming personal—Smith, have you ever given wrong advice? Come, now. When your friend Jones has, in the fulness of his heart, put his case before you (be the case what it may), and asked your advice, have you never seen the advantage which you would derive yourself by arguing him quietly to the step which he meditates taking; although you knew yourself that that step, if it did not precisely lead him over the brink, would take him at least one step nearer; and have you never strangled conscience for a moment, and given him the false advice? Have you never allowed secret envy for Jones’ position to prompt you to whistle for the wind which would carry his wavering barque nearer the whirlpool? Being applied to by Jones as to your opinion about Jenkins’ credit—who, to your sorrow, is deep in your own books, and whose account you have ordered to be closed—have you never through petty trade-jealousy—without exactly saying that Jenkins is good for any amount—put on a false, frank look, and said, ‘Well, we trust him so much, Jones! his payments have been pretty regular!’—and allowed Jones to be brought into the mess, when a word could have saved him? 'No, you have never done anything analogous!' I thank Providence, then, the world is not so wicked as I thought. I confess my sin, O public! Let me not depart unshriven.

I repeat, that I put the matter before Plawton in such a way that he determined not exactly to fly with her, but to commence the liaison; in fact, to take the tide in his affairs which would be likely to lead to—qui sait?

Plawton left me, and rushed out to the garden to keep the rendezvous.

I followed, unobserved.

Two voices in earnest conversation; two pair of feet pacing up and down; two muffled figures flitting about among the trees, and casting shadows on the snow.

Plawton and the unknown!

I rubbed my hands with fiendish glee. I stood between the pale December moon and the ghostly white snow. I shuddered; and looked down, almost expecting that my figure would have cast no shadow on the ground. It did though. Fiends are said to be shadowless. I felt myself one then.

Two figures embracing each other frantically—one coming my way; the other disappearing in the shades of the trees—

Plawton and the unknown!

I hastened back to the scullery.

'Well?'

'I have seen her,' said Plawton, huskily. 'I will fly with her two hours after midnight. Will you assist me?'

'Yes.'

'Swear!'

I swore.

It was one hour and three-quarters after midnight. The guests had departed. I was with Plawton in a small room, which he called his study, leading off the drawing-room. We were both muffled up. I felt no repugnance at seeing the miserable man about to take the step. He was nervous and trembling. I was firm.

I looked at my watch. Plawton looked at his. The time would be up before we could get to the corner of the lane where she was to be with a cab in attendance.

I was about to turn down the gas, when I felt Plawton clutching at my arm, and heard him give a suppressed shriek. A figure walked into the room, and stood fronting us both.

'Gracious!' said Plawton. 'Why have you ventured in here? We were coming. My wife is not asleep!'

I looked.

It was the original of the photograph. I knew by the curls and the never-to-be-forgotten expression. She was a little stouter, but undoubtedly the same.

'Why did you come in here?' I said. 'Mrs. Plawton is awake!'

With a ghastly smile, the original of the photograph said—'Hypocrite and fool! you are right. Mrs. Plawton is awake—she is here!'

I saw Plawton's face overspread, as if it had been suddenly double-refined white-washed; and he fell senseless at my feet as the words escaped him—'Merciful Fates! it is my wife!'

I looked again, and would also have fainted, but that she grasped my arm tightly and hissed into my ear—

'I AM THE ORIGINAL OF THE PHOTOGRAPH! Know that I have found you out! You are a hypocrite—a false friend—a fiend in human form! You came here under the pretence of administering sympathy at the withdrawal of my husband's affection; and you all along fanned the flame. You didn't know that it was his own wife he was sighing for—the little imbecile! That photograph which he has is a likeness of me, taken eight years ago. I have not so much altered in that time but that I can recall the expression. See!'

She put the photograph into my hand that I might compare again. It was indeed Plawton's wife! I felt as if I could have sunk into the earth. My brain was fizzing; the room spun round. I rushed out into the cool air.

A year has elapsed since then. Mr. Plawton is reconciled to his wife, but not yet to me. If this comes under her eye, will she forgive me? I hope so. Confession is half atonement.

R. L. G.

MONODY FOR A BELOVED DAUGHTER.

Come forth, brave heart, and tell thy grief—

So deeply felt, so closely pent;
Thy surcharged founts may find relief
If forth in gurgling streamlets sent
To flood with tears the vale of woe,
And lull thy grief with murmurs low.

The summer sky beams pure and bright,
The earth is deck'd with beauty rare,
All Nature teems with life and light,
And heavenly music fills the air;
But, lorn of her who made all dear,
To me all's gloomy, lone, and drear.

So pure, so beautiful, so good—
By all admired, by all beloved;
In cheerful or in mournful mood,
The genial breast alike was moved;
And radiant smile or glistening tear
To all were given, to all were dear.

New charms were dawning every day
New traits of sweetness every hour—
Her eye bright as the morning ray,
Her face fair as the opening flower.
Too pure for earth, she pass'd to heaven—
Leaving our hearts all sear'd and riven!

She had no selfish cares or fears;
She gloried in her neighbours' gladness;
Her schoolmates mourn'd her, bathed in tears;
Her playmates' mirth was changed to sadness.
And when her spirit pass'd away,
Joy left our happy home for aye.

But all throughout the day and night
Her last fond look still beams on me,
Shedding a ray of heavenly light
O'er dark and vast eternity;
While that last tender kiss and sigh
Have link'd my soul to her on high.

Oh blessed hope! Oh glorious thought!
That, rising brightly o'er the grave,
Show deathless life, so dearly bought
By Him who died our souls to save;
And through our sorrows lead us on
To worship at our Father's throne.

Dear child! we'll meet no more to part—
Afar from sorrow, death, and pain;
Where soul with soul, and heart with heart,
Join in the universal strain
That fills yon radiant orbs above
With one vast hymn of grateful love!

JAMES BALLANTINE.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK
18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St
Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

We now pass from consideration of the light as the mere illuminator of the earth, and contemplate it as an all-pervading energy working powerfully throughout the material world, and exercising a healthy and holy influence on the body and spirit of man. Light is the eldest born of creation; and from this priority we infer that it was called forth to be an agent in the evolution of the things that came after it. Such an inference is warranted by what we see and know of its comprehensive action. Life, beauty, and successive order are dependant upon it. We cannot penetrate into the deep mysteries of the inner earth, and learn in what manner the absorbed light kindles into lustrous beauty in the gem, or stores itself secretly in the buried flora of an elder time; but we see the consummated work in the jewelled chaplet of the bride, and in the more homely yet invaluable product of the coal measures. It were vain to speculate concerning the operations of the light that enters into and permeates the chambers of the world beneath our feet. There is enough beside us and around us, and that falls within the compass of our knowledge, to fill the mind with admiration and exalt it to reverence. The functions of vegetable life are maintained and directed by the light; and according as the plant or tree is favourably or unfavourably located with reference to the sun, it flourishes or dwindles to decay. The floods of radiance that are poured over tropical regions produce luxuriance and arborescent strength; while in high latitudes and less genial climes the tree is dwarfed into a shrub, and floral beauty becomes less gorgeous; and on lofty mountain crests and under polar skies are found only a few lichens and mosses—the lowest forms of vegetable life. Vegetation withers in unrelieved shade, while in perpetual darkness its very nature is changed. Plants entirely deprived of light secrete a deadly poison—the solanine—and are at once repulsive and unwholesome growths. The flowers of every clime bear silent yet impressive testimony to their dependence on the sun for development and support, in that they turn towards his rising beams, and close their petals at his setting. To the animal kingdom the light is no less indispensable. The physical structure of man and the lower animals presents marked differences in different climes; but, speaking of the beasts of the earth generally, and of our own race almost without exception, we may say that the bodily form is perfected in those temperate regions which are equally removed from the cold and long darkness of the Pole, and the extreme heats of the Equator and the Torrid Zones. It is true that in northern lands and seas we find large animal structures, and creatures of vast power and sullenly savage dispositions; and that in the middle regions of the earth are also found magnificent beasts, of great strength, fiery and impetuous in their nature, and cruel in their hatred of man and of each other. But we are to bear in mind that the development of animals differs materially from that of plants. Equinoctial light and heat give grandeur to the tree and brilliant colouring to the flower; but they produce in the beasts of the earth a beauty indeed, yet a beauty that is terrible; while they kindle strong passion in man, and make him merciless, vindictive, and sensual.

As regards animal life, we can separate the effects of light from those of heat a cold; and as these do not affect plants and animal structures alike, we have to seek in temperate climates for the just balance of the forces that operate most favourably towards living creatures in their relation to each other. I admit that many exceptional cases might be urged against arguments so general as the I use, but I cannot pause to consider them.

The influence of the justly-tempered light on the spirit of man runs parallel with its effects on his physical structure. This is confirmed by daily observation. The mind is depressed and the body paralysed by long continued gloom, and both become buoyant and vigorous when the light returns. But let us take an extreme case in illustration of the indispensableness of light, a case of the ameliorating circumstances that mitigate almost total denial. We live in times and in a state of society that do not permit the incarceration of a prisoner for months and years in the impenetrable gloom of a dungeon; but such extremity of punishment was common occurrence in past ages, and the enormity exists in countries where the will of a despot is the law, and where the sentence of the judge is not righted by retribution, but stern and cruel revenge. Instances familiar to all of us in which a man, for some crime supposed or real, is suddenly snatched from social life and the blessings of the light, and made the living companion of a sepulchre. The noisome air and thick darkness poison his physical frame, and fill his mind with hideous imaginings. The moving wheel that conveys to him his daily morsel of bread and draught of water has been so artfully constructed that it turns in no ray of light to relieve the tedium of hours, and days, and weeks, months of utter isolation from all human sympathy. He sleeps from excess of weariness and torture, but not rest. Night visions of liberty, and home, and friends, and the cheering sun, make his slumbers a feverish excitement; and, when the cold dank atmosphere of the prison-house awakens him, the mockery of his dream becomes a superadded torment. Outside his dungeon day follows day; but what knows he of their succession! what measure can he apply to time who is buried alive with the worm, and condemned to the unbroken weariness of inaction! Endurance under suffering and affliction may be protracted, but it must at length come to an end. The overworn mind and frame advance step by step to the cold obstruction of death. But ere this point is reached a reaction may take place; by what the philosopher calls a law of Nature—by what the Christian acknowledges as an instance of the all-prevailing mercy of Him who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb. A long period of unbroken gloom has dilated the pupil of the eye; intense anxiety has made the nervous sensation acute; and the captive, in his extremity, becomes sensible of the presence of light.

"Tis but a dull imprison'd ray,
A sunbeam that hath lost its way."

winding through chinks and crevices that had escaped the jailor's strictest search; but the pulse of the forlorn man quickens, and his heart gathers strength, and atches its transit across the dungeon wall. That thin thread of light, so valueless to the outer world, comes forth as an angel's mission to save one human spirit from despair.

Contrast with the picture we have drawn the quietude and happiness of the summer sunset hour. Man has been forth to his work and to his labour until the evening, and returns to seek a season of repose. During the day, all Nature has partaken of the light, and it now rejoices in the calm and promise of eventide. Eastward and to the mid-sky the heaven is serenely beautiful; but in the west magnificent cloud-forms gather and combine into towering structures, revealing through their open gates vistas of unutterable splendour. An isle of amethyst, rising from a sea of molten gold, sustains a throne, curtained with tapestries of the living light. And He who sits thereon is veiled in cloud that tempers to weak mortal vision the Majesty Divine. The happy voice and laugh of childhood; the salutations of honest, kindly hearts meeting at close of day; the thankful utterances of age for one day more of strength—all these unite into a vespers song of praise to Him who made both day and night. And then succeeds a mellowed and departing glory that calms all passion, and gives peace to every trusting heart. Infinite Benevolence smiles upon the parting day: a loving Father blesses his children as they sink in sleep.

As the sundown, and as the darkness increases, the light is presented under an aspect which suggests the questions,—Whence comes it? And with what velocity does it travel? As we look up to the shining hosts of heaven, we feel an intense desire to learn somewhat concerning the magnitudes of the various bodies, and their distances from the earth; and to understand the deep mystery connected with the streams of light which are continually coming down from them. Of the distances and magnitudes of the orbs forming the solar system, we have a certain knowledge, but not so of the stars. All that we can learn in relation to them is that they rank in magnitude with the sun, and that the nearest of them cannot be separated from our planet by less than millions of millions of miles. And I will tell you how this is proved beyond all dispute. The diameter of the earth's orbit is not less than 190 millions of miles; and when we look upon the stars from one extremity of this line, we are 190 millions of miles nearer to them than when we survey them from the other. Now if their distances were not immense, they would appear much larger at our nearest approach to them; and would, moreover, be altered in relative position to each other. But they exhibit no such change; viewed from either extremity of the earth's orbit, they present fixed points of light of no sensible magnitude, and their relations are in no way disturbed. Of distances so vast, we can form an imperfect conception only by comparing the transit of a ray of light from a star, with the interval required for its passage from the sun to the earth. Among the planets of our system, one of the largest, Jupiter, is attended by four moons, which suffer frequent eclipses as they enter the shadow which he projects into space. Now, the times of these eclipses are accurately calculated and tabulated for the sun's place, and with respect to him their occurrence is regular. But Roemer, a Danish philosopher, made the grand discovery that these times differ by about seventeen minutes with reference to the earth in the two extreme limits of its orbit. When the earth is nearest to Jupiter, the eclipses take place about seventeen minutes earlier than when it is most distant from him. Hence it is proved that light requires this interval of time to transit over one hundred and ninety millions of miles; and one half of this interval, or about 8½ minutes, to pass from the sun to the earth; and if we take this last as a standard of measure by which to gauge the depths of creation, so far as the telescope has revealed them, the mind is overwhelmed with the results that necessarily follow. A ray of light requires more than four hours to travel from the planet Neptune to the earth; eight hours to pass across our system; upwards of ten years to come from the nearest stars; many years to traverse the space intervening between us and the feeblest luminaries visible to the naked eye; hundreds of years to reach us from the stars which moderate telescopic power brings into view; thousands of years to come from the remote depths penetrated by the telescope of Herchel; and thousands of thousands of years must that ray travel, ere it strikes the earth, that sets forth from the unresolved nebulae of the Rosse telescope. Your minds, like mine, must sink under the weight of statements such as these. Time permits me to press upon you only one thought with reference to the habitation and velocity of light. It must be evident to you that when you explore the stellar heavens, even with the naked eye, you look back into the past. You are the cotemporary of a bygone age; and the question naturally arises to each of you,—Am I looking upon distant suns which still exist, or upon mere memories of departed glory? If such a question arises on contemplation of the heavens, so comparatively near to us, how intensely interesting it becomes in its application to those distant fields of radiance opened up by the telescope. Are those morning stars still shining as in the day of their creation, when the sons of God shouted for joy, or have they fulfilled their purpose and disappeared? Are they, at this day, only long lines of light, which every instant shortens, and a few years shall exhaust? Is the time nigh at hand when new heavens shall be revealed—when old things shall pass away, and all things become new?

Through many ages man has been pursuing the inquiry, What is light? And some philosophers have said one thing, and some another. Doctrines have been propounded, and mathematical formulæ applied to them, in apparent forgetfulness that a consistent theory may stand upon an initial error. That we have arrived as yet at no certain knowledge concerning the light must be admitted, since extended observation of its effects and properties is opposed to the hypothesis of Newton, and is daily undermining the one that has taken its place. 'Where is the way where light dwelleth?' is a question proposed of old; and it still waits solution. I venture to think that the philosophic eye too frequently seeks to discover the deep mysteries of creation—as we are all too much disposed to seek its Author—rather in the whirlwind and in the fire than in the still small voice. It is the infirmity of the human intellect to connect complicated agencies and laborious effort with great effects in Nature; and, measuring the Infinite by the finite, to forget the 'sublime simplicity in working of Him who spake and it was done, who commanded and it stood fast. It cannot be denied that before truth, as before honour, is humility; and that we make our nearest approach to truth, not when we build up imposing theories, but when we substitute for what is cumbersome and perplexed, a simpler conception more in harmony with what we have learned of God's doings. It may be that earthly man shall never learn the true nature of light; indeed, all probability assures us that he will not; for a perfect acquaintance with a sunbeam would be the revelation of all the mysteries that surround the material universe.

Let us take a final glance at the manifold operations and wonders of the light. So pure and excellent is it, that God Himself hath made it the similitude of true wisdom and holiness:—'They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.' And again:—'The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.' So necessary is the presence of light, that God makes its withdrawal a portent of His coming wrath:—'Behold the day of the Lord cometh! cruel both with wrath and fierce anger. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth; and the moon shall not cause her light to shine.' And again, at the opening of the Sixth Seal:—'The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood, and the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together.' It is to the light that the earliest gaze of infancy is turned; and age takes leave of earth in a last look upon the sun. The flowers absorb his beams, and put on robes of beauty and of gladness; the forest tree rises in majesty and spreads its boughs, sustained and strengthened by the orb of day; hill-tops and vales, and woods and fields, all streams and rivers, and the lordly sea, are subject to the sun; and insect myriads, and creeping things, and fowls that fly, and beasts and cattle for the use of man—all creatures that abound on earth, in air, or in the ocean's depths, live and continue by the threefold light. And ever-circling change and orderly succession; all processes of nature, first and last—the beating of a pulse; the body's growth; its nutriment; its vital force; continuance of food for man and beast; all wondrous operations in the deep, or in the buried terraces of earth—all are committed to the threefold power of light, and heat, and chemic force residing in the sun. What can man hope to learn of the essential nature of a force so mighty in operation! Deeply as we are interested in its effects, it is our duty to observe and study them; but it is our best wisdom to be temperate in inquiry concerning the cause, and very diffident in pronouncing judgment. And, when we are led, by the ever craving of the mind to learn some new thing, to look into the mysteries of the light, and find such knowledge too high for us, well is it if the wearied and unsatisfied spirit can retrace its flight—can come back across the shoreless ocean—the wide waters of speculation, where no abiding-place for the foot is found—and seek a rest and refuge in the sublime announcement of infallible truth,—that 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth;' and that then went forth the primal fiat, 'Let there be light: and there was light.' 'And God saw the light, that it was good.'

T. R.

AN ENGLISH CLASSIC REVIEWED.

THIS is an iron, practical, and statistical age. Poetry is at a discount. Had Byron lived in these matter-of-fact times, we doubt much whether he could have exclaimed, 'I rose one morning, and found myself famous.' The love of poetry, however, in the human mind can never become extinct; and even in this prosaic era many are to be found who delight to spend their days with the poets. Great statesmen and orators employ their leisure in the perusal of Homer; but they have taken degrees at Oxford. Those who are unacquainted with Greek—whose knowledge is confined to the vernacular—can resort to the English poets. Chaucer, perhaps, they might pass over, being rather obsolete in language and quaint in style; but there are the mighty Shakspeare and the sublime Milton. Numerous are the commentators on Shakspeare; and there are even blockheads who have attempted to amend and improve the text of this transcendent and unparalleled genius. Critics, too, small and great, have tried their acumen on the works of Milton, especially on his great epic, 'Paradise Lost.' Addison, in the 'Spectator,' expatiated on his sublime creations; and the most brilliant of essayists, Macaulay, discoursed on Milton, as he alone could do, in the Edinburgh Review. It has occurred to us, however, that many noble poetical productions have been overlooked. We stumbled the other day upon one of the right sort, which had the genuine ring of true poetry. The poem is no doubt brief; but is not brevity the soul of wit? and why should it not also be the soul of poetry? It commences quite in an original strain—

'Hay diddle diddle.

The repetition here is admirable, and reminds us of another great poet—'Ye isles of Greece—ye isles of Greece!' This, we should say, is after the manner of the ancients—an invocation to the Muses. It is the battle-cry which precedes the conflict—the pluming of the eagle's wings before he takes his upward flight—the overture to prepare for what is to come. Hark! Do you not hear the clang of the instruments—the confusion of sounds produced by the mingling chords of violins, clarionets, French horns, trombones, cymbals, and, last, although by no means least, the big drum? But the music has ceased, and the curtain has risen. The school to which this poem belongs may be characterised as the suggestive. It does not deal in epithets and glowing descriptions. The action is never disturbed by episodes.

'The cat and the fiddle.'

The cat has long been a favourite with ladies of a certain age, and it may be with solitary bachelors—who must have some living entity to love. But does not the mention of the cat suggest a family scene? It is a winter night, bitter cold—the wind blows a hurricane—the rain descends 'in torrents'—your umbrella is useless—you are drenched (we hope not exactly to the skin); nevertheless, be bold of heart—struggle through the storm; you will soon reach the desired haven—home.

'Home, sweet home,
There is no place like home.'

Enter your snug parlour. The fire blazes cheerfully—pussy sits purring with satisfaction on the hearth-rug—the presiding divinity, your 'better half,' neat and tidy and happy, smiles a hearty welcome, and presents your slippers, which have been toasted nicely before the fire—and then tea is ready, with jam and marmalade not bought from the shops, but warranted genuine home manufacture. Let the tempest howl without, you are comfortable; and surely you will not go to your club to-night, especially as her ladyship has suspended the interdict against smoking. The cat is of the feline tribe: so is his majesty the lion who roams in the deserts of Africa. You think of that wondrous country—ancient Egypt—where stand the Pyramids, upon which you may now gaze, although they were old and belonged to the long past in the days of Herodotus, the father of history; you will be reminded of that adventurous mariner, Vasco da Gama, creeping with his frail barque along the African coast, doubling the Cape of Good Hope, traversing the great unknown ocean, and arriving at India, near the spot, perhaps, whence Solomon procured his silver and gold and precious stones for the Temple. Speaking of Africa, we are also reminded of our great and enterprising travellers—Mungo Park, Belzoni, Caperton, Dr. Livingstone; and, if you are commercial, you cannot help speculating upon the probabilities of obtaining cotton from the countries watered by the Zambesi.

'The fiddle,'

If you have any 'music in your soul' the word will electrify. True, your dancing days are over; and, undoubtedly, it is high time, seeing that you weigh sixteen stones avoirdupois. But you have seen the day when you could 'trip it on the light fantastic toe' with the best of them. Well, do you remember the ball, when you became enamoured of Maria, the girl with the auburn ringlets and sylph-like figure? You could not, by any persuasion, and you tried all your eloquence, get her to waltz. 'Ma,' she laughed, 'said it was naughty;' but you reeled and quadrilled and whispered 'soft nothings' in her ear, which made her blush, and simper, and call you, to your great delight, 'a sad wild fellow.' You were fairly infected with the love fever. You commenced to write execrable verses about 'sparkling eyes,' and 'ruby lips,' and 'rosy cheeks,' and 'golden hair.' This was all very well, if you had thrown them into the fire, or even sent them to your charmer, but it was atrocious to send your trash to the local newspaper. How did you feel when the following appeared in the Notices to Correspondents?—'A lover is no poet. We suspect he is a tailor. Let him stick to his goose.'

'The cow jump'd over the moon.'

'The cow.' This plainly speaks of the rural. A cow in town is certainly not a cow in its right place. It is pleasant to retire to some rustic spot, away from the bustle of the city and turmoil of business, with no bills to pay and no presentment of 'small accounts.' In a cottage—we think of the Elizabethan style, with a flower-garden in front, evergreens clinging around the door; the river, not far distant, 'rushing o'er its pebbled bed;' fields of golden corn (it was autumn) waving with the breeze; and of course, to complete the landscape, 'hills in the distance'—you passed the honeymoon with the cheerful and tidy lady who produced the marmalade and suspended the interdict against smoking on the winter evenings. Maria, your first love, had been long married, and was the mother of little girls with tiny parasols and incipient crinolines. You have reason to congratulate yourself on your escape. Maria was a sad flirt as a girl, and as a wife has turned out a very Xantippe.

In the days of your youth, you were probably told that there was 'a man in the moon;' and doubtless you have seen him in your 'mind's eye,' with a melancholy aspect, gazing down from his solitary residence. Zimmerman descants with great power and eloquence upon the delights and advantages of solitude. We confess we have our doubts upon the subject, and have always thought that solitary confinement was a punishment too severe even for the greatest of criminals. Man is gregarious, and likes companionship. Robinson Crusoe in his island, when he could pronounce himself to be lord of all he surveyed, was perhaps tolerably happy, especially after his man Friday appeared upon the scene. To have an island to one's self is all very well; but to be the sole occupant of a world is rather too much. We have no doubt, therefore, if the cow had jumped ~~into~~ in place of ~~over~~ the moon, her advent would have been hailed by the lunar hermit with inexpressible delectation. The ancients—even that acute people the Greeks—knew little of astronomy. They thought that the firmament—sun, moon, and stars—revolved round the earth every twenty-four hours! The true method of philosophic inquiry was then unknown; and, during the long dreary period of what are called 'the dark ages,' knowledge was kept in abeyance, and little was achieved either in science or art. The illustrious Bacon inaugurated a new era. He despised the dreamy, subtle speculations of the schoolmen. He could not see the sense or utility of discussing such questions as 'How many angels can stand upon the point of a needle without crowding?' He said—'Interrogate Nature, and she will answer; get facts, and with these build your structure.' So the great Newton, following in the same course—from seeing an apple fall to the ground—pursued his investigations until he established the law of gravitation, which explains the motions of the heavenly bodies; and to the moon, being our next-door neighbour, he first directed his attention to test and verify the truth of the theory. Take an excursion into the realms of space. At the velocity of light, you will soon reach Mars, pass Jupiter with his satellites, Saturn with his belt, then Uranus, and arrive at Neptune—that lone outpost of the solar system. The splendour of the sun has faded, and his apparent magnitude has become greatly diminished; the stars, however, 'twinkle, twinkle' as observed from the earth—no brighter, no larger—although you have gone far. Millions of millions of miles you must travel before you can reach the nearest fixed star. You had better, however, now return to sublunary scenes; lest, by pondering on the infinitudes of space, which must be believed but cannot be comprehended, you become lunatic—which, you know, or ought to know, comes from the Latin word luna, the moon. Moonlight flittings are not uncommon; but moonlight courtships have been from time immemorial. How often has it been said—'Meet me, meet me in the evening!' and if you have heard Sims Reeves sing the favourite song—'My pretty Jane!' you must know the satisfactory reason for the invitation—'The moon shines bright and clear.'

'The little dog laugh'd to see such a sport.'

The dog—the friend, the slave, the worshipping of man. In adversity, your so-called friends may desert you, but the dog remains steadfast even unto death. We do love that sagacious, affectionate animal, a Newfoundland dog. You may have seen his portrait, by a first-rate artist, with the inscription—‘A member of the Humane Society;’ and no nobler member belongs to that philanthropic institution. Far up in the Alps, in the regions of glaciers and perpetual snow, the dog of St. Bernard speeds his way—on his message of mercy, in darkness and in storm—to search for, to succour, and to save the exhausted, benighted traveller. Good dogs! good monks! Brutus, in his quarrel with his brother conspirator, Cassius, says—‘I’d rather be a dog, and bay the moon, than such a Roman.’ Had you been a dog, Junius Brutus, you never would have been treacherous—never have stabbed your benefactor. The probability is, that at the very moment the cow made the extraordinary ‘jump,’ the ‘little dog’ was busily engaged in baying the moon; and certainly nothing could be more provocative of laughter than such a grotesque performance. Let us tender a little advice. If you keep late hours, and steal in by means of a latch-key, don’t keep a Skye terrier in the house. There is more wisdom than some people are apt to suppose in the aphorism, ‘Laugh, and grow fat.’ Shun the man who does not laugh—he is dangerous, especially ‘in his cups.’ There are various kinds of laughter—the horse laugh, which speaks of vulgarity; the vacant laugh, which tells of insanity; the sympathetic laugh, which indicates a kindly disposition; the Satanic laugh, which is a mockery of laughter; the hearty laugh, which all delight to hear; the giggle, which is confined to misses ‘in their teens;’ but, of all sorts of laughter, commend us to the clear, ringing, innocent laugh of childhood, to which angels may listen with approval.

‘The dish run after the spoon.’

We are aware that in some editions the dish is made to ‘follow,’ not to ‘run after.’ We are satisfied, however, that ours is the true reading. The spoon, it may be observed, was useless until the arrival of the dish; hence the dish hastened, or ‘run after.’ To follow, might imply lapse of time. It is obvious too, we think, that it was not an empty dish, but one which contained savoury viands; or, as another great poet expresses it,

‘A dainty dish to set before the King.’

The juxtaposition of a dish and a spoon means dinner. Well, do you remember the dinner given to Jenkins? In the name of wonder and common sense, what had Jenkins done to entitle him to a dinner, and a gold watch with appendages? He had gained no laurels in the field of literature; for he could never make a verb agree with its nominative. He was not amiable or generous. He was not even a ‘jolly good fellow;’ but a bully, who wished always to be ‘cock of the company.’ In short, no man with greater truth could have been ‘written down an ass.’ We confess that we have never been able to understand these dinners and presentations given to obscure individuals. To us they have ever been involved in inscrutable mystery. As you were behind the scenes, however, please disclose the secret. Ah! we have hit it. Jenkins himself was the prime mover! He was the getter-up of the dinner and presentation, and you men of the committee were dupes and ninnies! It was on that memorable evening that you delivered your maiden speech. A person of whom you had no knowledge, and who was unacquainted with you, proposed your health. He told the company that you were a gentleman of great intelligence—a steady friend—an excellent convivial companion; that your ‘heart was in the right place;’ and that the longer you were known the more highly would your merits be appreciated. You rose quite overpowered by your feelings; you could not find words adequately to express your gratitude; but it was the proudest day of your life, and you would cherish the remembrance of it to the latest hour of your existence. On that occasion, too, you essayed to sing ‘I’m afloat, I’m afloat,’—a song exceedingly appropriate, considering that you were then ‘half-seas over;’ and, at a more advanced period of the evening, you bawled out like a ‘bull of Bashan,’ ‘We’ll not go home till morning!’ and, alas! that it should be recorded, you did not ‘go home at all!’ You are now an elder of the Church, and a Justice of the quorum; and it is stated that you are exceedingly severe upon poachers, and publicans who infringe the Forbes Mackenzie Act. Remember, however, that justice should be tempered with mercy, and although ‘Tis excellent to have a giant’s strength,’ ‘tis tyrannous to use it as a giant.’

H. M.

THE TOWER.

To the westward of the town there stands a little hill,
Where long ago the Romans built a Tower;
In the valley to the north, a streamlet murmurs forth,
As it murmur’d when the Cæsars were in power:
But the grinding tooth of Time hath pierced the Tower sublime,
And not a stone remaineth at this hour.

For, after many years of sovereignty and wrath,
The Romans went, and other races came;
And other walls were built, and other blood was spilt,
And other martyrs perish’d in the flame:
Then how it came about I could never well make out,
But ‘twas on this hill my fathers won their name.

So, here they built their Tower on the dark eternal rock,
Impregnable as Glory in his might;
And many a shock it stood in the days of bale and blood,
When Truth was dawdling grimly on her height:
But when the foe was quell’d and his wickedness inbald,
The Tower o’erflow’d with feasting and delight.

Many a day, and many a month, and many a year—
Five hundred years, I think, it must have been—
Did my fathers reign, elate, in their Tower with brave ostent,
Loyal-soul’d, yet easy lords of the demesne:
Then how it came about, well I know, and could give out,
How they fell, and almost perish’d from the scene.

One cold December night, when my father was at sea,
As we huddled round the spectre of a flame,
My mother told the story of our house’s ancient glory,
‘And its fall into the hollow trough of shame:
How the Tower and all its lands were grasp’d by alien hands,
In the midnight and the ruin of our fame.

There, sitting mid the chill bewitching glamour of the night,
Sick and sad with all the burden of the rede,
Sudden as wing’d fire flash’d a vision of desire
On my soul, and bore it up with eagle speed:
The vision grew and grew, till my heart was strong and new—
And I swore to work redemption for our seed.

Now write my mighty vow, steel-eyed Angel of Resolve,
In thy volume of heroic oaths of power!
And while the unswerving stars, led by red-maid Mars,
Win the Eternal’s bloodless trophies hour by hour,
Let me, from this ledge of time, with a sword unsain’d by crime,
Fight the demons, and regain my fathers’ Tower!

WILLIAM FREELAND.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

THE recent trial of Mrs. M'Lachlan, at the Glasgow Circuit, for the murder of Jessie M'Pherson Richardson, has raised a considerable amount of discussion on the question of evidence:—What evidence is sufficient to warrant a verdict of 'guilty' being returned on a criminal charge? The respective merits of direct and circumstantial evidence have been freely criticised; but, in much that has been said and written on the subject, there has been displayed an all but total ignorance of the true nature of circumstantial proof, and the rules applicable thereto.

All evidence is divisible into two classes—direct and indirect. The former goes at once to the question in issue, and asserts either the affirmative or negative. It has no intermediata. This is illustrated by a witness confidently asserting that he saw the prisoner commit the offence charged against him; and that he (the witness) entertains no doubt of the prisoner's identity.

On the other hand, indirect evidence—which includes evidence of a circumstantial and presumptive character—is a factum probatum, from which we infer another fact, the factum probandum, by a process of reasoning, or by classification. For instance—A. is found dead with a gash across his throat, evidently made by a razor. He was last seen alive in the company of B. B. has in his possession a razor stained with fresh human blood. The inference here is that B. murdered A. The facta probata are that B. was the last person seen in the company of A., and that a razor stained with fresh human blood was found in his possession; and from these facta we deduce the inference—the factum probandum—that A. was murdered by B. This illustration will serve to show the difference between direct and indirect evidence.

But we have said that the term indirect evidence embraces presumptive as well as circumstantial proof. The expression 'presumptive' is often used synonymously with 'circumstantial;' but they are different from each other. With circumstantial evidence, we arrive at the result by a process of reasoning applied to certain known facts (as shown by the A. B. illustration supra); whereas, with presumptive evidence, the result is obtained by observing that the evidence comes under a class from which a certain inference is in most cases deducible. Thus, when I see a person take a book from the library, I infer that he intends reading it; because, when a book is taken from the library, it is almost always for the purpose of being read; or, when I see any one put on his hat, I infer that he is going out, because people when going out put on their hats. In accepting these inferences, I am quite justified. In nine cases out of ten, the presumption would be correct. With presumptive evidence, therefore, we get the result by observing that the circumstance from which the presumption is drawn belongs to a certain class, from which a similar inference is usually deducible. If it cannot be so classed, it is not presumptive: it then comes under the head of circumstantial evidence, which cannot be classed like presumptive, because each circumstance is peculiar—there may never have been, and may never again be, a similar circumstance. The result must be arrived at by a process of reasoning applied to these circumstances. There is no room for precedents—they do not apply. Many presumptions may be deducible from the circumstances, each one being as probable as the other. Thus, if a person is found having his brains blown out, and with a pistol lying beside him, we may infer suicide as well as murder. The one is just as presumable as the other. There is here no presumptive proof that a murder was committed, any more than there is proof that the person committed suicide. But, by taking into consideration the circumstances of the man's past life, we may deduce a credible inference whether or not the idea of suicide is warrantable. If the circumstances do not warrant the idea of suicide, we may then infer, with great probability, that he was murdered. But we cannot presume that this person committed suicide, because fifty, or any number of persons, were found under similar circumstances, and the fact of their having committed suicide was afterwards clearly established. Indeed, presumptive evidence is, or is nearly all but, inadmissible in cases of murder.

From these observations, the difference between direct and indirect evidence, as well as the difference between circumstantial and presumptive proof, will be seen. I shall now proceed to explain more fully the nature of circumstantial evidence.

There are few more important branches of our system of jurisprudence than that which embraces circumstantial evidence. As Lord Wynford truly remarked,* 'Most of the facts upon which courts of justice act, not only in civil but in criminal cases, even in those which affect the lives of individuals, are established by circumstantial proof.' A correct idea of what circumstances are necessary to establish any fact—where there is no direct evidence of such fact—or to warrant a verdict, is highly desirable. That circumstantial evidence is deserving of the utmost credence, and may be relied upon in the vast majority of cases with perfect safety, is admitted by every one who has carefully studied the subject; but before we can, with any degree of safety, give credence to the evidence of circumstances, that evidence must embrace and clearly establish certain facts—the only inference derivable from which is that they were the sequence, and followed from, the doing of that act which we desire to prove was actually done. If, however, there be two or more inferences deducible from these proved facts—the one being equally probable as the other—we cannot accept the evidence as conclusive. Nay, further, should one of these inferences be to a slight, or even to a considerable, extent more tenable than the other, still, we cannot hold the proof sufficient to warrant a verdict in favour of that inference; because, it is of the very nature of the deduction we make from the proved facts before us that it be beyond reasonable doubt. If there be a doubt that the inference we have drawn is not the correct inference, then must the verdict be either a decided negative, or one which decides neither the affirmative nor the negative, but rests between them. Where there is a doubt—a reasonable doubt—there can be no decided affirmative verdict.

* In the case of Galbraith v. Galbraith, 1831—Wilson and Shaw's H. of L. Cases, vol. v., p. 87.

The question may be asked—What facts, aided by circumstances, will be sufficient to infer guilt? This is a question which it is impossible properly to answer. Each case must be judged of by its own attendant circumstances. But it may be stated as a general rule that, before an inference of guilt can be used to a prisoner's prejudice, there must be clear and undoubted proof that he had the *opportunity of committing the crime charged against him. The fact of his being in the neighbourhood where, and at the time when, the crime was perpetrated—and also, that he had the means of perpetrating such crime—must be established; or, at least, that they are not irreconcilable with other proved facts. Thus, if a person is charged with having committed a murder—however strongly circumstances may point to him, and to him alone, as the murderer—it will be a sufficient answer to the charge, if he prove the fact of his having been at a distance from the scene of the murder during the time within which it must have been perpetrated. But though it be proved against a party charged with any crime that he had ample opportunity for committing such crime, this single circumstance is not of itself sufficient evidence of guilt. This is obvious, because most of the petty, and many of the more serious crimes which we read of daily, are committed by only one person, while many persons have had opportunities of committing them.

Besides opportunity to commit an offence, it must be clear that the party charged was capable of the act; as, for instance, it is impossible that a conviction of murder can pass against one who, by paralysis, or any other affliction, was, at the time of the murder, totally unable to commit such a crime.

It is not absolutely necessary—and, indeed, it is sometimes impossible—to prove motive for the commission of any offence. But motive is seldom wanting, unless in some of the more unimportant crimes; and there are few cases of any considerable magnitude for which more than one motive is not assignable.

Opportunity and capability are necessary to be proved in all cases; indeed, they form the foundation of every criminal charge. The other facts which are necessary to be proved, in order that we may draw the inference of guilt, depend, as we have already said, upon the circumstances attending each particular case. It would only be a waste of time and space to enumerate instances. Every case has its own peculiarities, which regulate the necessary proof.

* Opportunity to commit an offence embraces nearness in time and place to the scene, possession of the means by which it appears to have been committed, or of power to procure them, and the appropriateness of the means within the prisoner's reach to produce their supposed effect.—Dickson on Evidence, vol. 1, title 7, sec. 252.

I have endeavoured to explain the nature of circumstantial evidence, and in what respects it differs from evidence of a presumptive character. Before concluding, I would say a few words as to the degree of importance which is to be attached to circumstantial proof—how far it may be relied upon as a safe guide to a just verdict. Is it to be relied upon with the same confidence as direct evidence? Careful inquiry leads me to reply in the affirmative. All human testimony is fallible; but if this objection were permitted to deter us from believing such testimony, crime would increase unchecked, and the cords which bind society would be severed. Before any community or state can exist with any degree of safety or comfort to its members, there must be laws for the protection of the lives and property of such members. Without law there can be no order, and without order there can be no communion. Laws are essential to the well-being of society, and it is also essential that these laws be strictly enforced. Wherever large numbers of individuals are joined into one community or state, crime will always exist. But in order that crime may be prevented so far as possible, certain punishments are inflicted on the criminals—the punishment increasing according to the magnitude of the offence; and such punishments effect a diminution of, or, at least, act as a check upon, crime. If, however, the infliction of these punishments could be set aside by the plea of the fallibility of human testimony, the law would remain a dead letter, crime would constantly increase, and consequently society could not be maintained. But this plea of the fallibility of human testimony is inadmissible—such testimony is allowed to prove and to disprove, and so lead to the solution of any question.

But it is said:—‘Admitting the necessity which exists for the acceptance of direct evidence, we do not see there is any necessity for accepting an inference deduced from circumstances; and holding that inference as satisfactory proof, for circumstances often lie.’* To this I reply—Circumstances never lie. The risk which we run by adopting circumstantial evidence is, that a wrong inference may be deduced. It must be remembered, however, that that inference is deduced from facts. If the more serious crimes—such as murder—were not allowed to be proved by circumstantial evidence, the penalty inflicted by law would seldom be applied. Very few murders are committed before witnesses. They are all, or nearly all, secret murders; and, such being the case, without the aid of circumstantial evidence a conviction would seldom be obtained; the consequence of which would be a large increase in the number of such crimes. In order to show what would be the effect of such a course, take an illustration:—A. suddenly becomes ill and dies. The symptoms are such as to arouse suspicion. A post-mortem examination takes place, the result of which is, that poison is found to have been taken by deceased. B., who was in attendance on A. before and during his illness, is arrested and tried for the crime of murder. He is proved to have been, during his attendance on A., in possession of the same kind of poison of which A. died. Farther, that, during the illness of A., B. alone attended to his wants. By reasoning upon these circumstances, or rather facts, we deduce the inference that B. poisoned A. The case seems clear; but as circumstantial evidence is inadmissible, and as there is no direct evidence to prove that B. poisoned A., the charge must fall to the ground, and B. escape unpunished. Does any one doubt the guilt of Palmer or Catherine Wilson? But for circumstantial evidence they must have escaped; and who can tell how many lives might have been added to their long lists of victims?

* This is one of the principal objections offered by those who oppose conviction on circumstantial evidence—that circumstances often lie.

I am well aware that, as our law at present stands,* we are apt to deduce an erroneous inference, and consequently to punish an innocent person. That such is sometimes the case I am also well aware. But how few have been these cases compared with the number in which a correct verdict has been arrived at? And may not such errors be attributable as much to the manner in which our criminal trials are conducted as to the admission of circumstantial evidence?

For myself, I incline to the opinion that circumstantial evidence is equally credible with direct. The latter involves the risk of untruths—whether intentional or unintentional—being sworn to by the witnesses; mistaken identity,† &c.; while the former involves the same risk as regards the facta probata, and the additional risk of an erroneous inference being deduced from such facta. But, on the other hand, circumstantial proof is often far more trustworthy than direct as the two occur in practice; for, although false testimony,‡ or forged writings, may pass undetected when they are limited to a few simple facts it is almost impossible to fabricate successfully a complete case of circumstantial proof. Accordingly, direct evidence is preferable to circumstantial when the witnesses can be implicitly believed; whereas circumstantial evidence has the superiority of being more free from attempts at fabrication, and almost entirely beyond the risk of undetected concoction.'—Diction on Evidence, vol. i., title 7, sec. 280.

HERBERT GRAHAM.

*Allowing of trials by jury.

†The term 'mistaken identity' may appear somewhat paradoxical; but it aptly conveys the meaning intended.

‡A great many such cases are recorded by the authorities on Criminal law.

A KENTUCKY ADVENTURE.

It was during the autumn of 1861, in the very heat of the civil war, that I, managing clerk to an English mercantile house at New-York, was sent off west. Our firm—Denny & Holt, shipping-brokers and exporters—did a good deal of business with western men; and in this particular case we had burned our fingers. A great corn-dealer and general jobber had died insolvent at Cairo; and it became plain that the only chance of recovering our fair proportion of the dividend would depend on the presence of a representative of our house, ready to watch over that house's interests.

This duty fell to me. I had been in America but twelve months, and had seen nothing of the continent, save only the stock sights of Niagara and the highlands of the Hudson; but my employers preferred to entrust the affair to me, and I did my best to merit their confidence.

I was now on my return. Tennessee was full of warlike commotion, and the more southern counties of Kentucky were infested by Confederate guerillas; but the line of railway on which I was to travel was sufficiently safe; and I was as far from anticipating any but the most prosaic incidents of journeying as if I had been bound from Birmingham to London.

'Jump in, Mister Spry, if you please. Time's up, and a trifle more; but we'll catch him up, I guess.'

As the spruce conductor of the train said these words, he almost dragged into the car where I was sitting the passenger to whom they were addressed. He was the only white man waiting for the train; and, as the long carriages were nearly half empty, he and I were virtually almost the sole occupants of the car.

'Shove them darkies in, can't ye?' bawled the conductor. 'Chuck another log on the fire, Sam Davies; and you, Barney, stand clear with the cowcatcher. This child don't choose to be called unpunctual—not if he knows it. Right!' And, with a hoarse scream from the engine, off we went. Hopkinsville is but a petty place, where the gaunt white wooden houses—sun-cracked, and grievously in want of paint—glare blankly out upon the swampy meadows and weedy creeks. And in a short time—after running past fields full of gambolling colts and sluggish oxen, past barrens of worn-out brown land, past clearings where the stumps yet stood grimly in the midst of the maize stubble—we were again in the forest.

Tired of seeing hemlock trees succeed to the swamp pine, the dwarf oak, and the dark hickory, I turned my attention to my companion. The latter was a lathy, active-looking man, shorter than most of the tall westerns, but with an intelligent face and sparkling dark eyes. He was dressed in the national costume—with the swallow-tailed coat, black satin waistcoat, black trousers, black cravat, crumpled patent leather boots, and profuse jewellery. To guess his rank or occupation was of course impossible.

We fell into conversation, as is customary in that sociable country; and the new-comer, having discovered that I was 'a Britisher,' talked very freely and glibly. I was quite surprised at the boldness with which he criticised the military and political conduct of the North; and especially his contemptuous way of mentioning the President and his Cabinet. Once or twice he looked at me with twinkling eyes and an expression of quaint frankness, rubbed his hands together, and seemed to be on the brink of some confession of party faith; but checked himself as the incautious words were trembling on his lips, and relapsed into generalities. And when two ladies and a tall ungainly gentleman got into the car at Posawatchie Junction, and took their seats near us, the hitherto garrulous voyager became very silent indeed.

The line of country which we now traversed was new to me, since my westward journey had been made by steamer down the Ohio; and though I had been prepared for some peculiarities in a western railroad—especially in a Slave State, and in war time—I was startled at some of the features that presented themselves. We were on the single line of rails of which the permanent way consisted, and our security from collisions depended on the punctuality, vigilance, and sobriety of the officials. But that was not what struck me with surprise; but the shapely iron rails, along which we had glided so majestically out of the Cairo station, had given place to rude substitutes of yellow pine wood, covered with a thin slip of iron, like the hoops of a cask; and that these were insufficiently secured we had evidence enough in the matter of bumps and jolts. Yet we went fast—tearing through brake and meadow, forest and maize field—the train bounding and leaping, the rails quivering and jerking—and fragments of blazing wood from the engine furnace flying past in picturesque profusion.

In one place our speed had to be reduced to a slow crawl, while a party of negroes, with hammers in their hands, and grinning at the importance of their task, ran on in front, nailing down the impromptu rails to the unbarked logs that did duty for sleepers. And two broad streams had to be crossed with extreme caution—the awkward bridges vibrating like spring-boards.

'Is the line always thus?' I could not help inquiring of my lately voluble companion.

'No sir,' was the reply; 'a few months back you'd have been whisked over as neat irons as any you ever saw, even to home in the old country. They've been tore up.'

'Tore up?'

The American nodded; 'Ay, sir. Taken up and told off by Confederate citizens. Iron is always useful in war, and to cripple the line was maybe necessary.'

Here the tall ungainly personage who had last got in, and who had expressed by sundry shrugs and inarticulate growls anything rather than approval of the other's tone in mentioning the devastation, broke in with—

'You see, sir, the fruits of civil war; you do. They burned the bridges, sir, and they stole the rails to patch up their beggarly Secesh lines in North Carolina; and they've run up a reckoning, sir, we wont shirk settling, dollar and cent.'

The eyes of my first companion flashed, but when he spoke, his words were smooth enough; and he deplored the madness and folly of the Secessionists, and predicted the patching up of the Union, until the taller Kentuokian was mollified into stretching out a lean, bony hand, gloveless, but with two or three rings to adorn it.

'Shake hands, mister. Your sentiments do credit to your heart and intellect. My name's Dr. Eli Hook of Frankfort, in this State; and I'm proud to make your acquaintance.'

There was a great deal of hand-shaking, bowing, and compliment. The other traveller announced himself as A. P. Hudson of Missouri, tobacco-merchant and coach-proprietor, and was formally presented to the ladies.

'My wife, sir. A matron who had the advantage of New England raising, and is too accomplished, though I say it, for this comparatively benighted State. A charming poetess, sir. And this is my sister-in-law, Miss Jenner.'

I had just time to remark, as the fair persons alluded to exchanged a few words with Mr. Hudson, that while Mrs. Hook was pale, languid, and pretentious in manner, her dark-eyed sister had a handsome, clever face, that expressed little respect for her sententious brother-in-law. He was evidently a vehement Federal; while Miss Jenner's sympathies, like those of multitudes of Northern women, turned Southwards. The train came to a dead stop, just as I arrived at these conclusions, and the conductor came by, observing—

'Glasgow, ladies and gentlemen! Refreshments are procurable, and a bang-up hotel dinner at seventy-five cents. Twelve minutes time.'

There was no refreshment car attached to the train; indeed, the service had been disorganised by the war and the harassing assaults of guerillas; and several passengers were eagerly availing themselves of the chance of obtaining either the three shilling dinner or the cheaper sustenance of a beef-sandwich and a draught of lager beer. The Hook family, being provided with a hamper of 'home-raised' eatables, declined to get out, and would liberally have imparted of their abundance to Mr. Hudson and my less regarded self, but we slipped out of the car with some expressions of polite thanks.

'What a relief to get away from that pompous, nasal-voiced Yankee!' said I, quite confidentially; for my earlier fellow-traveller was quite a kindred spirit in comparison with Dr. Hook. Mr. Hudson laughingly assented; and we sat down to the hurried dinner, excellent and plentiful enough, had only time been allowed to eat it. As I discussed venison, wild turkey, and boiled 'cobs' of Indian corn, I noticed many soldiers in torn and muddy blue uniforms, with muskets carried anyhow, knapsacks slung on sticks, cooking-tins, bundles, and other portable property, pass the windows hurriedly, singing German songs or indulging in Irish howls and halloos that said little for discipline.

'Who are these?' I asked.

'Soldiers—they call 'em so—going to reinforce the Potomac army. Drafts from Grant's command. Some of Uncle Sam's bad bar—'

'You must jump, gentlemen. We're off,' cried the conductor, thrusting in his head. My acquaintance leaped from his seat.

'I stay here, Mister. Don't vampoos with my baggage. My greatcoat, too, is in the car I left. I thought you were good for half-an-hour here.'

'Hi, Snowball! Jube! Cato! look in 72 car for a gentleman's coat. A Canada cape, eh?'

'Yes; just so. Canada or Inverness as you please,' said the traveller, smiling. 'Thank you, my lad,' as the black porter ran up with the garment. 'Luggage check is in the pocket. Here it is. Good-day, Mr. Britisher. Hope we may meet again.'

We shook hands and parted, and I regained my place in the car. By this time the train was so packed with soldiers bound for the North that room was precious; and, but for the precaution of leaving my greatcoat behind me, and the Hooks' good nature in laying it on a vacant seat when upset by a boisterous intrusion of troops, I should have lost my chance of proceeding.

Although the soldiers were rough and uncouth, they were not uncivil; and we had favourable specimens near us—a quiet young Prussian officer, and some six or eight privates who spoke little or no English, but conversed in their native German on the events of the campaign. I addressed them. I happened to be familiar with their language, having been brought up at a German university; and it was curious to see how their stolid faces brightened at the sound of the old tongue of the fatherland.

'You are fortunate, sir, to be able to colloquialise with the Dutchman,' said Dr. Eli Hook, gravely. 'I hope they feel the patriotic fire, sir, as adopted children of the States—Uncle Sam's children, sir?'

I laughingly informed him that the thoughts of the Germans ran, so far as I could discover, much more on the musty biscuits, bad coffee, ill-sewn shoes, and other shortcomings of the commissariat, than on the privilege of shedding their blood for the Union. The doctor took this statement in great dudgeon, gave a brief, indignant snort, and was silent.

About an hour later, a chilly breeze from the east began to blow; and we all experienced the effects of some of those abrupt changes of temperature common to continental climates. Mrs. Hook—who was evidently very sensitive to cold, as most city-bred American females are—shivered and complained, in spite of her shawls; and I at once offered her my cloak as a reinforcement.

The offer was made as a matter of course, and as a matter of course accepted. American ladies are too well used to claim attention from strangers as a rightful homage to their sex, for so trivial an act of politeness to require much acknowledgment. Mrs. Hook said, 'Thank you; spread the gray Inverness cape over her own and her sister's knees, and there was an end of the matter. The young German subaltern now addressed me, asking some question which led to a prolonged chat; and it was not till a considerable time afterwards that I remembered my other neighbours.

I was startled by the voice of Mrs. Hook, who thrust back my cloak upon me with the following odd speech, cockily spoken—

'Sir, I return your property. Thank you.'

Somehow I had offended her; that was evident, though how I could not conjecture. Dr. Eli Hook, too, eyed me with no friendly scrutiny; while, stranger still, I could trace a mixture of alarm, vexation, and interest in the dark eyes of the younger lady, as they stared at mine. I made one or two efforts, by great humility and deference, to efface the odious impression which I had manifestly, though mysteriously, made on Mrs. Hook, but in vain.

'You are wasting your words, sir,' said that accomplished matron, very sternly; 'I beg to let you know that I would die for the Union, and am an Abolitionist too.'

Was Mrs. Hook mad? or, if not, why should she make me the recipient of such a declaration of political belief. I had nothing to do with Yankee faction or party, and had risked no unpalatable expression of opinion on the slavery question.

One thing was plain. Both the doctor and his poetic spouse regarded me with altered and hostile feelings; and, after two or three ineffectual attempts to set matters right, I gave up the Hooks as the victims of a monomania, and relapsed into silence.

It was late and dark when we rolled into the station of Harrodsburg. Here, all was bustle and stir. Two trains were being loaded with recruits from the North-west. The station was blazing with light, and full of civilians and military men of all ranks, conversing, giving orders, or hurriedly rushing to and fro.

Scarcely had we come to a stop, and the active conductor arrived to announce the name of the place, when Dr. Hook sprang up, drew the man aside, and whispered in his ear—what I know not, but the effect was astounding.

'Whew!' exclaimed the conductor, with a shrill whistle of surprise, 'this is serious, Doctor; you take the responsibility, eh?'

The Doctor nodded, and they left the carriage together. I thought little of this, but kept my seat, my ticket being for Lexington, where I was to pass the night. Presently, four or five officers in uniform, and a larger number of citizens in plain clothes, came up and stared into the car, as if attracted by curiosity.

'Artful critter!' 'Younger than I thought him!' 'Well, he's a gone 'coon, now!' were the only scraps of talk that fell upon my ear—perfect enigmas to me. Dr. Hook came up.

'Please to alight, my love,' he said to his wife. 'Come, Titia Jenner; it might be unpleasant for ladies when the caption's made.'

What he meant I knew no more than I do about the cuneiform character on the sun's parallax; but as Miss Jenner passed me she bent forward and said, in an impressive whisper—

'Rash man, fly!—for your life, fly!'

Before I could gasp out a question, she was gone, and had joined her relations. I looked after her with a stupid, puzzled face, that must have been very comic; for a light laugh broke from some of the bystanders, and then there was a hum, and a cry of—

'Here he comes! Here's the Deputy Provost-Marshal!'

And, in sober earnest, a stout, pale-faced personage, with epaulettes stitched on the shoulders of a gray coat, but wearing a cocked hat and sabre, came bustling up, followed by a guard of soldiers with fixed bayonets. With him was the conductor.

'Collar the varmint! Give him the butt-end if he resists!' cried the marshal, pointing me out to a file of his men, 'he with the gray cape!'

And before I could really convince myself that I was the unwitting cause of all this hubbub, I found myself dragged out, handcuffed, and in military custody.

'Citizens! we may thank the intelligence of a lady for this! But for Mrs. Hook, the villain might have escaped capture,' cried the triumphant Doctor; and there was a roar of applause, while I loudly expostulated against the treatment which I was thus receiving at the hands of the authorities.

The Provost-Marshall looked at me with a sort of admiration, and remarked that I was the 'brazenest rowdy unhung.'

'Look at him!' cried another; 'knows he's snared; knows he's booked for Fort-Lafayette, and perhaps the gallows, and see how cool he takes it!'

'Of what am I accused?' said I, angry with the consciousness of innocence.

'What's your name? Where do you hail from?' asked the Marshal rudely enough.

'My name is William Looksley Burgess. I am a native of Northampton, in England.' There was an absolute yell of scornful laughter.

'Your name is Catesby Latch of Shaftesbury County, North Carolina; and you're the most accused spy and traitor that ever plotted against the Union!'

Now it was my turn to laugh.

'Prove your assertions,' said I.

To my horror, the Provost-Marshall put his hand into the pockets of the gray Inverness cape which I had thrown, half-an-hour ago, over my shoulders, and pulled out a number of letters.

'Here's proofs in plenty—umph! One letter directed to Major Butler, one to Colonel Ashton, one to Randolph Stewart, one to Mrs. Blake, a fifth to Dr. Bartletop—all known sympathisers with the bloodthirsty rebels down South.'

The mood of the bystanders was gradually turning from irony to ferocity. They began to clamour for my execution, or, at least, that I should be lashed with a cowhide until I made a full confession. Former escapes of mine were quoted, and I was evidently regarded as a most hateful individual.

In vain I pleaded—in vain I protested. I was utterly borne down by the weight of evidence. My coat, the luckless gray cape, was torn from my shoulders that I might read the owner's name—'Catesby Latch'—neatly written on the lining. This unlucky name had been read by Mrs. Hook when I lent her the cloak, and hence had arisen the denunciation and the whole awkward affair. Very slowly—for I was confused by the noise and threats—I began to catch a glimpse of daylight. I sprang forward.

'Gentlemen, Provost-Marshall, I am not Catesby Latch, nor any other rebel. I am what I seem—an Englishman. If you telegraph to New-York—'

Their outcries drowned my voice. In vain I protested that my late fellow-traveller, who had left the train at Glasgow, must no doubt have accidentally exchanged his cloak for mine—both being of a gray colour and an identity of cut. I was bidden to produce the brass 'check' for my baggage, and when, after a search, it was found in a pocket of the dreadful Inverness cape, the result was no pleasant one.

I had a black portmanteau, the commonest article of bachelor luggage in America; and Latch, spy or whatever he was, had probably a similar valise, which still remained in the train, and proved to contain correspondence that incriminated me worse than ever. As for my trunk, no doubt Latch, having my brass ticket, had accidentally carried it off along with my cloak.

I never spent before, and never wish to spend again, such a half-hour as that which succeeded these discoveries. That I was Catesby Latch was as well established in every one's mind as that Washington founded the Republic; and while Mrs. Hook was flattered and cheered as a patriot heroine, I was cursed, cuffed, taunted, and banded to and fro amid a furious throng.

At last I was lodged in jail, thankful for the shelter; and it was not until I had been a fortnight in the cramped limits of the little Harrodsburg prison—full of mutinous soldiers, or suttlers under sentence for smuggling whisky—that I persuaded a warder to allow my telegraphing to my employers at New-York. Holt & Denny acted promptly and kindly; and an interview with Secretary Cameron, then chief of the War Department, procured my freedom. This might not have been so easy; but that a full account of the affair—written by Catesby Latch himself to a friend in Baltimore, and taking a most jocular view of the case—had fallen into the hands of the officials on the frontier. And thus my release was indirectly brought about by the very man to whom I owed my arrest. But I had had enough of American life; and, soon after my return to New-York, I resigned my situation, and embarked for Europe.

'EEP-'EEP!

BY ALLAN PARK PATON.

DEAR old Chester—that concrete of dovescots—how enjoyed my first ramble there after getting out of my inn! for that was no easy matter. Such a place with up and downs and alongs, and dusky nooks and crooks and corners, I never saw. Why, one's neck would soon become as supple and rotatory as an owl's in the twisting and keeking and peering about that it requires there. It should have been called 'The Magpie's Paradise'; as more than once on meeting, in an obscure lobby, one of the waiters, 'lighter-footed than the fox,' with a glinting silver spoon or fork in his hand, I felt assured that the villain was going to secrete it.

Well, after a dozen false turns, and being obliged to greet many people for information that was of no earthly service to me, I had emerged into the open air, and taken a long stroll round the walls and over the Doe, and was on my way to the Cathedral; when, as I went, lo! Eastgate-street in excitement, and its Rows burdened with people of every class! A fine sight Chester as it may have been at its great historical points. I, too, determined to look over. So I left the fashionable side—which would be better seen from the other—and got up with the humbler folk; and, fortunately, among several juveniles.

Here I first did the amiable to three little girls, by girdling them poised by the waist upon the old, grotesque oaken balustrade; and then I cultivated and succeeded in securing the acquaintance of a gentleman in a black suit.

When I addressed him, he was poised on the safer, tender region, and straining a pair of fine large green eyes up the street. He wore a long, loose waistcoat of corduroy, a tight pair of trousers of ditto, and a coat of worsted cap, with a brass plate in front, telling, in the days of abolition, whose slave he was; and he had a black bag under him, and flourished a brush in one hand.

This was the young gentleman with whom I opened a conversation, of which the following will give some idea.

'What are they expecting, my boy?'

'The 'Merican Circus, sir.' A hitch, and an eager gaze along the street.

'Is it a large one?'

'There's fotty 'osses in one karridge.' Another hitch.

'Will they soon be here?'

'Yes. They was to be between 'alf-past 'lev'n and twelve.' An interval.

'Did you become a sweep of your own accord? Did you want to be one?'

'No; my father put me to it.'

'What is your father? Is he a sweep?'

'No; he's a bricklayer.'

'What's your name?'

'Erry Richard.'

'Have you any brothers or sisters?'

'Yes; I have two brothers and two sisters. My brothers are learning to be bricklayers, too.'

'Do you like your work?' A shake of the head.

'When do you get up in the mornings—five and six?'

'Shake of the head. 'One and two, sir.'

'But then you'll get done soon?'

'Shake of the head. 'Sometimes don't get our tay till six o'clock at night.'

'How old are you?'

'Tev'n, sir.'

'But you'll not be bound as an apprentice?'

'Shake of the head. 'Seven years.'

'That's a long while. And how much is past?'

'One and half.'

'And what wages do you get?'

'Mate and clothes.' A pause.

'Oh, never you mind, Henry. It will soon wear away, and then you'll get into some trade you like better. Can you read and write?'

'Yes.' A pause. 'My father's going to take me away from it soon.' A hitch, and an eager gaze;—new hope.

'It's to be a great circus this, isn't it?'

'Yes; they've had big bills all over.'

'And just to be one night?'

'Yes.' Sad tone.

'Where is it to be?'

'On the Rhodose.'

'Are you going?'

'Sad tone. 'No.'

'How much is it?'

'Sixpence on the flat.'

'And have you not a sixpence?'

Silence, and a hitch on, as if he must make the most of it.

Here I gave him a sixpence; and, although poised tenderly, he touched his hat with his brush. A glorious piece of colour the little coin was as it lay in his wee, black, dry, puggy-looking palm! And now he had a personal interest in the coming cavalcade, and hitched so impulsively that I thought he would be over. It gave me true pleasure to put him in the way of it. He would see the hoops, and banners, and bare-backed steeds, and conjuring Arabs, and dancing Dervishes, and bounding Bedouins, and grinning Giaours; and all the rest of it. He would have the easiest seat in the throng, I warrant; and, at every joke of the clown, would so show his teeth as to make spectators exclaim, 'It lightens!' He would be powdering the by-lanes next day, making summersaults; and have secured a memory which would make many a dark chimney bright. I declare, I feel as if I could write a chapter as sentimental as any of Sterne's upon it; indeed, one of 'Sterner stuff,' if I may be allowed the expression.

After this piece of good fortune, he was much more communicative; but, during his revelations, frequently forgot all the delight in store for him, and by a low tone and reddening eyelid showed me that he was sad at heart.

'Do you stay with your father?' I asked.

'No; with master, sir. There's four on us with him.'

'Is he kind?'

'Yes'—a little hesitatingly. 'Him over there'—his companion sweep—'has been with him since he was two year old.'

'And are you very busy?'

'Yes.'

'I suppose these houses are so old and crooked here it is a difficult place for you?'

'The chimneys of the old 'ouses is the widest, sir. The new chimneys is all narrow.'

'Indeed! I suppose, looking over to the opposite roof, you know all these?'

'Yes, sir; we do.' Party pride. 'The Magpie's Paradise, we'll call it; my inn.'

'And how often will you do it?'

'Oh, very often. They'll have it done whenever a person leaves a room.'

'After some stay, I fancy. And are you well paid?'

'Yes. Sometimes, speaking a fortune, 'seven or eight pounds. We do Chumley Castle, and we gets seven or eight pounds there; and they gives us mate, and wont let the boys go up the chimneys. They must have the machine.'

'And do you still go up chimneys?'

'Yes.' Slow.

'Very sore, is it?'

'Yes.' Red eyelid.

'How do you manage it?'

'Elbows and knees.' Still sad.

'And does it hurt them?'

'Yes'—pause—'at first. Bathe them in salt and water.'

'Does that make them better?'

'Yes; hardens them.'

He was getting dreary; so I changed the subject.

'And have you ever been at Something Hall?'

'Yes. We do Something Hall; but it's such a skinny place, they wont give us mate—only a drink of water. And we go up there; and the chimneys of the house and of the stables is round.'

'Do you ever stick in the chimneys?'

'I have never stuck.' Proudly.

'But they sometimes do?'

'Yes.'

'And how do they get them out?'

Here there was a mysterious pause, which made me suspect that they must still occasionally kindle a fire below to 'start' them. However, he by-and-by answered, 'Breaks a hole for them.'

The crowd had evidently caught sight of something, and he hitched on again. Whereon, looking round, I faced a baker lad with his basket, whom I tackled for the price of bread, bakers' wages, and some odds and ends; and we got such friends that he at last said laughingly, pointing with his floury hand to my little dark friend,

'A baker and a sweep! sir.'

'What, is there a saying about them?' I asked.

'Yes, sir. They say they can make their way through a crowd when other people can't.'

But THE PROCESSION was at hand; and, just as it came below us, out rushed, from the shop behind, two or three Goldsmith-headed, intelligent-looking, aproned, shoemaker lads, smelling dreadfully of leather; and they chattering, too, we made rather a mixture of it; while below, from East Gate to Water Gate, between the quaint, many-coloured houses—their queer Rows clustered with all kinds of people—came JONATHAN, 'going ahead' for the almighty dollar even through one of the oldest places in Britain. 'Howes & Cushing's Great U-nited States Troupe.' On they came. First, 'The Stupendous Apollonios, or Great Musical Chariot,' equal, one of the sons of Crispin told me—as he had doubtless learned from the bills—to sixty musicians. Then appeared Mr. J. P. Paul, 'the first reinsman in the world, driving, four in hand, his forty American cream-coloured horses,' which, with their bones sticking out of their bodies, looked as if they wished much to be 'put out of misery,' or be able to 'skedaddle,' to make an early use of the new verbal importation. Then came the Arabs, and the Red Indians, and one wonder after another; and I can only say this, that if my young friend in black had laid his waist upon his cap, with the brass plate down, he would not have needed that conspicuous patch which his master would ere long require to put upon his corduroy. By St. Werburgh! how he wriggled! I hope the expectations of the poor little black diamond were fulfilled when he found himself actually 'on the flat' inside of 'The Colossal Circus Tent.'

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. V.

THE vivid picture which Sir Walter Scott has given, in 'The Lady of the Lake' and 'The Legend of Montrose,' of Clan Alpine and the Children of the Mist, will be remembered by every reader. The terrible persecution which the MacGregors were subjected to—the cruel sufferings which for many years they had to struggle against, when their whole tribe was outlawed, their lands confiscated, and their very name proscribed—Sir Walter has made familiar to many who would perhaps have never heard but for him of the valorous endurance of the 'clan that was nameless by day.' That the great novelist has done justice to the indomitable energy, the terrible prowess, the courage, and the wild heroic fidelity of this much wronged sept, there is no one can venture to dispute. But certain warm-hearted Highlanders—who feel peculiarly interested in all the brave men who spoke the mother tongue of the Gael in other days—assert that the poet, to say the least of it, has fixed too exclusively on the fiercer and more savage attributes of the banished clan. It may be Sir Walter really did exaggerate, for artistic purposes, those harsher traits of character which must have in some degree existed among the MacGregors when subjected to such vile treatment as theirs—unless they were actually something more than mortal; or it may perhaps as likely be that the kindly partiality of the modern Celts has closed their eyes, when they think so, on some of the ruder doings of the outlawed and exasperated mountaineers.

At any rate, there seems to be some force in the reasoning which the novelist has put into the mouth of Rannald MacEagh in Argyll's dungeon, when he says, 'I am a man like my forefathers; while wrapped in the mantle of peace we were lambs; it was rent from us, and ye now call us wolves. Give us the huts ye have burned, our children whom ye have murdered, our widows whom ye have starved; collect from the gibbet and the pole the mangled carcasses and whitened skulls of our kinsmen; bid them live and bless us, and we will be your vassals and brothers; till then let death and blood and mutual wrang draw a dark veil of division between us.'

There is here a natural eloquence and logic of facts which cannot fail to find an echo in the most peaceful heart amongst us. If the Children of the Mist did not feel such sentiments, at least they are amazingly like the sentiments by which we can most readily suppose we would be actuated in their circumstances. But, however that may be, certainly the following song does not breathe the fiery energy of Rannald's hostility; nor is it at all tinged with the vindictive spirit which scandalised Captain Dalgetty in the parting injunctions of the old cateran to his grandson, Kenneth of the Mist. I hope this is a fit place to notice one mistake which Sir Walter has certainly made, and to which he has given extensive currency. In all his works where he has introduced Highlanders and Lowlanders together, he represents the former calling the latter 'Sassenachs' or 'Saxons.' This the Highlanders never do; and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, never did. The Highlanders in the west of Scotland, at all events, would as soon think of calling their Lowland brethren 'Franchmen' as 'Sassenich.' They call themselves 'Gaidheil,' and the Lowlanders they call 'Gail,' words which have almost the same sound, but whose derivation and exact meaning I believe it is at present impossible to fix with certainty. Some people translate the word 'Gail' by 'Stranger,' but there appears to be reason to doubt if it ever had that meaning. Certainly it never bears it now. It is appropriated to the one use, standing always for 'Lowland Soot,' just as 'Gael' always stands for 'Highland Soot.' It is remarkable that this word 'Gail' forms the termination of several Highland names. Amongst others, that of the world-renowned hero, Fingal, who is better known in Gaelic, however, as Finn. This seems to go rather against the rendering of 'Gail' by 'Stranger.' Besides, there is no reason why the Highlanders should call the Lowlander 'Strangers,' any more than the English, who are 'Sassenich,' or the Scandinavians, who are 'Lochlannich,' and very frequently introduced both in the tales and poems of the Gael.

I once met a native of the Isle of Man who had been long in Scotland, and who knew the Celtic dialects well. I questioned him on this subject, and he told me that they (the Manx) called all Scotchmen indiscriminately whether Lowland or Highland, 'Albanich'—that is 'natives of Albin'; and that they called Englishmen, and only Englishmen, 'Sassenich,' or 'Saxons.' To their own language, he said, they gave the name of 'Gaelic.' We speak of it as 'Manx.' I may add that the Highlanders never call the English language 'Sassenach.' 'Ch nìod Sasannach,' which I have somewhere seen put in the mouth of a Highlander for 'I have no English,' is the most inexpressible nonsense. The Gaelic for the English language is 'Beurla,' pronounced 'Bairla'—a word which I cannot explain. English seems to have been early in use in the Highlands. I once observed a tombstone, in the old and roofless church of Kildalton, Islay, bearing date 1622 or 1624, with the inscription on it in English. It lies over the grave of a noted champion and strong man, still well remembered, whose name was MacArthur.

How that ludicrous dialect, which passes for the educated Highlandman's English, took its rise, I cannot conceive. I have conversed with Highlanders of all ages and degrees of education, and I never heard one of them calling himself 'she,' or 'hur nainseal,' in my life.

In the recent volume of Scottish songs published by the Messrs. Chambers, this curious custom is gravely accounted for in this absurd fashion:—"The Highlanders, it is said, have only one pronoun, which to Lowland ears sounds like "she," and so they are humorously represented in Lowland songs speaking of themselves as "she." This is not the case. The Highlanders have three personal pronouns, just like other people; and none of them sounds particularly like 'she.'

In her 'Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlanders of Scotland,' Mrs. Grant of Laggan has given a most elaborate history and analysis of 'MacGregor o' Ruars,' which now follows. She says:—"There is every reason to suppose, from the intrinsic evidence contained in this song, that it was composed during Montrose's wars"—the very period at which Sir Walter makes such a powerfully poetic use of the Children of the Mist.

The verses form the elegy or lament for Macgregor o' Ruars, sung by a comrade—foster-brother and clansman—who had survived a recent and bloody skirmish, in which MacGregor himself and most of his followers had perished:—

There is sorrow and sorrow and sorrow now fills me,
Poor pitiful sorrow no man can redress;
His sorrow and sighing and sadness that thrills me,
Oh! terrible sadness I cannot repress.

MacGregor has perished—MacGregor, pine-banner'd—
MacGregor, beloved in Glen Liohban the green—
MacGregor, the brave, by whose foes ever honour'd
His threatening roar of our pibroch hath been.

His badge was the pine—known the steep hill ascending—
His arrows were wing'd from the true bird's brown side;
Twas a joy for a prince when the hero was sending
The smooth polish'd shafts from the bow of his pride.

By that strong hand well aim'd, son of Murdoch the fearless—

Swift, silent, and deadly they darted from thee;
Then, if wrong e'er was done us, MacGregor the peerless,
Soon our foes saw thy standard, and trembled to see!

But now when they hurt us, we bear uncomplaining—
MacGregor and all that would help us are gone;
And the thoughts of our sad hearts with them are remaining
In the chapel that stands near the valley alone.

My kinsmen co-nurtured! O you that could right me!
It grieves and it wounds me the blank you have made;
Your death and your absence for ever affright me,
And the dark narrow bed where your heads low are laid!

Now in shirts of pale linen so lonely you're lying,
No hands and no silks and no tartans you wear;
Ourselves sew'd your white robes, with sorrow and sighing;
No gentle dames wrought with us—wept with us, there.

Now this counsel of me, who your safety am seeking,
Take you for your guidance, young clansmen of mine;
When you go to the inn where the strangers sit speaking,
More than one draught, for your life's sake, decline.

Take the dish which they offer; be cautious and wary—
There is no man you meet with but may be a foe;
While you drink, remain standing, and then do not tarry,
But turn round and haste ye—delay not, but go.

For summer take spring-time—for autumn take winter—
And away and away to wild solitudes his,
Where the heat and the cold the crag shiver and splinter,
And see you sleep lightly wherever you lie.

* The true bird (see for ehn) is a poetic name for the eagle. The common name is 'Fiolair,' a word rather difficult to pronounce with a right accent.

The squirrel is rare, but the hunters deceive him,
And draw him away from his nest in the tree;
And the falcon is noble, but men will not leave him
His daring, his speed, and the blue heavens free.

'More than one draught, for your life's sake, decline.' At this place, Mrs. Grant makes the following remark:—"The single draught in this verse is particularly expressive of the constant apprehensions which haunt the mind of him who knows that his life is hunted with malicious diligence. The ancients tell of dogs on the borders of the Nile who always drank running, for fear of the crocodile. This is one of the liveliest images of habitual terror." There are other parts of the song equally expressive. The mention of a bow and arrows reminds us again of Captain Dalgetty, and his pleasant surprise at finding such antiquated weapons still in use among the Children of the Mist. Ah! that Dugald Dalgetty of Drumthwaite should live to see men fight with bows and arrows! The immortal Gustavus would never have believed it—nor Wallenstein, nor Butler, nor old Tilly. There was no man could ever lay out his old-world knowledge to such advantage as Sir Walter, either for giving pleasure to his reader or verisimilitude to his narrative.

While speaking of the charge which has been brought against him, of rather exaggerating the revengeful spirit of our poor Highlanders—whom I am sure he loved as much as any man, and delighted with his kingly genius to honour—I transcribe another song, which contains the lament of a woman over the body of her murdered husband. It is probably two or three centuries older than the preceding, as it is found in the Dean of Lismore's book, and was considered ancient at the beginning of the sixteenth century. But neither does it manifest a ferocious or vindictive spirit; though it speaks with energy enough of 'the hound from Mull' who killed Connal. This little poem is rather peculiar in its structure:—

Alas! alas! is this the head
Where knowledge and where sense were bred—
The lovely and the handsome head
Of the blue-bladed Connal!

Alas! alas! is this the eye
That beam'd around so generously—
The manly and the clear blue eye
Of the kind-hearted Connal!

Alas! alas! are these the lips
The bards could not for wit eclipse—
The honey-sweet, the thin red lips
Of the fair mouth of Connal!

Alas! alas! is this the hand
That could the force of foes withstand!
Oh, strong in battle was the hand
Of my first-loved—my Connal!

Alas! alas! is this the side
By which I stood a happy bride!
Peaceful lying on his side,
The hound from Mull kill'd Connal.

Alas! alas! is this the foot
That oft was fleet in the pursuit;
But ne'er from warrior turn'd the foot
Of my round-shielded Connal.

Alas! alas! my chief! my love!
The field was gain'd where'er you strove.
My tale is done. I've lost my love—
I dwell in tears for Connal.

In the following ballad, an old Highland tradition, still well known and often repeated, presents itself in a lyrical form. A distinguished chief of the MacLeans, who was known as Sir Lachlan Mor, on account of his great size and prowess, was killed in a bloody battle between his own clan and the Macdonalds, which took place in the year 1598, on the shore of Gruinort, Islay. The story says that he was killed by a deformed and very diminutive man named Dubh Shee, who had offered the chief his services before the fight commenced, but met with rather a contemptuous refusal. The man immediately went over to the other side, whose leader, Sir James Macdonald, received him gladly. Dubh Shee was unfit to mingle in the strife of strong men. So it is said he took up his position on a tree which overlooked the field of battle, though I believe there are no trees growing there now. He was a famous archer, and he watched his opportunity till the chances of the fight brought Sir Lachlan Mor within his reach, when he shot him dead at the head of his men. The MacLeans were completely defeated with heavy loss. A day or two after this, it is said that two females, of whom different accounts are given—some calling them strangers, some clanswomen, some relatives of the dead—grieving to think that the body of so notable a chief as Sir Lachlan Mor should lie unburied and uncared for on the moorland, came from a distance in search of it. They hired a rude vehicle—the only one to be had in the neighbourhood—and having found the corpse, proceeded to carry it to the nearest burying-ground, about six miles distant. The way was rough, and the driver looking behind him saw the head of the great chief, which extended beyond the car, nodding to him at every jolt, as if it had life, and were giving him directions. Boor, or perhaps enemy, as the fellow was, he laughed when he saw this. At the next heavy rut he looked again to please his savage soul with the same ferocious enjoyment. But this time the elder female, who had watched him, acted as described in the ballad. She killed the brutal driver with the chieftain's dagger. Then along with her companion she brought the mortal remains of Sir Lachlan to the place where they still lie buried. A spirited gentleman of the clan recently endeavoured to raise a sum sufficient to erect a monument over the grave of this chief, the most famous and the ablest the MacLeans ever had; but unfortunately he did not succeed to his satisfaction.

Slowly from the field of slaughter
Do they bring Sir Lachlan Mor;
Slowly o'er the weary moorland,
From the dank and deadly shore.

Slowly, and in bitter sorrow,
Through a rough and rugged way,
With the yellow beams upon it
Of the sickly setting day.

Ah! how lowly lies the leader;
See how pale his face is now;
Never in the hall or highway—
Never on the mountain brow—

Shall his step be laid majestic;
Shall his stately form be seen;
Shall his voice inspire the council,
Or the fight his manly men.

Never shall his clan behind him
Gather in the joy of fight;
Never draw their cold blue weapons—
Hard and deadly—glancing bright.

Poorly is the chief attended,
Rudely is the hero led;
Yet he wakes not from the slumber
Of yon red and mossy bed.

For the sad stamp's on his features
Which Dubh Shee's hard arrow bore;
On the moor Clan Gillian reddened
With their brave and boiling gore.

Only two are with the driver
Of a rolling, rocking car,
Stretch'd whereon the dead man's carried
From the fiery field of war:

Two that walk in silent sorrow—
Ladies of his kindred are—
Mourning to the field of slaughter—
Come to seek him from afar.

As they drive him slowly onward,
O'er the bad and broken way;
His head, with all its matted tresses,
Nodded where he lifeless lay.

Then the driver laugh'd who saw him,
Large and massy, lie along,
Senseless, soulless—him so lately
Foremost in the martial throng.

Laugh'd! and quicker drove him onward,
Yet again to see the head
Nodding, without will or reason,
With its light of manhood fled.

Fast then rush'd the ladies to him,
While more bitter was the flow
Of the tears they rain'd in anguish
On the manly face below.

And the elder dame answer'd—
'Laugh'st thou at my fallen chief?
May thine own vile carcase, caitiff,
Fill thy mother's heart with grief!

Out she drew the chieftain's dagger
As the angry word she said;
Out, and struck the scornor sternly—
Struck him on the moorland, dead!

Struck; and, bleeding, left him lying Stretch'd before the sunbeams there,
Like a wild fowl by the falcon
Swept from out the fields of air.

Then, alone, their dead they carried,
While one nursed the manly brow—
Nursed it on her bosom gently,
Like a holy, heavenly vow.

And one—tenderly she drove him
To the sad and solemn ground,
Where the hero's dust reposes,
With the mouldering ashes round.

Soft and slowly there we leave them—
Chieftain! may thine ashes rest
Peaceful as the voice of prayer
From a calm untroubled breast!

Long as sound the breezes o'er them,
Sound the voice of psalms beside;
And spread Christ's peace-inspiring Gospel,
From thy green sod, far and wide!

Sir Lachlan Mor MacLean is buried in the church-yard of Kilchoman, Islay, near the south wall of the church. This serves to explain the reference to psalms, &c. in the concluding lines.

THOMAS PATTISON.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Author. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St. Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

reasons, but, on the contrary, looked forward to the publication of 'Baldwin's African Hunting' with a lively interest, which has been more than justified by the result.

In his introductory chapter, Mr. Baldwin says:—'When the following pages, taken from my journals, were written—sometimes in ink, but often in pencil, gunpowder, tea, &c., in Kaffir kraals or waggon bottoms, and chiefly for a brother's eye—I little thought that they would ever come before the public; and it is only now, at the earnest solicitation of my friends—and almost promises made to many I left behind me in Natal, who noticed the once short trips grow longer and longer, till, in my last, 2,000 miles of an almost unexplored country had been traversed, and the Zambesi reached—that I am now induced, with some diffidence, to publish them.' A perusal of the book amply confirms the genuineness of this modus operandi; and we feel assured that no reader of this most interesting work will be impressed with any other idea than that it is the faithful chronicle of the events narrated, without any attempt at garnishing or mere book-making; indeed, this apparently literal transcription of the original journal is carried out to an extreme; and we have no hesitation in saying that considerable alterations and improvements in style and composition might have been introduced, without in the slightest degree affecting the fidelity of the work.

Mr. Baldwin informs us that 'the love of sport, dogs, and horses was innate in him; and, from the age of six, he had his two days a-week on his pony with the neighbouring harriers.' Being placed in a large mercantile establishment, it was found that quill-driving did not suit his 'roving disposition,' and he was sent to Forfarshire to learn farming; but, having 'a difficulty with the master,' he 'changed the location to a West Highland farm,' where, as he says, he spent the happiest days of his life. It was, while revelling in the pleasures of the 'land of the mountain and the flood,' that he made up his mind to emigrate to some country where he would find free scope for his vagrant, sporting propensities; and Gordon Cumming's book, which appeared at that moment, at once induced him to decide in favour of Natal. Accordingly, having laid in a stock of guns, rifles, saddles, seven deer-hounds, et id genus omne, he set sail for that 'paradise of South Africa,' where he landed, after a passage of ninety-two days, in December 1851.

Within three weeks of his arrival, Mr. Baldwin started on his first hunting trip into the Zulu country, along with a great hunter known in the colony as 'Elephant White,' and others. This excursion, made in the unhealthy season to the unhealthy district about St. Lucia Bay, was a most disastrous one. 'Out of nine hunters,' he says, 'who went out full of vigour and hope, in all the ardour of enterprise, Gibson and myself alone returned, enervated and prostrated, after months of insensibility in Kaffir kraals.' After his return to Natal, in a most debilitated state, he was received by Mr. W. M. Collins, Postmaster-General (formerly of Glasgow), and for three or four months remained under his hospitable roof. He observes, 'It is to Mrs. Collins' nursing and care—and all the little delicacies, so grateful and refreshing to a sick man, which a woman's forethought can alone supply—that I am indebted for my eventual recovery, after a very long illness.' I might have been thought that this miserable result of his first hunting trip would have sickened him at such a life; but having had 'a taste' of hunting elephants, hippopotami, lions, and other such small game, 'he thirsted after their blood;' and after a tedious convalescence, during which he indulged in cattle-dealing with the Kaffirs and other native tribes, he started—on the 15th of July 1853, accompanied by Gibson, the survivor of the former trip—on his second expedition into the Zulu country.

Having proceeded to the kraal of Panda (the King of the Zulus), in order to pay their devoirs, they learned that his Majesty was asleep. Impatient to pursue their journey, they accordingly set off; but before they had gone two miles, they were overtaken by one of Panda's captains, who swore awfully by the bones of Dingaan and Chaka—the former bloody and cruel Kings of the Zulus—and ordered them at once to return to propitiate his sable majesty. This they had no alternative but to do, under somewhat humiliating circumstances. On the whole, however, the excursion was decidedly more successful than their previous luckless venture; and while they had, of course, to put up with many discomforts, they had, nevertheless, good sport, and sufficient variety to satisfy the most fastidious.

On the 10th April 1854, our author left Natal Bay on his third trip, his destination on this occasion being the Amatonga country, beyond the Zulu. In his narrative of this enterprise, we have the usual routine of killing and slaying, together with some amusing incidents pleasantly described—such as his essay at shoemaking, a novel warm bath, plucking live fowl, and his peculiar notions on Sabbath observance and short commons.

Mr. Baldwin's fourth and fifth trips were commenced respectively on the 31st March 1855 and 7th October 1855—the Zulu country and the ferre nature thereof being the favoured objects on these occasions. We have, in this part of the book, a dash down-hill of his waggon and fourteen, by which his driver's skull got fractured; and the following recipe for a stew, which we recommend to the attention of housekeepers—advising them, of course, to first catch the hippopotamus:—'Take 1½ lbs. of breast of sea-coat well stewed, cut up small, about 3 table-spoonfuls of inside fat rendered clean and white as snow, a few red peppers, salt, a handful of rice, a handful of fine flour, a couple of pickled walnuts, with a few sprigs of thyme, or some such herb!' The description of Mr. Schroeder, the Norwegian missionary, as well as of his church and congregation, is very amusing. Mr. Baldwin found himself much more respected by the Kaffirs on this than on the previous journeys, being evidently richer in waggons and other substantiaproperties—for your Kaffir, like your civilised man, is a great worshipper of wealth. Mr. Baldwin pays a tribute to the scrupulous honesty of the natives; and gives a vivid account of the frightful massacre of the Zulus at and after the battle between Panda's two sons, when it was estimated that one-fourth of the Zulu nation was destroyed; when the land for fifteen miles was covered with fetid corpses; and when the Tugela was choked with the bodies, and its waters reddened with the blood, of the slain!

The sixth chapter is occupied with an account of Mr. Baldwin's expedition through the Transvaal Republic, and the Merico country, with an account of the Boers, the Bechuanas, and their great chief Mosilikatse; and is full of interest and novelty. In this chapter, he pays a well-merited compliment to the colony of Natal, which he says, viewed from the Drakenberg, 'looks beautiful, well watered and wooded, and like a large well-kept garden;' while, further on, he remarks,—'Natal is the garden of South Africa.' En passant, he describes his meeting with the second instance in this quarter of abject poverty, in the person of an Irishman with seven children; and this man's father was said to be an 'Honourable,' with a rent-roll of £12,500 a-year! We have also an account of 'a night in the open veldt,' which, as Jonathan would say, 'is a caution to makers.' He subsequently falls in with and engages Kleinboy, Gordon Cumming's after-rider, whom he finds 'a most amusing dog, but incorrigibly lazy.' A Hottentot beauty next attracts him, and here is her photograph:—'She is one of Pharaoh's lean kine, unusually tall, straight as a kitchen poker; long, lean, scraggy neck; the smallest little pig eyes in the world; no nose, but two huge nostrils; high cheek bones, smoken cheeks, wide mouth, very thick lips just the colour of the mulberry juice, low forehead, and very small head, with about the eighth of an inch long of woolly hair, between 50 and 60 years of age, generally with a short black pipe in her mouth; wears ear-rings and armlets, and the gaudiest-coloured shawl and landkerchief; is of a yellowish copper-colour, with breast as flat as a deal-board; but with all these she has the most perfect, delicately-formed, and smallest hands and feet in the world!' Mr. Baldwin describes a singular custom of the Boers 'in the days when they went courting.' 'If you admire any one in particular,' he says, 'you take the first opportunity that presents itself of asking her to upset. Should this be accorded—when the old people and all the rest of the household have retired, a curtain being all the partition between the sitting and bed rooms—the chosen one again appears with a candle, short or long according as she fancies you or otherwise, and remains as long as that burns—all conversation being carried on in whispers, and the fair one being obliged to sit very close, and talk low, for fear of disturbing the inmates on the other side of the curtain. These upsets frequently last far into the morning, and the happy swain is at great pains to trim the candle—not to let it flicker or flare, or get into a draft—and so keep it burning as long as possible, for it is imperative to retire when that is out.' This is a new version of 'the old, old story;' but whether our young lady friends think it 'a corrected and improved edition,' we leave them to determine. What would they say to trying it by way of experiment? As a set-off to this pleasant upset, we have our author's unpleasant downsit to his Christmas dinner in the desert, his 'bill of fare' being 'a bit of rhinoceros—cold,' and so fat as to make the strongest stomach bilious—and a small portion of half-baked dough, and a cup of coffee to drink the health of absent friends'—rather an unfavourable contrast to the roast-beef and plum-pudding of old England.

The seventh journey which Mr. Baldwin undertook, in 1858, had for its Ultima Thule the celebrated Lake Ngami; and comprised a tour through the Orange-river Free State (a fine country, which our Government foolishly handed over to the Dutch colonists a few years ago); and the Transvaal Republic—both of them Dutch colonies, and at war with each other at the time—and also the Merico country. His arrangements and provant for the journey consisted of three Kaffirs, two Hottentots (a driver and after-rider), a waggon, eighteen oxen, a cow and a calf, five horses, and seven dogs; with guns, powder, and lead; beads, wine, and supplies of tea, coffee, meal, &c. for a twelvemonth at least; add to these a dozen of brandy and a cask of good Madeira, with a goodly supply of eland and giraffe bell-tongue hanging up to dry. A Kaffir brings him an old musket to be mended; and he tries his 'prentice han' at tinkering the lock, but makes a mess of it; and the native insists on getting another gun for his used-up 'shooting iron.' Our traveller is compelled to give him one worth three of it, in order to keep him sweet. However, he subsequently manages to exchange the old gun for a Masara boy! and for this, and some other similar acts of kind-heartedness, Mr. Baldwin was accused by some humanity-mongers in the colony of slave-dealing! His five Kaffirs leave him most unceremoniously in the lurch, in the midst of the desert; and, after a fearful and wearisome time they are hunted up, and induced to return to their allegiance by his remaining servant. The following incident in elephant hunting shows the exciting and dangerous nature of that sport:—'I rode close under the stern of the largest bull elephant, and he cleared a path for me. He turned to see who had the audacity to ride so near—for the horse's nose touched him—when I gave him a bullet behind the shoulder, and cleared out of his path. In reloading I lost him; and, cantering on his spoor, he very nearly caught me, as he had stopped and turned round just where the path turned suddenly and sharply to the right; and I was almost under his very trunk ere I saw him. He was lying in wait, and made a terrific charge, trumpeting furiously. The horse was round like a top; and away I went, with both rowels deep in his flanks as I threw myself on his neck. It was a very near shave. His trunk was over the horse's hind quarters. I went through bush that, in cold blood, I should have pronounced impenetrable; but did not come off scatheless; my poor hands are sheekingly torn, and my trousers, from the knee, literally in shreds, though made of goatskin.' En route, he met the Chief Sechele's daughter, with a whity-brown picaninny, by an English trader of the name of Wilson, to whom she was married, but whom she was leaving in consequence of ill usage. He subsequently came up with her again, and gave her 'a lift' in his waggon to her father's kraal, as she was thoroughly done-up. Old Sechele, however, in true barbarian fashion, not having his amiable son-in-law to wreak his revenge upon, victimised poor Baldwin, by levying black-mail on him, in the shape of a horse and powder and lead, vindicating himself by declaring 'an Englishman had thrown away his daughter; and, as they have treated me so will I treat them.' Sechele is one of Moffat's converts, and 'professes to be very religious, saying grace before and after meat, holding forth to his people, and singing half the day.' Mr. Baldwin says that 'Moffat has all the Kaffirs under his finger and thumb, and can do just what he likes with them. He has been living very long amongst them, educates the different chiefs' children, and has thoroughly gained their confidence.'

Our author's description of Lake Ngami is exceedingly meagre, leaving almost everything to be desired. He says, 'The country all around appears to be a perfect flat—very unhealthy and uninteresting—with a lot of rubbishy reeds at this end; but it is wooded to the banks on the other side, and most of the way round. I gather from the natives that it is a three days' ride round the lake; but that the tsetse render it impassable for horses. The natives are afraid to cross in their frail canoes—as when a wind rises the water is very rough. Three canoes were swamped not long since, and their crews drowned. Not far from this southern point—the road the waggons take to Walvisch Bay—there is a high ridge of rocks, Letchulathebe's stronghold in case of an attack from Sebituana. I could only get a very bad view of an end of the lake; but, I must confess, that I was disappointed in it. To-day, I measured two trees called Mowain—one was 27, and the other 28 yards round the bole. At about 6 feet from the ground they spread into four immense stems, all bending outwards, and leaving in the middle a spacious apartment, exactly one foot between each stem when they branched from the main bole, widening upwards; and, at 18 or 20 feet from the ground, the circumference of the tree must have been 40 yards at least.' Our mighty Nimrod indulges in a sentimental apostrophe to a dead horse à la Sterne. The loss of this faithful animal seems to have put him in the dumps, for he concludes his in memoriam by saying, 'I have now lost all heart for the hunt, and care not how soon the trek comes to an end.' Mr. Baldwin has a return of his old enemy fever and ague, and the Kaffirs wonder to see him swathed in blankets, in the hot sun and before a rousing fire, shivering, and chattering, and icy cold. He makes a first essay at wagon-mending, and succeeds better than with the old one. He has a narrow escape from being burned up by the grass on fire, which they check, by firing the grass in a dozen places under the wind, so that, when the fiery-sirocco came up to this friendly trench, it was stopped for want of fuel.

The eighth chapter is occupied with the description of his second trip to Lake Ngami. Our traveller has a repetition of 'skedaddling' on the part of his Kaffirs; has a narrow escape from drowning in crossing the Tugela; meets a Mr. and Mrs. Thompson from the Cape, on a wedding tour to the great lake; overtakes the far-famed old Boer hunters—John Viljoen and Pet Jacobs—who have bagged 93 elephants! and has himself the usual allowance of sport, and about 5,000 lbs. of ivory.

Mr. Baldwin's ninth and last journey, in 1860, was the most important, as far as extent and interest of country traversed, and dangers encountered, give it a claim to that distinction. The Zambesi Falls were his destination on this occasion. When he arrived at the frontier, he found that the whole of the Boer officials had gone off to a public sale of sheep, cattle, and land, some eighty or a hundred miles away! He comes to the conclusion that gratitude forms no part of the Kaffir character; and declares—'For the future, I will lavish my kindnesses on the two much superior animals—horses and dogs, in spite of the missionaries dunning it into me that a black man is my brother. I could see, yesterday, that the good Samaritan (the missionary Zimmerman) was secretly annoyed and displeased that I would not shake hands with a parcel of his baptised singing heathens.' Incidentally, he mentions—'I have a very poor appetite, and live almost entirely on dry toast, cold roast Guinea fowls, partridges, pheasants, korans, dikkops, and ducks.' Good gracious! If this is his bill of fare with 'a very poor appetite,' what must it be when his molars and gastric juice are doing full duty? He is amused and annoyed with the vagaries of his drunk and half-mad 'Tottie,' suffers from horse-sickness and extremes of heat and cold—burning sun by day, and ice at night; is humbugged by Kaffirs; has narrow escapes from elephants and lions; comes on a Macao encampment—a miserable affair; shoots about 400 antelopes, besides other feræ naturæ; and calculates he has travelled 15,000 miles during the last three years. The chapter is altogether most interesting; but, although there is much that we had marked off for quotation, we find that we have already exceeded our limits. We accordingly confine ourselves to the account of the Falls of the Zambesi, which we give in the author's own words:—

'August 4th.—Zambesi Falls at last! I set off resolutely on the 1st, being determined to find the Falls; walked all day and all night, and towards morning I heard the roar of them. I never rested till I threw myself down, just before daybreak, within 300 yards of the river; and I spent yesterday at the Falls, which far exceeded all I had been led to expect. Rougher travelling I never encountered, but I had the benefit of the full moon. I struck the river first about two miles above the Falls; and there it is not less than two miles wide, covered with islands of all sizes—at least ten or twelve miles round—wooded to the water's edge—mowain trees, palmyra and palms and plenty of wild dates; some of the former measuring twenty yards round the bole. The river is the finest and most beautiful I ever saw. It is rocky and shallow; and, just above the Falls, about one mile wide. And now for the Falls. I heard the roar full ten miles off, and you can see the immense volumes of spray ascending like a great white cloud, over which shines an eternal rainbow. The whole volume of water pours over a huge rock into an enormous chasm below, of immense depth. I counted from 16 to 18 while a heavy stone of about 20 lbs. weight was falling. I could not see it to the bottom, but only saw the splash in the water. I stood opposite to the Falls, at nearly the same elevation, and could almost throw a stone across. The gorge cannot be more than a hundred yards wide; and, at the bottom, the river boils turbulently boiling. You cannot see the largest Fall for more than a few yards down, on account of the spray, and you are drenched with rain for 100 yards round from the falling mist. It is one perpendicular fall of many hundred feet, and I should think there are no less than 30 or 40 different cascades, of all widths. The gorge cannot be less than 2,000 yards long, and the outlet is not certainly more than 40 yards wide. This outlet is not the end of the gorge, though how far off I cannot say; the streams meet, form a wild, mad whirlpool, and then rush helter-skelter through the pass. Looking up the gorge, from that point, is the most magnificent sight I ever beheld. It is as if streams of brimstone were ascending high into the clouds. There was a never-ceasing rain for 50 and in some places upwards on the high land opposite; and the rocks are very slippery, and the ground, where there are no rocks, is a regular swamp, where the buffalo, hippopotamus, and elephant come to graze on the green grass. There is one grand fall at the head of the gorge, which you can see to the bottom, about 80 yards wide, but not so deep, as the river forms a rapid before it shoots perpendicularly over the rock. Below the Falls, the river winds about in a deep, narrow, inaccessible gorge—a strong, swift, rocky stream. I followed its windings for some distance, and, after all, was not more than two miles, as the crow flies, from the Falls. It is one succession of kloofs, valleys, and mountains, and the worst walking I ever encountered. The river through this fearful gorge seems not wider than a swollen Highland torrent. The greatest drawback to the otherwise magnificent scene, is that the dense clouds rising from below render the main Falls invisible; and it is only the smaller cascades you can see to the bottom. There are some 30 or 40 of these, spreading over a space of at least 1,500 yards. The Makololos are very jealous, and very much alarmed at my having found my way hither, and cannot account for it. I show them the compass, and say that is my guide, and they are sorely perplexed. The baboons here are out of all number. 8th.—I saw the Falls from the opposite side yesterday, and also from above. No words can express their grandeur. The view from above is, to my mind, the most magnificent; the water looks like a shower of crystal, and it is one perpendicular fall of immense height. There is only one outlet, and it is marvellous how such an immense body of water squeezes itself through so small an opening. I have punted for three days, in all directions, in the Makololo canoes, and could spend half my life on the waters. Dr. Livingstone is expected here to-day, and I am waiting to see him. 9th.—I had the honour yesterday of cutting my initials on a tree on the island above the Falls, just below Dr. Livingstone's, as being the second European who has reached the Falls, and the first from the east coast. Charles Livingstone says they far exceed Niagara in every respect; and the Doctor tells me that it is the only place, from the west coast to the east, where he had the vanity to cut his initials.

With this graphic extract, we conclude our notice of this agreeable book, from the perusal of which we have derived a large amount of interesting information; and we have only to add, that we have the best reasons for knowing, from friends in the colony of Natal, that Mr. Baldwin is a gentleman whose veracity is unquestionable, and whose reputation, as 'a mighty Nimrod,' stands second to none among those in the best position to judge. R. M.T.

A SOLITARY WALK IN NUREMBERG.

NUREMBERG is as old and as interesting a town as Prague; but its stamp of antiquity is completely different from that of the Bohemian capital, and the interest attached to it is also of another kind. The past of Prague makes us sympathise deeply and painfully with a people, once foremost in European civilisation, struggling for freedom and self-government, and ultimately despoiled of all their rights. The past of Nuremberg is not that of a people, but of a brave industrious little community. It toils on simply for its own weal, and the independence of the free town. Now, this independence could only be secured by the protection of one powerful ruler or another; and some wariness and shiftiness were necessary to obtain it. Thus, the community, like all commercial bodies, was a little selfish now and then, seeming not much to care how the wide world wagged outside its walls and gates, except inasmuch as matters affected itself. But the truth is, with all its wariness and shiftiness, the little world of trade, and science, and art, within those walls and gates, was braver and honestier than the German world outside them. For, outside the free towns and the Swabian towns, what was Germany? A great battle-field for scheming Electors, brave nobles, and oppressed peasants, roused from time to time into a fierce avenging of wrong.

Nuremberg, then, although it is so ancient—with moat and wall around it, and scores of towers—looks in no respect like Prague. It wants altogether the aristocratic, nay, the regal look of the other—that aspect which we cannot see without recalling how, 'with deep scars of thunder, it was once intrenched.' But Nuremberg, on the contrary, tells at once that it is a burgher city. It reminds you of a burgher—very old-fashioned in his attire, which yet cost him a great deal of money. He has his two gowns, and everything handsome; and, I can tell you, he is one who has had his losses, too. He did not spare any cost on the fashions of the day that he might be like his neighbours; in fact, it was necessary that he should be like them to be respected. However, in that way, he sometimes followed the multitude to do evil; and with all he could not get rid of his old-world cut. But to leave metaphor, I will set out on my walk.

It is winter; and snow has fallen. I take my afternoon's ramble outside the town, by the walls. For miles around, the level plain on which it stands is all dazzling whiteness. Out of this, it rises with its churches, castles, high-peaked roofs of houses, towers, gateways, and bastions, in quaint and fantastic show. The sky is cloudless and blue as in summer; and the sun pours a flood of light on the masses of buildings—all their peculiarities being etched out by the lines of the snow which has lodged on every point, ridge, and cranny. On the level, glittering road, ladies, in fashionable hats, appear from time to time. Nursemaids push along little sledges, in which lie little children, made very snug with feather-quilts and furs. Peasant women follow, who scorn crinoline, but do not scorn the orthodox Parisian standard of lady-like bulk, only that theirs is made up of solid quantities, by half a dozen woollen petticoats of different colours—a border of each being displayed. And, then, what waists! Name them not! for now come some of those little Bavarian dandy officers, so wasp-like in figure that one expects them to faint with horror as the honest countrywomen trudge past.

But all these take their way, by one gate or another, into the town; and I go on until the brilliant sunlight has faded, and is succeeded by the misty frost of evening. Everything is still, and I am alone. Now, as I look on the old town, it retreats from me three or four centuries into the past. The antique stone life of walls, and towers, and bastions remains, but the human beings whom I saw in the glare of day exist no more; and nothing is, but what is not!

Who comes? I hear the galloping of horse and the clang of arms. A gallant body of knights and soldiers, with an Emperor at their head, rush by—an Emperor seeking, within the walls of the free town, refuge from a rebelling son. And he will find the refuge he seeks. The burghers of the imperial free town will stand by him. He and his brave troop have passed me in the twilight; they are crossing the drawbridge, entering by the gateway under that heavy round tower; they are welcomed by the imperial bailiff who holds the castle within the walls for his Majesty, and receives the moneys paid him by the prosperous citizens for his protection. Now are matters so reversed that they are protecting him. But let them look to it! The rebel son will not long delay the pursuit of his father, and Nuremberg will have to stand a siege. He will take the town by storm, making bloody work of it.

I brushed aside my vision at this point. Leaving Emperor and Prince with their followers, and the friendly or frightened burghers, to the repose into which they sank five hundred years ago, I continued my walk. Yet on my lonely path I still reflected on the vicissitudes of old days. I passed towers round and square, pointed and turreted, of all sizes and forms, and again I feel I am not alone—airy tongues begin to syllable men's names to my ears; and actually one of the tongues had a peculiar Scotch accent. It seemed to frame words like these:—'If we get into this rich town we shall have good quarters, and good quarters are always acceptable, and are only to be postponed to good pay or good booty—not to mention the honour of a cavalier, or the needful points of commanded duty.'

Right! Ritt-master or Major Dugald Dalgetty of Drumthwacket. I know your voice. Often on my walk do you, in all your bright steel trappings, flash by me on your stout war-horse. But you are not alone now. I hear the heavy tramp of an army. At a certain gate I see coming forth, to hold a parley with the leaders of the approaching troops, a party of the burghers of the town. They are no longer young, have nothing military in their appearance, but are of very honourable demeanour. These are their Excellencies the Town Councillors; by whom all matters are so well and wisely managed in Nuremberg, that they look on it as a mirror for all other cities, and rejoice in being freed from the control of the Emperor's bailiff. Much wisdom do their Excellencies need now. Earnestly do they talk with one another. My friend Dalgetty has got as close to them as he can, and tries to understand their rapid German utterances.

Gustavus or Tilly—the Swedes or Wallenstein's dragons? Which will ye choose? ye men of Nuremberg. A difficult question to decide; feeling, as they do, as if the daggers of all the three great leaders were at their throats. By turns they have had Swedes and Imperialists in their town, and have had trouble with both parties; yet their hearts are with the Protestants and the Reformation. While they are hesitating now as to whether they shall leave their gates open or shall close them, I become as interested in their decision as the hungry Scotch Ritt-master, and think that I hear nearer and nearer the heavy tramp of the Swedes.

Have they bells at the necks of their horses? Bah! My vision of the men of two centuries ago passed away like my first one of an older time. It was dissipated by the loud ringing of the bells of a horse, which was drawing a heavily laden cart, driven by a stout countryman. Startled, I looked up, and was struck by a change in the sky and in the appearance of things. I had continued my walk for the last few minutes without giving heed to my steps; and, not following the bend of the road by the walls, had kept directly forward on a path which joins it, and leads to a very ancient burying-place. Its pointed gateway stood out at this moment in dark relief, for the sun was setting, in a broad field of lurid red, on the horizon behind it; and above, dark clouds looked heavy with coming snow.

On the right of the entrance to the cemetery, rising high above the low wall which encloses it, are three stone crosses, with the figures of our Saviour and the two thieves. The varying lights of sunset have glowed and faded century after century on their three faces—for the representation of the Crucifixion was erected three hundred years ago, by a renowned sculptor of the time. Worn as the stone is, by age and exposure to the weather, and much as the figures have lost of their original expression, no one could behold them for the first time without emotion. There still remain the majesty of weakness in its greatness, of the central form; the hatred, anger, and torture of that on the left, turning away in scornful upbraiding; and the writhings of suffering in that on the right. The scene, wrought out with such truth of heart and hand by ancient faith, arrested my steps, and led me into a train of thought, awakening feelings too deep for words—feelings which all seemed to merge into a sense of awe mingled with dread. This was caused perhaps, in some degree by the peculiar lights thrown on the level snow-covered space around the cemetery, and on the tombs and dark crosses in it. The fiery glow of sunset had passed away, and the lingering brightness of the horizon was dulled and streaked with black. A looked eerie in the increasing twilight; and I gladly hastened back to the town, to the comforts of coffee by the stove; yet, out of the frosty dusk from which I had come, the hearth and the English open fireplace would have more genially dispelled the mood which had gathered on me.

The awe and dread passed away, and with them those emotions that seemed to quicken the soul to a surer sense of the bond between it and the invisible. But as all the concerned only self vanished from the mind, I ceased to indulge in fancies on the curious old town in which I was, and gave way to some questioning reflections, such as—What had been for it the end of all its centuries of toil and change?—of its stout battling for the Reformation?—of the uprooting of Catholicism within its walls?

The end is, that, by the tender mercies of Napoleon, confirmed by the treaties of 1815, the good old Protestant town was handed over to Bavaria, a Roman Catholic power; and that it has had verses made in praise of its picturesque antiquity by King Ludwig, of Lola Montes renown. Shade of Dugald Dalgetty! thou doest it more honour!

M. M. L.

LOVE AND THE MUSICIAN.

'Thou canst not charm me,' said the lady;
'So, weary not thy bow-strings so.'
'Yet shall I surely charm thee,' said he,
'When to the silent land I go.'

'Your love songs, sir, I vow,' she said,
'Are neither sad nor gay to me.'
Deep to his heart the sore thrust sped;
Said the musician, 'We shall see.'

The lady loved a warrior knight;
Who soon his well-sworn vow forgot;
For hasty love takes hasty flight,
And so at last he loved her not.

He loved far more the bustling camp;
The noisy, loud, carousing hall;
The ribald jest; the charger's tramp,—
But cared not for his lady's call.

And she, alas! despairing, sigh'd
On her lone couch from dawn till eve;
And, as each luckless aid she tried,
The more her stricken heart did grieve.

She bade her maidens bring with speed
Music, which they might sing and play;
And, in her passion, said, 'Take heed
Ye drive my wretchedness away.'

They sung to her as angels sing,
And long'd to wile away her grief;
And, as each maid her harp did bring,
One play'd, another turn'd the leaf.

Their songs did please her willing ear,
But roused to wretchedness her heart;
For, in each note which she did hear,
She knew her minstrel-lover's art.

She turn'd away, with look of pain,
The fading brightness of her eyes;
The thought of him had overtaken
Her heart amid these melodies.

'Go, bring the minstrel here!' she cried;
'Far better he than fickle lord,
Who all his love-oaths hath denied,
And loved his wife less than his sword!'

'Alas!' replied her maidens fair,
'Thou lovedst him less than did the world,
Which freely praised each mystic air
That from his wrapt brain forth was hur'd.

While he, alas! did love thee more
Than fame, or wealth, or aught could bring;
Thou wert to him the jewell'd store,
The loss of which was everything!'

'Then lives he yet? For, by this hand,
I do regret I spurn'd him so;
But if his young affection stand,
I for that love shall begging go.'

'Too late! too late!' the maidens said;
'Thy first fond lover is no more;
And, where his broken heart is laid,
The winds repeat their dirges o'er!'

'Too late?' the lady said. 'Vain life!
How vain to live when life is pain,
And hope is gone, and troubles rife,
And peace shall ne'er return again!

Then, since he's dead, and ne'er these eyes
Shall by his presence lighted be,
As by the sun the clouded skies,
Or by her pearls the sombre sea;

I pray you, maidens, kind and fair—
Since you do know what 'tis to grieve—
To find for me an artist rare
Whose skill the senses can deceive;

And bid him cut, in marble white,
The likeness of that minstrel boy;
That in my room, by day and night,
To gaze thereon may give me joy.'

'Twas done, and in her chamber stood,
With look all life and form all grace,
The minstrel of the loving mood—
A smile upon his placid face.

One eve, when rose-leaves kiss'd the pane
Through which the dying sunset gleam'd,
The lady look'd, and yet again,
Upon that face,—the while she dream'd
Of love's bright sun in clouds of jet;
Of love's sweet song, touch'd with that hand
Within whose grasp a viol set
Told memory how she'd seen him stand.

hen sleep, as 'twere some playful sprite
Stealing around her with a spell,
Held shut her eyelids, and the night,
With summer short-lived mildness, fell.

And as she lay, at breaking day,
Her soul was wrapt with music sweet.
Good heavens! she heard the minstrel play;
And, eager, leap'd upon her feet!

She knelt before the statue low,
As oft that form had done to her;
She pray'd, in bitter tears of woe,
Once more these notes her soul might stir.

'A lonely lady, here I lie,
And clasp thy marble limbs so cold:
Wake forth thy music ere I die;
Nor count me, heavenly spirit! bold.'

Repentant-like there at his feet,
No sound to her petition came;
The day dawn'd out on white wings fleet,
But she was kneeling still the same.

Her maidens came to braid her hair,
But, kneeling yet, she did not wake;
They thought her wrapt in holy prayer,
And back retired, for pity's sake.

The false knight came from field of gore,
His fiery eye with wine all pale;
At frightened maids he smiling swore,
And bade them quick their mistress hail.

They call'd aloud—no answer yet!
He went and touch'd her once soft cheek—
In marble cold her form was set,
And gone the life-blood's purple streak!

And in that chamber still, they say,
That marble group, from hour to hour,
Reminds the gazer—well it may—
Of slighted Love and Music's power!

R.

A CHINESE TALE.

FROM THE FRENCH.

TI-TCHONG-YU was a young student, whose family resided in a city situated about 250 miles from the capital. He was a beautiful youth, of a hasty and eager disposition; but who redeemed any of his natural defects by a wonderful generosity and desire to oblige and assist his fellows. His father had the title of Censor; and was distinguished by his integrity, and the boldness with which he used to speak to his master the Emperor. Knowing well the impetuous character of his son, he did not allow him to reside at Peking. At the age of sixteen, our hero was desirous of choosing a wife; but he was obliged to submit to the remonstrances of his father, and to defer the happy occasion.

Ti-tchong-yu continued to devote himself, to study till he was twenty years of age. One day, in the course of his reading, he fell upon the history of a famous statesman, mentioned in the annals of his country, who became a victim to the great boldness with which he used to reprove his sovereign. Reflecting upon this event, he dreaded that the same misfortune might perhaps happen to his father; and, in his fear, he resolved to set out for the capital.

On the way he heard, in a village where he remained to pass the night, the story of a young student like himself, from whom a powerful noble had by force taken away his intended bride. Instantly, he took up his cause and defence—transmitted the written evidence to his father—and resolved to carry, in person, a petition to the Emperor.

On his arrival at Peking, our hero found all his fears realised. The zeal with which the Censor had defended the cause of the poor student, whose case appeared to him a hard one, had displeased the Emperor. The case had been carried before the Criminal Council; but the guilty noble was so powerful that he had succeeded, by his wealth and influence, in obtaining an acquittal, and in persuading the Emperor that the Censor had only deceived him. The father of Ti-tchong-yu was then degraded and imprisoned. Our hero penetrated into the prison, where lay in misery the author of his being; whom he surprised agreeably by showing him the memoir of the young student on whose account he was a prisoner; and which narrative was sufficient to justify the whole conduct of the Censor.

The Emperor, to whom he afterwards transmitted this document, returned him his thanks, and, according to his request, a secret order for the arrest of the noble. Ti-tchong-yu armed himself with a weapon of brass, and entered the palace of the noble, apprehended him after sufficient delay, and set at liberty the lady who had been carried off. The Censor regained his rank, and was raised to dignity by the Emperor, who punished the noble, and loudly praised the courage and zeal of the young man for being able to manage the affair so cleverly. The Censor, fearing lest his son should suffer from the praises which were being heaped upon him from all quarters, sent him off upon a journey into the interior of the empire, hoping that he might at the same time gather wisdom and knowledge.

In a district of the province of Chan-tong there lived a member of the military tribunal of Peking, who had one daughter, named Choui-ping-sin, endowed with wondrous beauty, and with virtuous qualities not less admirable. It was to her that he entrusted (his wife being dead) the care of his property, when the duties of his office called him to the capital. An unworthy brother of this mandarin, called Chou-yun, who had three sons and one daughter (the latter very plain-looking), had entertained for a long time past a covetous desire to possess this property, which, moreover, he thought could not fail to come into his possession if his niece should marry. To this end, therefore, tended all his efforts. Encouraged by the absence of his brother, who had been banished to Tartary for having committed an error in his duties, he attached to himself a young, debauched nobleman, who became desirous of marrying with Choui-ping-sin. The lady, after having delayed some time in the matter, ended by persuading her stupid uncle to give his own daughter to the young nobleman; and the latter, of course, became furious when he perceived that he had been cheated. Chou-yun succeeded meanwhile in calming him, by making him a proposition which at once laid bare all the baseness of his character. He indicated to him the means whereby he might possess Choui-ping-sin, namely, by taking her for his wife, and by reducing his real wife to the condition of concubine. The plan was so well conceived that it appeared impossible that his niece, in her youth and innocence, should not immediately fall into the dragon's mouth. Here the interest becomes exciting; indeed, one cannot, but admire the art with which Choui-ping-sin overturned all the machinations of her two persecutors. They went about their business with great energy, forming the plan of seizing her on her return from her mother's grave, to which she had gone to perform the customary rites of the autumn season. Warned in time, however, she had changed her dress, and entered the carriage of her attendant, having filled her own with rubbish and stones, closed it, and withdrawn herself. The young nobleman arrived, and opened the carriage, in presence of his companions, who gave utterance to loud shouts of laughter on perceiving his disappointment. This second misfortune, instead of discouraging the incorrigible libertine, only, on the contrary, increased his determination.

As Choui-ping-sin shut herself up in her house, and refused to receive any strangers, the young nobleman despaired of being able to seize her forcibly. He therefore had recourse to a deception; and, to enable him to attain to the object of his passion, he manufactured a decree, which he pretended would be able to recall her father from exile. He entered her house, accompanied by a numerous retinue of attendants. The lady, finding herself a prisoner, demanded to be taken before a magistrate; and the magistrate, although proving to be the parent of the young nobleman, saw no difficulty in agreeing to the request of Choui-ping-sin, and resolved to give her case a hearing.

At this moment, Ti-tchong-yu, whom we left to his journey, entered the city. On turning the corner of a street, he met the procession, and was hurt on the leg by the carriage which contained Choui-ping-sin. Irritated thereby, he was inclined to be angry and violent; but, after receiving the apologies of the attendants, he was about to withdraw himself, when a woman's voice, gentle and touching, fell upon his ear. She said—'I am wronged, and a prisoner. I rely upon your courage to succour me!' So, as every other knight-errant would have done, Ti-tchong-yu laid hold of the entire company, and led them before the magistrate, whom he found already seated, and about to give a decision in favour of his own son. Striking upon the great drum which was placed at the door, he entered the court, and spoke face to face with the astonished judge, who instantly decided that Choui-ping-sin should submit to her cruel persecutor. Our hero, indignant, demanded a hearing; and the magistrate was obliged to ordain that the liberty of the daughter of the mandarin be instantly granted her. Ti-tchong-yu became suddenly startled with the extraordinary beauty of her whom he had been the means of saving; and Choui-ping-sin, on the other hand, became sincerely attached to him by the bonds of gratitude. In the meanwhile, the young nobleman formed a project for revenge. He induced some unprincipled priests, belonging to a Buddhist monastery, to seize, and shut up in one of their cells, our young hero; and gave them instructions that no food should be given to him but what was first mixed with a slow and deadly poison. Choui-ping-sin, knowing well what her pursuer was capable of doing, charged her emissaries to render her an account of all that took place. As soon as she learned that her liberator had taken ill, she conceived the resolution to have him suddenly recaptured, and brought to her own house, for she saw no other way of saving his life. Our hero consented to her request with considerable scruples, lest he might, by so doing, cause her trouble. Very soon he recovered his health, and was upon the point of going away from the house, without even having seen his fair protector (for, in this matter, Chinese decorum was rigorously observed), when his rival, grown more and more furious, sent Chou-yun to address some remonstrances to his niece on the subject of the imprudence which she was committing. Choui-ping-sin excused herself by pleading the urgency of the case, and the gratitude she owed to her liberator. Her uncle retired, after placing near her dwelling a spy, who, however, rendered him a most favourable account of the conduct of the young lady. Seeing that he was unable to satisfy the young noble by such means, he set about arranging other devices.

Ti-tchong-yu, completely cured, left at last the house of the fair lady, whom he was, in turn, able to call his liberator; and returned into his own province, for the purpose of preparing for the next public examination of candidates for degrees in literature. The indefatigable persecutor of Choui-ping-sin profited by the absence of Ti-tchong-yu in gaining over a commissioner newly arrived from the court, where he had been protected by his father. This depraved functionary delivered to him a written authority to marry the young lady in her own house, in virtue of a particular right sanctioned by the Chinese laws. Choui-ping-sin, who having heard of this, and having sent a messenger to the Emperor, secretly, with a memorial, demanded of the commissary assistance to free her from her persecutor; and, upon his refusing, showed him a copy of the petition which she had sent to the court complaining of him. The commissary, confounded, immediately set about stopping the celebration of the nuptials; upon which, she herself sent an express to recall her messenger.

Ti-tchong-yu was not long of learning all the evil which his sweetheart was enduring; and he hastened to arrive at the province of Chan-tong, that he might be able to protect her. The two wicked fellows, having seen him arrive, sent to him a little cunning boy, with a forged billet-doux from Choui-ping-sin, in which she granted him an interview. This message—being so thoroughly in opposition to the character of the young lady—awakened the suspicions of our hero, who, threatening the boy, managed to obtain from him a confession of the perfidious intentions of his enemies, and what trick it was which they meant to play upon him. These were not yet discouraged; their inventive genius furnished them with another shift. The young noble presented himself at the domicile of Ti-tchong-yu; and, on being refused admission, he left his card with the attendant. Ti-tchong-yu fancied himself, by ceremony, obliged to return this visit. On entering his enemy's house, he found assembled a numerous company, with whom he was obliged, in spite of himself, to mingle. According to a plan arranged between the young noble and his friends, the latter immediately began to make a quarrel, so as to be able, in the mêlée, to fall upon the lover of Choui-ping-sin, and maltreat him. But the latter conducted himself with such address and courage that he escaped from this vile plot without injury.

Some time after, our hero was in a position to render a signal service to the father of her whom he loved, which had the effect of recalling him from his exile and reinstating him in his honours as of old. Upon this, the two families decided together to contract an alliance, by uniting, in marriage, the two young people. The scrupulousness of the school of Confucius, whose principles Choui-ping-sin and Ti-tchong-yu professed, inspired them meanwhile with mutual doubts on the subject of their marriage, and they resolved at once not to carry it into effect, lest the purity and disinterestedness which had dictated all their actions might be misunderstood. These scruples ended, however, in clearing off. But, at the very moment when the union was about to be concluded, Chou-yun and his worthy friend appeared, bringing with them new obstacles.

In consideration of the elevated rank of the young lovers, the matter was carried before the Emperor himself, who summarily punished both the persecutors; and, addressing a high eulogium to the youthful couple, ordered the marriage ceremony to be consummated.

MRS. SPOKESHAVE AND HER LETTERS.

'ANY letters for me to-day, Mary?' cheerily inquires my venerable mother, Mrs. Spokeshave, as she passes from her bedroom to her parlour, in the rosy light of early morning—'any letters for me?' 'Yes, ma'am,' as cheerfully responds the faithful and attached domestic, 'there are no less than four letters for you to-day.' 'Ah! let me see them.' They are handed to her. The first opened is from her eldest son, John, who is a merchant in Calcutta. After glancing it over, she remarks—'How faint and dim his handwriting is; he writes on very thin paper; and his letter is almost wholly occupied with details about the cotton crops, indigo, flax, rice, the Government and the talookdars, and the Income-tax! I must put it aside, and read it more carefully afterwards.' The next is a joint epistle from her daughters Grace and Margaret, who are engaged in teaching in a large ladies' seminary in Edinburgh. It is full of news—as usual, a perfect budget of home intelligence. They inform her that they visited their friends at Newington on Saturday last, and found them tolerably well, although some of the children are troubled with pertinacious colds and coughs. They attended lectures at the Philosophical Institution on 'Fossil Animals,' in which they witnessed the complete demolition of the development theory. One is working a prudence cap, and the other a scarlet jacket for their old maiden aunt Jane. They have been reading Christopher North's Life, by Mrs. Gordon, and are quite delighted with it. 'Good kind girls,' their mother says, 'how active and how industrious they are! I can do very little now in the way of sewing or knitting myself, but they are young and hopeful, and can do anything.' The third letter is from her brother, Mr. Robert, who is an invalid, and resides at Cheltenham. He is a little better in his general health, but complains grievously of pains in his back and breast—in his head and feet. 'Poor bachelor uncle!' she remarks, 'he will never be quite well again, I fear. He should have taken my advice, and married forty years ago—marriage would have cured all his complaints.' The last letter contains marriage cards. 'Mrs. Thomas Simpkins—Mr. Thomas Simpkins. At home on the —.' 'Ah! they have made it out at last! It was a long engagement, and I was afraid it was going to be broken. I am glad it is now en fait accompli. I have a dread of long engagements. But Simpkins is a fine fellow, and I daresay the delay arose from a conscientious desire on his part to make his home more comfortable for his wife.' Thus the old lady soliloquises and moralises over her letters in the parlour, ere yet the family are assembled to breakfast.

Surely a pleasant letter is a signal blessing, for which we ought to be prepared to return thanks. Like 'a thing of beauty' it 'is a joy,' if not 'for ever,' at least for a reasonable time. There is in the nature of it (if written as it should be) a charming ease, a fine familiarity, a noble abandon, a glorious disregard of conventionalities (not to be found in a lecture or speech, or in a sermon or an article), which engages the affections and captivates the mind. Like choice wine (say champagne, Topham's best) it refreshes the heart and causes the face to shine. It soothes the troubled soul, sends up the spirits, and rekindles afresh the fading fires of hope. How a man, on receipt of such a letter, dives with renewed alacrity into business, seeming to make a mere pastime of it! He goes into it singing. Even a note from a friend in the city, as thus:—'Dear Phil,—If you mean to go to Mr. Spindle's introductory lecture, favour me in passing with the light of your countenance, and I'll accompany you.—Yours, H. M.' has a cheering effect, like a small electric thrill. Good stories circulate in letters, and give birth to agreeable thoughts and pleasant talk. From special friends, whose mental idiosyncracies we know and admire, letters are doubly welcome. It was no ordinary fellow-man who wrote the above quoted note. How the correspondents of Charles Lamb must have exulted when letters, addressed in the old familiar handwriting of Elia, were put into their hands! How involuntarily they would bless and thank the persons who brought them! With what high expectations and dawning smiles they would open them! Ere long, the quaint jest, the serio-comic phrase, the startling hypothesis, the plays upon ideas and feelings, would convulse them with laughter, and perhaps awaken those graver thoughts which 'do often lie too deep for tears.'

So is it with Mrs. S. She dotes on a letter: a miser dotes on a guinea—a joker on a joke. It is her hobby. Though verging on fourscore, she receives a letter with all the enthusiasm of youth. Oh! could her numerous correspondents behold the cheery looks, the sunny smiles, the dimples on the cheeks, the glistening of the eyes, which their letters produce, they would write far oftener than they do to their old friend. Why, it seems as if she had got due intimation of a very rare thing—a legacy. How complacently she takes her seat at the breakfast table, and presides with enlarged urbanity! How cheerfully she tells us the news as she tops her egg.—'Cousin Grace has got another baby; and Joseph's eldest boy has gone to college,' &c. She muses much on her absent relations and friends, conjecturing what they may be doing or saying; and nothing delights her more than to hear, either riya voce or by letter, of their welfare. Heaven (notwithstanding all our efforts to detain her here) will soon take her from us; and yet I cannot conceive how she will manage to exist there without her letters; and can almost fancy that she will frequently ask some of the celestial people whether there are 'any letters from the earth to-day?'

Mrs. S. has set days for receiving and answering letters. When letters do not arrive at the appointed time she may be heard to exclaim 'No letters to-day!—very strange! Something must have happened.' This is rarely the case, because her correspondents, knowing her partiality for letters, are studious to send them punctually. In replying, she is very exact; and her letters are short, precise, pointed, and full of matters of fact. No elaboration and no false sentiment. She writes as she feels. Her small, jagged, somewhat rough writing is slightly marked with the tremulousness of age. The lines are far from being level, and exhibit a tendency to wander to the top or to the bottom of the page. Sometimes she requests the present writer to answer her letters for her. He tells her that he knows not what to write—that he has no news. 'Oh, tell them anything,' she says. 'You can have no difficulty in framing a letter; tell them that I have knitted another stocking—that I lost my spectacles for an hour last night, and found them in my pocket amongst a lot of letters.' So he, unwilling to disoblige so dear a friend (the sun of his life and the anchor of his soul), begins the letters; and, falling short of domestic news, fills his sheets with reflections on the weather, the present distress, the war, and other such general topics. The old lady does not stint her approbation when due, but frequently remarks, 'you have omitted to tell them so-and-so,' and thus a postscript requires to be added. In many cases letters beget letters; and where, as in female correspondents' letters generally, a host of queries are put, one is less at a loss to make a suitable reply.

In her repositories, Mrs. S. has a large store of old letters, which are carefully taken out and read once a year. There are the love-letters of her youth, written to her by my father when with his regiment in the Spanish Peninsula. How anxiously looked at, how eagerly read, how dearly prized were those letters! They are somewhat dim and faded now, and yet the light of love lingers about them still—a ray of that larger light,

'Which never is on land or sea;

and Memory, as she reads them, can light them up with a portion of their former splendour. They were written in happy times, bright with hope and joy, when

'Love took up the glass of Time, and turn'd it in his glowing hands;

Every moment lightly shaken, ran itself in golden sands.

Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all its chords with might—

Smote the chord of Self, that trembling, pass'd in music out of sight.'

There, too, are the sweet, artless, primitive letters of her early girl friends. How their hand-writings differ!—some being small, sloping, faint; others bold, rough, uneven. They are nearly all full of crossed writing, so that one wonders how she manages to read them. They express the hopes, joys, fears, trials, and amusements of budding girlhood; and in some of them, between the leaves, are locks of hair and faded violets. Then come letters from members of her own family, full of mingled lights and shadows—successes and disappointments. All are religiously preserved. They are to her as voices of the past—utterances of friends, many of whom have long gone into the silent land. In reading them, her bygone life comes in review—the friends of her youth cluster around her. Almost she fancies she hears them speak. Surely the minds which caused the hands to trace these lines are not gone for ever? At all events, they live to her in those letters. They are more precious to her than all 'the wealth of Ormus or the Ind.'

Some people affect to despise letters, saying that they are mere words and phrases. They sigh for the more substantial gifts of friendship, such as a hare, or a jewel, perhaps, or a brace of partridges, or a bag, or a sum of money. Certainly, these presents are not to be rejected when offered; and yet do they not all perish in the using? Words fitly spoken or written sometimes produce more solid and lasting benefits than all material gifts whatever. Such largesses from a rich friend are not so cheering as a kind letter. The former are as nothing, in his wealth, from him—the latter is from his heart. The letter of a truly honest friend is above rubies. Why? Because it is a piece of himself—a bit of his mind—his heart. Can he send you anything more valuable than a slice of his intellect—of his humour—his pathos—his observation—or his experience? We would rather have from (friends unknown in the flesh, yet well known in the spirit—familiar as the stars) Mr. Thackeray, or Mr. Tennyson, or Mr. Carlyle, a letter, than any other gift they could bestow, except their photographs. But their books are their letters. Then there is the fact that your friend when writing was also thinking of you. 'Light is sweet,' says Solomon or somebody; 'and it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the sun.' True, O king! more especially after a fortnight's obscurity in such fogs (happily unknown in ancient Jerusalem) as those which in winter settle down on our modern cities. These dispersed, the rising luminary—the illustrious stranger—is hailed with joy. Akin and next to this is the joy with which we perceive the smiling face of a particular friend. But friends cannot always meet in this rickety and shifting world. Space separates them. They can communicate, however, quite freely, mind with mind, by means of a letter. They may be far distant from each other, and yet a letter brings them nigh with that nearness with which spirits converse in the land of dreams. Across wide continents and over yawning sea-gulfs they shake hands, mentally—they embrace and fall into each other's arms.

Therefore, O beloved reader! if any of your correspondents' letters remain unanswered, reply to them immediately. Nay, whether you owe your friends letters or no, write to them. In a poetical epistle to a friend, Burns says,—

'I long ha'e thought, my youthful friend,

A something to ha'e sent you;

Though it should serve nae ither end

Than jist a kind memento.'

Consider how much of the sweetness of life is made up by minor charities, small benevolences, cheap gifts like letters, which, thanks to Sir Rowland Hill, cost in the transmission only one penny. The finest models of letters are at your service for direction and help. The gossipy letters of Walpole—the passionate letters of Burns—the playful letters of Cowper—the acute and sarcastic letters of Pascal or Junius—the lively letters of Plymley—the classical letters of Gray—the profound letters of Foster—or the pithy letters of Lamb, are all before you. But the best letters, I sometimes think, like the most interesting biographies, never find their way into type. Letters, like talking, should be easy, concise, and unaffected. Those from the common soldiers in the Crimea, during the war—simple, rough, off-hand productions—were most interesting. The daily and weekly journals now-a-days discuss many of the ideas and speculations floating through the general mind—they are, in fact, letters on a larger scale; but many good topics—even the choicest—which cannot be discussed in newspapers, remain for private letters. Cultivate letters, then, as Mrs. Spokes have cultivates them. By doing so, you cultivate yourself, 'improve your mind' as the phrase is, and, what is of much importance in this correct and decorous age, your style.

PHILIP SPOKESHAVE.

OLLA PODRIDA.

How much one envies those people who can summon sleep at will; who no sooner draw a cheque upon the Bank of Rest than it is honoured; who enter every night into immediate possession of a still chamber, shady curtains, a quiet pillow, and unbroken dreams! Silence, twin-brother unto Slumber, hangs over them his softest canopy. The pulse of Time, as it beats in the tickings of a watch, or, haply, the subdued music of the tuneful nose, but confirm the peace, hallow the nocturnal calm, and resemble, so to speak, the cries of distant sentinels on the outposts of Repose, proclaiming that all is well with the main body. Meanwhile, the sister hours pace noiselessly through the room; the slumberer hears not one single footfall. He takes no note of time, not even from its loss. For him the minutes of this waking world have no existence. He counts his days by another calendar; the almanack of his dreams knows not that of Greenwich.

Alas! when I set out upon my travels into the land of Nod, my mind has to traverse many a weary length of wakeful consciousness before it emerges into that shadowy region. Even then I can never penetrate far—never make a thorough satisfactory acquaintance with the inhabitants thereof. I suppose I can't get used to the customs of that country. I have unlearned the language. My friends tell me that when I was a child I conversed in its most abstruse terms with the utmost facility. Certain it is, that of late years my nightly wanderings have been confined to a sort of border land between sleep and waking. Hence, though I am all anxiety to pay homage to the goddess who sits on the ebony throne, binding her heavy brows with poppy, yet, after all, my allegiance is more often paid to a restless pillow, a lighted candle, and a never-absent book. 'Tis in vain that I bind darkness round me by means of an extinguisher and a resolute blanket. I sleep not, and yet am not awake. The incidents of the day dance disorderly through my puzzled memory—a train of metaphysics runs into an apple-cart—Bishop Colenso turns into a jockey at a horse fair—the Athanasian creed boils over in a coffee-pot—and I give sixpence to a tramp who spouts the elegiacs of a New-Zealand!

Hark! Is not that the rush of a thousand chariots driving past the house, carrying afar the reverberation of their echoes—dying, dying, dying! Pshaw! 'tis but the wind's long melancholy howl down the chimney—a few chords of that equinoctial symphony which, on these dark nights, is played so often to the dull ears of shipwrecked mariners; who, as they cling to the sea-tossed wreck, or utter their last cry before they disappear beneath the wave, hear not or shudder at the dreadful music. God be with them!

How silent now is all around me! as if Time himself were asleep, and one might hear his breathing. Was that two which struck last? Have I been sleeping three hours? I know not. Some interval divides me from the party I have just left. Just left! That cannot be. 'Tis half a lifetime since I was there. There is my good friend, with beaming face and hospitable waistcoat, presiding like a very gentlemanly Jupiter, in this modern Olympus of a dining-room. There, too, are the shining rows of glass and plate, gracing the snowy table-cloth. There, too, more shining still, glance on each side bright eyes, bare shoulders, and rose-tinted cheeks. Fie! What have I to do with these? Let me improve my mind by listening to my right hand neighbour. I wish one could catch knowledge, like a fever, from contiguity. How closely would I press to his learned sides! I am silent, it is true, but I know how to laugh; and see! our hostess laughs too. Yes; we all laugh. Laughter is catching; but what!—Stop, stop, for pity's sake, that horrid jingling of bells, the rattle of those leaping plates! What Apollo has maddened this delphic ware?

Hullo! I've been asleep, it seems. It's only the wind again. Hark to its distant muttering! Now it gathers strength, swiftly advancing this way, with a sound as of the great Judgment travelling towards me. I wonder what that pretty woman across the table thinks of it? Why does she not talk to me? I have sat in her drawing-room, and eaten at her table. She might have held out if only the little finger of recognition to the silent young man opposite. She has black eyes; but now, I confess, there's a haze, a film over them, which destroys not their brightness, but communicates the wavering uncertainty of short sight. She was a woman of wonderful faith, certainly; for, after she had prayed, so heavy a fall of snow answered her petition that all Cumberland, part of Westmoreland, the Irish Channel, and the north-eastern headlands of Man were covered by it. No; I can't have said covered. The sea couldn't have covered the snow, you know. But that sounds like nonsense. What did I say? or did I only think of saying? Oh, I remember. They said the gentleman was deaf and dumb, and the lady deficient. But how? Not blind! Sight is the sound of the dumb alphabet. She must have seen. I wonder how he proposed to her? Did he work out his feelings on a slate like a sum? or play Pyramus in dumb show to her Thisbe? It's a queer question; but—how will they quarrel when they want to—a fioo for the phrase. Never mind; go on, sir. If one is in a passion, the other won't know it. I should hate such dead calm of the matrimonial waters. Now, a breeze—

But in this breeze I fell at last fast asleep, and slept, without more rocking, till the morning.

Now, if this is to be the penalty of my dining out, let me dine out no more, or only with a few old friends of my childhood, to whom my habits are a very part of the me me ipsum of the man they love. They will forgive my involuntary quadragesimal winks. They know me well enough to believe that I have a meaning in a heavy eyelid and a listless look. What if I am not vain? Besides, speech is silver, but silence is golden. I prefer the nobler currency.

But to be forced to talk when you want to digest; to keep up the witty dignity of your first character to strangers or half acquaintance—ay, there's the rub! I never see that twin picture of the ploughboy defeated by a dismantled pie-dish, without envying the boeotic attitude. Somewhat more of grace, indeed—yet that's a mere matter of form. You have the reality, the quintessence of satisfaction. I would I were as unrestrained! Like him, I conquer, but am myself vanquished; an empty platter gets the better of a full stomach; the disjecta membra of fish, flesh, and fowl mock my futile triumph, for they know they will lie heavy on my soul for the next two hours. Alas! even now I have the lack-lustre eye of the stupid man, the stammering tongue of the modest man, and the dull wit of an unfed lawyer. I confess my torpidity. Norfolk dumping shall have his heavy jest at me, and I will not answer; jokes as flat as his own fields shall not stir my bile; I will hear without understanding—I will smile without knowing why; comprehension shall not even rise to the height of a good story, which, like a fox, is filthiest at its tail.

It, at such a time, I possessed imagination enough, I would curiously divide my stolen wits among the dishes that have appeared on the table. Here, a piece of salmon ran away with my best joke; there, a slice of beef blunted the point of an extra smart saying; and the thread of an argument amongst the nice intricacies of a partridge's wing; and was reduced to plain 'yes' and 'no' in the battery of a damson cheese. If any one accosts me, my brain lumbers up heavily in reply; if I attempt a pun, 'tis nothing but a flash in the pan; and, while the piece hangs fire, my questioner turns to his neighbour, and, in a whisper, asks him who that silent gentleman is. Then, as I sip my wine, and hear politician-tinkers boasting of their power to mend the old state-kettle—young men impudently flippant, old men lugubriously dull—I think, shame be to me! of nothing but sleep. Yes, I think also of roses, and waterfalls, and little birds singing their madrigals, and fountain-heads, and pathless groves, and a soft couch in the meadow-grass, if it be summer, or of a loving lounge on my own sofa before a clear winter fire. By-and-by, these after-dinner voices come to me as from a distance. My mind enters the vestibule of sleep, and catches only the far-off echoes of a prosaic world. Then I make odd blunders in connecting the dim sounds which reach me. A sober piece of philosophy ends by declaring that Miss — has fine legs, and I catch a line of poetry industriously proving the advantage of sewage water as manure. Somehow or other, the question of who did what? and what somebody else said, mingles itself with the constitution of the sun and the last news from America. Words, too, cease to be signs of thought, or shape themselves into preposterous meanings. Napoleon III. last week knocked down Otho, King of Greece, in the Strand; and the Prince of Wales, three days back, pitched Abe Lincoln into the crater of Vésuvius, where he began to talk of the Herculean papyri, and asked after his four feet!

But it is when I am alone in my own chamber that I mostly relish these after-dinner reveries. Powerfully convinced of the impotence of my reasoning faculties, I yield entirely the direction of my thoughts to the random guidance of fancy. Patience fails me in pursuing an idea to any length, and I am conscious of passing from one state of dreamy imagination to another, with a celerity that would appear ridiculous to me were I not absolutely incapable of being surprised at any mental inconsistency. Sometimes the hedge which separates the two strips of Fairyland is a short doze, a true sip of Lethe; or, it may be, a noise in the street or a knock at the door. Sleep, however, at such an hour is an inconstant mistress, anon kissing your eyes in all the ecstasy of declared affection, anon coyly retreating from your embrace; now summoning the sad dirges of the wind to lull you into the preparatory hush of supine slumbers; now in an instant forsaking you, causing you to start up, take an idle glance at your book or newspaper, and straightway subside into your former dreaminess.

But in such an hour, so unthoughtfully languid, so melancholy sweet, have I pressed the remembrance of years into the limits of a fleeting dream. Then have I waved back the shadows of the too busy present, and stood face to face with my other self—the self of the past, the vague dreamer of those heathy wilds, or cleaving the blue lake waters, or rambling with thee, O Col, thou brave and kindly heart, together frightening the green gods of those antique woods by wild laughter shouts at our impossible German. Ah me! what blissful memories rise up and do obeisance in the charmed circle of youth! Love was not all madness or delirious transport of the senses, fair —, when in those wild tangled woodlands thine eyes of clearest azure, launched with every glance an argosy of hope upon my sea of life; thy sighs, the winds which filled the sails; thy eloquent blushes the sunbeams striking a radiant furrow to that fair haven —thy sweet self! Shipwrecked I remain; and the dust of years hath passed over thy head, soiled the amaranthine locks of youth, and buried thy beauty in the tomb of one short memory. Well, perchance it is better thus, that we may learn to discover in our dearest thoughts, in all enchantment of our feelings, the winding-sheet and epitaph of their death. The fiat of their decay is but a seal to the charter of their more glorious resurrection.

And now, sigh softly, ye summer breezes! and sing your faint melodies, ye mystic horns! For I am wrapt into unreal remembrances, the trance of unearthly memories, the dreams of some mysterious past. I think nobly of the soul, and believe with Plato in its pre-existence. Else, why these recollections of a life of which this seems but an after-birth? For methinks, at some vast interval from this unsatisfying consciousness of things, I have lain upon the slopes of wondrous hills, turreted by flames of sapphire and of gold. Sweet voices mingle round me in the liquid music of immortal song. White hands are clasping mine, soft cheeks offer their pure roses to my lips, and I feel the tide of a celestial life passing from her breast into a heart that cannot contain the precious flood; but feels already, oh! how sadly, the barren sands of mortality rising above its melancholy ebb. So passes that dream away.

Sometimes I can only remember myself as a little child, running alone down a leafy lane. I come to a white cottage, cold in the fiery flashes of hot noon. But who stands now at the gate? what little hands are linked around my neck? whose the soft kisses showered upon my lips and cheeks? I see a face these mortal eyes have never seen—I hear a voice these ears have never heard in Time; a graceful shadow runs in my path, or chases with me the undisappointing bubbles of the fairy hour. At last we stand together at the western gate, mournfully looking on the falling day. I feel her sorrowful face pressed close to mine—strange antenatal tears fall from my eyes. The sun that is setting before us calls me to follow over those blue horizons into other lands. But she is left behind. Does she think of her immortal playmate now—bond-slave of Time and Sense?

I am willing to account for some of these fancies by supposing them to be chance recollections of books read to be forgotten. It may be by the help of my own imagination I prolong the delusions. Yet whatsoever they be, I would not exchange them for all the prosaic grandeurs of kings and princes. They are my terra incognita whereon I rule sole lord—my fortunate isles whose seas are ever mild, whose skies are ever blue. They are centres of deep quiet in the vast Bermoothes of this world—the true succedaneum of life's toothache—the elixir of youth's decrepitude—the shadowy sunshine of a departing day.

Let ill-natured people sneer, and call them the froaks of an idle fancy when reason sleeps; the giddy frolics of children in an empty house. I am too happy to care; for these my dreams—if dreams they be—are sworn friends and fairy playmates with other beauteous children of the mind; and, as I wave my ideal wand, I see, through half-shut eyes, the landscape of a fairy world; a lovely maiden lying by a singing stream; a meadow sloping downwards to a lake; forest ground cross-barred by magic moonlight; a silver swan reposing on its silent image in the wave; a city in the clouds; the wet feet of the pilgrim; and the glimmering gates of pearl beyond. Still rides the brave knight with his visor up; still heavenly Una leads her milk-white lamb; still shines the treacherous heaven of Armida's smiles; still dance—

'Eh, eh! What! Rhoda? Coffee? Yes, you may bring me a cup.'

A. S.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. VI.

THERE is another song of the Children of the Mist, which may be called 'Cruachan a Cheathaich; or The Braes of the Mist.' It is in print, and well known. But I translate from a copy taken down from the singing of an Irlayman, who is a smith, and well acquainted with the traditional poetry and legends of the Highlands. Neither this man nor the transcriber knew that the song had ever been published. Each thought he was doing his best to save an ancient fragment that was just about to perish. This again serves to show the care with which Tradition watches over the few prized treasures which the tyrant Time leaves with it. The ballad is sung to a wild and melancholy pibroch tune, to which the translation has been adapted. The story connected with it is interesting. In the last line of the poem the singer speaks of her father, but the tradition says it was her husband and two sons, whom she had concealed in her house when some of the bitter enemies of the MacGregors were observed approaching. They were already close at hand. There was no time for escape.

The woman concealed her friends in a bed, and then sitting down at the fire or at the door proceeded to sing this song. She represents herself waiting in solitude for her persecuted kindred; and saying, since they had not then returned, they must either yet be at Loch-Fyne—as when she last heard of them—or far away in the glens of the Mist, hunting and fishing; and consequently, as it was now so late, obliged to pass the night in a poor hut, where she had left some tokens of her presence, and it is to be inferred some rude preparations for their reception. She then concludes, praying for their safety, and expressing her own sadness on account of their many dangers, some of which she enumerates with the minuteness of intimate acquaintance. In such circumstances, that prayer must have come emphatically from the singer's heart. It was answered to her wish on that occasion at least.

The people outside listened as the woman sang, and, believing what she said, passed on without disturbing her. A very good subject surely for a picture this woman would make, singing so at her fireside, in the hearing of her friends and her enemies—her heart's most precious wishes depending on the effect produced by her ballad.

The song represents her sitting on the highway—her most cruel foes not unobserved, though unnoticed by her; her dearest friends in the power of those foes if they only knew it; and she—with the twilight, and the dim, misty mountains looking down on her—their deliverer, if she could sing her lyric in the right character to the end. Seldom, indeed, has song or ballad been composed or chanted in circumstances of such intense excitement.

THE BRAES OF THE CEATHACH.

I sit here alone, by the plain of the highway,
For my poor hunted kin; watching mist, watching by-way.
I've yet got no sign that they're near to my dwelling;
At Loch-Fyne they were last seen—if true be that telling—
Drinking wine with the nobles, the street proudly stepping
With Gregor o' Rua—that hard hand behind weapon—
And Gregor Mor Malmach, my household commanding,
Son of him of Strath Startall, round whose hearth, often standing,

I've heard the bards harping, and oft seen them playing
With the dice, and with chess, and the fiddle's mirth swaying.

In the Glen of the Mist is the stag from you flying?
On the moor are you leaving the bonny bird lying?
For the raven a prey do her bloody plumes quiver?
Or draw you its dark blue flock from the bonds of the river?

You must pass this long night in a hut low and narrow,
Where the dagger I left, and the belt and the arrow;
May the King of the Universe save you for ever
From the flash and the bullet and store of the quiver;
From the keen-pointed knife, with the life-blood oft streaming;
From the edge of the sharp claymore, terribly gleaming.

In Braigh Bhaillie, on Sunday, they won without fighting,
But since then no smile my sad face has been lighting;
Small wonder I say so—greater shame 'twould be rather
Not to say so with grief when they call thee my father.

From internal evidence, this song may be pronounced at least two hundred years old. It forms a fit companion for 'MacGregor o' Ruara,' belonging to the same clan and the same era, and having been produced under somewhat similar circumstances. The next are a good deal more modern.

Laments or elegies are called in Gaelic 'Marbha Banna,' or 'Death Songs.' The proportion which these elegies bear to the other kinds of Highland poetry is immense. The time has been when perhaps every man had his coronach or lament sung over him. No man of note could die without several bards singing at least one tuneful strain, expressive of the sorrows of the living and celebrating the virtues of the dead. Even yet, Marbh Ranns are commonly composed, and not unfrequently published. Many of these used to be the not improper channels by which a real, melting, noble, and becoming sorrow passed from mind to mind. Perhaps some of them may still be so. But many would probably originate in the feeling of their being creditable or profitable exercises of the poetic faculty. Some of them are prodigiously long. Of all these it may with considerable safety be averred that not one of them is good. Those which are likeliest to the popular songs—like 'MacGregor o' Ruara' and 'Connal,' already translated, and which seem not to have been composed by the regular bards at all, but to have been the outburst of irrepressible and unaffected feeling—are much the best. They are not, however, the commonest. The usual style is more like the following, which is the production of Robert Mackay—generally called Robb Donn, from the colour of his hair, which was brown. He was the author of a vast number of elegies, satires, and songs. This Marbh Rann has been made choice of partly on account of its shortness. It forms one of two composed by the same bard for Mr. Murdoch MacDonald, a minister who was in Durinis in the land of Mackay:—

Dreary and dreary—oh, dreary am I!
So dreary and lone at the head of the year;
Since Murdoch has left me I grieve, and ask why
Was he not left for an age or two here?

Heart of reason—mouth that could good things say!
Wiseest head, in pious knowledge taught!
Open hand, and open in the time to pay!
O face above the board, with bounty ever fraught!

They faded—these faded when Death vanquish'd thee—
This year takes the glory of wisdom away;
Now the boons, unrestrain'd, without fear wander free,
God gives them so loose a rein since that doleful day.

For me, I am lone as a desert is lone;
I feel without use, and I laugh now no more.
How can I chant, or sing, or speak in cheerful tone,
When thou canst never hear again my mirth or lore!

Alas for thy household—thy children bereft!
Alas for the tunes thou couldst sing with such glee!
Alas for myself, with this empty praise left!
Alas for the sod that now rests upon thee!

Many they are who wept when thou wert dead,
But in a month their weary grief went by;
My grief at least has not so quickly fled—
At the head of the year, oh dreary am I!

Robb Donn was born in Sutherlandshire in the year 1714, and died in 1784—his life being thus divided into two equal portions by the year of the battle of Culloden. There is little or nothing in his works, however, to remind us of the romance of that period. The spirit of chivalrous devotion, the generous ardour, the enterprising valour and forgetfulness of the selfish interest of the moment, which certainly belonged in a very striking degree to the Highlands at that time, seem to have passed beside or above Robb Donn. He was less distinguished for the high imaginative effect of deep sentiment, acting on a naturally fine intellect, than for the clearness of his perceptions and the pointed vigour of his thought and expression.

The following pithy satire, with its peculiar form and even though covert mockery, is certainly philosophic and original enough, but not what we should most readily expect to come from a Gaelic bard immediately after the year of Charles. It is entitled, 'The Greedy Man and the World complaining against one another.' The Greedy Man opens the dialogue:—

'Grudging art thou, O World! and always art so;
Parting with those who have no wish to part so.
The man whose greedy passions tie a string to thee,
Falls on his back with nothing when he pulls it free.'

'Tis you, ye fickle men! who always start so.
Ill do ye keep by me who would not part so.
My sod supports you underneath, as you see;
But away you flit at once—and well may you be!

'Oh, if thou wouldst keep me, I'd be thine indeed!
Since beneath the sun lies all the good I heed,
How canst thou let me go, perhaps to endless pain,
When of heaven than of thee I am far less fain?

'Nay; but thou shouldst set thy wishes much more truly
Where lasting pleasure in return comes duly.
Although the boor I nourish for a season,
To keep him long I've neither might nor reason.'

There were a great many songs composed by Robb Donn. Some of these are not considered of a very high quality, and some of them are not of a very pure character. One which took its rise on the poet's being forsaken by his sweetheart is the best of the number. Robb Donn was at one time a drover. Following his vocation, he was absent on a certain occasion for more than a year from his native district; on his return he found his sweetheart engaged to a fair-haired Lowland carpenter. The song is descriptive of his feelings on making this melancholy discovery. But Robb Donn must have been a man of a buoyant temperament, for he tells his grief with unmistakable smartness as well as feeling. He was the author of the music as well as the words of the song. Its title is

THE SHIELING SONG.

Oh, sad is the shieling,
And gone are its joys!
All harsh and unfeeling
To me now its noise,
Since Anna—who warbled
As sweet as the merle—
Forsook me—my honey-mouth'd
Merry-lipp'd girl!
Heigh, how I sigh;
While the hour
Lastly, lonelly,
Sadly, goes by!

Last week, as I wander'd
Up past the old trees,
I mourn'd, while I ponder'd,
What changes one sees!
Just then the fair stranger
Walk'd by with my dear—
Dreaming, unthinking,
I'd wander'd too near,
Till 'Heigh' then I cried,—
When I saw
The girl, with her lover, draw
Close to my side—

'Anna, the yellow-hair'd,
Dost thou not see
How thy love unimpair'd
Wearieth me?
'Twas as strong in my absence,
When banish'd from thee—
As heart-stirring, powerful,
Deep as you see—
Heigh! it is now,
At this time,
When up like a leafy bough,
High doth it climb.'

Then, haughtily speaking,
She airily said,
'Tis in vain for you seeking
To hold up your head.

There were six wooers sought me
While you stay'd away;
And the absentee surely Deserved less than they.
Ha! ha! ha!
Are you ill?
But if Love seeks to kill you—bah!
Small is his skill!

Ach! ach! Now I'm trying
My loss to forget—
With sorrow and sighing,
With anger and fret.

But still that sweet image
Steals over my heart;
And still I deem fondly
Hope need not depart.

Heich! and I say
That our love,
Firm as a tower gray,
Nought can remove.

So Fancy beguiles me,
Fair Anna MacNee!
But the carpenter wiles thee,
False speaker! from me.
Yet from Love's first affection
I never get free;
But the dear known direction
My thoughts ever flee
Heich! when we stray'd
Far away,
Where soft shone the summer day
Through the green shade.

The airy, haughty, heartless coquette of this little ballad is sketched with considerable spirit.

'Ha! ha! ha! are you ill?' is a touch of Nature. One sees the poor disconsolate bard standing bewildered before her without a word in his head—so utterly cast down is he at the ill-placed mirth and cruel triumph of his worthless fair-haired beauty. He has contrived, however, to make the lady show a little pique too—'If Love seeks to kill you—bah! small is his skill!'—as if to console himself with the idea that his old favourite was not so utterly destitute of feeling, nor her old love after all so easily cast off without leaving a trace behind.

It would not perhaps be unsatisfactory to know that 'Anna, the yellow-hair'd,' met with some little bit of a disappointment herself in the end, in spite of her vaunted powers of attracting six lovers around her in one year. There is another lady mentioned in the original whose name was Isabel; but as she makes her appearance only in one line, and as her business even there seems to have been merely that of St. Peter in Master Stephen's verse,* I have taken the liberty of omitting her altogether.

There is another well-known Highland song by a for-

* Stephen—'Sidd! I have lost my purse, I think.

E. Knowell—Nay, do not weep the loss. Hang it! let it go.

Stephen—Oh! it's here! No; an' it had been lost, I had not cared, but for a jet ring Mistress Mary sent me.

E. Knowell—A jet ring! Oh, the poesi! the poesi!

Stephen—Fine i' faith.

Though fancy sleep,
My love is deep.

Meaning that, though I did not fancy her, she loved me dearly.

E. Knowell—Most excellent!

Stephen—And then I sent her another; and my poesi was—

The deeper the sweeter;
I'll be judged by St. Peter.

E. Knowell—How by St. Peter! I do not conceive that.

Stephen—Marry, St. Peter to make up the metre.

E. Knowell—Well, there the Saint was your good patron—he helped you at your need. Thank him—thank him.—Every Man in his Humour; Act II. scene 2.

saken lover, which may be compared with the preceding one, though it deals with its subject in a very different style. This is an Islay song, and called 'Och! mar tha Mi.' I give it verse for verse with the original, and in its rather peculiar metre, exactly as it was sung to me by a lady well acquainted with, and much interested in, Highland popular poetry. It must be noted that words of two syllables are in Gaelic invariably accented on the first; the second syllable becoming frequently little more than a mere breathing. There are also far fewer monosyllables in Gaelic than in English. This will serve to account for Gaelic verses ending as they so often do—not with a long syllable as in English, but with a word of a long and short syllable, as in this song—what the ancients called a trochee.

It is very difficult to give verses constructed on this principle a metrical sound in English at all; but, to adapt words to a great number of the Highland melodies, such a form is absolutely necessary. Every one who has heard Gaelic songs sung by those who give them the raciest intonation, must have observed how prone they were to dwell on the second last syllable of each line, and drop the last almost inaudibly. That is the right style for singing 'Och! mar tha Mi'—the air of which is very pretty.

OCH! MAR THA MI.*

Och! mar tha mi! here so lonely,
Despair has seized me, and keeps his hold,
Oh were I near thee, in Islay, only
Before thou'st taken that man for gold!

This doleful morning, how sad my waking!
My eyes with tear-drops fast running over,
For old love leaving and old vows breaking—
Thy banns are call'd with that other lover.

When sleeping sweetly the rest are lying,
Wild dreams of anguish my mind is weaving.
I'm like the swan that drops wounded—dying;
My love exhausts me with bitter grieving.

Alas! thy kind eye, so brightly shining;
Thy neck so comely, like cannach blinding;
Those ebon eyebrows thy forehead lining;
Thy cheek like berries on rowans glowing.

Though all earth's maidens my heart were seeking,
I'll love no more from this doleful morning,
Thou spirit-thrilling! thou sweetly-speaking!
Since thou hast left me, and without warning.

Since thou hast left me, and without warning,
Alas! and taken a man for gold!
Had I been by thee, false wisdom scorning,
Thyself, my dear one! thou hadst not sold.

Thy love could raise me from wasting fever,
And fill my pulses with health abounding—
Like the strong salmon that leaves the river,
And leaps rejoicing where waves are sounding.

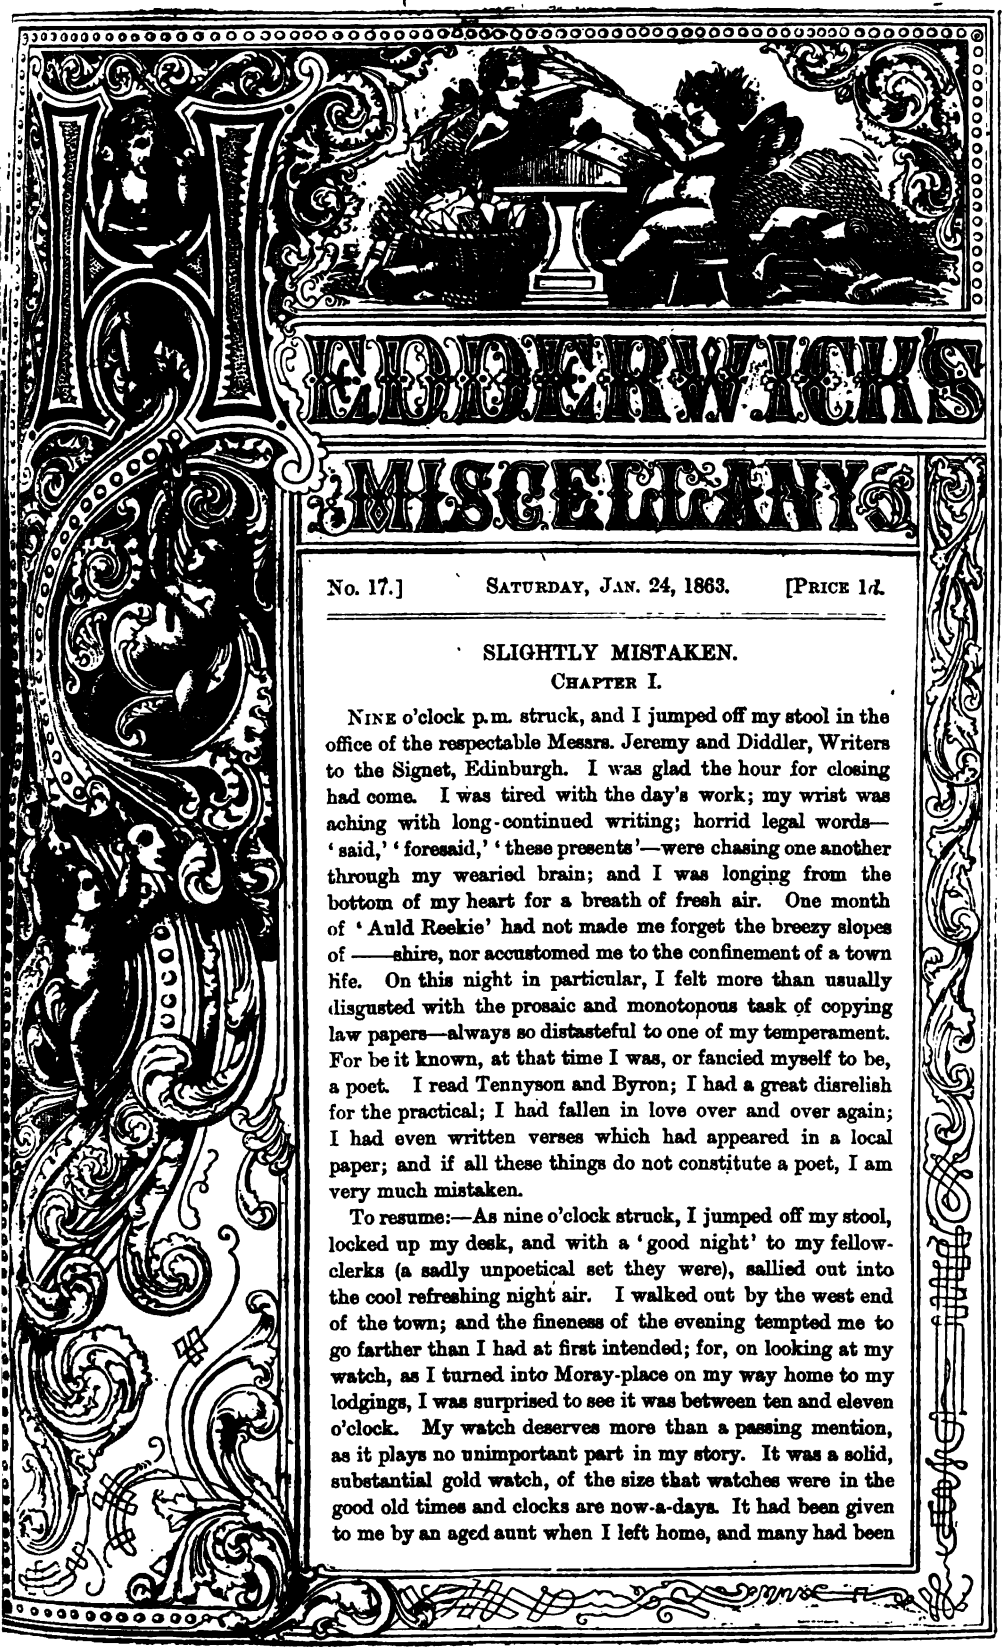

Och! mar tha mi! here so lonely
Despair has caught me, and keeps his hold.
Oh were I near thee, in Islay, only
Before thou'st taken that man for gold!

THOMAS PATTERSON.

* The th being silent in Gaelic, and the i sounded as in all other languages except English, these words are pronounced 'ha me!' This is an exclamation of grief, and means literally 'Och! how am I!' or, rendered more freely, 'Alas! what a state am I in!'

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention; but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 22 St Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

NO. 17.]

EDDERWICK'S

MISCELLANY

No. 17.]

SATURDAY, JAN. 24, 1863.

[PRICE 1d.]

SLIGHTLY MISTAKEN.

CHAPTER I.

NINE o'clock p.m. struck, and I jumped off my stool in the office of the respectable Messrs. Jeremy and Diddler, Writers to the Signet, Edinburgh. I was glad the hour for closing had come. I was tired with the day's work; my wrist was aching with long-continued writing; horrid legal words—'said,' 'foresaid,' 'these presents'—were chasing one another through my wearied brain; and I was longing from the bottom of my heart for a breath of fresh air. One month of 'Auld Reekie' had not made me forget the breezy slopes of —shire, nor accustomed me to the confinement of a town life. On this night in particular, I felt more than usually disgusted with the prosaic and monotonous task of copying law papers—always so distasteful to one of my temperament. For be it known, at that time I was, or fancied myself to be, a poet. I read Tennyson and Byron; I had a great disrelish for the practical; I had fallen in love over and over again; I had even written verses which had appeared in a local paper; and if all these things do not constitute a poet, I am very much mistaken.

To resume:—As nine o'clock struck, I jumped off my stool, locked up my desk, and with a 'good night' to my fellow-clerks (a sadly unpoetical set they were), sallied out into the cool refreshing night air. I walked out by the west end of the town; and the fineness of the evening tempted me to go farther than I had at first intended; for, on looking at my watch, as I turned into Moray-place on my way home to my lodgings, I was surprised to see it was between ten and eleven o'clock. My watch deserves more than a passing mention, as it plays no unimportant part in my story. It was a solid, substantial gold watch, of the size that watches were in the good old times and clocks are now-a-days. It had been given to me by an aged aunt when I left home, and many had been the weighty words with which she had endeavoured to impress upon my youthful mind a due sense of the responsibility connected with the custody of so precious an heirloom. Modesty forbids me to say more than that, as yet, I had been very faithful to the trust reposed in me.

I returned my watch to my pocket, and after a momentary glance at the fine appearance the Square presented—illuminated as it was by the brilliant light of a clear, full moon—was passing on, when I was suddenly startled by hearing a slight scream. I turned round in the direction whence the sound proceeded, and, by help of the moonlight, saw, at a short distance behind me, a young lady struggling to free herself from the grasp of a man who had hold of her by the arm. There was no other living creature but myself near them, and of course I rushed back to her assistance. The fellow did not wait for my coming up, but on hearing my footsteps made off as fast as possible, and I was left at liberty to attend to the object of his attack. I went forward to her and politely expressed a hope that she had not been hurt. The tone of her voice, as she assured me that she had escaped uninjured, and thanked me for my opportune arrival, sent a thrill of pleasure through me; it was silvery and musical to a degree—its sweet notes would have charmed the mighty bard who thought a gentle voice an excellent thing in woman. Her eyes were turned downwards when she began to speak, for she was putting to rights her shawl, which had become disarranged in the slight struggle; but as she finished, she looked up, and—ye scoffers at love at first sight, be as derisive as you please!—I was a victim, a helpless victim, bound in the chains of Cupid's forging.

Reader! bear with me for a little. Picture to yourself the scene and its surroundings; put yourself in my place, and then blame me, if you can. Imagine a magnificent moon overhead—its soft and tender light disclosing to your gaze a sweet young face flushed over with a blush of mingled confusion and gratitude, and a pair of bright eyes—the one moment looking timidly into yours, the next cast bashfully upon the ground! Add to these attractions the suddenness of the apparition, and the peculiar, not to say romantic, nature of the meeting; and, male reader of mine! I ask you, could you have resisted the combined force of all these charms? If you say you could, I have done with you. Like the Greek philosopher of old, you are not a man, but a stone. I could not. The lady was fair; and, by the 'weird moonlight,' doubtless appeared even fairer than she really was. I was young, soft-hearted, unsophisticated—and I succumbed. From the first glance she gave me, I was in love with her—I was her slave. I can well imagine now how stupid I must have appeared to her; for I was startled, dazzled out of my self-possession, and thrown into a state of nearly passive awkwardness. I, who could have thrown myself at the lady's feet, and in dumb show declared the passion that had so suddenly sprung up within me, could not find, as I stood upright before her, words with which to frame the most commonplace observation—even the formal Good night, I should have said, stuck in my throat. The only distinct feeling of which I was conscious, beyond a cold thrill all over me, was an insane wish for some enchanter's wand, with which I might fix her to the spot, and, unseen by her, gaze for ever on her face. Foolish, foolish I! Pardon me, reader, I was but a young man, and not very long from the country. I was, however, soon roused from my inaction. The lady bowed, and seemed to be on the point of moving away. Was this to be the end of it all? Was the fair apparition to depart as strangely and as suddenly as it had come—the memory only of its beauty abiding with me? It must not be. A desperate thought seized me, and I gave expression to it, although how I summoned up courage to do so even as well as I did, I cannot yet understand. I asked 'If I might be allowed to see her home, the hour was so late.' At least this was what I intended to say, but I am afraid I made a sad bungle of it. The words I stammered out must, however, have had some coherency in them, for the lady understood their meaning. She stood still again for a minute, and I knew by the gentle tapping of her foot upon the pavement (oh! how each little pat went through my heart!) that she was considering my proposal. The result of her deliberation, which did not last above a few seconds, was favourable to me. She murmured something about 'the hour being indeed late, and that she accepted my offer, and . . . The rest of the sentence was spoken in so low a tone that I only caught the words 'stranger' and 'trust.' Trust me! well might she. What danger would not have run for her! From what peril would I not have defended her! I am not a Hercules by nature, but I am confident that at that moment I could have scattered a whole host of ruffians, for I felt my arm nerved with the strength of a Sir Galahad. My self-possession did not increase in the same proportion, for, to tell the truth, the success which had attended my proposition was rather unexpected. I managed, however, to mutter a few words about proving myself worthy of the confidence reposed in me, and, without more ado, we sallied out of the Square together. As we walked on, I got rid, partly at least, of my embarrassment; although, for some little time, I could hardly shake off the impression that the whole affair was but some pleasant dream. I was brought to myself by the sweet voice of 'the fair unknown' calling my attention to the route it would be necessary to take. I had not yet bestowed a thought on anything so prosaic. Why could we not just wander on wherever fancy led us! She informed me that she lived at a considerable distance from where we then were—at the very other side of the town indeed—in a street in Lauriston. 'Too far out of my road! oh! certainly not!' I spoke in answer to a doubt the lady had expressed; and I thought of adding that I would go with pleasure to the world's end with her, but contented myself with a less vehement protest. At the same time, I had to confess that I was a comparative stranger to Edinburgh, and therefore totally unacquainted with the locality named. My companion, however, knew the road, and that was enough for me. I surrendered myself to her guidance.

We walked on in the proper direction, and arrived safely at Princes-street. A slight interruption occurred here. Two or three students, possessed of that sense of humour common to the tribe, had been amusing themselves by thrashing an unfortunate policeman, and the result was a regular riot. The street was almost blocked up by a restless crowd; and, as we were both very much jostled in the crush, and, indeed, almost separated, I offered the young lady my arm. I thought the urgency of the moment warranted me in doing so; and I suppose my companion thought so too, for she very readily passed her arm through mine, and, even when we had fairly got out of the press, did not withdraw it. It only needed this to complete my happiness. I felt as if I trode upon air, and I could have gone on for ever, with the little hand resting on my arm, with the fair face looking up to mine, with the silvery voice making sweet music to my ears. It was about common every-day subjects that she spoke, and I suppose no very great degree of science or talent was either required or exhibited; but she was the most gifted orator that ever was had never a more attentive listener than she had. I hung upon every word she said. I treasured up in my heart her most trivial sentences. She was certainly not talkative, but she yet spoke more than I did. I was too happy even to think, much less to talk; besides, every time I opened my mouth I felt as if the sound of my own voice, so uncouth compared with hers, would break the spell under which I lay. I was happy only when I listened. I gathered from her conversation that she, like myself, was almost a stranger to Edinburgh (I was glad that there was at least one point of sympathy between us); that she had been on a visit that evening to a friend's house at the other end of the town; and that she had waited for some one to call for her to see her home, but that no one had ever appeared, and she had been obliged to set out alone. How grateful I felt to that some one for its negligence. Who could it be? Was it he or a she? It might be her brother—it might be her — oh horror! I felt the sting of jealousy already. The walk did not last for ever, as I would have liked it to have done. We passed the Castle; we admired the moon and the moonlight; and I thought of speeches which I could have spoken glibly enough to many a young lady, but which, addressed to her, would, I felt, have been nothing but impertinence. We reached the south side of the town; we threaded our way through many streets which I had never been to before; and we finally came to a stand in one, at the foot of a common stair, the door of which was open.

The pleasant drama of the past hour or so was nearly over—the last scene of it had come; and I stood with the lady's hand in mine, bidding her adieu. Oh, how I longed to raise it to my lips!—it felt so soft, it looked so small and tempting. I restrained myself, however, and let it fall again; although I did try to please myself with the idea that she had allowed it to remain in my grasp a little, just a very little, longer than was absolutely necessary.

'Good-bye!' How powerless was that little word to express all the feelings of my heart! I tried to make it sound tender and melancholy. I only succeeded, I am afraid, in making it dismal. 'Good-bye!' I pulled my hat over my eyes and turned away.

'Mr. —'

The fair unknown still stood upon the steps. It was her voice that had called me back.

'Mr. —'

'Browning,' I mildly suggested.

'Mr. Browning! if you are ever passing this way again, I am sure papa, Captain Burnham, will be glad if you will call up; he will thank you better than I can for your kindness to me to-night.'

I bowed assent: the lady passed in; and the envious door closed behind her and hid her from my sight.

O dear, dear young lady! how happy these last words of yours had made me! for, had they not removed from my breast the dreadful thought that I would never see you more? How bright, for the next few minutes, did everything round about me look! The very dull gray street assumed, in my eyes, a beauty that was not its own. My heart, too, felt brimful of 'universal brotherhood.' Supremely happy myself, I could afford to feel benevolently towards my less favoured fellow-mortals. I could have hugged a passing policeman; I could have forgiven my greatest enemy; even if Plimmer had stood before me—that odious fellow-clerk of mine, who but a week ago had laughed at some of my verses—I could have taken him to my bosom—I could, indeed;—at least, I think so. In this benevolent state of mind I proceeded on my way. I stopped again at the corner to have another glance along the street. It looked dismal, now that her presence was no longer there. Clouds, too, were gathering in the sky, and a slight easterly haar creeping up. So, repressing a desire that prompted me to return to kiss the bell-handle her fingers had doubtless so often touched, and to gaze up at a lighted window, which might have been hers or any other person's, I walked hastily onwards.

It will be needless to describe the blissful feelings that occupied my mind on my way home;—they were such as have possessed all lovers since the beginning of time. I will only mention that, having given vent to them at a moment when they were very deeply excited, by singing wildly,

'I love thee! I love thee! is all that I can say,'

I succeeded in frightening an old cinder-woman, who was crouching at the side of the pavement, into using abusive language. I did not resent it, however. I, who could have taken a Plimmer to my bosom, found it easy to pardon a perhaps natural ebullition of feeling in an unlearned child of the Cowgate. It took me about an hour and a-half to walk home; for I lost my way more than once, and only recovered it after a good deal of plunging about. One o'clock was sounding forth, from a neighbouring church steeple, as I stood at the foot of the stair, in the respectable street, on the north side of the town, in which my lodgings were situated.

I had never been out so late before, and I ran quickly up stairs—intending to let myself quietly in with the pass-key, so as not to disturb either my landlady or my fellow-lodgers. But Fate was against me. My landlady, Mrs. Parsons, met me at the door, with a very small candle in her hand, and a very large nightcap on her head. Oh! how intensely unromantic she looked! Her whole appearance clashed so terribly with the train of my thoughts and feelings at the time, that the very sight of her prosaic and unprepossessing exterior ruffled my nerves. I felt like an Abyssinian suddenly brought face to face with an Arctic iceberg. Her voice, too, was the reverse of soothing—it did grate terribly on the ear in which the silvery notes of the fair unknown still lingered.

'We're late to-night, Mr. Browning! We're late to-night!' and between each clause she smacked her lips, as if she were tasting something peculiarly nice. Of course, I could not but assent to this very mild statement. She was not done with me, however.

'You'll be wanting your supper, sir. The kitchen fire is nearly out; but I dare say I could do you a bit toasted cheese.'

Yes, these were her exact words. She offered toasted cheese to me!—to a man in love!—to one who would have thought the nectar of the gods too solid food! Oh, Mrs. P.! Mrs. P.! if a glance could have withered you up, root and branch, you would not have been this day in the land of the living! I did not trust myself to speak; but, with the next thing to a rush, made straight for my bed-room door. I was not fated to reach it in safety. I had hardly taken one or two steps forward, when my foot caught in the leg of a chair, which the darkness of the lobby prevented me seeing in time; and chair and I both came to the ground with a tremendous clatter. Now, there is probably no man living who would consider it a very pleasant thing to have to lie out, full length, in a lobby, at one o'clock in the morning, with a chair on the top of him. For a lover to have to do so was peculiarly humiliating! I felt very much annoyed. I could have risen and thrown the offending piece of furniture at Mrs. P.'s head. The old aggravator! Before I had time to pick myself up, I heard the shrill treble of her voice sounding forth.

'Easy! easy! Mr. Browning. Young men will be young men, I dare say; but you might try and not disturb the other ludgers in the house.'

She meant to insinuate that I was drunk. This insult, coming so quickly after the toasted cheese, was too much for me—the patience even of a Job would have given way. I sprang to my feet, determined to rebuke her in a dignified and gentlemanly manner. With my hand on the handle of my own room-door (he was a wise man that said 'discretion is the better part of valour'), I turned at bay.

'Woman!' began.

I got no further. She burst on me like a whirlwind. 'Woman! woman!! ye'll woman me, you will! Keep your "woman" for your fine leddies out o' doors; they'll —'

I did not wait for the finish. I made a dive into my own room, and shut the door in her face. Behind that breakwater, I heard with composure the muttering and rolling of the storm outside. As, however, I was now fairly out of reach, it soon subsided; and with the passing reflection that if she were a woman I was not to blame, I dismissed the irate landlady from my mind.

For a full hour I walked up and down my bed room, occupied with pleasant memories and golden castle-building. I need hardly say who was the central figure in all my thoughts. A hundred times repeated over to myself every word she had spoken a hundred times I recalled with rapture her voice, her face, her hand, her eyes. I had almost forgot to mention that these last were brown (I had noticed this as I stood opposite to her bidding her good-bye) and brown eyes had always been my delight. Black eyes may be beady and staring; blue eyes may be insipid and weak; but brown eyes can never be anything but beautiful.

I had often been in love before, but had never experienced anything at all compared to what I now felt as far as regards intensity. All my previous affairs of the heart had been merely boyish flames, and

'In the light of deeper eyes
Seem'd matter for a flying smile.'

but this present one, I was convinced, was the passion that was to influence for good or ill my whole future life. No thought of a rival ever crossed my inflated brain; I was determined to win her; the first step had been already gained—I had been asked into the house, and what obstacle could prove insurmountable to an ardour such as mine? I would do or die.

Animated with this high resolve, I began to take of bed, for in truth I was getting sleepy. Cupid, in the long run, is no match for Morpheus; and love notwithstanding all that poets say to the contrary cannot altogether dispense with blankets and pillows. I threw off my coat, and then put my hand into my pocket to take out my watch; but, to my utter astonishment, no watch was there! I looked hastily down—a short piece of broken chain, hanging loosely from a button-hole, told the tale! A practised hand had been at work; and my watch, the treasured heirloom had passed into the possession of some common thief in my pocket! I stood petrified. My first thought was, 'would I say to my aunt? My second, when and where could I have lost it? Many vague surmises flitted through my mind; and then a terrible suspicion flashed across me. I caught up my coat;—my purse had been in the pocket, on the side that had been next to the

I felt for it. It was gone too! I grew faint; my head swam round; I had to hold on by the bed to steady myself. My suspicion was gaining ground. There was one way of either verifying or disproving it. The Edinburgh Directory lay upon my table; in a minute more my trembling fingers were turning over its leaves. The name of the street she lived in? She had mentioned it. Quick! O treacherous memory! had it escaped thee? Yes. Ah no! I remembered it. Cardigan-street was the name she had given. For Cardigan-street, accordingly, I looked—but looked in vain; there was no such street in Edinburgh! There was another chance still remaining. I turned to the list of residents, and, with a beating heart, run my eye down the pages. Burn—Burness—Burnside; but not one of the name of Burnham! My suspicion was a suspicion no longer; it had passed into a conviction—into a certainty. I threw the book from me in despair. Everything appeared in its true light to me now; rapidly, all the incidents of the evening passed in review before my mind; and I saw, attached to each one of them, an importance and a meaning which till this moment had been concealed from me. The pretended assault in Moray-place—the readiness with which she had accepted my proffered escort—the cautious route we had taken—the out-of-the-way street she had led me to—me, a confessed stranger to the town,—the open door at which we stopped—all had been but the successive steps in the conspiracy of which I had been the unsuspecting victim; and she, who for the last few hours had been the idol of my heart, was nothing but a most accomplished pick-pocket!

'And with brown eyes, too!' I faintly murmured, as I sank into the nearest chair, exhausted in body, crushed and humiliated in spirit.

CHAPTER II.

Time rolled on; and, although it brought few changes to me outwardly, I trust that, profiting by the lessons of experience, I became, if not a better at least a wiser man. Of course, I never heard more of my watch; indeed, to tell the truth, I never took any steps in the matter, I was so ashamed of the foolish part I had played. Neither did the fair unknown ever again cross my path. For long, I kept a sharp look-out on the streets—for long, I read every police report; but all to no purpose—I neither saw nor heard anything of her. She seemed to have departed as suddenly as she had come, leaving not a trace behind. Even the very street to which she had taken me I could never afterwards clearly identify, as I had been too much excited on the memorable evening to take particular note of the landmarks of the scene. Did the love—for the young woman, shall I call her?—also disappear as completely from my heart? I don't know what to say to this question. When I thought of her fair face and silvery voice, then I am afraid the answer must be 'No.' But when I think of her degraded life and all its terrible accompaniments rose up before my mind, then it must be 'Yes;' for love passed into pity. Somehow, it was only pity I felt. I never felt angry at the deception which I concluded had been practised on me.

I soon made my peace with my landlady; and—with shame I write this—I had often to tell lies to my aunt about my watch. I know that the end does not justify the means; but if I had revealed to her the whole truth, I am sure it would have brought her gray hairs in sorrow to an earlier grave than Nature had marked out for her. Poor old soul! may she rest in peace! Her funeral notice at this moment lies upon my table.

One winter evening, between one and two years after my adventure, I sat in my own room, considering what answer I should send to a note I had received, inviting me to an evening party. Now, I was not fond of dancing, and, in consequence, had hitherto as a rule declined all such invitations; but I was half inclined to make an exception in this case. The 'blow-out' (as I have heard some of my fast friends call it) was to be given by the Austins—a family with whom I had become very intimate within the last year or so, and one of the members of which, Frank by name, was my most particular friend. If I sent a refusal, I would more than likely give offence, and I did not certainly wish to risk that. Would I be self-denying, and go? I was saved the trouble of deciding for myself. In the midst of my cogitations I heard a ring at the bell, followed in a minute or two after by a knock at my door. I had hardly time to say 'Come in,' before harum-scarum Frank Austin, in propria persona, was shaking me by the hand.

'I say, old boy! how are you? I declare it's a perfect age since I saw you last; that's our note in your hand, isn't it? You are coming? Of course, you are! You couldn't refuse, you know.'

This was either a cool assumption on Frank's part, or else he saw indecision written on my face; for he had not given me time yet even to open my lips. Without heeding me, however, this second Lavater rattled on.

'And you will not repent it; for although I say it that shouldn't, it will be a "swell" affair. My cousin from England is to be there. By-the-bye, you have not seen her yet. She is a little stunner, and no mistake. And there will be a whole lot of other jolly girls. Dost like the picture, Charlie?'

(Before going further, I must protest against some of the terms made use of by Frank. I cannot approve of them. I would never call any young lady either 'a stunner,' or 'a jolly girl;' nor a number of young ladies 'a lot,' as if they were drapery or hardware goods put up to auction. Such expressions are not respectful; and, moreover, they are not poetical. Tennyson would never use them.)

What could I say to Frank? His vigorous onset struck me dumb; and, as silence is always held to mean consent, I was forced to go to the party.

* * * * *

One or two quadrilles were over, and I sat down in an out-of-the-way corner of the room to rest myself, and take a general survey of the company. It was a brilliant assemblage; but not an interesting one to me, for I could see but few familiar faces among the many present. Remembering Frank's words, 'however, I kept a sharp look-out for the 'stunners' and the 'jolly girls;' but my search was so fruitless, that I began to think they had existed only in that young gentleman's rather vivid imagination. Sitting by myself, I fell into a sort of dreamy state; and, half unconsciously, allowed my eyes to rest on the figures of two young ladies, engaged in conversation at the other end of the room. I say figures advisedly, because, from the position in which they were both sitting, I could at first see neither of their faces. Just, however, as I, suddenly recollecting myself, was on the point of taking off my eyes, one of them looked round in my direction. At the very first glance, it struck me I had seen her features before; I stole another look, and then they all came back to me—that face! those eyes! that smile! The room swam round with me; for there, before me, I saw in substantial flesh and blood the heroine of my night's adventure! Were my senses deceiving me? Was I dreaming? I shook myself, to make sure that I had not fallen asleep, and then fixed my eyes once more upon the lady. She smiled again to her companion, and I knew that I was not mistaken; for, by that smile I could have picked her out from among a hundred others.

It was a most astounding discovery. I sat gazing at her for some time, with a strange beating at my heart, and, it must be confessed, no little confusion in my head; till at last our eyes met, and I noticed her give a slight start. I was sure she had recognised me; and I was confirmed in this belief by seeing her almost immediately afterwards rise from her seat and leave the room.

In the midst of my perplexity, I was greeted by Frank.

'How are you getting on, old boy?'

The sound of his voice was like music to my ears; for it immediately occurred to me that he was the very person to help me to an explanation. I opened on him at once.

'Frank! there is a young lady in the room'—

'Two or three of them, I rather think, Charlie!'

'Well; but, joking apart, there is one in particular—one with brown hair, brown eyes, a sweet smile, and a voice that's'—

'Do draw it mild, please! You do not mean to say you have fallen in love with my pretty cousin already. Never mind. It's nothing to be ashamed of. Come away, and I'll introduce you.'

I rose from my seat at once to accompany him, with my courage screwed to the sticking-place; but, just at that moment, a servant came up, and whispered a few words in Frank's ear.

'I will have to leave you for a little, Charlie. They have got into no end of a mess with the negus, and I must go and look after it. Ah, Mrs. Webster! allow me to introduce to you my friend, Mr. Browning. I'll be back in a minute or two.'

And he was off, 'like an arrow from a Tartar's bow,' leaving me to the tender mercies of an old dowager, who seemed to think her daughters—their beauty and their accomplishments—the most interesting subjects upon which she could speak even to a stranger. I am afraid that at first I made rather random replies to her various observations; for Frank's words were ringing in my ears, and making the confusion in my head worse confounded. His 'cousin,' he had said. Could it be possible? The matter seemed only getting more and more complicated; but I contented myself at last with the reflection that all would soon be explained. For half-an-hour, I had to listen patiently to the terrible old lady's account of how deeply young Smith had been impressed by the beauty of Ellen (a flaxen-haired doll of over thirty), and of what old Jones had thought of the talents of Mary (if the girl was not a fool, her face did her a grievous wrong; but at the end of that time, Frank re-appeared. Instead of leading me off to be introduced to the young lady, he, much to my surprise, desired me to step aside with him for a minute or two, as he had something particular to say to me. I, of course, on the tiptoe of expectation, followed him at once, and we ensconced ourselves in an out-of-the-way corner of the room.

'Charlie! I have been informed by my cousin,' said Frank, seemingly half-amused, half-puzzled, 'that she and you have met before; and that, on the occasion when she was in your company, she—ahem! to state the case mildly—lost her watch!'

The reader may imagine, but I cannot well describe, the varied emotions that passed through my mind during this short speech of Frank's. In the first place, it removed any lingering doubt as to the young lady's identity. The heroine of my night's adventure and Frank Austin's cousin were, in truth, one and the same person; and in the fact, also mentioned by Frank, of the young lady having lost her watch, I saw the first glimmer of light cast upon the mysterious circumstances connected with the disappearance of my own. Of course we had both been robbed while entangled in the crowd in Princes-street. Fool that I was, never to have suspected the truth before now! I turned to Frank, and abruptly asked him if his cousin had related to him all the particulars of our meeting.

'No, she had not.'

Begging him not to interrupt me, however ridiculous my statements might seem to him, I then gave him a full, true, and particular account of our rencounter in Moray-place; of my escorting her to her own house; of missing my watch on my return home—of my suspicion—my fruitless search in the Directory—and the precipitate conclusion I came to. I told him everything. No, not everything: whatever he might suspect, I was silent on the subject of my passion for Miss Burnham. That was now too serious a matter to be needlessly exposed, even to his eyes. Friends—male friends at least—do not very often make confidants of one another in their love affairs. Several times during my narration, I noticed that Frank was very much amused; and the moment I came to an end he began his explanations.

'In the first place, Charlie! I must tell you—that at the time you met my cousin in Moray-place, Captain Burnham and his family were only residing temporarily in Edinburgh, and therefore occupied furnished apartments. That explains why his name was not in the Directory. Then, secondly, the name of the person with whom they lodged was Cardigan; the street they lived in was certainly in Lauriston, but is called — street. And, finally, you never hardly had a chance of seeing Kate again, because it must have been almost immediately after your rencontre, that one of my younger cousins having been suddenly ordered by the doctor to a milder climate, my uncle and all the rest of them went with her to the south of France; and they only returned from the Continent about a week or so ago. I have now told you all I know about the matter; but I think I have made everything very plain. Can you read the riddle, 'Charlie?'

Read the riddle! Ay, indeed! It would take no time to solve it now. He had made it too plain. I guessed in spirit; for I could only repeat the verdict my own judgment had already passed upon my conduct. 'What a fool I had been!' Of course, Miss Burnham had told me both the name of their land-lady and of the street they lived in. In my excitement, I had forgotten the first and substituted for it the second. In the light of this explanation, how slight the mystery looked; how contemptible my own suspicions! I felt heartily ashamed of them. I despised myself for ever having entertained them.

After a few moments' silent cogitation, I ventured to remark to Austin—

'What a fool your cousin must think me!'

'Oh, no!' he said with a wicked smile, 'not quite so bad as that; she only thinks you are a pickpocket! But never mind; come with me, and I'll introduce you to her, and make everything right in a minute or two.'

I at once declined the honour. I could not face the young lady, knowing how I had wronged her, in thought at least. Indeed, I felt sorely tempted to rush from the room and from the house, and be a cynic, and shun society from that hour. Just when this impulse was strongest, I heard the rustling of a lady's dress behind me. Frank, who, from the position in which he was standing, could see the wearer of the dress, slyly desired me to look around at her. I unwittingly obeyed, and —; but I cannot give a succinct account of what ensued. I met the glance of soft-brown eyes! I heard my own name pronounced in Frank's voice, followed by what I now suppose must have been words of explanation. I saw a sweet and gracious smile vouchsafed to me. I felt a little soft white-gloved hand in mine; and I was happy—very happy.

I have little more to say. As Captain Burnham is now a permanent resident in Edinburgh, I have very often met his daughter since the evening of the party—about a year ago, now; and it has so happened that my first moonlight walk with the young lady—that walk which will dwell for ever in my memory—has not been by any means the last, nor the night on which I rescued her in Moray-place the only occasion on which I have had to act with her the pleasant part of escort. A word to the wise is enough; so I will only add, that some day, and that at no distant date, I hope to have the right to call Kate Burnham by a dearer name than that of 'friend.' R. W.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. VII.

I ONCE knew an old Highland woman who used to lavish a set of most endearing terms on a child of her master's—a fair-haired boy of whom she took a particular charge. One of her expressions, I remember, was 'Laochan mo ghaeil,' that is, 'Hero of my love.' There was a well-known piper in a certain district of the Highlands with which I was at one time very familiar. He was a tall, straight, and handsomely made man, with high and bold features. He had dark sandy hair, retaining all its old strength and colour though he was nearly seventy years old; and great staring eyes, whose meaningless and prominent orbs were oftentimes reeling under the combined effects of drink and insanity. Everybody knew this man. He used to wander about, attending fairs and all sorts of gatherings, playing with immense spirit, and dancing bare-foot on the village streets, or on the hard highway, in a splendid fashion. He could both dance with extraordinary agility and play the chanter of his pipe cheerily at the same time, so great were the power of his lungs and the strength of his hardy limbs. I have heard this 'Piobaire Mor,' as they called him, or Big Piper, address a favourite, or indeed any one whose good will he wanted to propitiate, as 'a ohiail mo chridhe,' that is, 'reason, or soul of my heart.'

Such a word as 'fheudail,' pronounced aidal, or 'my treasure,' is quite common, and used by all sorts of people. A race, among whom exclamations like these have sprung up, and become parts of the most ordinary conversation, must have a language well adapted for lyric compositions of the most affectionate nature. Let that race, at the same time, be distinguished for musical and poetic genius, and it needs no prophet to tell that their literature will at least be rich in love-songs, and in strains expressive of every kind and degree of ardent attachment. In the Highlands this is eminently the case. Of Gaelic love-songs, which have been published or which still exist only in the mouths of the people, there is probably a sufficient number to form several volumes. These have very frequently the great fault of being much too long. Not seldom, perhaps, they are chargeable with some slight sameness in their descriptions, especially of the admired object. But they are often so natural, so tender, and graceful—they are composed in such a variety of measures, and with such unaffected feeling—that a very large proportion of them is of really high worth.

The Highland bards, whatever their defects in point of culture or artistic tact might be, have none of them weak hearts, at any rate, or watery eyes or whining voices; they are none of them in the habit of being led astray by wan Will-o'-the-Wisps, which they take for house or heaven light. We feel, in fact, as we read them that we make ourselves acquainted, not only with the real sentiments of men and women, but with what deserved to be such. We may, perhaps, sometimes fancy that those men and women were not in all respects so learned as ourselves; but we never have good reason to suppose them a bit more foolish, or in any way feebler than ourselves. So much we can safely say of them, and it is more than can be said of all other verse-makers.

The Gaelic lyric bards, indeed, sung according to their own condition, just because their circumstances happened so to prompt them. Their condition and their circumstances were real things. The mode in which they acted on them were plainly intelligible and respectable. They spoke in their own familiar language, right out from their own beating hearts. It was not their fashion to strain their fancies for novelties in imagery, nor tax their faculties to string together words that did not represent actual, and tangible, and sensible realities. Their thoughts and words are always the thoughts and words of people of this world; so are their passions, and so are their affections.

These qualities, along with their musical numbers, form their excellences. Their faults, as I have already said, are their occasional prolixity, and the slight sameness which is sometimes perceptible in their descriptions.

The love song which I now offer is a celebrated composition of Duncan Ban's. It is addressed to his wife, Mairi Bhan Og; and is redolent throughout of such grace and manly tenderness and delicacy, that it really seems to deserve the character given it—of being the finest love song in the Gaelic language. If it be compared with Spenser's epithalamium on his marriage with his Elizabeth, I do not think the Gaelic bard will be found much inferior to the great English poet and cultivated gentleman, in beautiful luxuriance of fancy, in manly affection, or in cordial respect and nobly becoming admiration for his spouse—though she was but Mairi Bhan Og of the ale-house, and he was but the Earl of Breadalbane's forester, or the sergeant of Highland Fencibles, who never in his life could decipher a single sentence of the lettered page of knowledge.

A SONG TO HIS SPOUSE, NEWLY WEDDED.

BY DUNCAN BAN.

Mairi Bhan Og,* thou girl ever thought of,
Still where I am may thou be,
Since the clerk-given right, so long wish'd for,
I've got, dear wife! o'er thee.
With cov'nants and bands strong and lasting
A knot now ties thee to me;
That thou'rt mine, with thy friends all consenting,
Fills me with health and with glee.
When sick, in our courtship's beginning,
To me none in kindness came near;
'Twas then, at the board of the ale-house,
I mark'd the good girl now so dear.
I drew to her side, and she promis'd
My life with her love to cheer;
Oh! the joy when I won her, and with her,
A part of the old baron's gear.
Monday morning—long though the journey
I travell'd to meet with my bride;
I ran like the wind to be bound in
The knot that will ne'er be untied.

* 'Mairi Bhan Og' means 'Fair young Mary.' The ai in Mairi is pronounced like the a in father, or in the first syllable of the Italian singer's name—Mario.

I took her aside for a moment,
To speak of my love and pride;
And my ear caught the fluttering tumult
Of my heart beating fast on my side;—

For Cupid had shot a whole bundle
Of sharp-winged darts in my breast,
That dried up my pulses, and downward
My strength like a burden press'd.
Then I told the sweet cause of my anguish,
How no leech could give me rest;
But my wounds with her virtues she cured them,
As myself she gently carress'd.

Then kiss'd I the round and soft maiden
Who'd grown up so mild and sweet—
So comely, so tall, and so curly,
So womanly, graceful, and neat.
In many a way am I favour'd,
Such a love as hers to meet;
When her vows and herself she gives me,
A cheaply bought bargain I greet.

I went to the wood with its saplings,
Radiant it glimmer'd around,
My eye caught a spray, all surpassing,
High in the dusky shade found.
It was cover'd all over with blossoms;
I bent it down to the ground,
And I cut it—a sad sight for many;
But my fate with it was bound.

Once casting a net in the true waters,*
I strove to draw it to land,
And I brought to the bank a bright sea-trout
That lay like a swan on the strand.
Pleased was my soul with the fortune
That came with such joy to my hand.
My spouse! thou'rt the star of the morning!
Blest be thy slumbers and bland!

Thy manners were womanly ever;
Gentle in word and in deed;
So genial, so kind, and so glowing—
Free of grudging, and closeness, and greed:
Alms-giving, liberal, pitying,
Humane with all that had need;
On the good thou hast done, I'm persuaded,
Thy spirit for ever shall feed.

While I studied to form thy acquaintance
With words that were mirthful and gay,
Thy breath smelt as sweet as the apples
Golden and ripe on the spray.
There was not a thing worth the telling
But thou couldst soon wile me to say:
And shouldst thou now leave me, the linen
And grave would hide me away.

Thy talk and thy singing are pleasant,
Thy nature is charming always—Mirthful, and noble, and free from
A shade of reproach or disgrace.
For three months I suffer'd a death pang;
But once thou hadst heard of my case,
A treasure of solace thou gav'st me—
Of sorrow it left not a trace.

Since last year I've risen in value,
With the calves thou broughtest and kine:
Now a choice sheaf of wheat, ripe and rustling,
With the best of corn is mine.
But what makes me rate thee the highest,
Is that firmness in good which is thine:
Yet thy beauties delight every bosom,
So sweetly and softly they shine.

* Water that comes from a spring is called 'true water' in Gaelic.

Thy fair hair, close set and excelling,
Rolls in curls and wavelets free;
Thy features are mild, modest, womanly,
Fine eyebrows, where frowns never be;
A winning blue eye, full, smooth-lidded;
No fault in thy face I see;
Thy teeth are strong, white as ivory;
Thy still mouth speaks modestly.

The lone shieling glen canst thou traverse,
Where the wandering cattle stray;
At the fold of the river to milk them,
While the calves around thee play.
Nor less is thy worth near the candle,
In the room that shines like day;
Sewing thy bands and plain seams,
Or working embroidery gay.

Thy breast's like the fresh and smooth pebble
That lies on the shore day and night;
Thy body, so slender and stately,
Like cannach, is pure and white.
Soft and thin is thy palm, fine thy fingers,
The lady's warm hand, shoulders bright;
Thy foot in its shoe is close fitting;
Graceful thy step is and light.

Mild art thou, wife! come from Mam-Charai;
Thy love steals my senses away;
For a heart such as thine is, oh surely
Small was the price I'd to pay!
The blood of great nobles and famous
Rolls in thy blue pulses' play—
The blood of the King and MacCallan,*
And him who in Sleat held the sway.†

Oh! could I but take thee and hide thee
In a place well secured from decay;
For now, should death leave me without thee,
I'd love not another for aye;
But ne'er shall the hearth's harsh wrangling tease thee,
Or ruffle thy temper so gay;
Thou shalt hear but the choice of sweet measures
My mouth can or sing or say.

I'd plough or drive in the spring-time for thee,
When the young horse in harness is dress'd,
Or seek on the shore with the fishers
Whate'er to the hook wileth best;
I'd kill for thee swans and seals and wild geese,
And birds on the boughs that rest;
Nor e'er shouldst thou want while a forest
Lay near with one antler'd crest.

In the following sentences we have an interesting account of Duncan Ban, as he looked when he travelled, with his Mairi Bhan, about the Highlands, collecting subscriptions for the third edition of his poems. Duncan Ban is said to have been remarkably handsome in his youth. He must have been a very fine-looking old man also.

*The Rev. Mr. MacCallum of Arisaig saw him travelling slowly with his wife. He was dressed in the Highland garb, with a checked bonnet, over which a large bushy tail of a wild animal hung; a badger's skin, fastened by a belt in front; a hanger by his side; and a soldier's wallet was strapped to his shoulders. He was not seen by any present before then, but was immediately recognised. A forward young man asked him "if it was he that made Ben Dourain?" "No," replied the venerable old man; "Ben Dourain was made before you or I was born; but I made a poem in praise of Ben Dourain." He then inquired if any would buy a copy of his book. I told him to call on me, paid him three shillings, and had some conversation with him. He spoke slowly. He seemed to have no high opinion of his own works, and said little of Gaelic poetry; but said that officers in the army used to tell him about the Greek poets; and Pindar was chiefly admired by him.—Mackenzie's Beauties of Gaelic Poetry.

*MacCallan, or, more frequently, MacCallan More—that is, the son of Colin the Great—is the patronymic of the Duke of Argyll. It is sometimes erroneously written MacCallummore.

†He who in Sleat held the sway was one of the chiefs of the Macdonalds.

The next song also belongs to wedded life. It forms, however, a striking contrast with the preceding, and I give it now accordingly. Here, it is a foolishly ambitious and absurdly deceived woman who sings. The verses, though only a mere sketch, serve to explain her situation. The hero of the ballad she calls Braigan Binneach—words which may be translated, 'The litting little Liar.'

BRAIGAN BINNEACH.

I went away with Braigan Binneach
And MacGregor Clair.
He told me of his splendid house,
His kitchen, and his dairy;
But not a house or hall saw I,
Save, on the hillside airy,
A little bothy where he lived
With his sister Mary.

He has got but one dun cow,
Though he bragg'd so rarely—
It hardly gives enough of milk
For himself and Mary.
In my father's barn at home
I could lie as fairly
As in this bothy by the hill,
Which is so damp and airy.

I would leave it fast enough,
If my sire forgave me;
I would work, and work enough—
Do anything to save me
From the Braigan Binneach's tongue
And his sister Mary;
I'd thrash, or plough, or tend the cows,
Or cart, or keep the dairy.

I give this song, as it was sung to me by a lady who was a good deal amused with it, though a little ashamed of remembering such nonsense so well. It belongs to a class of songs of which there are a considerable number: in the Highlands, though they seldom find their way into the printed collections. It would seem that both the genius and the taste of the people lead more to melancholy than to mirth in their compositions. At the same time, when they happen to be cheerful, their efforts are not the less effective, while their grave face still keeps masking the quaint humour and cordial mirthfulness which their words embody.

THOMAS PATTISON.

CONCERNING A MUSTACHE.

It is amusing to notice the powerful sway which Fashion holds over us, the poor children of men. How we trick out our poor bodies with glorious apparel! How sensitive we are to the cut of our coats—the polish of our boots! How different our common parent Adam—toiling in the Garden of Eden, in his 'beauty unadorned, adorned the most'—to those Beaux Brummels of society—those exquisite tailors' advertisements that we know so well, and meet every day in the fashionable promenades! Verily, Adam would not recognise his own children! But it is all Fashion. Nature has no voice in the matter at all. Do you possess a well-turned, shapely limb? Then don't let the world see it on any consideration. Skin-tights have long ago been considered indecent; but clothe them, if you will, in bags of flapping cloth, till all traces of their symmetry be lost. Do you possess a white and delicate hand? Perhaps it is the fairest gift Nature has bestowed upon you. No matter. The world must not look upon your naked flesh. Cover it with kid-skin. Have you long curling love-locks sporting around your shoulders? Vanity of vanities—we will have no Absaloms here! Have you a beard? Out it down!

Looking over a photographic album, the other day, with some lady friends, our eyes fell upon the carte de visite of a gentleman who was present in the room. The likeness was not very striking, for lately he had taken unto himself a terrific beard and mustache, which did not appear in the portrait. My friends lifted up their hands in mild horror; and, glancing from the shadow to the original, exclaimed, 'What frights men will make of themselves! How much better he would have looked without these horrid things!' And then turning to me, hoped that I would never have a beard. I, who have hitherto shaved like a martyr, reply—'Madam! I can assure you I intend to let myself grow all over—beard, mustache, and everything else.' 'Well! well!' exclaims another, 'have a beard if you choose, but don't get a mustache.' And this brings me to the point. Don't get a mustache! And why not, pray? Why not get a mustache? Why should we be obliged to draw the sharp edge of a knife over our skin every morning till it becomes ruffled and inflamed, and smarts as if rubbed with sand-paper? Echo answers—Why? But no; we hear voices, and clamorous enough too, and they speak in this wise—'Do not hesitate, we beseech you. For goodness sake! make yourselves like Christian men, and don't give yourselves the appearance of as wild-looking gorillas as ever roamed in the African forests!' Who utters these words? Follow me, kind reader, and we will see.

My friend Jones once tried to grow a mustache. How tenderly he watched over a few weak white hairs, till gradually a tinge of colour appeared, deepening and deepening as each week flew by, until they ripened into a flaming red. But ever since the birth of Jones's mustache, it had been assailed with the bitter winds of sarcasm and mockery, until, finding the atmosphere too severe, it went abroad. But not to die. It prospered on the Rhine; it sprouted in Brussels; it flourished among the Alpine hills; and triumphed in the broiling streets of Paris! Jones came home. Again the same bitter winds assailed it. Jones could not stand it. It was cut down in the glory of its prime! Requiescat in pace! Jones is now most bitter on those more persevering than himself; and I heard him say, just the other day, that 'None but cad and volunteer officers ever wore mustaches!' Reader, is this fair? Is this generous? I trow not. And yet there are many Joneses in this world.

As a general rule, the married lady whose husband is above all such hirsute appendages, is a violent opponent to mustaches. Either she has imbibed such sentiments from her better half (who is very bitter on the subject), or she feels that such ornaments are all for the benefit of those maiden daughters of Eve, from whose circle she is withdrawn for life; or, perhaps, her ideal of manly beauty is already realised in the man to whom she has given her heart; and what does not become him can become no one else.

Then there are maiden ladies whose hobby is scrupulous cleanliness. They have a horror for anything which may present a dark or dingy appearance. They like to dote upon boys of sixteen or so, whose faces are as smooth as a baby's; and nothing pleases them so much as a clean, polished, shining complexion, which tells of frequent applications of soap and water. If you are cultivating a mustache, you feel afraid to go near them, for their irony cuts deeper than the blade of the sharpest razor.

But this is not all. We must encounter the wrath of the generation of business men who are passing away—men who have shaved religiously for upward of fifty years, and who insist upon their children doing so too. They look upon a mustache and business matters as utterly antagonistic; and if the one increase, so must the others decrease. I once heard an old gentleman arguing with his son upon business matters. The dispute was waxing very hot; and when it became evident that arguing would have no effect, the old man, in a loud tone of indignation exclaimed, 'Boy! boy! you will never be worth a farthing for business till you take that hair off your lip!'

Reader! do you also side with the oppressor? Would you seek to abolish for ever

'The exquisite graceful things!'

At any rate, what does it matter? Appearance is but a matter of taste; and, after all, comfort is the main consideration. If we try to please every one, we will succeed in pleasing no one. What although people talk and grumble over the follies of the rising generation? let Nature take her own course, and habit will in the end overcome the most stubborn resistance.

J. A.

YANKEE PHILOLOGY.

UNCLE SAM and Brother Jonathan have long been terms familiar as household words on the lips of John Bull; but it may safely be affirmed that, within these few years, the British knew less of their vivacious cousins across the Atlantic than they knew of the British. Many travellers have visited them from hence, and we have now and again books recording the results of their experience, showing how much we differ from them, not only in political life but in social life as well. The States have a history of their own, which, though brief, is as ignoble, and comprises annals of self-denying vigils and heroic courage equal to that of any country. Travellers have dogmatized upon their institutions and judged them by a particular standard—condemning them only because they diverged from their own, and therefore setting them down as inferior and generally as failures. Political life there, more especially in the local Houses of Representatives, is characterised with much of what they themselves term 'Bowdism;' and rough and ready arguments, in the shape of revolver and bowie-knife—when other persuasives of a milder nature fail in effecting the senator's object—are apt to be used: a species of knock-down logic being a frequent resource of the opposition benches. In the social aspect of American life, too, there is little of what is considered in this country as one of the happiest issues in a man's life—we mean the hreside or home-life, which all right-minded people love so much, and is so eminently characteristic of our own land. In the larger cities of the Union, preference is often given to living in a hotel or boarding-house to living in a house of one's own. No doubt every country has its own peculiarities, and no one so comparatively new, this cannot but be looked for, and still less can it be wondered at. 'Ours is a great country,' say they, 'and we are convinced that it can't be beat nohow, and that it can't be ditted neither; in fact, we are some pumpkins!' Great as they may be, however, they are sufficiently thin-skinned enough when a Dickens finds fault with or rebukes their idiosyncracies, but generally enjoy a laugh at them when shown up by a native author.

That special one of which we wish to say a little, is only to be considered as a result of the different circumstances and wants of a new country making new terms necessary. Several of these novelties are becoming familiar with us, and though they may be unclassical enough, still they are simple, expressive, and apt to this age of telegraphs and express trains, which is 'fast' in every sense of the term; and, remembering that simplicity is the main element of strength as well as of beauty, though of the latter there may be little, yet many are strong in their expressive significance. Even in the coining of these words we can recognise the ready mind of the people. There is no circumlocution with them. 'They are born in a hurry, and educated at top speed—make a fortune with a wave of the hand, and lose it in like manner. Their bodies are locomotives, travelling ten leagues an hour; their spirit a high-pressure; their life resembles a shooting-star, and death surprises them like an electric shock.'

When it is considered that the original and main body of the settlers were British, and among them all kinds of provincial dialects, with whom were occasionally associated French, Germans, &c., it is astonishing to find so little real change in the spoken language of the States. We have said the spoken language, because, with American authors, nothing of this peculiarity is to be detected, and the number of really new words is comparatively small. Indeed, the works of their writers have in many cases gained to this country a most deserved popularity, and have mingled with the productions of our own authors as if they were indigenous to the soil to which they have been transferred. However, it will be better for both countries that the language of the two should continue as much the same as possible; and though all deliberate innovations are to be ignored, still it will be difficult, if their political and commercial activity continue to 'prö-gress' as it has hitherto, at least prior to the civil war, to expect that a complete identity will long continue. In those places where a foreign-speaking population has settled, there has been a kind of reciprocal isolation; and thus the proximity has in no wise endangered the English tongue, it never being overmatched, or degenerating into a patois embodying a mixture of any other language—but rather otherwise, they generally using a number of English words.

Comparatively few of these philological novelties, to which we refer as being peculiar in their application to the Yankees, have hitherto domesticated themselves on the British side of the Atlantic; and such as have are in a manner so suitable to their adopted purpose, that they are fast becoming common to everyday use. 'Go-ahead,' for instance—no doubt derived from the oft-reiterated cry of the captains of those immense river steamboats which are so common in their country, and noted also for the speed at which they sail—is expressive of a general characteristic of the people. This compound, together with that of 'posted-up' for 'well-informed,' is becoming of familiar use here. But there is one other word which bids fair to outlive these; indeed, it may be said to have already done so. It is a remarkably well-fitting word—the right thing in the right place, and hits the proper nail on the head with remarkable precision—a substantive which qualifies another in a very expressive manner. This is the word 'sensation,' which gives utterance to whatever is attractive to the prevalent spirit, or pandering to the taste of the mob. Thus we have sensation comic songs, sensation dramas, and sensation stories, with sensation pictures to illustrate them; and very popular these latter would seem to be, as a glance at any small bookseller's shop would evince, certainly exciting your wonder, if they don't make you buy. For the verb 'to think,' each section of the Union seems to have a rendering of its own: in New England—true Yankee-dom—it is 'guess;' about the Mason and Dixon line of States, it is 'expect;' New-Orleans and the Slave States, 'allow,' or 'reckon;' and to the West, they 'calculate'—four synonyms for a word they already use properly in print. With one section of the country a stone is a 'rock;' with another, a rock is a 'stone'—in either case always irrespective of bulk. A trace or mark of any kind is always a sign—Indian or Injun-sign, bear-sign, &c. In many parts 'creetur' is almost the only name for a horse. The Northern, when he is making a positive assertion, is 'as sartin as preaching;' the Southern is 'as shure as shooting.' Principle is frequently changed to 'princepel;' and 'do' comes before us as 'dew' or 'du.' When a man gets into a towering passion, he is said to be 'all wrath.' 'Clever' is often used for whatever is amiable or good; and 'smart' is used in our sense of the word clever. A 'doggery' is a grocery where spirits are sold by the 'small'—that is, by the glass. Whatever may be allied to political cowardice is stigmatised as 'doughfaceism.' When a man is said to be 'ugly,' it does not imply that his personal appearance is in any way faulty, but that he is cross-grained or ill-tempered. Our Old Lady of Threadneedle Street might consider it a personal affront and derogatory to her dignity, were her 'promises to pay' characterised as 'shaving-paper,' 'green-backs,' or 'shin-plasters,' as 'dollar-notes' not unfrequently are in the States. 'Skedaddled' (whence its origin would be hard to discover) is one of the newest coinage, and has of late been much applied to those 'who fight and run away.'

A genuine Yankee avoids, as far as possible, the sound of r, and ignores a final g; omits the h in such words as while and when, and frequently reduces au to a. The vowel a is sometimes given a close sound—as 'hev,' for have; at other times it is broad—as 'hawnsome,' for handsome. In general, also, his conversation is adorned with a peculiar monotonous drawl, which none but ears accustomed have the nerve to endure.

With regard to the 'let's liquor' propensities of the Yankees, none of their concoctions have found their way to this country, if we except the sherry-cobbler; and even that is not as yet very popular. 'Gin-slings,' 'egg-noggs,' 'cock-tails,' 'smashes,' 'bald-face whisky,' 'red-eye whisky,' 'whisky reverend'—this latter being synonymous with what our toppers here term 'neat'—and such like compounds, being never heard of here till lately, as there is now what is called an American bar in London, where any of their curiously-named 'drinks' may be had, from 'a flash of lightning' to 'a moonbeam.' In the Federal camps, wherever temperance is enforced, their ingenuity finds ways and means to procure the prohibited indulgence; and so we find it disguised in doubtful tin volumes of 'Common Prayer' and 'Sacred Poems.' Stimulating patent medicines, such as 'liniments,' 'embrocations'—to be taken internally!—and 'cough mixtures,' have been devised, and find ready sale—no doubt being found useful in promoting a certain degree of Dutch courage. Or should one give to a visitor the usual form of invitation, 'Let's have a drink,' he may not be quite prepared to sit down and discuss a bottle of 'Prepared Bear's Grease,' as the outside label purports the contents to be of the bottle which has been set before him.

The Americans, who speak much of our complicated system of titles, have still a craving after such like honours themselves; and although hereditary distinctions are dispensed with, the deficiency is amply compensated for in the abundance of governors, generals, majors, captains, judges, &c., who are as plentiful in the States as blackberries in England. Not content with this much, however, they take delight in conferring nicknames, in addition, on those who have achieved a certain degree of popularity—these being generally ironical, but seldom malicious. 'Gin'ral' Scott, of whom we have lately heard so much, had two different nicknames—one being Chippewa, given in consequence of a victory obtained by him at a place of that name; the other, 'Hasty Plate of Soup,' was derived from an expression in one of his hurriedly-written bulletins from the seat of war in Mexico. Gen. Houston got the name of San Jacinto from a similar source as that of Scott in the case of Chippewa; and General Taylor was popularly known as Old Rough and Ready. Daniel Webster received the cognomen of Big Black Dan. General Jackson's—not 'Stonewall' Jackson—inflexible disposition procured for him the designation of Old Hickory. So with the States themselves—each has a name apart altogether from its real one: New-York is the Empire or Excelsior State; Texas, the Lone Star State; Louisiana, the Creole State; Virginia, the Old Dominion; Kentucky, the Dark and Bloody Ground. The settlers in the States, too, possess names characteristic of the particular State to which they belong. Thus, a man from Florida is a Cowboy; one from Indiana, a Hoosier; from Ohio, a Buckeye; from Wisconsin a Badger; from Vermont, a Green Mountain Boy.

Each city may be said likewise to have a 'slang' of its own; but it is principally in the political world that this tendency to call people out of their proper names is most frequently shown. The party names and epithets they thus bestow on each other are sometimes amusing, but often degrading. There was at one time a section in Congress, whose leading tenet was termed the '54° 40' or fight' doctrine, referring to the disputed boundary-line between Canada and the States, which they insisted should run along the parallel; and they were popularly known as the '54° 40' or fight party.' The President, finding that the States' claim to this was untenable, anxiously sought to withdraw, and this was characterised as an attempt to 'crawl-fish'—that is, 'knock under,' or give in. The two great parties of Whigs and Democrats are divided and split up into ever so many minor branches, each of course possessing a distinctive name. There are amongst these—Hunker Democrats, Barnburners, Locofocos, Hocopocos, Softshells, Blue Lights, Know-nothings, Hardshell Hunkers, Wildcats, &c. Of the peculiar tenets of all these parties, little is satisfactorily known in this country. Some are liberal in their principles as can be; while others are highly conservative, and opposed to every kind of social and intellectual progress.

There is one department of the subject in which the Americans have not displayed anything like the usual ingenuity, and that is in the choice of names for their various cities. Turn to what part of their country you may, you find the same names repeated over and over again. The faded glory of ancient and classic names of cities of the Grecian and Roman empires are resuscitated, and conferred upon paltry townships—perhaps a dozen log cabins, as if they thought the success and splendour of the latter would atone for the lost renown of the former; and modern cities of note in the old world have received like honours. Of the first, there are Atticas, Spartas, Corinths, Troys, Romes, Carthages, by the dozen; while, of the second, we have Venices, Bombays, Calcuttas, Delhis, Cantons, Londons, Paris, Berlins, Edinburghs, Viennas, Glasgows, &c., in similar abundance. We find, also, Arcolass, Ledis, Marengos, and Waterloos. There are Swedens, Norways, Polands, Switzerlands, Caledonias, and Hibernias. A species of hero-worship assigns, also, the names of great men, and of heathen gods as well: as Jupiters, Mars, Ceres, Diana; and also Brutus, Cicero, Hannibal, Wellington, Washington. Scripture names have been extensively appropriated, and we have of these, several times repeated, Eden, Jerusalem, Jericho, Bethlehem, Lebanon, Goshen, Mount Carmel, and Mount Zion. There are, too, Harmony, Unity, Amity, and Friendship; Fairplay, and Fairdealing; Philanthropy, and Economy; Home, and Sweet Home. The following names of towns are copied verbatim from one of their official directories:—Number One, Number Two, Why Not, Wild Cat, Uncle Sam, Usquebaugh, Lucky Hit, Marrowbone, Oat Meal, Buggaboo, Liss, Little Muddy, Joe's Lick, Bug Swamp, Candle Sw. Hartshorn, Coffee, Haystack, Gentry, Half-mc, Dirt-town, and Henpeck. In some parts there is a reversion in favour of the old Indian names, which have an innate beauty of their own, and are preferable for various reasons. Names derived from Britain are, however, by far the most common; and it may be said that there is scarcely a town of any consequence north or south of the Borders, whose name has not been conferred upon some place on the other side of the Atlantic.

The newspaper press of the States is of great bulk, but little dignity—their editorials being often characterised by fine-spun 'hyperflutinated' bunkum—and present, from time to time, specimens of Yankee humour and philology which are thoroughly enjoyable; and closely allied with it not a little of that 'bouncing' 'tall-talk' which attaches to the gasconading stories of the French. They evidence occasionally a sharpness and keenness of wit quite characteristic of so shrewd a people, and just what might be expected from a country which abounds in all kinds of moral and physical wonders. Their newspaper columns are open to all and sundry. Long windy essays, sensational senatorial speeches, poetical effusions, and political disquisitions, from any who choose to send them, are all received; and the more libellous an article is, especially if treating of a person of local fame, the more willingly it is accepted. Reports of public meetings, &c., are full of self-laudation, bunkum, and brag, from a debate at a hotel-bar to a secretary's despatch. When an election is about to take place, the papers 'hoist the ticket' of their favourite nominee; and the bitterness and vituperation with which they attack the opposing candidate—entering into gross personality, and invading the sanctity of private life—lead often to personal collision. Their editors not unfrequently carry a good-sized walking-stick, and, in the coat pocket, one of those beautiful 'persuaders,' or 'bunch of sprouts,' manufactured by Colt; and is generally ready and willing to give every satisfaction for his articles—not to say that they will always flog or fight, but just 'pitch in like a thousand of bricks.' A great portion of their newspapers are more prejudicial than advantageous to healthy public morals and tastes. If their energies were rightly directed, and resulted from good principles, the press in America, from its great influence, would soon undo much of the mischief which has already followed from its vicious direction, and work a cure where there is now little else than social disorder.

We conclude with a quotation from a paragraph in a recent Boston paper, which shows in how curious a manner they sometimes use words. A correspondent, writing from the camp of Santa Rosa, detailing the attack upon Pensacola, describes the approach of a 'Secesh' steamer, and uses the following sentence in regard to her being eventually compelled to retreat:—'Any how, the tug turned tail, after being warned off in a formal manner by having several shot shoved at her, and put off for Pensacola like a scared shound.'

D.

A ROYAL VISIT TO BUTE.

It was in the summer of 1836, one bright morning, that the hereditary Sheriff of Bute, Ninian Stuart by name, stood at the window of Rothesay Castle surveying the fair scene before him. In front lay extended the beautiful bay now so much frequented, though at that period all but unknown to the bourgeois of Glasgow and Edinburgh; the distant mountains of Cowal appeared very grand in the clear atmosphere, while the ripple of the crystal water fell cheerfully on the gravel beach not far distant. How different then from now! No busy hum of an active population then sounded on the ear; no stately edifices and princely hotels then reared their heads to interrupt the view from the Castle windows; no quays and docks and graving-yards extended their dark fronts to occupy the shore; no cotton-mills, no cab-stands, no steamers, with their ever-sounding rush of vapour and throng of passengers; no villas stretching round the Ardbeg and Bogany shores, proclaiming the wealth and refinement of a thriving neighbourhood. But, notwithstanding that all these were wanting, still there were few of the inhabitants of the royal burgh who would have sung second to any community; the hereditary Sheriff kept baronial style within the walls of the Castle; and the town itself promised fair to become a very Novogorod for the population of the Western Highlands, and even aspired to a foreign trade; while, seaward, the burgh extended its boundaries from the Cloch to Pladda, so that the provost was admiral, as it were, of the Frith, and bailie of the Clyde. Besides all this, the lands of Bute, long held in yearly tenure from the sovereign, had, thirty years previously, been confirmed by King James IV. to the then occupiers of the soil; and the island was possessed by a body of freeholders having their titles direct from the Crown, each a 'Baron' within his own jurisdiction, and with every inducement to improve the land.

Such was the state of matters in Bute at the period mentioned. The Sheriff, as has been said, was standing at the window, calmly surveying the beautiful scene—cribbed and confined no doubt by those thick walls; and small scope was there for the free ingress of the balmy air at that tiny loophole. But his fine face reflected the sunshine without, and the strenth of his domicile being a source of no small pride to him, he cared not a fig for the inconveniences which modern improvers might find in the massive walls of the old Castle. At the time referred to, he had just finished the morning repast, and was calling aloud to his good wife Elizabeth—whom he had espoused from the family of Blair—to see what she might think of the lovely prospect, and pass a joke on the unusual serenity of the weather.

'Indeed now,' said he, 'ladye mine, I have business for an hour or two, to settle some bickerings between the lairds of Bransare and Kerremenoch; but, after that, what say you that we ride over hill to Kilquhattenmore before sundown?'

Right glad was she, worthy dame, to hear the proposal to visit their friends at Kingarth, and merrily went she to arrange for the day's proceedings. Before, however, she had gone many paces, her step-son made his appearance, causing the heavy door to creak on its massive hinges, and swing open wide against the solid wall. It was evident that something of importance had occurred. Young Stuart was breathless, and it was a few seconds before he could well express himself; but at last he broke out with the exclamation and intelligence—

'Here is Gallachane, come from the south end, with a report that a goodly number of ships are off the Garrochhead, sailing up between Margnahegliah and Kumbra-beg! He says that filled they are with great folks and men of war; and who knows but that the King himself be there, as the Red Lion flag looms through the haze?'

'Haye at you, there,' replied the Sheriff; 'that cannot surely be the case; you might have "knavin" that no King was there; he is in France e'en now, courting some foreign fair one. Did not Argyle tell me so, not many days ago, when Camys and I were down upon him at Dunhoun for a settlement anent the burning?'

'That may be so,' interposed Kinneburgh, Laird of Gallachane, who now made his appearance, and seconded young Stuart in his explanations; 'but a few hours will tell how the truth rests, unless there be more wind, and the ships carry on up the way to Dunbrittain.'

'How then saw you them?' interrogated the Sheriff.

'At early dawn,' replied the Laird, 'I was on the hill over St. Blain's when first the ships caught my eye—a goodly array, with a fair wind from off Broadwick. Nay now, thought I, here are goodly ships—

—ders for wine or velours, but warlike, and not seen every day in Kilbrandon waters. The Lairds of Kilwhinlick and Garrachty were on the hillside with me. I warrant before long you will see the fleet on your own side the hill; for the tide has turned, and, although the wind is away, if the ships get round Ascock Isle, and reach Bogany, you may rest assured they will not pass Rosey Bay this night.'

'Hey, then, good Bess!' quoth the Stuart, addressing his spouse, who had stood all this time in mute astonishment at the unexpected news, 'we must put off our excursion to Kilquhattenmore. See you well, good lass! to your maidens, that they be active, for this matter is something I thought not of; however, I'll see to it myself, and haste to the hill-top by the soonest path, to return forthwith.'

Thereupon the party sallied out from the Castle, and sped along the strand—the shore then being close to the Castle walls—the fortress at that time standing on a sort of isthmus, between the water of Rothsay on the one side and a small bay on the other—the space now occupied by the harbour and buildings adjoining being covered with water at high tide, which flowed beyond where Montague-street now is. Hurrying across the drawbridge, the Sheriff soon reached the hill-top beyond Crossmore; and sure enough there was seen a goodly flotilla, such as had not been on the waters of the Clyde since Haco, the Norwegian, came to claim the inner Hebrides as his own.

'Ay, marry is it,' quoth the Stuart. 'Sure enough I am much distressed to account for these great sails; but in case need be, let us call to arms and be ready whether for friend or enemy. Gallachane, you must go south, warn Scoulagmore, the M'Wererdys, the MacConochies, the Glasses, and all thereaway. I'll take in hand myself to call in the Stuarts, the Bannachtynes, and the Spences; no doubt the Jamiesons, M'Neils, and M'Caws, will be in town; let us have a rising, and meet in the Castle court before nightfall—all haste!'

'I'll warrant me,' said the Laird, 'that we will have a fair gathering; and unless the wind come out, we will see nought of the fleet in Rosey Bay till eventide.'

Thereupon the party broke up, each to warn their respective neighbours—young Stuart the most active of them all; and, as such a rising was not unusual, either for purposes of defence or aggression, there was no time lost in summoning together an assembly of the barons of Bute and their retainers—the Brandanni, who had shown such good fight in many a well-contested field.

Before long, the great ships were seen standing over towards the Cowal shore, when an air from the east decided their course; and the huge sails, hitherto flapping idly on the yards, expanded their great bellies to the wind, and the lofty hulls glided smoothly into the bay of Rothsay. Truly, indeed, there flaunted proudly the Royal flag, with the Red Lion of Scotland pre-eminent! And the gilt poops of the vessels showed that they were no ordinary craft; while the display of gorgeous trappings, silks, and lace, which adorned the goodly throng who appeared in sight over the rails, proved that it was something more than a trading expedition which brought the fleet together. By the afternoon, one after another of these large vessels dropped anchor, and swung heavily round to the wind; and soon thereafter the women were actively engaged bracing up the sails, and making all snug for the day, as if there was no intention of sailing again before nightfall. It seemed, however, that the whole party wore an aspect of sadness which was most unaccountable. No shouts such as might have been expected greeted the ear—no exclamations of joy or excitement;—all was quiet and dismal in the extreme. Before long, however, a boat came ashore, carrying a messenger to the Sheriff, announcing that the King James V. was on board the Royal ship, with his Court; and would, ere long, be on shore, to take up his apartments in the Castle. By the time the announcement arrived, the Sheriff was prepared for receiving his illustrious guests; and that right glad would he be and highly honoured in submitting himself to his liege lord, the King of Great Scotland.

By this time, all was bustle and activity as well within the Castle walls as without; the burghesses appeared in good display, and were in no degree behind their country friends, the 'Barons,' in showing loyalty to the Sovereign. Unfortunately, history is silent as to who were the leading personages in the burgh at the time; but, be that as it may, certain it is that the townsfolk thronged the shore, and occupied every available space within view of the landing-place, which was a little way up the creek which has been referred to; and, when the Royal barge came alongside the small stone jetty, there was waiting to receive the young King a full muster of the great folks of Bute—conspicuous among whom were the Sheriff himself and Jamieson the crowner. No sooner did the King and his followers stepped on shore, than the Stuart advanced, and, lifting his broad hat, in courtier fashion, saluted his Majesty on bended knee, welcoming him most heartily to the old home of his ancestors.

'Right good and trusty friend,' said the King; 'you no doubt little expected so many visitors; but I am indeed am I to find myself on shore with such an excellent councillor as my kinsman of Bute. These merry larks have played me a sorry prank, but by my troick, I shall hold a court of justice here; and if to-morrow morn sees not some traitor coward hang by the neck, my name is not Stuart.'

'Nay, now, my liege lord,' said Hamilton, who was close behind, and stepped on shore immediately after, 'take counsel well with our excellent friend the Sheriff of Bute; be not over hasty, for rest assured that we, your loyal followers, have acted for the best; and the "trappings" are not so much to blame in turning the ship's course hitherward.'

'Peace!' cried the King impatiently. 'Thy advice I have none of it. I must enforce the law; and unless there be such within the walls of this my Castle of Rothesay, I'll have you to Edinburgh, for I know what has been done, and will ere long try who is to have the power—you or I.'

Thus speaking, James moodily walked up the slight incline, passed through the massive doorway, and entered the Castle, scarcely deigning to acknowledge the hearty reception which was accorded to him on all sides; or to do more than give a slight inclination of the body, showing that he observed a bevy of fair Buteshire dames assembled in the Court, anxious to have a sight of his Majesty.

No sooner had he been seated within the timeworn halls of Rothesay, than he called again for the Stuart, and entered into a long narrative, explaining how his most cherished hopes had been frustrated by the machinations of the nobles who attended; how he had sent an embassy to France, which had concluded the terms of marriage with the Duke of Vendome's daughter; but that, unwilling to place entire confidence in the representations of Lord Erskine, or to rest satisfied with the 'vive-like picture' of the lady which he had received, he had resolved to proceed in person to have an interview with her; and, accordingly, had embarked with such of his courtiers as he thought could be depended upon; that, after great preparations, they had set out for the Continent, but that his retinue had played him false, inasmuch as, when the ships were within a day's sail of France, one night, when he was asleep, the course had been diverted without his authority; so that, when he awoke and came on deck in the morning, he observed that the high land of France, which he had seen the evening before, right ahead, was nowhere to be discovered; that, notwithstanding his most urgent commands, the ships had continued their voyage homewards; while Hamilton and the other attendants represented, in glowing language, the dangers and inconveniences of landing on the shores of France, so little prepared as they were for the gay scenes of courtly halls—the object of the expedition not having been explained before setting out. They further urged that it would be desirable to return to Scotland, in order that the King might make other arrangements, and appear in a state more befitting the occasion, and with retinue suitable to his dignity. He, however, did not fail to perceive that other motives lay concealed under these representations, and that this pretended anxiety for the preservation of his dignity was little better than a sham; that a strong party had been formed, who were anxious that he might make an alliance with some maiden nearer home. This, however, he had resolved not to do, and emphatically expressed his determination to carry out the original expedition.

The first burst of anger had passed over before the ships had reached the Clyde; and James, although wayward in the extreme, could not but perceive that the utmost degree of caution was necessary. It had been strongly urged, no doubt, that, even if a foreign marriage were decidedly resolved upon, he might aspire to a more dignified and powerful connexion than with the Duke of Vendome's daughter; that, indeed, he might look for a union with the Royal House of France; and, from the intercourse which had recently taken place, he could not fail to see that any advances in that quarter would be met with a cordial response. Such reflections, and the temperate counsels of the Sheriff, it is to be supposed gradually soothed the irritated monarch, and induced him at length to yield to the necessity of circumstances, and give himself up to the enjoyment of the beautiful climate and right pleasant company around him.

Soon, therefore, the halls of the old Castle of Rothesay rung with sounds of wassail and festivity—the King having yielded to the persuasion of his followers, and withdrawn the uncompromising threats of vengeance for the slight which had been put upon him. At no time a model character, but prone to give loose to those passions incident to a half-educated mind, the revulsion of feeling was quite remarkable; and it was with difficulty he could restrain himself from exhibiting his great joy in again finding himself on land, and among those whom, he fondly trusted, would counteract the evil influences of the courtiers inimical to the French expedition. The evening wore on, and the trusty Barons of Bute over and over again pledged to the health of their Sovereign, till at length night came, which terminated their demonstrations of loyalty. The following day, however, the King hunted in the forest; and in the evening the same festivities were renewed, with even greater display. Thus passed the time while the Court remained in Bute. Certainly it was a happy period for all, and chiefly for James himself, who testified a strong partiality for the island and its loyal inhabitants. But anxiety about his foreign courtship outran all other considerations, and it became necessary for the Royal party to leave, which they did by crossing over to the opposite shore at Toward, and taking horse to Stirling—the ships proceeding north about to Leith.

What follows is a matter of history: how the King remained at Stirling until a second fleet was equipped, with which he sailed to France, in company with a gallant band of the first nobility in the realm; and how, notwithstanding the most favourable intercourse with the Duke of Vendome and his daughter, the beautiful Marie de Bourbon, James changed his plans, and espoused Magdaline, the sickly daughter of the French king—a princess who died within two months after landing upon the shores of her adopted land, to the intense grief of all true-hearted Scotchmen. Melancholy and untimely as her fate was, it seems that both James' sweethearts were rather of the delicate school, as, according to Pitcottie's chronicles, 'The Duik of Vendonis dochter tuke sick displeasour at the king of Scotlandis marriage, that She deceast immediately thairafter quhairat the king of Scotland was highlie displeased, thinkand that he was the occasioun of that gentlevoman's death.' But for all that, he soon got quit of his 'displeasure,' as not long after he married Mary of Guise, who survived him, and became favourably known as Regent during part of the time her infant daughter, the unfortunate Mary, was a minor.

James the Fifth never forgot the pleasant sojourn which he had in Bute in 1536; and, in acknowledgment thereof, two years after, granted to the good old Sheriff, Ninian Stuart, and James his son and heir-apparent, and his other son Archibald, all the dues of the lands, lordship, and forest of Bute for five years, for payment, according to use and wont,* and that over and above the lands which the family then held in Bute—a goodly possession which, through many changes of circumstances, still pertains to their descendants, and has been vastly added to. The Sheriff did not long survive; as in 1540, when the King again visited Rothesay, the old man was gathered to his fathers, and his son was Sheriff in his stead, and welcomed his Sovereign to Bute. Instructions had been given to James Hamilton, Lord Evandale, to have certain repairs made on the old Castle, with the view of the Court paying an annual visit; but he appears to have betrayed his trust, as, among other charges brought against him, hastening to his downfall, was the keeping up of money given for improving the Castle of Rothesay. The King's untimely death, however, in 1542, occasioned the suspension of the alterations, and the old walls have not since then formed the residence of the Court. A proposal, however, has been mooted within these few weeks past, of renovating the grounds and forming pleasant walks for the good people of Rothesay—a very excellent design; and although the old building will not likely ever again be a Royal residence, still there is no reason why a locality having so many interesting associations, and from whence is derived the highest Scottish title of the heir to the British Crown, should not again attract a Royal visit.†

* 'Origines Parochiales,' vol. II. p. 228.

† It is but fair to state that the preceding sketch is only founded upon the well-known fact of the Royal visit of James V. to Bute, and that many of the details are not vouched by authorities.

TO LILY F.—

O DEAR little lady, with earnest eyes
Of wondering, beautiful blue—
I see you are struck with a sweet surprise
That we should be looking at you!

You know not the joy which a primrose bloom
Gives to a dweller in towns—
Bringing him visions of sea-dipped gloom,
And fragrance of breezy downs.

You know not the beauty of those blue eyes:
Or the sudden, electrical flush
Which laughingly up to your sweet face flies—
Too simple and pretty to blush.

Your father is one of those poets, my child,
Who were born in the woodlands to roam;
Yet why should he sigh after flow'rets wild,
With such a sweet Lily at home?

WILLIAM BLACK.

*. The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS. considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK
18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 31
Nepch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S

MISCELLANY

No. 18.]

SATURDAY, JAN. 31, 1863.

[PRICE 1s.]

SUB-EDITORIAL PHILOSOPHY.—No. II. ON SOME POPULAR JUGGERNAUTS.

IN my casual glances at the paper during my nocturnal attendance, I often find myself reading over—with a blissful unconsciousness of what it is all about—column after column of printed matter, which come under the general denomination of 'Ads;' whether relating to increasing sacrifices on the part of philanthropic linen-draper, robberies by confidential young men in the hat line, salvage stocks of shoes, bankrupt stocks of umbrellas and frying-pans, lists of subscriptions to distress funds, announcements of new banks with fabulous rates of interest, notices to parents and guardians or to parties about to purchase pigs, or to parties who have pigs and don't know how to feed them, or startling queries as to whether I powder my salt or sieve my mustard, or bruise my oats, or peel my potatoes, &c. &c. &c. I am addicted, occasionally, to reading through these announcements without having the power, if I were suddenly pulling myself up, of recollecting what was the subject of the last advertisement, or even the last line which I have just read. This I can only account for by the fact that tired Nature's sweet restorer is inclined, at that time, to commence the knitting operation in my ravelled sleeve of care, before the rip of that sleeve has reached to the cuff; which felicitous poetical expression, signifying that I am inclined to get sleepy before my work is done, brings me to the subject of my paper sooner than I anticipated. The allusion to the ravelled sleeve is borrowed from Macbeth's mouth—Macbeth suggests the Swan (of Avon)—the Swan suggests the legitimate drama—and the legitimate drama suggests that part of the advertisement column of the paper which treats of the amusements of the masses.

That the legitimate drama has been on the decrease for the last two or three years, a reference to the entertainments at the London theatres during that time will make palpable. That the legitimate drama is not dead yet, but only sleepeth, is apparent from the prospectus of the manager of the Lyceum Theatre. The thin end of the wedge has been re-inserted by a Frenchman! (The wedge had been withdrawn, a few months ago, by the retreat of Mr. Phelps from Sadler's Wells.) This chivalrous little Frenchman has armed himself with sword and spear; and, moved to pity at the forlorn condition of the British drama, has forgot the old rivalry existing between his country and our own, and come over to do battle with that shameless ogre—that stupid Juggernaut before which we have all been prostrating ourselves lately—that vile assinine compound of stage machinery, gaudy daubs of water scenes (with a high priest of the monster as a foreground piece, flinging himself down from a painted block of wood on to a bag of straw below)—that brainless bully and monopoliser of the metropolitan histrionic talent—to wit, Sensation Drama. Already has this detestable tyrant been stalking through the length and breadth of our beloved country, and forcing votaries to come and worship him by eating up everything else. But he is beginning to quake—dissensions and schisms among his high priests have commenced—and there is a good prospect of his altar being overthrown at last. The public are ashamed of the reverence which they have been paying to such a palpable impostor; and when the valiant Frenchman has opened his Temple of Janus, and proclaimed to the world that his campaign has commenced, we will swell his battle-cry, and pray that other temples may also be opened, to assist in demolishing the great painted, tinselled, wooden idol.

But there is another idol which it is hoped this Gallic hero will bring down—an idol which we have been bending before too long. Alas! too long;—for, as I recall it, behold a whole array of demon types range themselves in the white smoke before me into a ghostly paragraph, which I cut not long ago for insertion in the paper—a paragraph which, as I cut it, cut into my heart with shame and sorrow—a paragraph, recounting how a poor maimed-for-life woman had been released from the London Hospital, whither she had been borne, a few weeks before, from a late temple of this other Juggernaut—this Juggernaut of the rope—Blondinism and Leotardism, to wit. The case I refer to was that of the Female Blondin, who fell from the rope while performing her acrobatic feat at Highbury Barn, in the summer of last year. Had that woman been killed—and only a miracle saved her—the public who patronised the entertainment that evening would have been morally as guilty of murder as the proprietor of the gardens who allowed the exhibition to take place; and not only the public who patronised it that evening, but the public who have on any single occasion attended exhibitions of the same description. I congratulate the directors of the Crystal Palace on the escape of this woman. I congratulate the tens of thousands of visitors—aristocratic and plebeian, lay and clerical—to the Blondin feats on the escape of this woman. I congratulate the authorities, who have the power to put an end to these exhibitions, and who have not yet done it, on the escape of this woman; but I warn them that they are still risking the guilt of murder so long as it continues; and I would point out the latest instance of their escape from this guilt, by quoting the subjoined paragraph cut from the Liverpool Mercury:—

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—At Bell's Hippodrome, which is at present in Liverpool, Mr. Delevanti, Jan. was, on Monday night, going through 'Omar's extraordinary feat,' which consisted of some remarkable trapeze movements, executed upon a horizontal bar suspended within a few feet of the roof by a rope on either end. Soon after the performance commenced, one end of this horizontal bar broke away from its fastening, and precipitated Delevanti from the dizzy height into the arena below. In his fall, he grasped at a guide-rope suspended from the ceiling, and at others which were stretched across the building; and though in some degree they mitigated the violence of the fall, the young man came to the ground upon his right shoulder and side with a dreadful shock, and was immediately afterwards carried in a state of insensibility into the retiring-room, where it was found that he had sustained such serious injuries that his immediate removal to the Northern Hospital was deemed advisable. It was then ascertained that, in addition to the serious concussion of the whole frame, he had sustained a fracture of one thigh and of one or more ribs. We understand that the young man's life is not in danger.

I would also recall to the recollection of the authorities and of the public, the case of the unfortunate man who preceded Leotard at the Alhambra Music Hall, and who was killed while performing the trapeze feat—killed before thousands of spectators, many of whom, I dare say, have forgotten his fate, and have again and again applauded Leotard to the skies for risking the same death. Surely, for the credit of humanity, this Juggernaut will be speedily demolished, before more blood is spilt! Surely our children and grandchildren will not have to say—'Lo! these our fathers, with all their boasted humanity, were worse than the savages whom they endeavoured to civilise. The Hindoo priests, who urged the poor devotees to prostrate themselves before the ear of Juggernaut, were not so bad as they, because it was with the conscientious belief that human sacrifices would propitiate the deity, and ensure eternal felicity to the victim, that it was done! But the enlightened people of Great Britain, who read with a shudder of the gladiatorial combats of ancient Rome—who looked with horror at, and condemned, the Spanish and French bull-fights of their own period—were less wise and less enlightened in their generation. They flocked in thousands and tens of thousands to see, and urged on, with a rabid thirst for blood, those wretched acrobats. They did this one day, and attended church the next; they did it although warned repeatedly, by the death and mutilation of the poor victims, of the grievous sin of so doing.'

Another Juggernaut which has risen up lately is the Sensation Song Juggernaut, before which much valuable time is prostrated. The temples of this idol are shared in common with the Leotard Juggernaut, and attended by the same orders. This is a less sanguinary Juggernaut, in truth; but the evil effects of its influence are great.

A great controversy took place not long ago between the London theatrical managers and the proprietors of music halls, as to the right of the latter to have represented on their stages duologues or small farces, in which the characters appeared in costume. This, the managers said, was poaching upon their manor without a licence. The managers succeeded in getting it put down to a certain extent; but it had no effect in decreasing the popularity of the music halls. The principal attractions at those places are the sensation songs and the acrobatic feats. It is of the former that I should now wish to discourse, as it has occurred to me, on the perusal of some of those sensation songs, that neither the public who hear them, the musicians who exhibit them in their shop-windows, nor the piano-playing public, who buy them for binding in their collection of popular pieces, have the slightest idea of the nature of those songs; otherwise, I should hope, in the sake of morality, they would neither listen to them to be sung, consent to receive them on their shelves, or pollute their collections by giving them a place among respectable music. In a printed sheet which I have before me, I find a few of these songs which I recognise every day in music-shop windows, with highly-coloured frontispieces—in music-shop windows in the most fashionable thoroughfares. I will instance three, which are marked very prominently, 'copyright.' The first is entitled 'The Heroine,' which, on account of the extraordinary evolution of the artist who sings it, combined with a certain smart melody in the tune, has become one of the most popular songs of the day. Are the non-musical public, who admire it so much, aware that the words of the song are so silly and immoral that it is utterly impossible for me to quote even a single verse of it? The same may be said of 'Didn't she seem to like it?' which is also ticketed in the shop windows with a glaring frontispiece, representing the heroine, a gaudily-dressed Actress, and her victim, a silly-looking middle-aged man, grasping his umbrella mechanically, and opening his eyes wide, in astonishment at her desertion of him for the arm of another younger individual, foppishly dressed, and with a ring in his hand and glass in his eye. The background of the Great Globe in Leicester-square, with a glimpse of the Alhambra Music Hall, where, it is stated, the song is nightly sung with enthusiastic applause. The frontispiece bears the author's (?) name, with a grandiloquent dedication to one of his friends. The next is entitled 'There goes another Guy,' and is even more disgusting in words and plot than the second one, and only on a par with the first.

To me there is something egregiously absurd, ridiculous, and contemptible in the sight of two or three drunken people, three-fourths of them intoxicated, drinking, and smoking, and laughing, and enjoying such twaddle as this:—

I tried with every stick
To knock Sally on the nose,
Forgetting, quite, how quick
Both time and money goes.
I must have play'd for hours;
The man 'longside kept tally;
And said, 'I've more sticks left,
To shy at old Aunt Sally.'
Kind friends rally
Around me all you can;
And pity poor Aunt Sally,
Who has lost her fast young man.

'I'll trouble you for two pounds,'
Said the man to my surprise;
'For your young man's levanted!'
I opened both my eyes.
Having the money to pay,
I didn't stand shilly-shally,
But the boys called after me—
'How do you like Aunt Sally?'
Kind friends, &c.

I grant, kind friends, that there is a time to be sad and a time to be merry; but is this the way to make merry? Certainly not! you would answer, if you were sober. But you are not sober; you are dazzled by the lights; you have smoked too much; this is your fourth tumbler. A man at his fourth tumbler will laugh at anything. I can see Jenkins there at the second table. I know Jenkins is at times a sensible man (and I am addressing those of the audience who are supposed to have some common sense). I would say to Jenkins, 'Halloo, Jenkins! this is all very well, you know; but you ought not to be here. You have a wife and children, Jenkins. Your wife requires a new bonnet. The children, you know, are beginning to run slightly to seed. Mrs. J. wanted you to take little Timothy out for a walk last Sunday, after dinner, and you excused yourself on the ground that the roads were damp and his shoes too far gone. You said that you couldn't afford to get him a pair for another fortnight, when you would at the same time walk as far as Timms's with her, and select a bonnet. You have said that for the last two months, and always put the walk off because 'things were tight in the city.' You know, Jenkins, that the reason is solely because you have been spending too much money about the music halls. You wanted to treat Littleton, a customer of yours! That won't do, though. Littleton is not with you to-night, and you have been here three times this week. You must have some excitement, you say—something to keep up your spirits after the worry of business! That's all nonsense. You must acknowledge that you suffer trebly for the excitement on the Sundays, when you observe your wife and children bare and shabby in their dress. You are positively ashamed of their appearance, and begin to walk alone. When you go out in the morning, you tell your wife that you will be certain to be home early; and you scarcely ever keep your word. You come home in a cab as far as the end of the road; and you then fling away the half of the sixth fourpenny cigar which you have had that evening, swallow whole gusts of night air to purify your breath (seriously endangering your health), and walk up with an affectation of being weary and footsore; and then you sigh, when you get inside, and look as haggard as possible, with the remark—'Eh! dear, dear Annie! I've had such a day of worry! Money is so difficult to get in. I've been after a customer till now. How are the children?' And then you walk up stairs as straight as possible, where the innocents are sleeping, and pollute their apartment with an odour of rank tobacco and whisky toddy. You do this—you, that half-an-hour ago were stamping and shouting at 'The Cure,' or 'How's your poor feet?' or 'Aunt Sally!' For shame, Jenkins! You are a perpetual walking lie; you make the lineaments of your countenance lie; you make your legs lie, when you affect that fatigued, ambling gait along the lobby (you have been cabbing and 'bussing it all day); you make your arms lie, when you stretch them out with pretended fatigue, in order to blind poor Annie; you make your very nose to snore a lie, when you throw yourself upon your bed and go off at once into a pretended slumber! For shame! And then, when you are occasionally found out, you flare up, and take merit to yourself because you don't strike your wife! 'You never catch me drunk, Annie, do you? I don't come reeling home in a beastly state of intoxication, and lift my hand to you (Oh, you miserable coward, Jenkins!) like Barkins—do I, Annie? Answer me that. I don't require to be brought home in a cab every night like him, and then roll into the easy chair, and make you pull off my muddy boots—do I Annie? Of course not; I ain't such a beast. You make too much fuss, Annie; you do, upon my word!' You flare up when you say this, Jenkins, and really imagine yourself ill used. Oh, you selfish fellow! You don't strike your wife, I grant—you dare not do such a thing; but what shall I say about a man that takes merit to himself because he doesn't strike his wife? I leave this to the public. I don't like to venture an opinion, or I shall get too strong in my expressions. Think over it; think over how many times you could have bought that bonnet for your wife, and those clothes for the children, with the money spent about saloons and singing taverns; think how often you have bragged—yes, bragged about being able to stand three times the quantity of liquor it would take to make Barkins drunk! and how often you have, as you express it yourself, drunk Jones, Robinson, and Brown off their legs! Beware, Jenkins! give your conduct consideration. On my faith, thou art in a parlous state, Jenkins!

I see Tomkins there, also; but I excuse Tomkins, because, if Tomkins were to go home now, he would find his wife engaged reading the last sensation novel, the house in the most wretched disorder, and the children, dirty and squalid, fighting in the nursery under the charge of a tawdry maid-servant, also with a taste for the sensational in story-writing. Surely this is a great Juggernaut—perhaps the greatest—this Juggernaut of Sensation Story-writing. Surely the writers who waste their talents to pander to the taste of the public in this respect are much to blame—are, in a manner, the high priests of this idol before which so many bend prostrate. These writers attempt to excuse themselves on the grounds that it is the public taste, and that they must bow to the public taste or else starve. Who created this taste in the public? If they were to stop this ephemeral writing, the public would not cry out because it was lost to them—they would return to more wholesome diet. They will do so, assuredly, whether sensation story-writing is stopped or not. A wholesome reaction is certain to take place. The public will not always have a relish for mysterious murders, social conspiracies, intricate law-suits, or clandestine marriages. Such things pall upon the appetite. A criminal court, during the progress of a trial for murder, possesses a sort of morbid attraction for many persons; but to the reporters, advocates, and others connected with it professionally, the feeling is more that of disgust. The case is analogous. The public will assuredly get disgusted with sensation accounts of murders and conspiracies. The public who read this class of novels, read them, not for any particular beauty in the writing, but solely for the elucidation of the mystery which commences in the first chapter; and which is rendered more or less tantalising in every succeeding one, according to the constructive skill of the writer. There are no great truths to be derived from the perusal of such books—no great originality of character—no wit, humour, or pathos; such are not aimed at. The reader does not linger fondly over some favourite character; or mark some passage which strikes him as being particularly good—which suggests some train of reflection tending to throw a new light on any social question. No. Characters, description—everything is subsidiary to the plot. If good passages did exist, they would be passed over in the intense excitement to reach the grand finale—the trickery of the story—its shallowness: only discovered when the last chapter is reached. Surely the public are very easily gulled who rush through three volumes of such writing, merely for the purpose of finding who was the heroine's father—the result of a commonplace law-suit; or whether the plebeian villain who clandestinely married the heroine, and then disappeared mysteriously, will turn up again, to blast her future prospects, or be silent for ever; or whether the outwardly angelic heroine has all along been nursing a serpent in her breast, in the shape of conscience, and will confess, at the second last chapter, that she is the murderess. Several friends have assured me that, with a wonderful self-denial (for which they take great credit), they have refrained from buying those novels, when they were appearing in a periodical form, solely for the purpose of enjoying the luxury of reading them through in a night! The charm of these sensation novels is gone when the last chapter has been read. The charm is curiosity, than which no greater power exists till it is satisfied. The charm of a novel by Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, or Bulwer Lytton, is not gone when we have read it through. We are, it is true, interested in the plot; but it is not of such intense and exciting interest that we skim over the book with bated breath, keeping only to the mere chain of the story, and casting it aside for ever when the last chapter has been reached—casting aside, also, as much as possible, all recollection of the characters and incidents, as cumbering our brain. The plots of stories by those authors are merely pegs on which to hang characters, incidents, descriptions, bits of philosophy, pathos, pure wit, and, humour, which we can read again and again—read slowly, luxuriously, bit by bit, and with a tendency to read aloud to our wives, mothers, fathers, brothers, friends; with a tendency, also, to illustrate our conversation with scraps from them, and emphasize our written remarks by referring to some of these characters or sayings—characters and sayings which will remain green in the memory for ever. Who is to create other characters for us? Who is to delight us with humour, pathos, philosophy? A new school of writers is rising up; but if they lay all their talents prostrate before this Juggernaut Sensation, it will be sad indeed for the reading public, and for their own chances of living in generations to come, among the English class of the nineteenth century.

Another Juggernaut, which — but stay, the gray-eyed morn smiles on the frowning night. The printer, assistant, like a drunkard, reels in with a flabby sheet, which I look over and hand back. The ravel has reached to the cuffs. Four Juggernauts will lie heavy on my soul this morning, and retard the knitting operation as much as they conveniently can. When the sun has advanced his burning eye this day to cheer, I shall be here again at the stern behest of another Juggernaut—mighty, potent, before which Kings, Emperors, Presidents, and Sub-Editors alike bend and will bend to the end of time—the Juggernaut of the Press.

R. L. G.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. VIII.

THERE is another Gaelic song of wedded life, differing much both from 'Mairi Bhan Og' and 'The Braigan Binneach.' It is the wild wail of an unhappy woman, whose friends had forced her to marry against her inclination; or who had allowed herself to be more influenced by false sense and worldly policy, than she found afterwards consistent with the tranquillity of a powerfully sensitive heart. There is a good moral, not only in this song and 'Mairi Bhan Og,' but even in 'The Braigan Binneach.' In the last, we are amused at the ridiculous disappointment of a stupidly ambitious woman, who was little better than a fool before harsh experience schooled her into repentance. Of her class, are those ladies whose miserable weakness is still the sport and prey of the needy swaggers, who pass themselves off for Counts and great men in their own country. 'Mairi Bhan Og,' again, is the beautiful emanation of a pure and confiding nature, gratified more than could be told with its own soft affection and its sweet return. It displays the enviable condition of a well-regulated mind, content with what it possesses—not over-fearful to have less, nor over-greedy to get more.

The third song tells of that intensest misery, which is perhaps felt among us more frequently than it is spoken; and which oftener, it may be, than either, lurks darkly, like an inexorable Fate, where it is never acknowledged, even in the shape of a distinct feeling, by the dull and dreary heart that counts for years the heavy hours with sad and listless beatings. All marriages of interest, by whomsoever planned, cannot turn out well. Some of the parties in them have surely reason to sing, with this miserable Highland woman:—

HOOG ORIN, O!

I am married,
Hoog Orin, O!
Married! worried!
Hoog Orin, O!
They took me from my own lover—
Gave me to the western drover.
Where I hated
I am mated,
Hoog Orin, O!
Wife ill-fated.
I am married—I am worried,
Hoog Orin, O!
Mated! married! wearied! worried!
Hoog Orin, O!

They gave me to the clumsy drover—
Like my father, not my lover.

I am dreary
In his dwelling!
Hoog Orin, O!

I am weary
Of the knelling
Of my heavy heart!
Hoog Orin, O!
Of the tears for ever swelling
From this heavy heart—
Sadly swelling, faintly knelling—
O my soul! depart—
Leave this strife
With weary life!

Hoog Orin, O!
Ill-fated wife.
I am married—I am worried,
Hoog Orin, O!
I am mated where I hated,
Hoog Orin, O!
Mated! married! wearied! worried!
Hoog Orin, O!

Equally unhappy with the ill-fated wife of 'Hoog Orin, O!' was the unmarried heroine of the next song. Her lover was long absent. She looked out for him, but she saw him not. She watched for him, but he came not. Hope deferred made her heart 'Sick! sick! sick!'—forcing the sad conviction on her that she was wilfully neglected; and she became 'awearry, awearry,' and even thought he 'wished her dead.'

Sick! sick! sick!
Oh the pain! oh the gloom!
He has no wish to save me
From the cold tomb.
Love! love! love!
The fair cheek, the dark hair,
The promise forgotten;
'Twill go with me there.
False! false! false!
Oh youth is false for ever;
He loves far more than living me
The lifeless heather.

The hunting field,
The greenwood tree,
The trout, the running deer, he loves
Far more than me.

He loves—loves—loves
To stalk the frighten'd doe;
He never heeds the pain he gives,
His skill to show.

Oh the dark blue eye—
A flower wet with dew;
Oh the fair false face—
Too sweet to view.

Fare thee well—well—well!
Though thou'st forsaken me;
May every good thing follow—
Follow—follow thee!

A very sensible literary lady, commenting on the conduct of Mariana in 'The Moated Grange,' who was 'a-weary, a-weary,' and wished that she was dead, said that it would have been better for Mariana to have minded her household duties, and given over singing. And so, perhaps, it would; and better for our unfortunate Highland singers, too. It is easy, however, for the kettle on the hob to tell the kettle on the fire not to boil. When their souls were pierced through with bitter sorrows, and their poor hearts were full and overflowing, how were those tuneful females to accommodate themselves to the sedate proprieties of their cool and undisturbed sisters, whose feelings had perhaps never in their life given them much trouble in the grand concern of looking after themselves? Nothing more, perhaps, remained for the tender lyrists than to speak or die; or, it may be, speak and die. Their language betrays no guilt, at least. If anything was wrong in them, it was merely an excess of feeling—neither a great nor a common fault. Whatever cool-headed ladies may think of these poor sufferers,—of our sex, at all events, it may be said, that those of us who do not value a true and unaffected sensibility more than any amount of practical good sense in a woman—who do not intuitively prefer a Mary to a Martha, in fact—will possess but little sensibility, or sense either, themselves.

The title of the next song is

CUMHA MAIGHDINN—A MAIDEN'S LAMENT.

My heart is broken! broken!
What was bright in it is bleak.
Its joys are gone, and gone away
This many and many a week.
They are gone away with him
Who was fairest of us all—
Fairest, whitest, whiter
Than the snow-flakes as they fall!

He was manly; he was nobly brave;
He was first in every need.
I loved him, and I loved him not
In word, but all in deed.
Too well, too well I loved him;
For now I can but mourn—
I mourn and waste my heart away,
And pine till he return.

My heart is like a lump of lead—
I walk, but feel a stone;
I eat not, drink not with the youths;
I always feel alone.
My soul is black with sorrow;
Why should I lay it bare,
Or tell 'tis he who left last week
That causes all this care.

When he rein'd up a prancing steed,
How waver'd his curly hair!
How confident he look'd and proud!
How manly was his air!
Not like a boy of woman
Did he discourse with men—
His words were choice and pretty.
As if written with a pen.

He was to me a gem—a gem
Like the bud the brier wears;
He was as choice as is the tree
Bent with the fruit it bears.
And I was willing secretly
To wed—wed him alone:
He should have laid me, ere he left,
Beneath the cold grave-stone!

Ah me! 'tis little wonder
I grieve that he's away,
When I think how we two loved and lived
For many and many a day.
The sweet, sweet love we cherish'd—
The wandering alone—
Oh the chagrin, if he has cross'd the sea!
Oh my weary, weary moan!

The number of boatmen, fishers, and half-sailors in the Western Islands, is out of all proportion to the rest of the inhabitants; especially on the margin of the thousand creeks and inlets and arms of the sea that calmly nestle in the land. When night is falling on the long and winding loch that leads to a murmuring fishing village, the heavy sound of oars is heard incessantly along the shores; or in the summer twilight, when the wind is favourable, many and many sailing-boats may be seen gliding silently, as ghosts, over the smooth, bill-sheltered floor of the fresh western sea-way. Then the far-carrying sound of voices comes to the wanderer on the bank, and reminds him, as he looks into the dim gloaming where they issue, of the mysterious paths that are on the great ocean. Sometimes wild storms overtake the fisher, and anxious hearts wait for him at his home. Sometimes a fierce mountain squall leaps like a wild beast upon him as he passes by in his careless security, and drives him far away from his warm and blazing hearth; or, as I have known more than once to happen, overturns his frail bark and sinks him in the hissing, tumbling waters. Where the fishers have large boats, they occasionally go a great distance, and remain for days and weeks away. Very frequently they take a voyage or two to sea, and all of them are at least half, and some of them thorough-bred, sailors. The fishing population and the agricultural population differ a good deal in their dress, and a little even in their appearance; of course their associations are dissimilar. The fishermen are a very much respected class, however, and no doubt they think a good deal of themselves. It is one of them the following very popular song treats. The 'Man of the Boat' had gone over the sea, and was long never to return. He had left some one behind him, who mourned his absence greatly.

THE BOATMAN.

How often haunting the highest hill-top,
I scan the ocean thy sail to see.
Wilt come to-night, love? Wilt come to-morrow?
Or ever come, love! to comfort me?

My soul is weary; my heart is breaking;
With frequent teardrops mine eyes o'erflow.
Wilt come to-night, love? May I expect thee?
Or, sighing sorely, the door put to?

I question fondly thy friends, and ask them
Where last they saw thee? where thou art now?
But each one, jeering, some answer gives me
That sends me homeward with burning brow.

They call thee Fickle! they call thee False one!
And seek to change me; but all in vain.
No; thou'rt my dream yet throughout the dark night;
And every morn yet I watch the main,

Do not those remember the promise made me—
The tartan plaidie—the silken gown—
The ring of gold with thy hair and portrait?
That gown and ring now I'll never own.

For not a hamlet—too well I know it—
Where you go wandering, or stay awhile,
But all its old folk you win with talking,
And charm its maidens with song and smile.

And yet I dare not deny I love thee;
And not a month, oh nor yet a year,
But thee for ever, since first in childhood
I strol'd beside thee, and thought thee dear.

My friends they warn me, and oft advise me
To let thy false vows forgotten be:
As vain their counsel, as if they order'd
Yon little streamlet roll back the sea.

Here I wander a tearful mourner—
A stricken cygnet, with music-moan,
That sings her dirge-note by grassy fountain,
When, all forsaken, she dies alone!

Maltri went to the moor to hunt, and falling over a wire killed. The following verses, as if by a flash of lightning in a dark night, give us a vivid glimpse of the emotion and grief which attended the accident. The lines are very slight and sketchy; but they serve their end better, perhaps, than many more elaborate things.

There's a sound on the hill,
Not of joy but of ailing;
Dark-hair'd women mourn—
Beat their hands, with loud wailing.

They cry out, Ocho!
For the young Monaltri,
Who went to the hill,
But home came not he.

Without snood, without plaid,
Katrina's gone roaming.
O Katrina, my dear!
Homeward be coming.

Och! hear, on the Castle
Yon pretty bird singing!
"Snoodless and plaidless,
Her hands she is wringing."

This song reminds one a little of 'Bonnie George Campbell'. It treats of a similar misfortune; is equally rapid in its narration, and catches as successfully the right tone in which to deal with its kindred sorrow. If it falls short, in some other respects, of the rare masterpiece it resembles, that need not surprise us, for 'Bonnie George Campbell' is as much of a sad tale and a wild lamenting in a very small compass as probably any song whatever.

THOMAS PATTISON.

ROUND A TUFT OF MOSS.

I was reading Keats, just at the line 'There was a awful rainbow once in heaven,' when that patch of green moss met my eye. In a pastoral luxuriance like that of the golden age, I was stretched under the shade of leaves not altogether sunbeam proof; for it let through little silver butterfly-like patches of light to flick the grass. The world seemed, indeed—the world the poet painted—dressed in auroral radiance, young and fresh and ever beautiful, full of flowers, lush grass, golden fruitage, and golden moss as soft as sleep. Keats' earth is a habitation fit for the gods. An eternal halcyon day broods over it; and beauty, which is truth, is ever singing divine songs, and bathing its slopes in prophetic lustre.

Books, generally, are things unnecessary in the wood; for there is always, to those that think and see and hear, much to see and hear and think on. There are sweet sounds, with sweeter echoes innumerable, wonderful effects of light and shade, the bustle of insects, the exuberant animation of the birds; there are sweet delicate flowers, that nod and tremble and seem to talk to each other beneath the trees; and how easy to fancy what they say? There is a spirit of happiness in every leaf that dances to its own music, and in every wind that stirs—an unseen presence around—music, life-beauty, everywhere. But, then, how a book can be enjoyed in the wood! The world is distant—the harassing, perplexing, struggling world. A truce is asked in the battle of life—the armour is unbuckled—the sword, the spear, and the shield are laid idle in the tent—and the noise of the conflict is forgotten. The book is 'little worth if it is not here the passport to another world—its own peculiar world—and opens wide the cage door of the mind.

One is frequently, however, diverted from reading. A bird's song, the flutter of leaves, a flower, or blade of grass, leads to unheard of wanderings. Or a spider attracts attention by scampering across the page on stilted legs, and moving off as quickly as possible, as if he knew it was no place for him. The 'long-legged spinner' is often followed by a beetle in armour of malachite—like 'a mailed angel on a battle-day'—who walks at his ease athwart the lines of print, surveys them leisurely, and then drops among the grass. Such a beetle peregrinated the open pages of Lamia, first straight athwart the leaf, then along the medial line, next he ran along the edge, doubled the corner, once more across the black and white, and on to a blade of grass that threw a long linear shadow across the page. Here he paused, and seemed lost for a moment in thought; for he appeared, like Wordsworth's horse, to be a thinker. He ascended and descended the grass blade, and was soon lost in the herbage beneath. But was I to lose sight of him thus? His movements had become strangely interesting to me, and I could not afford to let him go so soon. In solitude it is wonderful how the little things of creation affect the heart. We all know the stories of the prisoner in the Bastille, and his affection for a spider; and the traveller in the African deserts taking heart at the sight of a green tuft of moss. The brave man, spent with toil and frequent battling, has grasped his sword more firmly, and clothed himself in renewed vigour, from observing the patient enterprise of an insect. Great men have been observed concentrated on the balancing of a straw; others in watching with breathless interest the fate of a paper boat upon a stream. I often fancy these self-forgetting moments are among the best in our life. We are not always the wisest or truest to ourselves, when we most seem or when we most think so. They are to be pitied who boast they have no time to spare for letting a moment pass untasked—no time to spare to allow the fancy a roving commission through the heights above and the deeps beneath, or to feel a self-forgetfulness sweeter than Nature's sweet restorer—balmy sleep.

The beetle had many ups and downs in his progress; but I observed he struggled stoutly on in one direction—a most persevering beetle. He had a great heart, that little beetle: he set bravely to overcome difficulties, and bravely he overcame them. On surmounting a somewhat difficult object, you could observe a certain marked elation in his air. Once or twice, on such occasions, he raised up his little shining elytra, that ran into shades of purple and golden green, and spread out his glittering wings to the sunlight, proud as a conqueror. I blessed the little beetle from my heart. I believe, were the incidents of a beetle's life chronicled, there would be many things related more fame-worthy than the deeds of Alexander.

At length a period came to his wanderings, and I found that he had ensconced himself in a tuft of moss, perfectly happy. Perhaps there was a family of young hungry crescent beetles awaiting his coming anxiously—eyes that would look brighter when he came, hearts that would beat quicker, and little antennæ quiver with soft emotion. Perfectly right, my entomological friend; we had forgotten there are no crescent beetles. Paterfamilias Beetle has not the trouble of filling a dozen clamorous mouths; for when a beetle sees the light as a beetle he is already full-fledged, full-sized, and able-bodied—capable of providing for himself, and of making grand excursions to the summit of grassy culms and flower-stalks, in blessed ignorance all his days of the troubles attendant on juvenility and hobbledehoyhood. He awakes one fine morning in a snug chamber under the earth, and finds himself fully equipped for a sojourn above ground, and thereto he instinctively pushes forward to taste the sweets of beetle-life. A few inches under ground what wondrous changes are going on! Here is the green-room and tiring-room of creation. It is not necessary for a spirit-guide, as in the ever-remembered tales of youth, to lead us down to earth's centre to find ourselves in Wonderland: let him but introduce us to the immediately sub-superficial realms of the earth, and he can amaze us sufficiently. There are roots ever extending their delicate fibrillæ, and from the black soil, in patient, silent ministering, sending life to the branches in air; bulbs filling their coated cells with leaf and flower for the rejuvenescence of the spring and the demands of summer; cradled seeds dreaming of sunshine, or germ-leaves bursting their sheaths and with soft fingers feeling for the light; creeping things that men loathe, slumbering in aurelian folds after a gourmand's life among the green things of earth, until the wand of the Great Magician touches them, and they slough themselves of their coverings and meet the glad resurrection winged creatures of light.

The moss-tuft was a paradise to our beetle—a paradise where no stern-browed angel guarded forbidden joys, where no black-hearted angel tempted him to death—it was all his and no other's; and Oberon could not desire a daintier paradise. How can I describe it, now that the bright summer day is gone, and remembrance alone remains? for, while I write, with slippered foot beside the fire, November is trampling the leaves in the mire, and the fern grows pale in the valley as winter stares it in the face. How can I describe it? or why need I describe it? It was simply a patch of moss—what everybody knows—that can be seen any day, and almost anywhere. Thank Heaven! its mercuries are not in one place, or in stinted measure growing. There is on all sides, and upon the commonest things, a prodigality of beauty lavished; and the mosses—deep-tinted, many-hued, with filaments of amber and ruby flowers—are little gardens that never fade nor grow dim with years. Meek and lowly, they do their work in their humble sphere, with a bright smiling face unfeignedly. Little daughters of the earth, they watch over her tenderly and continually. Would that we all, when the Master comes, might be able to give in an account of duty as faithfully performed as can these fragile lovely organisms!

What do we know of them? If the facts be stripped of their technicalities and Greek, and show themselves in currently available knowledge, they will appear few and meagre enough. The fruits of many years' study of hard-working naturalists might be summed up in a few sentences.

They spring up around us on every hand, ripening their seeds at all seasons; yet we know not whence they come. It seems as if a happy fortuitous course of atoms called them into existence; or, since the theory of spontaneous generation is not found to be tenable—as if the air kissed the brown cart until it became instinct with life and clothed itself in beauty—doubtless, the winds are impregnated with the imperceptibly minute spores, and thus scatter these germs far and wide. They were long considered from want of observation, to be destitute of seed; but this is easily disproved, by sowing the spores found in the capsules. The result will be a crop of mosses similar to that from which the seeds are taken.

Although small—and chiefly on account of their smallness—they have given a great deal of work to botanists to distinguish their parts; and hasty observers have rushed to generalizations regarding them that more extensive views showed to be wrong. Nature is continually breaking through our generalizations—opinionum commenta delet dies. We cannot lay the line and compass to her doings, or map her several regions; and doctors have strangely disagreed regarding the fructification of the mosses—a subject that yet remains in the chapter, of things little known.

Dillenius, about the middle of the eighteenth century, was among the first to consider mosses as possessed of barren and fertile flowers; but he mistook the one for the other, as did also Linnaeus, who adopted his opinions. Hill, by sowing the grains found in the so-called barren flowers of Linneus, and rearing a crop of mosses from them, crushed the error for ever. But he erred in considering all mosses to be hermaphrodite, having the sexes united in one flower. Others regarded the whole as a myth, when Hedwig appeared, and, after years of patient research and experiment, described the flower and the functions of its several parts—the barren flowers being the buds or disks at the extremity of the branch; the fertile, those terminated by the filament and capsule. Living botanists do not altogether agree with him in the supposed functions of the parts of the flower; but he deserves praise for the brave philosophical way in which he has accomplished his work. According to him, mosses are hermaphrodite, having the sexes combined in the same flower; others are monœcious, having the sexes separate in the same plant; and others diœcious, the sexes separate, on different individuals. To these, we may add some aspermous ones, as several of the genus Hypnum, which propagate by shoots and buds. There are at least 445 species of mosses indigenous to the British Isles. Into how many variations Nature, the artist bold, can mould a single type!

The more we know of these the more we love them—controversy turning the one-sided old piece of nonsense—'Familiarity breeds contempt.' To me they are a perpetual source of wonder. But wonder is everywhere. Everything around us is fearfully and wonderfully made. From the poor beetle that we tread upon, to the man with thoughts wandering through eternity—from the grass blade and tuft of moss and lichen-cell up to the mammoth tree of a thousand years—from the pebble to the mountain—from the dewdrop to the sun-world, a fearful wonder meets them all. We look upon the surfaces of things—we compare, and classify, and experiment—we weigh the sun, measure the earth and stars, shake hands with the glittering lightnings, play in the painted clouds;—and yet we have only extended our horizon of wonder! Else what were Science worth? Who would care for a world of which he could answer very how, and what, and where, and whence, and when, and why that could be asked regarding it? 'Wonder,' says Bacon, 'is broken knowledge.' Fools, then, to Infinity, wonder shall never cease; for in this boundless universe, though the ever-progressive soul of man shall reap ever-golden harvests of knowledge, when shall the sphere be complete? When Infinity ends, when we are able to comprehend latitude, then and there shall wonder end.

REUBEN K.

PORTRAITS IN OUTLINE.

CHAPTER I.—HEROES.

LESS than thirty years ago, there came to London two poor lads—a clerk and a mechanic. They came from one of the central counties of Scotland; and, like most of the thistle-bearded Northmen (albeit these youths were still unbearded), they were great visions of conquest, of which they could only profitably and safely delivered in the fat-soiled, partial-climated south. But, unlike a great many heroes of romance, especially those of the Whittington type, they did not expect to find the streets paved with slabs of gold. A certain sobriety of hope and expectation, combined with an incalculable capacity for work, based on a firm half-concealed substratum of self-reliance, were leading features in the character of especially one of these young-footed adventurers—as they are in those of a large number of their countrymen. I have been told, and I begin to believe the statement, that a Scotchman's dreams, if such they can be called, have a marvellous substantiality in their composition. They walk on end, casting a shadow, and seem to be endowed with the power of fulfilling themselves to any extent, and with a sort of mathematical certainty. Another characteristic of these invaders lies in the vulgar power they possess of living like beggars while working out their greatest and most cherished schemes. One could almost fancy that frugality was their god, and extravagance their devil.

Only one of these youths, however, came fully up to the true Caledonian standard. Peter Rowantree, the clerk, was nearly perfect, excepting in one very serious respect.

Peter was the son of excellent parents, who had early trained him to habits of cleanliness, industry, frugality, and godliness. His father, who had been the wheelwright of Irondale, the birth-place of both my heroes, was a Calvinist of the Calvinistic stamp—none of your make-believes. He was a man of principle, and, therefore, a man of power. His voice was heard among the elders, in the Deacons' Court, sometimes in the Presbytery, and, on two celebrated occasions, in the General Assembly itself. With, perhaps, the exception of his marriage, these two Assembly exhibitions were the grandest epochs in Elder Rowantree's long and spotless career. He bequeathed the glory of them to his son Peter, whom he had reared according to a special ideal of his own—an ideal which moved on the most unswerving lines of rectitude. It was the opinion of his friends that, as a disciplinarian, Elder Rowantree was unexcelled within the bounds of his parish; although other people maintained that his style was a degree over rigid, and was based too much on principles of repression.

Peter's mother was also a Calvinist; but in her the acrid blood and granitic severity of her husband met with more genial currents, and manners more supple and agreeable; so that the domestic skies of the Rowantrees, though habitually sobered by the gravity of the Elder, were considerably relieved by the moonlike presence of his tender-breasted and excellent spouse. If there was one weakness in Elspeth Rowantree's character, it seemed in the Elder's eyes to consist in her emphatic love of good dress. Her taste was high and pure; but, according to the Calvinistic simplicity of her husband's ideas, any particular patronage of the mantuamaker or milliner savoured too much of the carnal and the vain. He maintained that the mind should restrain the desires of the eye—which usually acted as the subtle diplomatist of a foolish heart in its attainment of illegitimate ends. Elspeth, being a good wife, was willing at all times to learn wisdom at the feet of her husband; but in this matter of dress, her natural desire and good taste, although painfully circum-scribed, were never wholly extinguished. Again and again, would Nature break out in open rebellion against the rigidity and tight-lacedness of a system which regarded colour and ornament as agents of the darker powers. But the Elder was master of his own house, and consequently these insurgent ebullitions of his wife were uniformly preached down. The good lady was, in the end, always compelled to hoist the Calvinistic colours—sober, solid, and solemn; so that Elder Rowantree ruled, sovereign at home, till the Reaper came, and lopped every bough and berry from his unbending trunk. He was a man whom Death alone could conquer. Respected he lived, and lamented he died; and we record with admiration and wonder the fact, that his tombstone was undisturbed by a single chiselled lie. The Elder's memory left no blot upon the chastity of the sculptor's fingers.

But as the fool is not wholly incapable of wisdom, so neither is the wise man wholly incapable of folly. He is a wise man, it is said, who knows his own father; yet many a man has known his father, and been foolish enough after all—in truth, been not one whit the wiser for his knowledge. Knowledge can never make a fool wise; it can only make a wise man wiser. But the wisest men are foolish in some point; and the foolish point in Elder Rowantree's character lay in the system of repression which he practised towards his wife's innocent and legitimate tastes. He ought to have known that desires or tendencies which are forcibly suppressed, or denied just expression, in one generation, almost inevitably break out in the next, or third following, with irrepressible intensity. Hence it was that the very natural desire to be tastefully and attractively dressed, which he denied satisfaction in the character of his wife, appeared with redoubled force, and also with an obliquity, in the character of his only son, Peter, and made him a cocomb of the first water.

This was the one imperfection in Peter Rowantree's character. In him his mother's chains were flung indignantly aside; and he revelled in such a mass of broad cloth, flowered vests, speckless boots, studded shirts, hair-brushes, tooth-brushes, sinecure razors, soaps, and scents, and miscellaneous jewellery, as would have struck his father, the Elder, dumb with a horror of coming judgment. A most serious imperfection, indeed! When a Scotchman's body becomes, in a millinery and tailoring sense, an object of adoration to himself—the Devil, or worse, is sure to be in it. Yet Peter was an excellent clerk, so far as ability and industry went; had a large share of ambition of a kind; and therefore was it that he gave up a good situation in his own country for one in London, which seemed to offer a better chance of making a spring into the woolstack of some nebulous little empire which began to swim into prophetic ken.

Peter's fellow-adventurer, the mechanic, was moulded of an entirely different metal from Peter. Allan Gray was what might be called a model Scotchman—quiet, confident, shrewd; with less hope than faith; and with a more unshakable belief in the logic of well-planned and sustained action than in the rhetoric of sudden luck or splendid accident. With both, the possibility of success seemed large; but Allan more amply, if not alone, possessed the power of changing the possible into the probable. Peter's visions were high, but appeared to be hung in the air; while the dreams of Allan, although not less lofty, seemed to be fixed on a series of solid ascending pillars. Peter darted into the heaven of his great desire on wings; Allan climbed wearily up to his heaven on stairs of granite. Had both these Scotchmen been sent to Australia during the gold or money mania, Peter Rowantree, on his arrival, would have darted off to the diggings before breakfast; while Allan Gray, after looking to his inner fortifications, would have sat quietly down, and, in his mind, challenged the whole southern empire, until he had found, among its brilliant phenomenal shadows, the solid and unshifting soil wherein to plant the acorn of his future oak. It is probable that, while Peter was vainly hunting his great spectral nugget, Allan would have stocked a farm, planned a harbour, or founded a city.

These are mere hints of portraiture; but may serve, perhaps, to indicate the peculiar character possible to each youth in the fuller development of time and experience. Peter Rowantree was one of those singular mortals with whom Fortune is frequently capricious. This old lady may, in such a case as his, unduly delay her benefits; but, on the other hand, she may send them before any particular effort has been made to deserve them—they will appear to come without any adequate reason, and without demanding any equivalent in sweat or suffering. Such men as Peter sometimes sink into early oblivion; but they as often stumble on fortune—though pretty much in the same manner as a wandering beggar may stumble in the dark upon a well-lined pocket-book.

Allan Gray's hopes of fortune were based on entirely different principles; or rather, of the two, his alone were based on principle. Nothing came to him by chance, but everything as the consequence of some visible cause. Norman Gray—when alive, the manager of Irondale Agricultural Implement Forge—had taught his son Allan to depend wholly upon the honest exercise of his own wits and fingers for present subsistence and future success. He warned him against the delusive devil-dream of luck. Nobody, he was wont to say, had ever prospered, or deserved to prosper, who waited on the fickle largess of what fools are pleased to call by the name of chance. Such people he sternly set down as lying beggars—men whose whole life was one continued attempt to swindle Heaven out of what rightly belonged to those who bent their backs at honest labour in the hollows of the world; or sweated brain-sweat, in hidden chambers, in the service of humanity; or endured the galling epithets of traitor, self-seeker, no-patriot, from the very country, in the upholding of whose constitutional freedom they lived a life of agony and endless toil. Then he would impress upon Allan that, if he were true to himself, and believed, and acted as if he believed, in the honesty of the material and the heavenly laws, and in the honesty of God, he would be sure to get into the right track, whether that track led him to the palace of Fullwell, or merely to the hut of Wellenough.

Under the influence of such rough, fragmentary teaching did Allan Gray grow up, till he reached his twentieth year, when his father died—leaving him almost nothing in the shape of fortune, excepting a good knowledge of practical and theoretical mechanics; the example of a steady, self-reliant life; and a few scraps of that eternal lore which angels, as well as men, might listen to and grow wiser.

If Norman Gray left his son any other blessing, it was a mother whom princes might have desired to be the mother of their sons. She was a woman of singular calmness and sweetness of temper, great natural sagacity, and a range of intelligence which is somewhat rare among her class. I should state that the families of both my heroes belonged to the same religious profession, and attended the same church. Let the religious ideas of Norman Gray and his wife be a wider, and what might be appropriately called a more heavenly, orbit—a characteristic which, in fact, was quite compatible with a milder humanity of feeling, in all that pertained to the hard practicalities of life.

These, then, are the homes and progenitors of Peter Rowantree, clerk, and Allan Gray, mechanic; and these are the gentlemen themselves whom you may imagine to have reached London in that career of conquest which, I verily believe, every Scotchman regards, in some form or other, as intensely imperative, if not simply inevitable. When the thistle desires heat and nourishment, whither can it turn for it but to the sun? and where can the sun be found excepting in the soft-blowing, genial-spirited south?

CHAPTER II.

SUCCESSSES, WITH A DIFFERENCE.

On their arrival in London, Peter had the advantage over Allan of having a situation cut and dry for him in one of the great wholesale mercantile establishments. In little more than two days, therefore, he sat down upon his stool, took pen in hand with true Caledonian courage, and fell upon his accounts as one of his savage ancestors might be supposed to have fallen upon a herd of wild boars in a criminal forest of the north. Peter also got into most respectable lodgings in Kentish-Town; and, considering the amount of polish, of a sort, which he had absorbed in the "north contrie," together with his agreeable, insinuating style, it was not long before he contrived to ingratiate himself with his employers, his compeers of the countinghouse, his landlady, and decidedly with his landlady's rather presentable niece, Polly Swanbill—a tall, fair-haired lady of eighteen years, an elegant dancer, a sweetish singer, a pretty pianist, mistress of three-fourths of the French language, and thoroughly proficient in the art of flirtation.

Could Peter Rowantree's lines have fallen in pleasanter places? It was hardly possible. His masters were rich and able to pay; his fellow-clerks were excessively clever, and perfectly qualified to initiate the northman into the divine mysteries of London life; and his landlady's niece, the exquisite Swanbill, was overflowing with charming accomplishments, and abundantly able, therefore, to cozen the open-hearted Peter into the belief that he had dropped into the ultimate paradise of his life. With such materials and such an atmosphere to assist in his development, it was little wonder that the handsome Rowantree burst almost at once from his Caledonian husk into the full-blown metropolitan gent. He became a mighty favourite with his class, and also with another class of whom careful, honest, and virtuous men never do make favourites.

Yes, Peter loved Swanbill, and the inimitable Swanbill gave her affections to the all-conquering Rowantree, on whose delicate, white-vested bosom she was eager, on every possible opportunity, to lean her languishing eye-lashes, and calm the heaving ecstacy of her spotless heart. As sweetest joys are fleetest, I shall leave the charming couple in their happy sculpturesque attitudes as long as I can, and take up Allan Gray for the rest of this stage.

Allan, it must be confessed, arrived south with unquestionably sober prospects. Unlike his companion, Peter, he did not come to leap into an empty stool, but to compete for a very modest position in one of the Government establishments. Allan was by no means so handsome as Peter. At first sight, there was something singular in his aspect. His large deep eyes—looking out on the world from their calm recesses, under broad square brows, surmounted by thick shocks of half-curved black hair—gave him, now and then, an appearance of dulness and simplicity, which invited the inspection as well as the criticisms of the humorous and impudent, whose jests were yet more keenly edged by the breadth of Allan's Irondale doric. But the temper of the young barbarian was not brittle, but tough and malleable; so that both laughter and jest fell from him flattened, as leaden balls fall from the surface of iron targets—the greater the force the flatter the lead.

When Allan reached the Government chambers, on the day of examination, he was put into a room among about a dozen other young fellows in the same condition as himself—in want of employment, and ready to be questioned as to their qualifications to fill the vacancies. Allan was the only Scot present, the rest consisting of two Irishmen and nine Englishmen. Previous to the examination, there was a good deal of chaffing among the candidates—the nationality of each being the most popular theme of attack and defence. The English lads had naturally the greatest abundance of chaff, and they blew it about in a liberal, though, generally, in a good-natured enough manner. By the two Irish adventurers, the happiest and most grotesque single allusions and hits were contributed; while Allan, perhaps the slowest and most silent in the company, did nevertheless, when hotly pressed, plant by far the deadliest blows, so that even the most daring word-coiner of the company, Percy Hyde—who was nephew of Sir John Hyde, one of the examiners—was made to reel before the Scotsman's single-gunned battery. In consequence of this, Percy was the only one who became slightly offensive towards Allan, whose personal appearance and nationality were never before so mercilessly handled. His chances at the forthcoming competitive examination were also sneeringly alluded to, and set down in the vicinity of zero. Percy Hyde's intentions were, of course, to tempt Allan Gray from his silent intrenchments, in order to spear him in his passion. But Allan knew a thing or two which Percy had yet to learn, and he had the advantage, besides, of having been born pretty far north—an advantage, I have observed, which contributes as much to increase the resistive powers as it does to sharpen the observant soul of the tactician. Allan was generally capable only of great angers—against all which, however, he had been much warned by his father; the shrewd old gentleman impressing upon his son the deep truth that anger, being altogether cruel and unscientific, was destitute of any power of true conquest over its object. Percy Hyde's most provoking sallies failed, therefore, to disturb Allan's apparently stupid equanimity.

The examination at length began, and all that I have to report of its results is comprised in the simple statement, that of the round dozen, Percy Hyde alone made a disgraceful figure; so bad, indeed, was it that Sir John Hyde, his uncle, indignantly sent him back to learn some of the most elementary principles of mechanics; that the others, or the whole, passed honourably, the two Irishmen and one Englishman especially so; but that Allan Gray made so satisfactory a figure in replying to the most puzzling interrogatories that, in addition to a first-class card, he won the publicly expressed recommendations of all the examiners, which had the effect of at once gaining him admission into one of the most important Government establishments in the vicinity of Woolwich.

Such was Allan Gray's preliminary success; and it was the result neither of luck, chance, friendship, nor cunning; but of well-digested theoretical and practical knowledge in the department in which he was by Nature best fitted to conquer some position. He fixed himself down, therefore, in his quiet place, and intrenched his heart against the fascinations of the mighty city—determined to work out whatever destiny was possible to intelligence, honesty of purpose, and persevering endeavour. Like most men who make similar resolves, and possess sufficient patience and dogged power to carry them out, Allan succeeded beyond his original hope. From being a mere mechanic, he advanced into the highest regions of practical and inventive engineering. Out of his rough, rock-like brain, many a beautiful and useful plan has sprung, by which the naval power and resources of England have been improved and vastly increased. As a man, and as an inventive engineer, there is at the present moment few men more loved for themselves or admired for their genius.

But, in the earlier years of his career in England, Allan Gray neither walked nor slept on roses. He brought his mother to Woolwich; and at first the management of their meagre resources taxed to the utmost their financial ingenuity. I never knew a more loving mother and son. They were worthy of each other. I became acquainted with them shortly after they settled so near the city; and I openly confess that if ever frugality was, and deserved to be, exalted to the quality of the godlike, it was so in the wonderful management of Allan's limited salary by his mother. These two had the courage to live within their income; and they did so without a particle of that ostentation which not unfrequently accompanies even very honest poverty, especially among the Scotch. Their domestic establishment, it may be imagined, was altogether a humble one, from the fact that not one of their rooms was adorned by an inch of carpet. They were content to tread bare deals, until for the mystic year of carpets should arrive.

CHAPTER III.

ALL'S ILL THAT ENDS ILL.

Of the courtship, marriage, and doom of Peter Rowantree, Esq., I have not much to relate, as that little is altogether unpleasant; but as it is curiously interwoven with cursed visions of carpets and other household splendours, I shall epitomise the matter for the benefit of those who might be in danger of catching the fatal heresy which dragged poor foolish Peter down to social, as well as to the brink of eternal, perdition. That heresy, which worse than all modern theological heresy, is contained within this detestable formula:—That it is necessary to live showily, in a showily-furnished house, in order to be respectable. The Prince of Evil never constructed a falser or a more insidious creed. Men and women will fill their eyes with pious light, and purify their tongues, and innocently ask, Will you believe in such doctrine? I reply, Nobody. Everybody knows its falsehood—will with their lips admit its falsehood—and in their hearts they will be unable to see it in any other light; yet all the while the deeds of their hands will give the lie to the beliefs of their hearts and the professions of their lips. If men and women acted on their sincerest, or at least on their professed beliefs, they would seldom come to sorrow. But the curse of large numbers is, that socially, as well as religiously, they live and act, according to their own knowledge, but according to the standards of their neighbours. Such weak, though perhaps reputable people, follow 'leaders' both in religion and fashion; and in both (like sheep who are also led by leaders) not unfrequently to their own destruction. Religiously, they walk open-eyed in the inner hell of respectable insincerity; and socially they plunge deliberately into the inner hell of respectable debt; whence, in both cases, they are almost inevitably hurled into the outer hell of bankruptcy.

Peter Rowantree and Polly Swanbill, although not altogether unsuspicious of being in the wrong track, were at least ardent practical believers in the creed of 'show.' Peter, false to the teaching and memory of his father, threw in his eternal interests with a certain fashionable church, in which Elder Rowantree would have sworn that only the skim-milk of the Word was procurable; Polly also reposed her little soul in a fashionable church on Sundays. Peter worshipped the beautiful ideal hero of manhood, which his mirror revealed to him in the millinery splendour of his own personage; Polly was as often on her knees before an ideal heroine of womanhood revealed in a similar manner. Peter was an idolater of a long roll of fashionable saints; so was Polly. Peter's tastes were dainty, select, and costly; so were Polly's. In truth, whatever Peter was, Polly was sure to be; and under these singularly harmonious conditions, the courtship of the inimitable couple proceeded.

Yet, let it not go unremembered that Peter was an excellent hand at his business. Indeed, had Polly Swanbill transported herself to one of the Pelican Bank and had Peter lived a good deal under the steady rein-hand of his fellow-parishioner, honest Allan Gray, it is not quite improbable that he would have acquired a handsome fortune, made a solid and amiable marriage, reared sons and daughters, and died quietly and respectably in his bed in some western villa. But Polly had marked Peter for her own. Before he was well aware, she had transfixed him with the mesmeric lightning of her languishing eyes, and brought him to her queenly feet—an act of submission which the gracious lady was not long in repaying, by twining the adoring Peter in her long plastic arms—the whole of which process being accomplished just as a beautifully subtle serpent might seduce and involve a peacock with all its vanity and splendour.

In the course of five years, Peter was advanced stage by stage by his employers, until he reached the most responsible position in the house; and before the end of the fifth year, Polly Swanbill was advanced to the position of Mrs. Rowantree, to the mingled admiration and envy of her neighbours. Amid the merry trangling of the marriage bells, the ominous croak of a raven was audible. Polly had enemies as well as friends; and while the latter were not wholly discreet as to her failings, the former clouded their brows, and assumed the functions of fatal prophets. The evil that women do in their days of maidenhood is published on the day of their marriage. But although Polly did not escape calumny, Peter did not escape her; and for the strokes of the one she considered herself sufficiently indemnified in the possession of the other—the more especially as she and her husband, after a delightful honeymoon spent in Peter's native valley of Irondale, took up their abode in a more fashionable suburb of London than Kentish Town is generally regarded.

Rowantree Villa, St. John's Wood, was by no means a large, but good judges pronounced it a very elegant thing of its kind. Its young occupants were of course altogether unknown in that select locality; but as they exhibited first-rate appearances, gave neat parties, maintained a pretty piece of horse flesh and a sweet barouche, they were not long in establishing or conquering a position in the affections of their neighbours. Their life was a gay one, and they swam in affluence and elegance.

But did Peter and Polly ever visit Allan Gray in his quiet home at Woolwich? Many a time and oft. But on every occasion, that stylish couple took leave of Allan and his mother much depressed in spirits. The engineer's abode was necessarily a humble one—for the grim Scot was still wearily and bravely winding his way up the granite staircase of the world's regard. Allan, like most men of his character, was visited by periodical fits of gloom; but in him these visitations were proofs rather of strength than of weakness, as, from their solemnity and depth, could be calculated the calm and almost heroic height of his nature. At these, as at all times, his mother was at hand; and in her he found unwrought sources of strength and assistance. Hence came it that, although often gloomily reflective in the fiercest rage of the battle, he never fainted, but wielded hammer, and screw, and file, and whipped his inventive brain in the higher departments of his craft, in a manner which showed that for him there could be nothing but ultimate success. As I have already mentioned, Allan did actually attain very considerable success; but, in the meantime, he and his mother were content to live on lenten fare, and dispense with the softening and relaxing elegancies of modern society, and that to an extent which absolutely horrified his two city friends, Peterkin and Polly. Both before and after their marriage, these dainty-footed and tender-eyed turtle-doves felt it a great deprivation, when they visited Woolwich, to be compelled to tread on uncarpeted pine deals, and to gaze on walls comparatively little beholden to any of the finer arts. Peter, for very shame, could not, for a long while, be brought to cut his mechanical and unrefined countryman, as sweet Polly Swanbill was wont to designate Allan. But, then, it was so unpleasant to come so far, and fare so ill; for Allan could never afford to feast Polly and Peter according to the pattern daily followed at Rowantree Villa, St. John's Wood; and was it not also, if anything, a little vulgarish to hold intercourse or correspondence with people so awfully unskilled in the divine mysteries of fashionable life? In brief, after a deal of peddling and tricking with their better thoughts, and the erection of a score of Devil's syllogisms as a battery of defence against the insidious attacks of conscience, these precious darlings of lady Fortune paid a concluding and most unwilling visit to Woolwich; and although they could hardly fail to perceive that the tide had begun to flow with Allan Gray and his mother, they made their bow to the dismal locality and its people, never again to soil their superfine feet, nor offend their moteless eyes, by walking its domestic planks or looking on its barren and vulgar walls.

These stars are meant to indicate a gulf, the merest whisper of whose name were sufficient to make the soul of honesty shudder for a week, and grieve for ever after. In that gulf, the ship of Peter Rowantree, Esq. and his fashionable lady-wife, after careering gaily about for some time, flashing with golden sails, sank suddenly out of sight, as if shot by a bolt out of heaven.

The secret was simply this:—Peter and Poll maintained a style of life at St. John's Wood which demanded ampler funds than Peter's already excellent salary could supply. Indeed, the income of the foolish wretch could no more cover the debts he created than a fourpenny-piece could cover a crown-piece. A dozen honest schemes were vainly attempted to meet the importunate hunger of creditors, and to maintain unmodified the glory of Rowantree Villa. These schemes failed; and, after much coquetting with the fiends that wait on folly, Peter by inches approached that doubtful gulf of forgery, in which his barque at length went down hissing to the sharks of hell!

Poor Peter! Poor Polly! They were a foolish couple; and, in order to support their folly, they became a wicked and a criminal couple—were detected in their crimes—and banished to climes beyond the sea.

Little did Elder Rowantree, and his good wife Elspeth, dream that the small white hand which they had handled, and kissed a thousand times, and taught to turn over the leaves of the holiest Book, should one day plunge itself into the inkiest trench of infamy; and, with one master-stroke of crime, bespot the simple splendour of a name whose purity was the old man's only boast.

CHAPTER IV.

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

If 'all's well that ends well,' it will perhaps better 'well' to end the account of 'all' with becoming brevity. This, in the present case, will be the more easily performed, as the quiet yet brave life-deeds of Allan Gray are happily not attuned to the brasen clangours of modern trumpeters; but, more especially, as he himself is still living—still energetic, fresh, and inventive, and now lustrous with a halo of unfamous fame. Among the best of his class, and among certain 'highest authorities,' Allan has won a name which wise men might virtuously covet in their honest pursuit of similar eminence in their profession.

After Mr. Rowantree's downfall—an event which shocked Allan terribly—the progress of the young engineer was continuously steady, if not rapid and brilliant. What brought him first under the special notice of those in power, was a simple but extremely useful invention, which has been introduced into every war-ship in the British navy. This was the means of placing Allan in a greatly advanced position, in which his opportunities for working at the higher branches of engineering were intentionally increased. He repaid this advancement by new inventions in various directions, which gained him the friendship of the best and the most responsible men in the kingdom. His most recent invention, however, is one of so singular a character that were I merely to mention its name, the reader would at once be able to point out the man whom I have thus imperfectly outlined under the colour of Allan Gray. But this I must not do, having almost reached the last line of these in-artistic figures.

In conclusion, however, I may state, without committing any breach of confidence, that if Allan Gray has attained conspicuous success in remembering and following the advice of his father, he has been no less successful, by shrewdly digesting the wise counsels of his excellent mother, in finding a true woman for a wife. Helen Hope—the youngest daughter of Sir Arthur Hope, one of the most popular landed gentlemen of Surrey—is a lady possessed of the twin-virtues of beauty and good sense—a combination of excellences that are supremely irresistible by accomplishments which render her the paragon of wives—a wife who might have inspired the soul of Shakspeare to create a new drama, for the sole purpose of making her immortal.

There is no house which I have more pleasure in visiting than that of Allan Gray; there are no persons whom I admire more than Allan Gray and his beautiful and truly accomplished wife; and, I speak it with perhaps more vanity than discretion, there is a little maiden whom I love so dearly as large-eyed and rosy-lipped Julia Gray, the one treasure of a daughter among four sons of the Scotch engineer and his English wife. Were I fifteen years younger—

But go to! What am I babbling about, and the great case coming on to-morrow in which I am to act as junior counsel? The law is a hard and exacting mistress; and, what with coming, conquests in the House of Commons, and visions of possible woolsacks there is neither time nor room for the softening and delicious visions of love—else, O Julia!— F.

HOW HE WON HER:

A STORY IN SEVEN LETTERS.—BY WILLIAM BLACK.

LETTER THE FIRST.

MRS. LESLIE to her Son, WALTER LESLIE.

MY DEAR BOY,—We have been positively shocked with your letter. I could hardly believe my eyes. I am sure when your poor dear father left you in charge to me, he never thought the result of all careful training and watching over you and Allan should come to this. It was with many misgivings that I allowed you to leave home for a city life. I thought the resolute spirit of the Leslies was strong within you, and that you would keep aloof both from the follies and vices of the companions you might meet. Yet you ask me if I would countenance your marriage with an actress! 'As modest as she is beautiful, and as graceful as she is intelligent!'—That is language she has taught you, possibly. And she can assume modesty as easily as she can assume other virtues! can she? Really, Miss Vernon would be a very clever actress indeed! I know my Walter was always willing to have his dark curls parted by a soft white hand; but I never thought—Well, Walter! I suppose I need hardly say anything about it. Sister Annie is sitting crying. And you, who were getting on so well—whose pictures were being talked about—who was making a name—thus to destroy your prospects, when they looked most inviting and encouraging! But stay, Walter. Has not your artist's devotion misled you? The glare of colour—the brilliant lights—the gorgeous dresses,—have they not fascinated you with but merely a foolish wonder, which will wear off in a week or two? You say you still visit the Greens; and I have some hope of you, for I understand Lillian Green to be a decent girl, who would be proud to be an honest man's wife. As soon as Aunt Johnson returns from York, I shall run through to see you, and shall probably stay with the Greens; until which time, I trust you will do nothing that either I or yourself may be sorry for afterwards.—Ever your affectionate

MOTHER.

LETTER THE SECOND.

From MISS VERNON, of the D— Theatre-Royal, to WALTER LESLIE.

SIR,—I regret being compelled to return you the accompanying bracelet, which you did me the honour to send me, as I have ever made it a rule to refuse such presents. I also regret that it is impossible for me to grant you an interview. But as you mention your acquaintance with Mr. Green, it is possible that I may be at his house some evening. That is the most I dare promise; and believe me, most respectfully yours,

MARY VERNON.

LETTER THE THIRD.

From ANNIE LESLIE to KATE SYLVER.

DEAR KATE,—Do you ever read poetry now? Our Walter has sent me a song which he wants me to sing, and I can't find music for it, and so I send it to you—that's the song, not the music—that you may copy it into your album and return it to me. It's beautiful—whatever you may say. Walter says he wrote it after coming home from a party at the Greens'; so I suppose it refers to Lillian Green. But it's pretty; and you mustn't say it isn't. On second thoughts, I'll copy it at the end of this note, in case you might lose Walter's writing, and then I should never forgive you. Good-bye, dear, dear Kate.

ANNIE LESLIE.

P. S.—Here is the SONG.

Oh, I know a face so sweet, so sweet,
That no one around me knows;
With a crimson bloom like the tender heat
That dwells in the heart of a rose—
A rose
That in the warm June wind blows!
And I know blue eyes so deep, so deep,
So limpidly cool and clear;
They seem to be sleeping a crystal sleep,
And wake but to brighten a tear—
A tear
For one whom they hold so dear!

And I know a hand so white, so white,
So little, and white, and shy;
It only peeps out to meet the light
Of a bright and welcoming eye—
Her eye
That smiles when nobody's by.
And I know a voice so mild, so mild,
Like the sounds that the night-winds move;
Like the murmur'd laugh of a cradled child,
And that is the voice of my love—
O love!
Come hither, my foam-white dove!

Isn't it pretty? Good-bye again.

A. L.

LETTER THE FOURTH.

From Mrs. LESLIE to ROBERT GREEN, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have to trouble you about a matter which is always nearest a mother's heart—her son's welfare. I know the influence you have over our poor Walter, and I am glad to hear that he still visits at your house; but will you, my dear sir, believe me when I say, that from my poor boy's own handwriting, I learn that he seriously contemplates marrying an actress! I have still some hope that you may be able to show him the wickedness and folly of such a step, and that you may yet be in time to save him. It was the wish of his dear father—as he often used to tell you—that Walter should marry your Lillian; and I am sure she must now be as handsome and good a young lady as she promised to be when I saw her many years ago. I really wonder what has so infatuated poor Walter about this Miss Vernon, when he is enabled to number Lillian Green among his friends. I am sure she must now be a beautiful girl; and you must be happy, dear friend, in having an obedient child. I shall take a run into town this day fortnight to see how matters stand. Meanwhile, I ask you, as a father, to do what you are able towards averting my boy's ruin. Kindest love to Lillian and her mother; and believe me, affectionately yours,

MARTHA LESLIE.

LETTER THE FIFTH.

From ROBERT GREEN, Esq. to WALTER LESLIE.

MY DEAR WALTER,—I have just had a letter from your mother, which reveals to me a secret of which I had never even dreamed. I need not refer to it more plainly than by saying that it is simply impossible you should ever again meet Miss Vernon at our house. I have every confidence in her, and she will always, I hope, remain as much a friend of our family as yourself; but after receiving your mother's letter, I feel it my duty to refuse any sanction I may inadvertently have given to your acquaintance by inviting you on the same night to our house. As you are aware, both Miss Vernon and yourself should have been at our little meeting this day fortnight; and I leave it to you, Walter, to say whether you will voluntarily remain absent, or whether Mrs. Green must cancel our invitation to Miss Vernon.—In haste, yours truly,

ROBERT GREEN.

P. S.—Have just received your note. After much deliberation, I have resolved to grant your request; and though your scheme is a bold one, still I don't think any great harm can result from it, even though it should prove a failure. Your mother has not seen our Lillian for some years, and Miss Vernon may very easily personate her; but, further than this, remember I can have nothing to do with it. Miss Vernon is as much my guest as your mother will be on that night; and I cannot have her insulted even by my nearest friend. So, if you care to take the responsibility, I am willing; but I should as soon that you gave up the idea altogether. At all events, I shall keep Lillian out of the way for a certain time, and give Miss Vernon every chance of appearing to advantage in the character of my daughter. R. G.

LETTER THE SIXTH.

From WALTER LESLIE to his friend TOM HAMILTON.

MY DEAR TOM,—There has been such a lark here! and I am going to tell you all about it, and I don't know where to begin. In the first place, I was introduced at a party to Miss Vernon—you remember how spooney you were about 'My love is like a red, red rose'!—and, one way or another, have become very intimate with her. Seriously speaking, Tom, I believe she is the prettiest, most modest, and best girl I ever met. But, you must know, before this—(what a novel-writer I would make!)—my mother had got some word of my intimacy with Miss Vernon, whereupon she became very indignant, and said I don't know how many hard things about actors and actresses in general. Her letters got quite short, and I thought we were to have a regular family quarrel—you see, those old ladies retain such absurd prejudices; and we all know what the stage was in their youth. However, mother was to come in to town to attend another party at Mr. Green's, and she expected to settle the whole matter then. Miss Vernon was there, and there I was, of course; so that I had the honour of introducing her to my mother. But it so happened that I introduced Miss Vernon as Miss Lillian Green—whom my mother had not previously seen,—and the two of them got on so well together that it was really delightful to see them! Upon my word, Tom, mother was quite charmed with the girl—as, how could she be otherwise? and, when I introduced, so to roce, the true Miss Lillian Green to her, she 'dropped' her, as the saying is. Upon my word, Tom—(I believe I said that before, but never mind)—if you had seen 'the little head, sunning over with curls,' looking so bewitchingly up in my mother's face, you would have sworn there wasn't a sweeter and prettier girl in Christendom! And then she sang; and you know how she can sing. The whole room was silent as night; and when she sung 'Though I leave thee now in sorrow,' or some such thing, mother cried! I was nearly crying myself; but I could have leaped and laughed like a girl to see it. But the dreadful scene came, when the ladies went to get shawled—for, of course, mother knew that 'Miss Lillian Green' had no cause to change her dress. She reproached me only with a look; but, since then, I have never heard the end of it. I think, however, Tom, she is drawing well in the new harness—you'll understand that phrase—and, by-and-by, that she'll be quite reconciled to—What? you ask. Never mind, Tom; don't make a fellow blush!—In spe rivo. Yours ever, WALTER LESLIE.

P. S.—I shall promise you a new riding-whip if you give up singing that absurd 'Old Towler,' and take to a decent song, such as this:—

Queen rose of the rosebud-garden of girls,
Come hither, the dances are done,
In gloss of satin and glimmer of pearls—
Queen, lily, and rose in one,
Queen, lily, and rose in one.
Shine out little head, sunning over with curls,
To the flowers, and be their sun!

Tom! there is, in all the earth, but one little head sunning over with curls that could be the sun to garden of roses. Remember the riding-whip, and good-bye! W. L.

LETTER THE SEVENTH.

From TOM HAMILTON to his friend, GREGORY SMITH.

DEAR GREG,—Father and I are just going shooting, and I've only time to tell you that ~~last~~ has got married to Miss Vernon, lato of the D—Theatre-Royal. Wont he fall into all sorts of ~~merisms~~ in painting his female faces after this?—haste, yours, T. HAMILTON.

THE HAMELESS LADDIE.

Be kind to the bairnie that stands at the door;
The laddie is hameless and friendless and poor;
There's few hearts to pity the wee cowerin' form
That seeks at your hallin' a beld frae the storm.
Your hame may be humble, your haddin' but bare,
For the poor and the lowly has little to spare;
But ye'll ne'er miss a morsel, though sma' be your store,
To the wee friendless laddie that stands at the door.

When the cauld wind is saughin' sae eerie and chill,
And the snaw-flakes o' winter lie white on the hill;
When ye meet in the gloamin' around the hearthstane
Be thankfu' for haddins and hames o' your ain,
And think what the feckless and friendless mannae draw
Wi' a heart to pity and nae hand to gie;
That wee guileless bosom might fraese to the core
Gin ye turn'd the bit laddie awa' frae the door.

The bird seeks a beld o'er the wide ocean wave;
In the depth of the covert the fox has a cave;
And the hare has a den 'neath the wild winter's snaw;
But the wee friendless laddie has nae hame ava!
Then pity the bairnie sae helpless and lone;
Ilka gift to the poor is recorded aboon;
For the warm heart o' kindness there's blessing in Sae be kind to the laddie that stands at the door!

Hawick.

J. THOMES

*. The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention, but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and Knock-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 19.]

SATURDAY, FEB. 7, 1863.

[PRICE 1d.]

THE SEER'S PREDICTION.

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER I.

As the gray mists of evening descended on the lofty summit of Ben-Crusachan, and Benderloch's deep waters heaved sullen and dark beneath the gathering cloud of night, a young man might have been observed standing on the Appin banks of this sequestered lake. The arms of the solitary musier were folded across his breast, and his eyes were fixed on the barren mountain, whose giant proportions loomed savagely in the distance. The appearance of this individual was, in the highest degree, prepossessing. His tall elegant figure was displayed to the fullest advantage in the Highland garb; and while the bronzed hue of his cheek harmonised well with his fine aquiline features, his dark eye, bright and bold as that of the eagle, flashed forth from beneath the proud feather surmounting his bonnet o' blue.

The thoughts then crowding on his mind speedily found vent in words. 'Tis madness, downright madness,' he murmured; 'and yet, Heaven help me! I cannot banish her image from my heart. Strive as I may, Edith Campbell haunts my every thought. What would my fierce father say did he know I, a Stuart of Appin, loved the niece of our dark-browed enemy!' A moment's pause, and the Highlander pursued his soliloquy. 'Happiness can never crown our ill-starred passion. In naught are we united save our love. My loyal devotion towards the Stuarts cannot be shared by a Campbell. She owns that hated name, and yet I love her. Would it were otherwise! To-night the fiery cross spreads through Appin, and the brave Stuarts arm themselves to fight for the Prince whose standard was yesternorn unfurled in the wilds of Glenfinnan. As the eldest son of their chief,

I must lead on my clan to battle; while the Campbells will range themselves beneath the usurper's banner. Even now, the enthusiastic daughters of Scotland are weaving white favours to deck the bonnets of those loved ones who espouse the Stuart cause; but no bright eyes will glance approval on me, nor weep, perchance, should I be destined to fill an early grave. She whom alone I love favours the Hanoverian dynasty, and regards as traitors those loyal men who refuse their allegiance to any save him whom heart and conscience both unite in proclaiming King of Scotland. Yet why will she permit diversity of opinion to separate us? Ewan Cameron loves her; and no clan is more devoted to the Stuarts than that of Lochiel. And does not the crafty Campbell smile approval on his suit; ay, but were he a Stuart of Appin, his red blood would stain the heather ere her uncle and evil-minded cousin, Ulick, saw him allied to their house. Ha! ha! the young rascal bears me bitter hatred, in return for the well-aimed blow of my dirk, which punished his insolence for questioning my right to address his Edith, as he styled her. Presumptuous fool! He has, it seems, discovered our stolen interviews; and, knowing his black nature, Edith is fearful of the consequences should we continue our clandestine correspondence. Hence must I depart without one word of farewell. She deems it prudent; therefore I submit; but 'tis hard to part thus when we may never meet on earth again!' A deep sigh followed these last words. When about to resume his soliloquy, the sound of a woman's voice caused him to pause. Sweet and irresistibly touching were the accents with which the singer rendered that most beautiful of the many melodies then so dear to the Jacobite party, 'When the King comes o'er the Water.' The words of this enthusiastic ballad, said to have been composed by the aged Countess of Maraschal, ran as follows:—

'I may sit in my wee croo-house,
At the rock and the reel to toll fa' droary;
I may think on the day that's gane,
And sigh and sob till I grow weary.
I ne'er could brook—I ne'er could brook
A foreign loon to own or flatter;
But I will sing a rantin' sang
That day our King comes o'er the water.

Oh, gin I live to see the day
That I ha'e begg'd and begg'd frae Heaven!
I'll fling my rock and reel away,
An' dance an' sing frae morn till even.
For there is one I winna name,
That comes the belglin birk to scatter;
And I'll put on my bridal gown
That day our King comes o'er the water.

I ha'e seen the gude auld day—
The day o' pride and chieftain glory—
When Royal Stuarts bore the sway,
And ne'er heard tell o' Whig or Tory.
Though lyart be my locks and gray,
And auld has crook'd me down—what matter?
I'll dance and sing asither day—
That day our King comes o'er the water.

A curse on dull and drawing Whig—
The whin! rantin' low deceiver;
Wi' heart sae black, and look sae big,
And vauntin' tongue o' clishmasdaver.
My father was a gude lord's son,
My mother was an earl's daughter;
And I'll be Lady Keith again
That day our King comes o'er the water.'

A short pause, and melting pathos is replaced by lofty enthusiasm. Forth gush the words:—

'But there's a bud in fair Scotland—
A bud weel kenn'd in glamourie;
And in that bud there is a bloom
That yet shall flower o'er kingdoms three;
And in that bloom there is a brier
Shall pierce the heart of tyranny;
Or there is neither faith nor truth
Nor honour left in our countrys.'

On the singer's near approach, the young Chief discovered her to be Mary Cameron—a pretty maiden, whose lovely voice, and light figure in the dance, were celebrated throughout Appin. She was not alone. By her side strode a stalwart Highlander, in whom Edward Stuart had no difficulty in recognising his favourite henchman, Donald M'Kinnon. The native enthusiasm of this athletic Celt seemed roused well nigh to madness by the enrapturing strains of his fair companion. His breath came short and quick—he cocked his bonnet more fiercely—beat time with his feet—at length, wholly unable to restrain the loyal feelings swelling high within his breast, as the pretty Mary concluded her last stanza, he gave utterance to a wild halloo! executed a series of capers in the air; then, snapping his fingers contemptuously, sang, or rather shouted;—

'He's clappit down in our gudeman's chair,
The wee, wee German lairdie;
And he's brought forth o' foreign trash,
And dibbled them in his yardie.
He's pu'd the rose o' English loons,
And broken the harp o' Irish clowns;
But our Scots thistle will lag his thumbs,
The wee, wee German lairdie.

Our hills are steep, our glens are deep,
Nae sitting for a yardie;
And our norland thistles wina pu'
For a wee, wee German lairdie.
And we've the trenching blade o' wair,
Wad glibe ye o' your German gear,
And pass ye 'neath the claymore's sheer,
Thou reckless German—'

The concluding word merged into a loud hurra, called forth by the appearance of a ruddy light, which that instant streamed along the precipitous sides of Ben-Cruachan. Onwards it came, rending the darkness of coming night.

'O Donald! what means yonder flame?' breathlessly inquired the maiden; and she clung for support to his protecting arm.

'Tis the Fiery Cross!' said the young Chief, advancing towards them. Recognising his master in the speaker, Donald M'Kinnon saluted him respectfully, as did also Mary Cameron. With an exulting laugh, the Chieftain bent his flashing eye on the flaming signal, while it pursued its wayward flight—now breasting the rugged shoulder of some stupendous mountain, now lost in the winding labyrinth of some lonely dell. After a short disappearance, it flared along the savage depths of Glen-Dhu, then gleamed fearfully from the summit of one of the rugged hills lying to the right of Benderloch. 'God bless King James!' shouted Edward Stuart; and, removing his bonnet, he waved it above his head. Rê-echoing the prayer with stentorian lungs, his henchman half unsheathed his weapon; while the maiden, unlooking her

'chief, permitted it to float in the breeze. As the cross disappeared, a loud shout in their immediate vicinity caused them to look round. Joyfully they beheld a stalwart Highlander emerging from a ravine, bearing aloft another fiery messenger. Apparently overcome with fatigue, the fierce mountaineer staggered towards Donald, and, placing the dreaded symbol in his hand, pointed across the loch, then sank exhausted on the ground. Grasping tight the blazing torch, Donald M'Kinnon gave utterance to an exulting cheer. A parting embrace to his betrothed, whose expressive countenance beamed with loyal enthusiasm, and a single bound placed him on the shore. The fisherman swiftly obeyed his summons to make ready the boat; to loosen it from its moorings was the work of an instant; and anon rebellion's dread signal flashed over the dark waters of Benderloch. As long as the cross was visible, Mary Cameron remained standing on the beach, waving her handkerchief to gladden her Donald, as he stood at the prow of the boat, chanting a Gaelic love song—his tall commanding figure seeming of gigantic proportions in midst of the ruddy glow. On its disappearance, the enthusiastic maiden stood for an instant motionless; then plucked an herb with which she was familiar from amongst the heather, placed it on the back of her head, muttered some words in a low tone, and then, turning her face towards the east, blew it away with her breath. This charm accomplished, she courted gracefully to the young chief, who had been an amused spectator of her proceedings, and then tripped lightly away in the direction of her home.

As Edward Stuart busied himself with the recovery of the prostrate Highlander, the sound of a bagpipe was borne towards him on the breeze. Straining his eyes to pierce the fast-gathering gloom, he beheld a shadowy mass filing through a narrow pass a little way on his right. The air, at first wholly indistinct, now swelled louder and more near, until Edward Stuart was able to recognise the pibroch of his clan; and soon the formerly colourless tartan shone red against the heather. Expectation having mounted to certainty, the young Chieftain hastily advanced towards the approaching Highlanders, and found, to his great delight, that they were headed by his favourite cousin, Duncan Stuart of Ardsheil. Issuing the necessary orders for the transportation of the utterly prostrate messenger, he placed himself by the side of the young leader; and the men continued their march towards Appin House, there to unite themselves with the main body of the clan. Possessed of a gay, hopeful temperament, Duncan Stuart was loud in his expressions of admiration of the gallant Prince who had thus thrown himself, unaided, on the loyalty of his northern subjects, and confident in his expectations regarding the speedy success of their efforts to overthrow the Hanoverian dynasty. Then, looking back in the direction of Lochnell, with a menacing gesture of his hand he burst forth in indignant tones—'Ride! ride on thy mission of treachery, thou false Campbell! But what avails thy speed?

The Provost may fret, and the honest Burghers may fume, as thou proclaimest in the Council that the rightful heir to auld Scotia's crown has landed at Borrodale; and that the gallant Lochiel, at the head of eight hundred men, has joined the standard which the loyal old Marquis of Tullibardine unfurled to the breeze; but that will not prevent our laying siege to the gates of their city—ay, marry! and stringing up these cross-eyed knaves at the Market-Cross, to serve as a warning to all such like-minded traitors.'

'What mean you, Duncan?

'Simply, that Campbell of Lochnell is even now on his way to Edinburgh, in order to acquaint the Magistrates that they are likely to find ample employment for the pampered dragoons at the Castle.'

'Does Black Ullick accompany him?' eagerly interrupted his cousin.

'I know not,' said the volatile Duncan. 'Ha, ha, ha! Methinks I see the well-nigh distracted citizens flying down their dirty old Canongate as though they were pursued by the avenging shade of Montrose; while the Provost, in great tribulation, causes the bells of St. Giles to jingle an alarm, orders the gates to be closed and protected with cannon, disaffected persons to be placed under arrest; while all loyal subjects are to hold themselves in readiness to protect the just rights of his most gracious Majesty, whom God long preserve, in spite of the Highland rogues and traitors who seek to compass his downfall!' Scarcely permitting himself leisure to draw breath, the thoughtless youth rattled on—'And such arming there will be! Why, Edward, only imagine—if thy less fertile imagination can furnish thee with so ludicrous a picture—the fat old burghers squeezing themselves, and that with no small difficulty, into the ancient armour worn by their less corpulent ancestors! While the Provost fishes out of his lumber-room a time-honoured suit, which last saw service in the days of the Long Parliament; and his loyal dame furbishes up some neglected helmet to save the thick head of her spouse from our trusty claymores!'

'How came our enemy to be so soon informed respecting the Prince's arrival?' inquired the other.

Duncan Stewart replied, 'It is more than suspected Campbell had some secret agent in France deputed to keep watch over the movements of the Jacobite party; but so skilfully did the Prince carry out his plans that the spy was unable to inform Lochnell of his departure until too late to prevent the rising.' 'Sneaking rascal!' muttered Edward Stuart. 'Should we chance to encounter him or his nephew in the streets of Edinburgh, a stroke from my dirk shall for ever silence his ill-omened clamour; and yet —' he paused embarrassed, having for the moment forgotten his enemy's near relationship to her whom he loved.

His cousin took up the unfinished sentence. 'And yet to die by the blow of a Stuart's poniard were too honourable a death for a craven Campbell. No, rather would I see him suspended from that Market-Cross to which his ill-favoured ancestor sent the loyal Montrose.' Not obtaining any response from his now thoughtful companion, the fiery young Highlander continued,—'Now that the Stuarts are taking the field in defence of their just rights, we will soon have it in our power to wipe off old scores with our deadly foes the Argyle faction. Such hatred do I bear them, that had I no more worthy motive for becoming a Jacobite, it alone would have sufficed, knowing I shall find myself opposed to M'Callum More and our treacherous foe of Lochnell.'

As young Stuart finished speaking, the Highlanders entered a narrow defile, hemmed in on either side by shelving mountains. Through this pass there brawled a rapid stream that a little way in advance terminated in a loch, in the centre of which stood an island, and thereon a ruined castle. Just as the cousins came within sight of their ancient fortress, the moon's pale disc struggled through the clouds, and cast a shadowy radiance on the fairy scene. Bidding the pipers strike up 'The Stuarts' gathering,' they motioned the men to precede them; and, resting on their claymores, surveyed in contemplative silence the ruined home of their ancestors.

Edward Stuart was the first to speak. 'Is it not strange,' he said, 'the superstitious should affirm that, when death hovers near the chiefs of our race, a taper's flickering ray, seen at one of the windows of that mouldering keep, gives warning of the mournful event?'

'Dost doubt the fact?' said his cousin, in a rebuking tone. 'The Macleans have their spectral horsemen—the Grants their bloody-handed female—and why should not we, the Stuarts of Appin, be honoured equally with them in this respect?'

'When was it last visible?' said his companion.

'On the night of your grandfather's death. It was observed by several shepherds while tending their flocks in this very dell.'

'When will it appear again?' murmured Edward Stuart, as if to himself.

His cousin, overhearing the side remark, observed, in a jocular tone, 'Why, coz, one would imagine, from the unusual length of thy face, that thou forebodest evil to thyself!'

For a moment, his companion looked thoughtfully into space, then observed, in a musing tone,—'It is strange what fancies suddenly possess people not prone to superstition; but the moment we came within sight of this castle, the thought darted like lightning across my brain—Soon shall the phantom ray, which foretells death to the chiefs of Clan-Appin, be seen glimmering from one of the casements of yonder ruined keep!'

'And whose end do you imagine this warning will foreshadow?' said Duncan Stuart, ironically.

'Perchance mine own.'

'Nonsense! nonsense, Edward! Do not abandon yourself thus to gloomy forebodings on the eve of our glorious enterprise.'

'Which may also prove a bloody one, dear Duncan! And why should I be spared more than others, equally young and life-like, who must periah ere our King be reinstated on his throne? But 'tis mere fancy on my part,' he added, passing his hand across his brow, as though striving to banish some painful remembrance. 'Come! 'Tis over now. Let us join our men.'

Taking his cousin by the arm, he was about to hasten onwards, when suddenly, as though he had emerged from the ground, a tall weird-looking man reared himself before their eyes. This apparition—for he resembled nothing earthly—was clad in vestments of goat-skins, a long silvery beard flowed upon his breast, and his bony hand grasped an oaken sapling, with which he pointed in the direction of the receding Highlanders, as he muttered in a hollow voice—'Woe! woe to the tartan! Dark is the cloud now overshadowing the land of the Gael! Before my fast-fading vision glares horribly the sword of the smiter, which is destined to lay the pride of the Highlands in the dust! Blood is everywhere! The heavens rain blood—it dyes our mountain streams—it stains our heather!'

'Prithee peace, good Alister,' said Edward Stuart in a soothing tone, fancying he recognised in the strange figure before him a half-crazy Highlander, who, originally a native of Skye, was endowed by the superstitious Celts with the faculty of second sight, and therefore regarded by them with reverential awe.

'Peace! who talks of peace,' exclaimed the seer, 'when the Fiery Cross speeds on its terrible mission and the tread of an armed host falls on mine ear! Peace! when the eagle scents the battle from afar and the vulture makes ready to feast on the eyes of the slain!'

'We fight in order that our rightful King may regain the throne of his ancestors,' broke in Duncan Stuart.

The old man tossed his arms wildly in the air. 'Behold not the throne of a conqueror,' he cried, 'be a crimson moor and a fleeing host; around me flow the blood of the Gael; while the thunder of cannon and the rasping of steel mingles with the dying groans of the plaided mountaineer, as he stretches out his limbs in the fierce agonies of death.'

'And what more glorious than to die in the arms of victory?' was the enthusiastic response.

A change passed over the working countenance of the seer; his voice sank to a whisper, and his arm fell powerless by his side, as he replied:—'No song of triumph is borne to me on the breeze; 'tis the coronach of my country, which rises with each fifth blast. In the south, rolls the triumphal car of the victor, and joyful acclaims greet the returning hero while, from the north, there arises an anguished cry over the loyal, the brave, and the true-hearted, who cold remains lie far away on the battle-field of the Lowlander.'

'But we shall triumph in the end!' said Duncan Stuart exultingly.

'Never!' shouted the aged Highlander. 'To you the future is veiled in impenetrable darkness; but me 'tis laid open as a scroll, and I read therein things dark and terrible. The cause of the Stuarts is doomed. The very heavens have declared against them. Last evening, when wandering among the hills, my ears in biding mysterious revelations from the unseen world and mine eyes fixed in wondering contemplation of the star-gemmed firmament—suddenly, as I gazed the aspect of the sky changed. A howling tempest drove a dark battlement of clouds across the azure dome. On their disappearance, I beheld as it were battle-field, on which two armies stood engaged. My blood ran cold in my veins; my hair stood on end, as the opposing forces rushed on to battle. Fiercely was the fight maintained. Soon horse and rider bit the dust. Still raged the deadly warfare, until the warriors of the north—too well I knew their plumed forms and eagle plumes—were mown down like grain beneath the reaper's sickle; then, on a given signal from one whose waving feather proclaimed him the leader of the victorious party, the combatants disappeared. Again a mass of tempest-tossed clouds swept overhead, and once more the heavens resumed their wonted aspect.

'Old man! thou ravest,' sternly exclaimed Edward Stuart. 'Think not to intimidate us by thy highly-wrought fancies, which we regard merely as the teenings of a disordered brain. If otherwise, and thou art an emissary of the traitor Campbells—sent for the purpose of terrifying us by thy ill-timed croakings—go tell thy base employers, that not by such idle warnings will a Stuart be dissuaded from embarking in a cause to which he is devoted heart and soul! Be the consequences what they may, led on by me, the Appin Highlanders shall go forth to battle. Should victory crown our arms, then will thy denunciations recoil on the heads of our enemies; and if as thou sayest, we are doomed to experience defeat, at the head of my devoted clan shall I yield my life rather than my sword to the foe!'

A prophetic gleam shot from the frenzied eyes of the dauntless Highlander finished speaking, and, stretching his withered hand in the direction of the ruined castle, he replied, in a hollow voice, 'Young man! in the pride of thy heart thou boastest thyself of a future never destined to dawn for thee. And on by other chief than thou, thy brave Highlanders shall rush to that fight from which few will return. More speedy the fate in store for thee. Even now, as I speak, the winding-sheet gathers round thy form, and the spectral light that foretells death to all of thy race glimmers in yonder tower.'

Grasping hold of each other's hand, the youths fled, horror-stricken, on the phantom-ray which for a moment flickered in one of the windows of the fatal keep. On its disappearance, they turned once more towards the stranger. He was gone!

(To be continued.)

RUDIMENTARY IDEAS OF PRINTING.

THE discussions which have ever and again taken place among students of history, as to the priority of progress of the arts, have never been devoid of interest in relation to the general advance of humanity on the scale of civilization. One would give the first place in the chronological table to painting, another to sculpture, and so on; but still, amid all conflicting opinions, it is generally conceded that the least speculative and the most practical would be likely to be the first place. However this may be, there is no question but there has always existed in the minds of men a native germ, which was given forth to the world at a certain period of its growth, in accordance with the circumstances which aided or impeded that growth. Thus in one man, who might have expressed himself in flowing and flowery metaphors, there was a poetic germ; and another, who might prolong and amplify this sentence, and feel delight in its sound, would show that of music. One might have striven to delineate some grotesque form upon the walls of his hut with a piece of charred wood, developing the primary idea of painting; and another, moulding in the clay some misshapen figure or ornament wherewith to adorn his dwelling, would show that of sculpture. Thus, the latent germ ever betrays itself with a power of its own, however much may be said of one nation borrowing from another preceding it—as Romans from Greeks, and Greeks from Phrygians—the germ growing in strength as it was nourished and moulded by the peculiarities of the people.

In like manner has it been with the Art of Printing, notwithstanding all the traditional accounts which have been given of the 'lucky accidents' which led to its introduction, and to which so many are fond of tracing its origin—it being more probably the result of those general causes on which the progress of society seems to depend. The distinct line of advancement of this, as well as other arts, is along the same line as that of human civilization, descending from the primitive stock, in the valley of the Nile, through the semi-civilised Oriental nations; then westward till it reaches the broad and wide field of modern Europe—the rudimentary ideas gradually increasing in vigour and strength as time rolls on; often turned aside from their onward path, but still going forward with the tide of knowledge—ever flowing, never ebbing.

Turn we first, then, to the 'land of Egypt'—the remarkable civilization of whose early inhabitants has ever been the admiration of the modern world. This advance, so much anterior to that which the historic records of any other nation reveals, shown in their colossal works of art, their profound philosophy and religion, and the possession of a high knowledge of the arts and sciences in general—is evidenced in those bricks and cylinders which bear their history impressed upon them: the mere taking of an impression upon one material, by the imprinting of another upon it, being considered to be almost as ancient as the art of writing itself. Brick-making was an almost national occupation with the Egyptians; and on the soft clay of these, previous to their being hardened in the sun, were stamped, by means of blocks of one kind or other, those hieroglyphics which have preserved till now the history of their country and the records of their attainments—being at once manuscripts and pictures—illustrated books, speaking alike to the eye and the mind. Hieroglyphics were everywhere used by them: the Egyptian could not enter a temple, or explore a catacomb, but there would he find innumerable specimens of this kind of work; some merely names and dates—others religious addresses or records of historical occurrences. Wherever a memorial stone was set up, or a building erected, there was certain to be carved upon it an inscription, intimating its purpose. The ruins of Babylon and other Chaldean cities have given up, likewise, bricks stamped with symbolical figures. These impressions, as in those of Egypt, were produced with wooden blocks, which were hollowed out in the desired manner—the hollows being filled with a coloured pigment, and then stamped upon the soft clay. This was a kind of rudimentary printing which, it is to be regretted, was not carried further with them, at least as far as that system which has been so long practised by the Chinese—the operation being almost identical, though differing in the desired result. In fact, in regard to the Celestials—according to a French writer—they only did on paper what had been done ages before on cotton, by the Assyrians and Indo-Persians. The bricks are not the only evidence we possess of there having existed an idea of the principle of taking impressions. The signet-rings of Egypt show this also; and we know that other articles besides soft clay were used for stamping on, such as smooth wooden boards, rubbed over with wax—leaves and bark of trees—skins and intestines—as well as the soft cellular tissue of the papyrus.

The Greeks and Romans also made use of stamps. One especially exists on which the letters are cut in low relief, which, if covered with ink, would leave an impression similar in effect to that of our modern type. We learn from Virgil, too, the surprising fact that brands, with the letters of the owner's name, were used in his time for branding cattle. Here the primary idea of printing was developed—born into the world, yet stifled in its birth; and the regret is still greater in this case than in that of the Egyptians; for had this rudimentary idea been followed up, we should not now have to deplore the loss of so many, and the imperfection of others, of the works of the great Latin authors.

History affords us little opportunity of knowing more of these crude and rudimentary ideas among the ancients. We can only surmise, from those tangible results which have been preserved and stood the brunt of ages—sufficient, however, to show that there really existed a germ of the art in the minds of the inhabitants of those lands, which only needed the impetus of an extra mental energy to set it forward on its onward path.

We revert now to that remarkable nation of the further east, the Chinese, whose extraordinary civilization had early reached a point far beyond that of any other nation, and with whom block-printing had equally early attained a settled position. They, as a nation, were fruitful in rudimentary ideas; but their apparently torpid mental energies never advanced these further, allowing them still to remain as crude and stunted as they were centuries ago. Gunpowder was known to them long before it was discovered in Europe; and yet this, which might have been an opening for a great military supremacy, resulted in nothing more than harmless fire-works. At a period equally remote, they had a glimpse of the path which leads to maritime success, in the discovery of the magnet and mariner's compass, but it only produced the coasting-junk. They had even a prototype of our banking system, for a paper money currency was established in China between the years 997 and 1022; and, long before printing was heard of in Europe, they had invented a system of their own, but it also stagnated in stereotyped editions of the works of Confucius. Yet this singularly vain people consider themselves nearly perfect in everything, in printing among the rest, and therefore deem improvement impossible. Nothing, certainly, can be more simple or primitive than the means they adopt; nothing can, however, be more effectual except presses and movable types, of which they know even yet but little.

It is generally supposed that it was in the tenth century they first began to print; but a volume of the Chinese Encyclopædia contains a passage to the effect that on the eighth day of the 13th year of the reign of Wen-ti (593), it was ordered by a decree to collect the worn-out drawings and inedited texts, and to engrave on wood and publish them. 'This was,' says the work referred to, 'the commencement of printing from wooden blocks.' Nothing was said of the inventor or originator; so that we may suppose that it was known before this time, for if it had been an altogether new process, some notice, in all likelihood, would have been taken of its author. As early as the year 904, blocks of stone were used on which the writing had been engraved—a mode of printing by which the ground of the paper was rendered black and the writing left white. The general method, however, was and is still by means of wooden blocks, on which the text to be printed is first drawn, the surrounding parts then cut away, and the words left in relief. In fact, the compositor in China is rather to be termed a wood-engraver, only instead of pictures his skill is exercised in writing. The words in relief being covered with ink, the paper is laid on, a soft brush is gently applied, and the process is complete. Each page of a book by this method must, of course, require a new block, and can only serve for the one unvarying purpose; and are not, like types, susceptible of a new arrangement. An attempt was made, so early as the eleventh century, to introduce movable types made of a plastic gum, and for a time single characters were made of clay, baked hard; but this was soon abandoned—except for the Imperial calendar, issued once a quarter; and the older system of wooden blocks continued in use, as being much neater and also cheaper than the method by means of plastic gum. One almost insuperable difficulty exists with the Celestials in the way of movable types; and this is in their language, which has not, as in others, an alphabet made up of a few characters, by which any book may be printed. A separate type is required for every word; and the language being divided into classes of sounds, in all above one hundred, a case of types is required for each class, each case containing a great number of letters, thus making the labour of printing in this way a task of no ordinary moment. Notwithstanding these difficulties, about the middle of last century, on one of their emperors ordering a number of historical works to be reprinted in the usual way, one of his finance ministers drew up a report recommending the use of movable types made of copper. This advice was favourably entertained, has been in some measure carried out, and is now gradually superseding the block process, which, with the characteristic conservatism of the Chinese, is still carried on to this day.

This method of printing from wooden blocks having been the first pursued in Europe, has very naturally led to the conjecture that the idea came from China; but this can hardly be the case, as, in those early days, there was little or no intercourse between that country and Europe. We can only suppose that, as in those other nations already mentioned, it was but the natural product of that latent germ which we think to have existed in the minds of men, and here now began to bud and blossom, and bring forth its own proper fruit. Indeed, if Europeans had been able to read and translate Persian historians in those days, the art might have been known to them 150 years before its discovery by the Germans, as it is fully detailed, so far as followed by the Chinese, in a Persian work of the year 1310. It was not till nearly a century after Marco Polo returned from the East, that the first attempts at block-printing were made, in the production of playing-cards for Charles VI. of France, the process having been applied to this purpose even before it was thought of for the production of books. A curious fact, which connects the history of this art with amusement with that of the most important civil improvement and the highest exertions of human intellect. From this the transition was simple and easy to productions of another kind. The earliest prints of this nature were rather more artistic than literary; one only exists which has any certain date, and is a representation of St. Christopher carrying the infant Saviour across the sea, bearing the date of 1423, and was found in a convent of Germany, pasted within the cover of a Latin MS. dated 1417. Following out this, block-printing gradually progressed, prints being first issued; then came that curious work called the 'Poor Man's Bible,' of 40 pp., something like those children's picture-books so plentiful now-a-days, having an illustration, with texts and explanations scattered about each page. Some of these have sold, when in good preservation, as high as £250, the very worst generally bringing about £50. This was followed by the 'Image Books,' some of which are still extant, and are also of great value as curiosities. The cutting up of these blocks into their separate words was next thought of, so as to be capable of new arrangement, and thereby forming fresh pages.

This brings us down to Guttenberg, to whom this invention is generally attributed, and the year 1432. The Dutch, however, make out a good case in favour of Laurens Coster as being first in the field, and he is said to have invented the process so early as 1420 or 1426. Coster copied closely the manuscript-writing of the clergy, whose productions he imitated even to the abbreviations, and this may account for his name not appearing on his books. He worked in secret at first, till, his custom increasing, he required to take an apprentice, who, on Coster's death in 1439, purloined his types, fled to Mayence, and gave the secret to Guttenberg. There is a proof at least of the independent nature of Coster's works, in the fact that the oldest printed books resemble the Dutch handwriting of the first half of the century; and also that his works are printed on one side only, like the first proofs of a beginner, while those of Guttenberg are in a more finished style, and are models of impression. Here the rough and crude rudimentary printing begins to disappear, and a new era commences, at a time when the great body of civilization was in a transition state. Since the destruction of the Roman empire, the nations which had sprung from it remained in subjection to the Papacy, which might be said to have inherited the government from that empire, but altered from an authority over the bodies of men to that of one over minds. So long as men continued to be the rough and thoughtless warriors and unlettered peasants they had been in the middle ages, in spite of the many abuses of the Roman Church, they never called this authority in question; but with knowledge, and the rise of a great commercial class, came a disposition to inquire into this assumed power. The art of printing came with an opportune aid, and helped to stir the torpid mental energies into that impulsive and throbbing life which ultimately resulted in the great Reformation.

Four names have figured in the controversy in regard to the first printer by means of movable types; and the city of Haarlem in Holland, and Mayence and Strasburg in Germany, all claim to be its birth-place. The probability is, in regard to Coster, that he was among the first to practise block-printing, but that he never attempted the system of movable types. It is to Guttenberg, Faust, and Schoeffer, the 'Grand Typographical Triumvirate,' as they have been termed, that we must look for the first use of movable type, primarily of wood and then of metal. Strasburg puts forth its claimant in the person of John Mentell or Mentellin, whose tombstone bears the following inscription, carved beneath the figure of a printing-press:—'I repose here, John Mentellin, who, by the grace of God, was the first to invent in Strasburg the characters of printing, by means of which a man may write more in a day than formerly in a year.' The goldsmith, Faust, according to one German antiquary, was first indebted for his ideas of the art to seeing the footprints of a horse on the soft mud of a road along which he was walking. He went home, thinking on this circumstance; and 'from that day printing was discovered.' In this, there is a parity with that to which the Chinese attribute the invention of writing characters, for which Fuh-he, the first of the five Emperors of the mythological period, receives credit; and is said to have derived the idea from seeing the footprints of birds upon the sand. Whatever value may be attached to this tradition of Faust, it does not record a first discovery; and, in all trustworthy evidence, he only appears as the capitalist by whose pecuniary aid to Guttenberg the art was brought into operation. The goldsmith and his associate worked long in secret at the wooden blocks with which Gутtemberg commenced, till Schoeffer, an illuminator of MSS. and a confidential person in their employ, hit upon the expedient of the punch and matrix, by which types were cast in separate single characters—this being the greatest step in advance of the science of typography, and the fundamental basis of the new art. This, of course, set aside at once the necessity of carving new blocks for every page—each letter being now a distinct piece of metal, capable of infinite re-arrangement. The first book they printed on the new system was the Latin Bible; and they had expended 1,200 florins before they produced twelve sheets, and it was not completed before the expiry of three years. This, the first perfect printed book which was ever issued, was a folio in two volumes, consisting of 637 leaves, printed in large Gothic or German characters. The art began to be made public about 1462, and gradually spread throughout Europe; but, notwithstanding a thorough appreciation of its value, at the end of a century not more than 200 presses were at work: the pace with which knowledge travelled to and fro upon the earth in those days being comparatively slow, so unfavourable was the state of the Continent for the reception of even the most obvious improvements in the mechanical arts.

Thirty years had elapsed when, according to some writers, Louis XI. of France sent Nicolas Jenson, director of the Mint, 'to inform himself secretly of the cutting of punches and characters, by means of which the rarest manuscripts might be multiplied by printing; and to bring away the invention subtilly.' He, however, did not return to France; but established himself at Venice, and applied his skill as a graver of coins to the art of typography, resulting in the invention of the Roman character. In France was displayed the utmost resistance to the new art—the manuscript-writing clergy of Paris bringing all the influence they could to bear against it—fearing the loss of their power as well as their means of livelihood. They were successful for a time; for the king issued an ordonnance, by which printers were enjoined not to print any books whatever, under penalty of being hanged! This did not, however, remain long in force. The Sultan Bajazet II. of Turkey also issued a similar decree in 1483, under a like penalty. This decree was confirmed by his son, Selim I., in 1515, and implicitly obeyed by the Mohammedans until the eighteenth century; when the Turkish ambassador at the court of France, in 1720, was so much struck with the advantages of the art, that he resolved that his own country should participate in them, and shortly after introduced the art there.

Caxton, the first English printer, is supposed to have gained his knowledge of the art while in France—whither he had been sent on some State business—from some of the fugitive workmen of Faust—they having found it expedient to leave Mayence, owing to that city having become involved in some of the Continental wars. The first work published by him (1471) was 'The Game and Playe of Chesse,' and was printed in black letter. From that time, the art progressed with giant strides in this country. Saxon types were first employed in England by J. Daye, in 1567, for an edition of 'Asserius Menevensis,' and the Gospels. We copy here, from the end of one of his books, the imprimatur of Daye:—'Imprynted at London by John Daye, dwellyne over Aldersgate, and Wylyyam Seres, dwellyne in Peter Colledge.

These Bokes are to be sold at the Newe Shop by the Lytle Conduyte in Chesepseyde.'

The earliest book in which both engraving and printing are combined is a Dante, published in Florence in 1481; and from that place came also what is known as Italic types, being imitated from the cursive character in use at the Roman chancery. They have also been called Venetian letters, from the punches from which the types were cast being made at Venice. Here also were published those celebrated Aldine editions, which are still highly prized by book-collectors, being distinguished for the remarkable correctness of their text, as well as the beauty of the type, forming an epoch in the annals of typography. Greek types were first used for a grammar of that language at Milan in 1476, and similar characters in England in 1543, the first specimen being an edition of 'St. Chrysostom's Homilies;' and, prior to 1599, Scottish printers possessed neither Greek nor Hebrew characters; where a word of either was introduced, a blank was left in the book, and the words afterwards filled in by hand when the sheets were printed. At Fano, on the shores of the Adriatic, Pope Julius II. established, in 1514, the first printing-press with Arabic letters known in Europe.

The earliest specimen of printing in Scotland is 'The Porteous of Nobleness, Translatit out of Ffrenc in Scottis, Edinburgh, 1508.' A licence had been granted by James IV. to two merchants in that city to establish a press in 1507. The progress of the art could not have been great, since we find that in 1574, the Privy Council found it necessary to levy a contribution of £5 from each parish in the kingdom, to enable Thomas Bassendyne to print an edition of the Bible. He became bound under certain penalties to deliver copies 'weel and sufficiently bund in paste or timmer' for the sum of £4 13s. 4d., the remaining part of the contribution being detained for the cost of collection. Having 'guid characters and prenting irons,' the Council thought the work, great as it was, would go quickly on. This hope was not realised; for Bassendyne found it necessary to petition for longer time in 1576; and in the following year he was ordered by the Council to deliver up his printing-house and Bible to Alex. Arbuthnot, who finished the work, and had it in circulation in 1579. The sale of this work was rather enforced, for the Council soon after enacted that all persons worth £500 should have a Bible in the vulgar tongue, under a penalty of ten pounds.

It was some years after its introduction into Scotland that the art reached Ireland. The first printing in Dublin was in 1531, but its progress must have been slow, for it was not till one hundred years after (1631) that the first Latin work was published in that country.

It enters not into our purpose to trace further the upward and onward path of the art. It now passes from its rudimentary stage into one of more perfect growth; and we can only wonder what the effect its introduction would have among the people in those unenlightened times. Did they imagine that such results could not be brought about without supernatural and questionable agencies, and hold great debates thereupon? Did they gather at street corners, while the gamins and city Arabs loitered round the quaintly-gabled house, stealing furtive glances through windows, peeping in on tiptoes? It is not likely all curiosity would be repressed among the people regarding the labours of those unceremonious hands which were now thrusting aside the veil for the admission of new light upon the darkness which had so long shrouded the human mind, and which promised to change and benefit the whole form of social life. W. T. D.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. IX.

WHILE there are abundance of songs, ballads, hymns, and all manner of lyric poems, in Gaelic; while there are didactic and descriptive compositions, heroic lays, and at least epic fragments, there is nothing whatever in the shape of dramatic achievement. Characters are certainly finely drawn; and conversation, of course, is frequent in the ballads and heroic songs. There are also several poems, carried on altogether in the form of a dialogue; but these are invariably descriptive, or, like the immediately following verses, reflective. To elicit human emotion, contrast varieties of character, develop a plot, and foster an increasing interest, up to a grand catastrophe, and all by means of dialogue, the Celtic bards never seem to have thought of attempting; consequently there is not even the germ of a drama in Gaelic. In this respect, the Highland and the Lowland poetry are alike. Rich and powerful in the production of narrative and lyric strains, the Highland and the Lowland mind seem much of them far better fitted for other kinds of composition than the pure drama; affording thus a strong presumption, both on the negative and the positive side, that the national genius of Scotland is one and the same in nature, in origin, in growth—north as well as south. Whether its peculiarities arise from the mingling of many elements, or whether its most marked and decided characteristics spring from the strong dash of Celtic blood which permeate the veins of all modern Caledonians, it would be more curious than wise, perhaps, to inquire. Lyrical poetry has flourished in the north and west of Scotland, and lyrical poetry has flourished in the south-east—its cultivators in all these parts having been in great measure the uneducated people. The same thing may be said of music as of poetry. There must surely be something more than mere coincidence in such resemblance. But whether it is race or place which has caused it, whether it has come from the Norsemen or from the Celts, or from the climate and the natural features of the country more than from either; or whether it rather depends on the habits and history of the people, such as their strong family attachments, their many long and arduous struggles with a neighbouring and superior power, and the stirring memories connected with their triumphs and their sufferings therein, it would be of very little consequence, at least to popular Highland poetry, suppose we could discover and point out with certainty. It must be noted, however, that the Highlanders, in their tales, are highly dramatic. A good story-teller gives a great relish to any narrative he has to give in Gaelic, by the skill and effect with which he makes different personages he has to deal with speak in their own style and character. This is a more marked quality in pure Gaelic conversation now-a-days than the rhetorical poetry which Highlanders are oftener represented as using of in English works, though these also are in many respects still characteristic of them, and must have been much more so, I should think, at one time than they are now. I have been induced to make the preceding remarks, as the following poem is very peculiar both in its style and character. I know nothing very like it in Gaelic. The poem, a very ancient and noble one, in which an owl is introduced as an interlocutor, is the likeliest to it. But the Castle has the most part of the conversation; and even in the Hunter and the Owl, it is the former who takes the lion's share of the speaking. The name of the author of this dialogue is not given in 'The choice Collection of the Works of the Highland Bards, collected in the Highlands and Isles, by Alexander and Donald Stewart,' from which the present translation has been made. The poem is entitled 'A Conversation between a Wayfarer and the old Castle of Inverlochry.' It is written in the Gaelic heroic measure, which has been followed closely in the translation.

CONVERSATION BETWEEN A WAYFARER AND THE OLD CASTLE OF INVERLOCHRY.

W.

Ruin, cold and pale and wan,
Oh the change that's come on thee!
Once the king's fit dwelling-place—
Great and lofty, high and fair;
Now the cattle's evening fold,
With thy mossy corners green;
Grassy is thy crested top,
Thy walls are bending earthward down!

C.

Solemn are thy words to me,
Who stand forsaken here like mist
Left in the corrie of the hill;
I face the scorn of all the world—
I face the sweep of every blast.
The slight and small men of the land
Ceaseless tear and wear me down;
They shame not when they pluck my wings
To prop their tottering bottles up.

W.

Well I see thy tale is true;
For all thy features certify
That every one reproaches thee,
Since thou art old and useless grown;
But why not smother up in dust
The unloving, unrespecting men
Who will not recollect the brave
Thou once didst in thy shelter hold.

C.

Easier said, alas! than done.
Hero! but a little shred
Hast thou seen of my reproach,
Since friends forsook me long ago.
Now my foes on every side,
Among this feeble, falling race
Are held in honour and respect;
Their very tongue's unknown to me;
Amid these hills they were not reared.

W.

It grieves me, I can say so too.
Oft I hear the unlovely sound;
Yet must we bear it as we may,
Now our arms are grown so weak;
But, alas! to see thee thus—
Age wasting thy unfriended side;
Hopeless of the heroic race—
Of gentle face, of stately tread!

C.

Thy speech of love wakes up my grief,
And drops run down my haggard eyes;
Dear is thy mention of the brave,
Though far from me their step has gone.
The time has been when, nobly new,
Kings and chiefs were in my tower;
Ah! if thou hadst seen that day,
Thou wouldst not wonder at my wall.
But me the courteous brave forsook;
They left me silent here and sad—
Not one in all the world to care
Though roofless, ruin'd I were seen.

But hark and hear me, little son!
And hide not from the race to come;
How I shall yet a king's house be
Before the world comes to an end.
But now farewell, and go thy way,
And tell in every land for me,
That here the heroes used to dwell,
Whose like is not beneath the sun,
Nor will be till their race return.
Farewell! thou'rt of their race thyself,
Whilst thou'rt in life, oft visit me.

The old Castle of Inverlochy, according to the Gazetteers, 'stands on the eastern shore of Loch-Eil, about two miles from Fort-William. The whole building covers 1,600 yards, and within the ditch there are 7,000 yards, or nearly an English acre and a-half. The walls in the towers are nine feet thick at the bottom and eight at the top.' The Castle is so ancient that all knowledge of its founders is lost. King Achaius is said to have signed here, in the year 790, a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Charlemagne. It was occupied by the Cummings in the time of Edward the First, and of Bruce and Wallace; and before them by no less a person than the ever-to-be-remembered Banquo, 'the blood-boltered' friend and victim of Macbeth, and the ancestor of the royal family of Stuart, and through them of the Queen. The Castle of Inverlochy, then, had good reason to speak out boldly, and also to use the old Gaelic heroic measure. Ossian himself might have almost seen its foundation; and bards must have often sung his strains within its thick-ribbed sides.

Something in the foregoing poem, at least the title of it, may remind us of Wordsworth's magnificent 'Address to Kilchurn Castle.' I don't know who the author of the Gaelic dialogue was, or when he lived; but, whoever he was, he could not have been indebted for even a hint to Wordsworth. 'Stewart's Collection' was published in the year 1804, and got together, of course, through some previous years. Wordsworth's tour to the Highlands, of which the 'Address to Kilchurn Castle' is one of the fruits, was made in the year 1803, and the poems that arose from it published some time after.

As another specimen of the Gaelic heroic measure, I give the following fragment, which is called 'Ossian's Address to the Setting Sun.' It is translated in Macpherson's 'Ossian,' but is a genuine piece of popular poetry, found in Stewart's collection, in MacCallum's, in Dr. Smith's, and in the Highland Society's report. The Rev. Mr. MacDiarmid, writing in the year 1801, says of this and some other fragments communicated by him to the Highland Society:—'I got the copy of these poems, about thirty years ago, from an old man in Glenlyon. I took it—and several other fragments, now I fear irrecoverably lost—from the man's mouth. He had learned them, in his youth, from people in the same glen—which must have been before Macpherson was born.'—Report, by the Committee of the Highland Society, on the Poems of Ossian—p. 71.

This Address to the Setting Sun, then, belonged to the people; and is, at least, as old as the beginning of the last century. I have translated it line for line, and I may say syllable for syllable, with the original.

OSSIAN'S ADDRESS TO THE SETTING SUN.

Hast thou left the blue depth of the sky,
Thou blameless son! thou golden-tressed!
The doors of the night open lie,
And thy place of repose in the west.

Calm come the sea-waves nigh,
To look on thy face bright and best;
They raise their heads fearful and shy,
When they see thee so grandly at rest;
Wan from thy side then they fly,
Sleep in thy cave darkly drest,
O sun! but with joy to the new dawning hie!

The Gaelic word for sun, 'grian,' is feminine. The sun is here addressed as masculine—a circumstance which, in the opinion of some Ossianic critics, creates an odd confusion, and goes against the great antiquity of this fragment. The supposed confusion, however, does not appear to have been perceived by the unlettered reciter of the poem—who preserved it among them for, at the rate, several generations, and by whom it is said to be still repeated. This is something singular; for, both in Gaelic writing and conversation, the sun is uniformly represented by the pronoun she, and not he. Thus, in the 19th Psalm, we read in Gaelic—as in German, where the sun is also feminine—'She is like a bridegroom.' 'She rejoiceth as a hero that runs the course.' 'Her going forth is from the end of the heaven.' 'There is nothing whatever that may be hid from the heat of her.'

Goethe, in that most grand address to the settings which he has put into the mouth of the melancholy Faust, makes his desponding hero address the great luminary as 'goddess,' and not 'god.' It certainly is very strange, then, that a Gaelic scholar and poet—whether he was ancient or not—should think of calling the 'grian' son, and not daughter; and spoken of it as 'him of the brightest face,' and not 'her of the brightest face.' But it is still stranger to me that the Gaelic-speaking people who knew only their own language, should have continued repeating this fragment to one another, and should have given it unaltered to the collectors, without appearing to see the least incongruity in it—if there really is any.

In English, the sun is sometimes neuter, sometimes masculine; and in Hebrew, the word for sun, 'Shemesh' is also of common gender—sometimes masculine and sometimes feminine. There may be something of the sort in the Celtic idea, though not in the Celtic word 'Grian'; but I cannot say that there is. The Gaelic heroic measure consists of lines usually seven or eight syllables in length, occasionally stretching out to nine and even ten, but sometimes no more than six. The sort of musical swing with which it moves is perhaps better illustrated in the following verses than in the preceding, where the number of syllables differs a little from the general. I have translated, however, line for line with this. This is one of those fragments communicated by Mr. MacDiarmid to the Committee of the Highland Society; also occurs at the conclusion of a much longer poem, Dr. Smith's 'Sean Dana; or, Old Lays.' The argument of the whole poem is thus shortly stated in the 'Highland Society's Report,' page 61:—

'Fingal summoned his heroes for an expedition to the Isle of Iffona. A flood in the river Struthon prevented Gaul from joining them in time; but he embarked a ship alone on the succeeding day. On his voyage, however, he passed his friends, who were returning with unperceived, and landed singly on the hostile shores according to the chivalrous idea of those times, he did not fly, but struck his shield as a token of defiance to the islanders, against whom he singly maintained a desperate conflict, till, fearful of a near approach, they rolled a stone from above, which, striking his thigh, disabled him from moving, and there he was left by his enemies, dashed alike and cruel, to pine and die. His wife, Evirich, anxious for his fate, embarked in a skiff with her infant son, Ogal, at her breast, in quest of her lord, whom she found in the pitiable situation described, and was able to carry to her boat, where they were discovered next morning by Ossian, who had sailed in quest of them, speechless and dying. He was only able to save the child.

This fragment, called 'The Bed of Gaul,' forms the Lament, spoken by Fingal over the dead body of the hero and his wife:—

THE BED OF GAUL.

Prepare ye the bed of our hero,
O children of music's sweet tone!
Lay his sunbeam of battle beside him,
Where his tomb through long time may be known.
Let the high leafy bough overshadow it,
Of the oak with its green-growing spray—
First to bud in the breath of the spring shower,
That lasts when the heath fades away.
Its leaves from the skirts of each far land
Shall summer's gay birds behold;
On Strumon's boughs, when they wearily come,
Their joyful wing they shall fold.
In his mist, Gaul shall hear their sweet singing,
And maidens lamenting, that say—
'Alas, Evirchoma!' Till these things shall perish,
Undivided in thought shall ye stay—
Till this stone into dust shall crumble—
Till with age this branch shall fade—
Till this stream run no more from its mother,
Far off in the mountain glade—
Till the age of the bard is lost in time,
And his tale and his song none can sing:
No stranger shall ask 'Who was Morni's son?'
Or 'Where lies Strumon's king?'

There seems to be something like a Scriptural and Oriental grace about this beautiful and pathetic fragment. Whoever composed it, could have been no mean poet. Gaul, the son of Morni, it will be remembered, was a great hero. The Ajax of the Fingalians, excelled by none in strength and courage, he deserved to have so noble an elegy spoken over him by the ever-generous and courteous Finn.

The next is more complete, and very probably a good deal older. The original may be found in 'MacCallum's Collection of the Poems of Ossian, Orraun, Ulin, and other Bards who flourished in the same age.' The collection was made orally, about the beginning of this century. There is a poem which in part closely resembles this one in the Dean of Lismore's book. But the present version treats its subject in a far more picturesque and dramatic manner. Its title is

THE BANNERS OF THE FEINNE.

On a hill stood the King of the North, and looked
To the sea, where his proud ships rode,
Then he looked to the shore, where his camps stretch'd
Along,
And the heroes of Lochlin abode.

Then he turn'd to the land; and there, far away,
A terrible hero came,
And above him a banner of Albin's gold
Floated and shone like a flame.

'Bard of sweet Songs,' said the King of the North,
'What banner is this I see;
And the champion tall at the head of yon host,
Is he of the sons of Victory?'

'That' said the Bard, 'is Diarmid MacDoon,
His is the banner you see;
When the hosts of the Feinne to the battle go forth,
The first in the fight is he.'

'But, Bard of the Songs, there's another now,
And it is red as blood—
A mighty hero's at its head,
High waves it o'er a multitude!'

'That,' said the Bard, 'is the banner of Raine,
A manly chief and a good;
Heads are oft cleft 'neath its folds in twain,
And ancles are bathed in blood.'

'Again, what banner is this I see,
Thou Bard of beautiful Song,
Dreadful the chief by its side appears,
And heroes around it throng?'

'That is the banner of Gaul the Great;
Yon yellow silken shroud
Is the first to advance and the last to retire;
From its shelter none ever has fled.'

'There is another, thou tuneful Bard,
And a mighty man at its head,
It waves o'er a host—has it ever waved
O'er a field of the conquer'd dead?'

'The dark and dread banner of Calit,' said the Bard,
'Comes fluttering now to your sight;
Fame hath it won where the hosts have been great,
And bloody the terrible fight.'

'There is one other yet, Bard of Song and of Tale!
Yonder it waves o'er a host,
Like a bird in the air, o'er the roar of the surge,
As it breaks on a storm-traversed coast.'

'That is the Besom of Peril, you see;
The standard of Oscar,' he said.
'First in renown in the conflict of chiefs,
Still flutters yon banner of dread.'

We fear'd up the Sunbeam—the standard of Finn;
Fair gleam'd that banner on high,
With its spangles of gold from the fields of its fame,
As it greeted the morning sky.

There were nine chains of gold tied the flag to the staff;
There were nine times nine chiefs for each chain;
Sad to the foe was that banner of light—
They strove 'gainst its heroes in vain.

Then Finn said aloud, 'Bend your heads, O my chiefs!
And redeem your pledge to me;
Show to Lochlin the hardy deeds he will find
On our hills that look down on the sea.'

We rush'd to the fray like a torrent
Down the mountain that rolls in spray;
And fire from the strokes of our heavy swords
In columns of sparks broke away.

Many a shoulder, many a head was gash'd
Ere they turn'd from our ire;
And we heard the sweet shrieks of our foes, as they fled
Like the snake when the heather's on fire.

'That was the victory won by our King;
And I, though now aged and gray—
Many a hero fell by my hand
On that dire and dangerous day.

This ballad bears an interesting resemblance to that celebrated passage in the Third Book of the 'Iliad,' in which Helen, from the walls of Troy, describes, in answer to Priam's questions, some of the distinguished leaders of the Greeks—the kingly Agamemnon—the broad-breasted and much-scheming Ulysses—and the towering Ajax, the bulwark of the Achaeans; and many others, whom she could name and describe; but that she missed her twin-brothers—the horse-taming Castor and Pollux, skilled in boxing—not knowing that the all-nurturing earth already possessed them in Laomedon, in their dear and native land. Indeed, there appears to me to be something altogether more of the true Homeric spirit in the preceding poem than in most of those that go under the name of Ossian. It is evidently an antique and a very energetic production, and certainly sufficiently fierce and savage in the latter part. I have not thought it necessary to go into all the minutiae of the slaughter, as it is given in the original. Oscar, for instance, is represented killing seven troops with his own hand, and the nine sons of the red-haired Manus besides. Caith and Gaul do execution in a like proportion; and the Feinne themselves suffer an immense loss. The Ossianic fragments, by whomsoever composed, do not often dwell upon slaughter with this evident delight. With respect to the age of the ballad, it would be needless to make any conjecture. It may belong to the time of the Vikings, and therefore be subsequent to the eighth century; or it may be even older in its first form, as there is said to have been a lively intercourse between Scotland and Scandinavia at a much earlier period. The following sentences, in reference to this subject, I quote from the work of a very intelligent foreigner:—"They (that is, the Songs of Ossian) have quite a peculiar interest for the Scandinavian North, from the striking agreement both in tone and spirit which they present to several of the songs of the Sagas and Edda. These last, again, afford a strong proof of the genuineness of those attributed to Ossian, since the songs of the Sagas and Edda, at the time Macpherson published his 'Ossian,' were either not at all or but very imperfectly known even in Scandinavia itself, not to speak of other countries. The real age of Ossian's songs is very uncertain, and very difficult to discover; but this much is clear, that they indicate a lively intercourse between Alba (Scotland) and Lochlin (Scandinavia) long before the times of the Vikings, and previously to all historical accounts of connections between those countries."

* 'Worsaae's Account of the Danes and Norwegians in England, Scotland, and Ireland.' The Norwegians in Scotland. Section 2.

THOMAS PATTISON.

THE LODGER IN THE ATTIC.

WHEN Admiral Tuffin retired from active service, with a ball in his shoulder and four shillings a-day to compensate for it, he settled down in the neighbourhood of his native village, in the wilds of Cumberland. He had outlived all his relatives; but the place of his boyhood possessed attractions to him, and he took a small cottage on the outskirts of the village of Harfell, and employed me and my John to look after his domestic arrangements.

The poor old gentleman did not live very long, and at his death John and I inherited the little money he had to leave; and we deliberated for some time as to the use to which we should apply it. John had a hankering after the public line; but I felt I could not demean myself by serving out half-pints to carmen and such like, so that idea was abandoned; and at last it was settled that we, for the first time in our lives, should leave our native county, and go to London to find a good investment for our little fortune.

Something within me whispered 'Lodgings.' John agreed; and, before long, we were established in a small house in a northern suburb of London—in the front parlour window of which hung a card, upon which was inscribed 'Apartments to let.'

Some time elapsed before any one applied to see the rooms; but one morning, while John was enjoying his after-breakfast pipe in the back yard, a young man, strolling leisurely along, stopped, attracted by the card. He looked attentively, stroked his chin with the back of his hand as if in doubt, walked on two or three paces, came back, and finally ascended the two steps, and knocked at our door. I answered it myself.

'You have some rooms to let, I see.'

'Yes, sir,' I answered; 'and very nice ones they are—well furnished, with coals, and a view at the back, and attendance, and——but wont you walk in and see them?'

'My good woman! you have wasted a great deal of breath in describing what I don't want.'

My countenance fell on hearing this; but he continued—

'If you had allowed me to speak first, I should have told you that I did not require furnished apartments, but simply an attic. These houses have, I believe, sky-lights on the roof?'

'Yes, sir, and——'

'Thank you. The next question is—Are you disposed to let the room which is lighted by that sky-light?'

'Well, sir, I dare say we could manage it; but you would find the expense of the other rooms very little more; and anything that we could do——'

'Bless the woman! If I wanted the other rooms, I should take them. Can I have the attic?'

'Well, sir, if——'

'Answer Yes or No!'

'I think my husband——'

'Yes or No!'

'Well; yes, sir; you can have it.'

'That is well. I shall send in what furniture I want; and, after that, I shall require the key of the room, as no one must enter it under any pretext.'

'Wont you want your bed made?'

'I shall not sleep here.'

'Or the furniture dusted?'

'No; nothing. I will pay the rent you ask; but on these conditions. If you do not like the arrangement, I will go somewhere else.'

I longed to ask John; but the gentleman seemed so impatient that I agreed at once; and he left the house, saying he would return the following day.

He was a nice-looking young man enough, with a light fluffy mustache, and his hair pushed back behind his ears; but somehow I didn't seem to like him. His way of speaking was sharp and disagreeable; and I was almost sorry I had agreed to let him the room. My John, who was always of an unsuspicious nature, could not see any reason for refusing him the attic; but, I confess, thoughts ran through my mind connecting our lodger with gangs of coiners, robbers, or even murderers.

'Nonsense!' said my husband.

'It may be, John; but when you are murdered in your bed, you'll see I was right.'

He laughed, and I saw it was no good talking with him on the subject; so the matter dropped.

The following day, the stranger came to the door in a cab, with his luggage. I own to being curious, and I took account of all that went up stairs to the attic. First, there was a good-sized box; then three bits of wood, fastened together at the top; after that, a bundle and a little box; and, last of all, a large frame, apparently carefully wrapped up, which he carried himself.

'Can I help you, sir?' I asked, civilly enough.

'No,' said he. 'Give me the key of the room, and be off.'

It was rude, but I had no other course but to retire; and I heard him go stamping up stairs to the top of the house. It was only right that I should know something of our lodger; so, after a short time, I went up stairs, knocked at the door, and asked him if he wanted anything; but he answered, grumpily enough, that when he wanted anything he'd ask for it; and I was forced to descend without seeing the inside of the room. In about an hour's time, he came down with his hat on.

'Beg your pardon, sir; but you haven't told me your name.'

'Adams—Robert Adams.'

'And if the rest of your luggage comes while you are out, what shall I do with it?'

'The rest! I brought everything with me this morning.' And out he went, without so much as saying 'good day.'

A week passed; and, notwithstanding all my efforts, I was unable to ascertain anything respecting Mr. Adams. He came generally in the morning at about eleven o'clock, and remained till four or five; but no sound came from the attic by which I could guess at the way he passed his time when locked in that room. In vain I strove to urge John to question.

'It's no good, Martha (my name is Martha). He pays his rent; and if he wishes to be undisturbed, why not leave him alone?'

I saw it was no use trying to arouse John; so I waited patiently, hoping to discover in time something more concerning Mr. Robert Adams. I like a mystery. I have read cheap periodicals, in which the hero does many strange and, to all appearances, incomprehensible things; and at first I strove to envelop our lodger in a cloud of romance, but his proceedings soon put an end to that. His name, to begin with, was not romantic. He was accustomed to smoke short black pipes, to drink porter, and to whistle popular ballads; to none of which practices were the mysterious heroes of penny numbers given to indulge.

One day he addressed me—

'I expect some persons will call upon me this afternoon. Will you direct them to my room? You need not trouble yourself to come up with them.'

'Certainly, sir. But if you expect visitors, would you not rather use the parlour? It is quite at your service.'

'I told you when I took the attic, that if I had required your furnished rooms I should have taken them.'

I could make no reply, for all my offers were cut so short that I must confess I did not feel particularly friendly to Mr. Adams. I went into the kitchen to await the arrival of his visitors, wondering very much who they would be. I was not kept long in expectancy. A ring at the door bell summoned me; and I found, on opening the door, a tall burly man waiting to be let in. He was very shabbily dressed, and chewed the stalk of a flower reflectively.

'Do Mr. Adams put up here?' he asked.

'He's got a room here,' I replied.

'All right, old lady! That's it.'

He actually said 'old lady!' although I was only thirty-five last birth-day; and my John, who was in the passage, never offered to knock him down!

'You'll find him up at the top of the house,' said I. 'You've only got to go up those stairs till you knock your head against his door.' And up he went, bumping against the banisters.

'John,' said I, turning to my husband, 'are you going to allow this? I'm surprised at you! You, who swore to protect me, standing by while I am insulted, and never saying a single word!' I could have gone on at him much longer, only a double knock at the door suggested the idea that the furnished apartments were going to be taken; so, smoothing my apron, I opened the door, prepared to vaunt the rooms to the utmost. A very pretty and elegantly dressed lady was standing on the steps.

'Will you walk in, madam?' I said. You will find the rooms everything you can desire, with a view at the back, and coals, and attendance, for twenty-five shillings a-week.'

'I do not understand. I would see one Mr. Adams,' replied she, with a foreign accent.

'Mr. Adams, ma'am!' I stared aghast. The idea of asking so grand a lady to walk up three pair of stairs to a little room with two rude hulking men in it, I could not do it.

'If you'll walk in here, ma'am, I'll tell Mr. Adams.' And I went up to the attic to do so.

'Is that you, Agnes?' asked Mr. Adams, when I knocked at the door.

Agnes, indeed! thought I—no miss, or anything; so, making my voice sound as stern as possible, I replied, 'No; it's me, sir—Martha.'

'What's the matter?'

'A lady below inquiring for you, sir.'

'Why, the what's his name! didn't you tell her to come up?'

'Well, sir, I thought —'

'Never mind what you thought; send her up.'

It was not with a very good grace that I directed the fine lady to the attic; and she went up the steep stairs muttering to herself in some foreign language.

John was out, or I should have given him a piece of my mind respecting Mr. Adams and his goings on. As it was, I was forced to content myself with endeavouring to guess the business of our attic lodger.

I happened to be in the passage when the visitors to Mr. Adams went out, and remarked that, considering the apparent distinction between the two, they seemed to be on very friendly terms. What it all meant was a puzzle to me; but I determined sooner or later to arrive at the bottom of it.

The following day, the same visitors came and remained the greater part of the afternoon in the little room. Four days in succession they came; and on the evening of the fourth, I spoke to my husband.

'John,' said I, 'these goings on are not to be borne.'

'What's the matter, my dear?' asked he, as cool as a cucumber.

'Matter enough! There's that precious lodger of ours looked up in the attic with a Frenchwoman, and a man who looks more like a housebreaker than a respectable Englishman, for five or six hours every blessed day, and you ask what's the matter!'

'Well, Martha?'

'Well—you call it well. Isn't it your duty to find out what characters you are sheltering?'

'He pays his rent, don't he?'

'Yes, of course; but——'

'All right, Martha, that's all I mean to look after; and he actually began to whistle. I continued talking; he only whistled louder. I got angry; and he left the house.

The next time these strange visitors were in the attic, I crept cautiously up the stairs, and listened at the keyhole.

Let me here observe that any lady or gentleman who may hereafter take my lodgings, will not be spied upon in this way. This was a solitary case, and I felt myself justified in endeavouring to discover the mystery connected with the lodger in the attic.

I was rewarded by hearing Mr. Adams ask for 'the pistols!' My first idea was to run immediately to the police-station; but second thoughts are best, and I determined to wait a little, hoping to discover something more. But all was quiet; and, after a length of time, I was forced to go down stairs. When the lady left the house that day, I noticed that she held money in her open hand, which she counted as she descended the stairs. Could it be that the three formed a band of robbers, and that my attic was the place where they formed their plots, and afterwards shared their ill-gotten gains? John, like a cold-blooded monster, laughed at my suspicions, and refused to take any steps in the matter; consequently, it was all left in my hands, and I determined by a bold stroke to find out their villanies.

I was prevented, for several days, putting my plan into execution; but in that time I had two conversations with Mr. Adams. In the first, he cut me very short. In the second, he said suddenly—

'Now, look here—when I took your attic, I told you I wished to be quite private, and you agreed. Since then you have been continually prying about my affairs, and I won't have it. If I am a robber or a murderer it's nothing to you, provided I pay my rent.' So saying, he went out of the house and banged the door after him like anything.

A robber or a murderer, he said! and I turned quite cold at his words, but nevertheless I determined that the following day I would unravel the mystery. Accordingly, after the two visitors had been with Mr. Adams as usual about an hour, I crept softly up stairs, and again listened at the keyhole. All was silent. I cautiously turned the handle, and then suddenly flung the door wide open. The sight I saw nearly made me faint; but I recovered my senses in a few moments. Happily I was just in time. The poor unfortunate French lady was upon the ground, her hair dishevelled, and her face expressive of the greatest terror. The wretch who had called me 'old lady' held her firmly with one hand by the throat to stifle her cries, and in the other grasped, uplifted, a short glittering dagger. Mr. Adams was hiding behind a sort of wooden screen. My entrance seemed to paralyse the would-be murderer. Thank goodness, I am in time to save her life, I thought.

'Murder—murder—help!' I cried with the whole strength of my lungs.

'Ha, ha, ha! Ha, ha, ha!'

'Could it really be laughter?'

'Ha, ha, ha!'

The ruffian flung down his weapon, held his sides, and roared. The French lady I had just rescued from a violent death, sat up upon the floor, and joined in the assassin's merriment. Mr. Adams emerged from behind the screen—his face convulsed—and joined in the chorus.

It was some minutes before our lodger could sufficiently recover his countenance to speak to me. John in the meantime, startled by my cries, had lumbered up stairs, and stood staring round him with an air of perplexity.

At length, Mr. Adams explained the affair.

'You must know that I am an artist, and am very anxious to complete a picture in time for the Exhibition of the Royal Academy. At home, I am liable to frequent interruptions, consequently I looked out for an attic, with a good light, for my studio; and, finally, as you know, took this room. These,' I added, turning to his visitors, 'are my models for the two principal figures; and when you entered, they were grouped for me to paint from.'

I was quite taken aback, and could only mutter some confused apology. John stood bowing and scraping, and saying he was very sorry—hoped for offence—and so on. Of course, no offence was taken. Mr. Adams was a gentleman; and ever since been one of our best friends.

[NOTE.—My worthy landlady has asked me to read through an account of a little affair in which she was concerned, which she has written, and to correct or alter anything I may think necessary. I have done so only in a few cases, where provincialisms rendered it necessary.

The 'three bits of wood, fastened together at top,' was, doubtless, my easel; and the screen, behind which I was supposed to be sheltering myself, the same with the canvas stretched upon it.

After deliberation, I allow the sentence which describes me as 'nice-looking,' to remain—that being the only passage in which I appear to advantage. Let me here add, that the churlishness, or 'grumpiness,' of my manner—which appears to have offended my landlady—was assumed for the express purpose of silencing questioners.

I have nothing more to say, with the exception, perhaps, that my picture was exhibited, and sold at a very good price; and, if I may be allowed to put the moral of this anecdote, I should say—

'Never make a mystery to your landlady!'

R. A.

A SOLITARY WALK AT FÜRTH.

A WALK at Fürth! Where is it? What is it? And why did I go thither? It is but a commonplace-looking little town, of sixteen or eighteen thousand inhabitants, of whom a large proportion are Jews. Jews belong to all German towns in which trade is carried on; but this particular town rather belongs to them. It has four or five synagogues and a Jewish university. Perhaps, if the rivers Rednitz and Pegnitz were spoken of, the names of them might be scornfully answered, as the Syrian answered the prophet of old. That there are, in all parts of the known world, rivers of greater renown and of greater volume than those two, I admit. But of those two, Fame has not been quite silent; and, at their confluence, the town of Fürth is situated. Their waters are used by its inhabitants, a very busy people, in manufactures of various kinds. Nuremberg is only a few miles distant. Now, that great commercial city of the middle ages had a weakness—shared, indeed, then by all towns inhabited by Christians—on the matter of Jews. It hated and avoided them. Yet the peaceful industry of the Jewish race had taught the Nurembergers much, and had brought them much wealth. From hating and avoiding them went on to slaying, robbing, and banishing. At length a law was made that no Jew should be permitted to pass a night in Nuremberg. After that Fürth came into existence. It traded and carried on business successfully even with the old enemy of the descendants of the twelve tribes; and I was told there that the first railroad made in Germany is that between Nuremberg and Fürth. So much for where Fürth is, and what it is. Why did I go thither? Not out of any unchristian interest in Hebrews, but from a propensity—perhaps it is a little one—to linger near spots consecrated by the memory of a great man—a hero. But there are heroes and heroes. There are some to whom a lawful tribute of love and veneration is due; others to whom an offering of the chilliest admiration would be an unlawful tribute. Germany has two of the latter kind, who are much talked of and much written about—Wallenstein and the great Frederic of Prussia. Their memory can never win either the respect or love of a true, honest Christian heart. At Prague, for all sight-seers, I had been led to Wallenstein's place. This, I said, I might see—not because I admire the character of the great general who lived here in days gone by, but because I admire Schiller, who cast a poetic charm around such a character. His charm solely prevailed over me on entering the house of the Count von Waldstein, the sixth collateral descendant from the great Duke of Friedland, the all-powerful Wallenstein, who had there kept royal state with a retinue of six hundred persons. We were shown a great hall, in which balls and concerts are now given; in it he had feasted his guests at tables covered with all the luxuries of the times. The ceiling is ornamented by a painting representing him in a triumphal car. Here, perhaps, when the feast was over, he had talked at midnight with his astrologer, Semi. Here, when, by the influence of the Emperor's confessor, he was deprived of his command, his angry cry may have resounded.—'A Capuchin friar, with his rosary, has disarmed me!' Here, when that Emperor needed his services again, and wished him to return to the army, but under the Crown Prince, he may have made that impious reply—'I would not serve under God the Father himself!' Yet this man had a chapel in his palace! We were shown, in the gallery of it, which is entered from one of the apartments, the chair used by him, and the piece of carpet on which he knelt. At all events, there was no harm in believing they were his, as we looked down on the altar-piece of his chapel. It represents the assassination, in the evening twilight, at the door of a church, of King Wenzel, the saint who brought Christianity into Bohemia. He was kneeling in prayer when murdered by his brother, and in his death agony he seized the iron ring of the door. That ring was preserved, and by it miraculous cures were wrought. Thinking not of the ancient saint's assassination, but of that of Wallenstein, I left the chapel. Recalling how that dreaded man, who had done too much for his imperial master, fell by that master's command, in the dead of night, in his own castle, without a sound being heard by friend or partisan.—Did some touch of pity for him then move my heart? No. For by that time I had reached the garden, and had been conducted into a kind of grotto-room, in which is preserved, stuffed, and standing up, the horse on which he rode at the battle of Lützen. That creature had borne him safe in the battle in which Gustavus Adolphus fell! I would look at it no more.

In Nuremberg I went, of course, to see its interesting old Rath-haus, or Town-hall. It was built five centuries ago, but it had the addition of a more modern front about three hundred years later. The old part has a very fine hall more than two hundred feet long, and broad and high in good proportion. It was decorated by the man spoken of constantly in Nuremberg, Albert Durer; and there is to be seen his triumph of the Emperor Maximilian, with five or six pairs of horses drawing the triumphal car, and a pair of the Emperor's virtues at the heads of each pair of horses. One may see, too, the old throne on which all the German Emperors sat in their turn to receive the homage of the burghers of Nuremberg; may hear that this old hall has re-echoed to the voice of Charles the Fifth, and may remain unmoved. But that will not be the case when one is told, 'There sat Gustavus Adolphus—his words resounded here!' Gracious and pious they were, the historians of Nuremberg tell us.

And now I come to the wherefore of my going by the railway—a half-hour's journey from Nuremberg to Fürth, a town of which I saw very little—my object being what is called the Alte Feste, the old fortress in its neighbourhood. But, in fact, there is no fortress there. There is a high hill, with a tower—a modern structure—on it. The country below the hill—now covered by a plantation of firs, and intersected by the Rednitz—was once the scene of many a bloody fight. Wallenstein's camp was intrenched around and on the hill of the Alte Feste; and after the King of Sweden had for more than a month tried to draw the Imperialists out of their intrenchments to give him battle, he determined on storming that hill. Six or eight times did the fearless Swedes renew the attack unsuccessfully. At last, the combat became a frightful hand-to-hand fight, 'until night compelled the troops of Wallenstein to retire within their lines. The Swedes remained on the ground. It was cold, and a heavy rain fell; which made the roads in such a state, that when morning came the King saw that there was no possibility of renewing the battle. The preceding bloody day had decided nothing. Both armies had lost many thousand men, and both withdrew from the vicinity of Nuremberg to renew the contest elsewhere. Wallenstein was the last to depart; and, on leaving, he set fire to his place of encampment, and to all the villages lying around it. Five days after, Gustavus Adolphus returned to Fürth, without his army—moved by some curiosity about Wallenstein's abandoned camp, and the battle-ground. Having visited them, he went back to his troops.

Since then, who visits the scene of that bloody episode in the thirty years' war?—an episode, too, in the history of Nuremberg, when her burghers held their breath for fear, during those terrible weeks of the Swedish King's throwing up trenches around the town, and his subsequent waiting for the battle refused by Wallenstein. Who now visits the Alte Feste, walking from Fürth through the fir wood, ascending the hill, and searching for what remains to mark it as the place where the two greatest generals of their time encountered each other? Perhaps a historian now and then, to measure the field of battle with his eye; perhaps a young poet, with Schiller's 'Wallenstein's Lager' in his hand—for this was the spot to which that portion of his great tragedy refers. But, historian or poet, neither would dare in his musings to imagine what had been the thoughts of the first great visitor to that place; to ask whether then, thinking of what his Swedes had done there, his hopes were high in his high cause; or whether aught prophetic in his soul whispered that, when next he and Wallenstein met, he should be victorious over the imperial leader; but that he should purchase victory at the expense of his life.

When I reached the summit of the hill of the Alte Feste, being neither historian nor poet, but a traveller who finds places only interesting in as far as a human interest attaches to them, I looked if any vestiges remained to recall the momentous time of which I was thinking. There is a large round stone table, at which it is said Wallenstein sat to give his orders. It is so solid and cumbersome that there is no reason to doubt its having been there for centuries. But something that had not been there for centuries might have been found, I thought, to tell of Wallenstein's noble foe. At length, I discovered a little shabby denkstein—monumental stone; but no name of Gustavus Adolphus on it. It merely declares that a battle was fought there between the Imperialists and the Swedes on such a date. There have, it is true, been many battles fought for foolish causes between sovereigns; but I think even the foolishness had a better and a worse side, which would be worth setting before men if the battle were worth remembering in after years. But the battle here had been fought for the highest and holiest cause—freedom to worship God according to man's conscience, enlightened by the Scriptures. I disliked that stone with its few engraved words more than I disliked Wallenstein's stuffed horse. But more than either did I dislike the place in which I was. No longer solitary, I was in a coffee and beer garden! To that purpose was the hill of the Alte Feste dedicated! Such a dedication of such a spot!

At long tables, with benches at each side, sat men and women, students and girls, peasants and their wives and daughters—every man sending up his cloud of tobacco smoke—most of the women knitting, some drinking coffee; while on all sides the foaming glass of Bavarian beer was being quaffed—and all went on to the sound of a band of music. So it is everywhere in Germany, in any picturesque place, or in any place which has been the scene of a great historic event. Thus, few spots are left for silent meditation of Nature, or on the strivings and shortcomings of man in societies. Germans talk of a noble Begeisterung, ideale—a fine enthusiasm for the ideal. I can rather see this, a fine enthusiasm for humanity, practically shown—not in disquisitions over books, and in the midst of tobacco smoke. One of their own poets has a verse, which I could not recall, as I sauntered away from the Alte Feste back to Fürth. Literally translated it is this:—'What hast thou on the banks of Rhine and Ister, that thou should dare to compare yourself with the Athenians? Ye have magazines, newspapers, critiques, tobacco and beer, and the police!'

So, then, who now visits with the historian, or the poet, or the traveller, that hill to which the great Gustavus Adolphus came after the battle, desirous to meditate, willing to learn aught that he could for the service of his fellow-men in the science of war? Who come? Idlers—the careless, the thoughtless, the dull—who, if they once reflect that the native land in former days could contend nobly for a great principle, think it best to forget that as soon as possible.

M. M. L.

DEAD.

OUR first-born and our dearest
Grew sick and pined away,
And left our home in darkness
As she soar'd to endless day.
'Twas in the dark December,
In the midnight of our woe,
We saw her life's last ember
Growing dim and burning low.

She died, as die the lilies
On the bosom of the stream;
And pass'd, as pass the shadows
From the sleeper's early dream.
But still her voice is ringing
Through the chambers of my brain;
But never more I'll meet her
In this breathing world again!

T. K.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Author. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return them considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK
18 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 22
Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

thought—do they ever sing to the accompaniment of old pianos—those first daughters of the ancient spinnet—such strains as Luther's? or the less severe version of Tallis? or, haply, the easier anthem of Cecil, to those words gathered from what Sir Philip Sidney calls 'that heavenly discourse of the lost child and gracious father'? I fear the answers to those questions. And then, what beautiful books are theirs! How wonderfully adorned in colour and gold! What charming designs! What wonderful illustrations! Genius and art are doing top much for them—they leave too little for them to imagine. The artist imagines for them. He satisfies them before they are hungry. The child's want of expressing his thoughts by some means or other in his own power, whether in rude picture, on paper or slate, or in imaginary day dream—revealed to a wondering sister or sympathising schoolfellow—is now satisfied almost before it is felt. The creative faculty rusts unused. The world of mental fantasy remains chaotic and unshaped. A certain hardness of character forms within. The stellar influences work not as heretofore. Jupiter brings not what is great, or Venus what is fair. Our boys are over-read, over-taught; but under-thoughtful, under-imaginative. The fair spirit of Poesy, the sweet dream-culture of the soul, is unexercised. True, the instinctive veneration of children for something out of themselves, the devotion of their young hearts to some object of worship, cannot be annihilated. But, unfortunately, its modern direction seems to lie towards the actual, divested of every thread of imagination, every rag of fancy. They fall down and worship the cold idol of worldly success. Alas! too often that unworthy goddess holds a lie in her right hand. Her eyes glitter on the surface with strange fire. But, far back in the miserable hollows, lurks an unbroken night.

Not of these, but of their younger brothers and sisters, is my theme—of the little ones of the household, the tender buds of the domestic tree, the nurslings of the flock, the callow brood of the warm nest; the infantile Lares, the small Penates, of our Christian hearths; the young shoots of the family vine, which bear no fruit and yield no shade, but twine so closely round the parent stock that Death, when he uproots or tears them away, often leaves behind but a broken, bleeding stump. They are the Tommies and Harries, the Lizzies and Evas, the Charlies and Willies of life. In the dictionary of my heart, I keep more than one choice red-leaved page for these universal diminutives of the polyglot man. With feelings of love, tenderness, and protection, I delight in them—I rejoice and tremble. Who knows of what after value these little blank bills of humanity will become. Will heaven honour them at last? Whose endorsement, God's or that wicked one's, will lie across the lines of life? Will the discount demanded by Mercy be so large as to absorb the principal, or will the mighty creditor be paid in full, and still the balance be a noble one which lies to the soul's credit in the Eternal exchequer? Ah! what issues —

But let us leave this mercantile moralising. Very pleasant is it to watch a group of little folks standing at the corner of the street, or walking sedately along—haply just released from school, or met together fortuitously on maternal embassy. How busily they talk! What a Lilliputian flow of eloquence! What rapid change-ringing of the baby bells of speech! What can they have to talk about? What facts, what information, what discoveries form the staple of that busy trade in words? I suppose their converse, like their elders, turns on the business of their lives—the prosaic elements of their every-day experience. But what touches of imagination, produced by their childish ignorance and purity, light up here and there the picture of their discourse! How unreal, how pathetic in its unworldliness, their view of the doings of grown-up people! They stand on a different platform to ours. Their world of ideal suggestion and knowledge revolves within our wide sphere, like a fairy bubble. Heaven keep it from breaking over soon! Never again will such beautiful colours, such sky-drawn glories, such emanations of the dawn, be woven into the tissues of life. As we grow older, the splendour fades—the brilliant hue becomes dark—the stuff of which our days are made turns hoden gray. Our spirits are fortunate if the prevailing tint be neutral. But no, my little dear, I am not going to sadden your young hearts with foreboding any such change in your case. Bless you, you would not understand me if I did. Nature herself is jealous of your rights; and, indeed, you look so wise sometimes, that I have often thought you know all about it;—at least, not you, but the angels who have taken your place for a time, and sent the little children up to heaven the while, to the great joy of that country.

But, however, I do not deny, in a general way, the humanity of these little ones. They have their friendships and dislikes like grown-up people. They are passionate, revengeful, loving, partial, prejudiced, like their wiser elders. As with us, some one of the number stands out clear and distinct, the cynosure of infant eyes, the leader and pattern of infant experience. Child influences child, as man man, woman woman; in degree less, maybe, but in the same. I know it to my cost. Some years I was in the pit of B— Theatre, and observed a young and handsome man enter one of the boxes. Calmly and languidly, his glance wandered round the house, rested for an instant on me, passed away cold and unremembering. But my membranes were more vivid. Clearly and painfully I recognised that elegant young man. The theatre became a mist; vanished the rows of spectators, the shining lamps, the glittering pendants, the painted curtain. Deep in the silent country, far down a side-road, appeared my old school-house, facing a green lane, with garden and playground on the other side. I thought of the time when I entered that school—a pure and happy lad. I shuddered at the sight of those lips which had poured the deadliest ab-tion into my ears; and then, after the lapse of many years, my spirit rose against that graceful gentleman, handling his opera-glass so daintily. In the hatred of my remembrances I could have cursed him. But the tenderness with which we think of our childhood and its associations came betwixt the curse and its object; and, indeed, softened the malediction itself into something between a sigh and a prayer.

Heaven bless thee, my little Ted! and keep thee from such contamination! keep thee from what is so often the beginning of the fall from sweet childish instincts—becoming impatient of the love of thy sisters! Long mayest thou find delight in their charming little letters, which breathe of the country like the scent from a hay-field! Long, too, may it be before thou and they are condemned to the tread-mill of conventionality, feeding on the dry chaff of respectability, and ashamed of saying the thing that is in thy heart! But, indeed, in the matter of telling the truth, thou hast thy story; and 'tis not a bad one. As when, in the time of petticoats, sitting with thy mamma, Miss Vapid was announced. Straightway thou wert despatched with the news into the paternal study; and this was the result:—

'Did you tell your papa that Miss Vapid was here?'

'Ta mamma.'

'What did he say?'

'What a bore!'

He thinks the reply was, if I may use the term, a tour de force. There was no resisting it. Compromise was out of the question. It was not to be extenuated or smoothed over. No hem-ing or haw-ing could smother it up in indistinction. It stood bolt upright in the way of apology. It faced Conventionalism, and bored him. It was sublime, like Fate. Since then, Miss Vapid hath wandered away into the Elysian fields. Haply, she is found to be a bore even there. True, if bitter, was thy infant speech; and true, though not bitter, be thy winged words for ever—per dilectissime!

I am thankful to say that among my little friends are no prodigies; no infant Thames-setters-on-fire; no mental phenomena of three feet; no admirable Crichtons in petticoats. They are all good specimens of English juveniles—not averse to a moderate dose of school, but ready for a whole pharmacopeia of play. I admire them all the more that they are not above being bribed into knowledge—that they like their alphabet—like their powders, sweetened. I remember, in my own case, how long and vainly I skirmished with the advanced guard of a spelling-book, before I was reinforced by timely supplies of jam-pot and ear-basin. After that, I need not say the victory was my own; and, like a cannibal, I feasted on the conquered. I began to find, as that charming Mr. Merry prepared the dishes, what a splendid repast he laid before me. I became a helluo of his librorum. One of my little friends have just attained their first mouthful. Now, I don't know who is the principal publisher of juvenile books at the present time, but I trust he deals fairly with his children; that he has not shortened his giants by an inch; that his genies are as implacable, his rocs soar as high, his Sindbads have as little to do with the island of Ceylon as those of my youth. Let the little ones believe all they can. It's a mistake to be poking your absurd explanations among the glorious fictions. You can't lay down the railway of Fact in Fairydom. That country is not to be surveyed. It lies somewhere over the sea, under the eyes of the morning; and there's not such a thing as a Gunter's chain or a theodolite in the whole realm. They would be useless there.

Most mothers, I am happy to say, acknowledge this, and will repudiate the silly conduct of one of their order, who shudders at Hans Andersen, and has bundled every Jack and Jill of a fairy-book, prince and princess, geni and giant, ogre and fair lady, out of doors. Bless your five hard wits, madam! Do you not see that, with the growth of their faith and sympathy for something for ever beautiful and joyous, with the instinctive forming of their judgments in favour of truth and goodness—and I maintain that a good fairy tale is a mighty convincer of children's minds on the question whether wickedness or worthiness be the best off in the long run—I repeat, madam, do you not see that, along with this mental pleasure and conviction, would blend the image of the gentle mother, at whose feet they sat while reading the precious book, into whose untired ears they poured their hurrying exclamations of surprise and delight? Depend upon it, madam, you are fighting with Nature. The feeling of wonder and faith will be gratified somehow. I should not be surprised if that good old nurse of yours be not attracting and securing much of the love which you are perversely denying yourself, in casting from you the influence of those associations which preserve and strengthen it.

What a very uncomfortable world it would be if there were many children in it like Christian Henry Heinecken, who was born at Lubeck in 1721, and died, at a prodigious age for what he accomplished, in 1725. We are informed that he talked at ten months, read at twelve, knew all the principal facts in the Bible at fourteen, and, when four years old, might have passed a bishop's examination, so well up was he in Christian evidences, besides being a dab hand at church history. Nor is this all. He understood and spoke accurately the German, Latin, French, and Low Dutch languages; and was able, moreover, to repeat 80 psalms and 200 hymns!

This monstrum horrendum, cui lumen ademptum, in his fifth year, of course was too fast a train not to run swiftly into that universal terminus—the grave. Like a comet, he flashed among and beyond the morning stars of childhood, and fell into blank vacancy long before they were even half-way between their horizon and zenith. While men gazed and wondered, he was gone. Peace be to him! These American aloes of humanity are not to my fancy.

But his early death reminds me of more than one darkening of the child-life which I have loved. More than once have I watched, sorrowfully enough God knows! the shadows of impending dissolution creep into the little face, as if to make an abiding home there. Night has resumed the usurpations of the breaking day; their world has gone back into darkness; the orbit of their young lives has floated up among the stars; another sun has risen in a far different east; they ask the meaning of things from wiser, purer lips than ours. Perhaps, in the first days which herald the coming change, the little sufferers cannot forbear a natural peevishness, shown in fretful words, and vague sad chidings at they know not what. They cannot understand the meaning of their aching heads and strength-deserted limbs; they cannot read the hieroglyphic of sickness; their inexperience is unable to interpret this new language, the elements of which are a heavy brow, a pillowed chair, and perpetual stepping in-doors. But 'tis mercifully ordered that, after awhile, the pettish murmurs cease; the rippling stream flows on in silence; a calm and steadfast resignation descends upon them; their interest in external affairs—the sports of their playfellows, their school, their books—flags and dies; the soul retreats into itself, and but remotely visits the outer world of consciousness. Reader! have you never witnessed, in the eyes of a sick child, that patient, mournful look which followed your every movement; but was, withal, so unear, so uninquiring as to what it all meant? And while darker and darker grew the shadows round their waning lives—while thinner, paler, became the little face and hands—have you never noticed how those eyes preserved their unnatural brightness—that fixed and lingering gaze? Unrebuking, uncomplaining to the last, they look up to yours, as if they wondered at the tears you vainly seek to hide.

I had a little cousin who fell ill, and, after a few months' suffering, died and went to God. The heavenly calm which I have spoken about descended upon her. That holy dove, which erst accompanied with the wondrous Child of Nazareth, brooded in her little chamber, and shook from his plumes untroubled peace and blessedness. During all the little maid's illness, the house was like a fore-court of Paradise. Care and worldliness died, like a spent wave, at the threshold. In the room where the child lay was as the rustling of angel-plumes. Watching all things, all persons, in her chamber, with those calm, inscrutable eyes, the baby-sufferer seemed to be conscious of the ethereal visitants.

'How good Polly and Fanny are!' she would say. 'They make no noise. Shall I ever play with them again, mamma?'

Her chief amusement was to listen to her elder sister reading the 'Pilgrim's Progress.' A very real narrative it became to her. The wicket-gate, the house beautiful, the castle of Giant Despair, the land of Beulah, the message, the river, the Shining Ones beyond, took their place in her imagination as waking, substantial realities. Somewhere they existed in veritable fact. It was plain from her comments, made during the course of the narrative, that she expected to experience all for herself. She would not have understood what you meant by an allegory. The book was her history, her biography, to come. In the next world she would be grown up, and begin at the beginning as Christian did. Of course, we never tried to deceive her on this point. Her faith was mightier than our knowledge.

One night, when the pitiful drama of her sufferings appeared to be rapidly drawing to a close, she requested the loved tale to be repeated once more. With much ado to get rid of the stifling feeling in her throat, and the blinding tears in her eyes, her sister managed to comply with the request. At last the child motioned for the book to be laid aside, and said, 'Mamma, I should like to play a game of dominoes.'

They brought the box, and, raising her in bed, placed the ivory counters in order. Nothing would do but that her father and mother must be her opponents. With strength gathered from the might of parental love, they overcame the outward signs of grief, and commenced to play. Meantime, as the game went on, it was strange but cheering to see how careful the child was to see that it should be conducted with all justice and impartiality. 'That's not fair,' she said, and replaced the piece, when her father would have given her a slight advantage. At last the game was finished. She had disposed of all her markers first. She pushed them aside wearily, and lay back on her pillow. Her mother, struck in the heart with sudden forebodings, bent over her. The little eyes looked up for an instant—the little lips murmured, 'I have won, mamma,' and she was gone.

Do the angels play at dominoes, and read that famous story to her now? I shouldn't wonder.

A. S.

THE SEER'S PREDICTION (Concluded).

BY ELLEN EMMA GUTHRIE.

CHAPTER II.

A long silence ensued. 'What think you of this?' at length said Duncan Stewart, gazing inquiringly in his companion's face.

'Tis passing strange,' observed the other, thoughtfully; 'yet, after all, it may prove a mere piece of deception on the part of the Campbells.'

'Still, the old man's mysterious disappearance, and the warning flame—how are these facts to be accounted for?'

'They certainly seem inexplicable at the present moment; but circumstances may yet arise which will furnish us with a clue to the mystery.'

'Woe betide the Campbells, should we discover them to be the perpetrators of this piece of jugglery!' exclaimed young Stuart of Ardahiel. 'For, so true as my name is Duncan, the Prince shall burn down Lochneil about their ears.'

Not tarrying to make any reply to this threat on the part of his cousin, Edward Stuart hastened to rejoin his men; the other following close on his footsteps. While skirting the base of an eminence in the vicinity of the ruined castle, they observed several of the clan formed into a circle a good way apart from the others. Advancing towards them, Edward Stuart perceived that they surrounded a boy arrayed in dark green tartan, who, standing in the midst, observed a dogged silence, in spite of the taunts levelled at him by the fierce mountaineers.

'What means this?' inquired the Chief, of the Highlander nearest him.

'Why, Master Edward, we captured this young cur of a Campbell while plunging on his way through the heather; and the surly imp refuses to answer our inquiries respecting his business on this side the loch—'

'It was not the questions of such unmannerly dogs as you I was deputed to answer,' interrupted the boy in an imperious tone; and now that I have fulfilled my mission [here he placed a note in the hands of the Chief], I care not to linger on your ground; but' [while speaking, he scowled fiercely on the mocking Highlanders, and worked with the handle of his dagger] 'should any of you chance to visit the Campbell territories, I will not forget the reception accorded to me among the hills of Appin.'

So saying, he darted swiftly up the mountains, amid loud shouts of derisive mirth from his hearers. Recognising Edith Campbell's page in the bearer of the missive, Edward Stuart impatiently ordered a light to be struck, and ran his eye hurriedly over the almost illegible lines. Having mastered its contents, a joyful gleam lit up his countenance; and, beckoning his wondering cousin aside, he, for the first time, made him acquainted with his love for Edith Campbell, and his determination instantly to proceed to Lochneil, to bid her adieu;—her note conveying the welcome tidings that Black Ullick had accompanied his uncle to Edinburgh, therefore they need not fear any interruption.

Duncan Stuart staggered back a few paces, so overwhelmed was he by this unexpected intelligence. Recovering himself as the other prepared to depart, he grasped him by the arm, exclaiming 'Art mad, Edward, thus to precipitate thyself on unknown dangers, after the terrible warning we have so recently received? Who can tell what treachery is intended thee by these black Campbells? Perdition! to think thou shouldst love one belonging to that detested race! You shall not go,' he went on, tightening his grasp on his companion's sleeve; 'you have no right thus foolishly to risk the life now solemnly dedicated to the cause of our lawful Sovereign. Be-think you, seriously, of the dreadful consequences that must ensue, should you fall by the daggers of our enemies, and abandon your rashly formed resolution.'

'Never!' replied Edward Stuart, with flashing eyes, 'though the dirks of a dozen Campbells menaced my breast, yet should I struggle through their midst to obtain an approving smile from the lips of my Edith!'

'Is your love for her so strong?'

'Ay, strong as death itself.'

'Yet she is a Campbell!'

'That is merely a misfortune of birth. The faults of her relations cannot be imputed to her.'

'And you disregard the Seer's warning?'

'Entirely.'

Duncan Stuart smote his hand on his forehead. 'Lost! lost!' he murmured.

Touched by this proof of loving anxiety on the part of his generally heedless cousin, the young Chief placed his hand on his shoulder. 'Ah! Duncan,' he said, sorrowfully, 'you know not what it is to love, else you would recognise the impossibility of my following your advice. But fear not for me; our enemies are absent from the Castle, therefore I can run no risk in obeying the dictates of love. In a few hours I shall rejoin you, with a heart lightened of its care, and an arm doubly nerved to fight for our gallant young Prince. Do you, in the meantime, proceed with your men to my father.'

'That will I not,' said his friend, firmly. 'Since you have made up your mind to embark on this wild-geese expedition, I will accompany you.'

'Duncan! this must not be.'

'Wherefore?'

'Because two lives will needlessly be endangered.'

'Should danger beset your path, it is meet I share it.'

'Duncan!'

'Edward!'

'And you will abide by your resolve?'

'Yes; and unless you agree to my proposal, I will at once have you bound, and conveyed to head-quarters, nor shall you be released till we march to join the Prince.'

Admiring his cousin's inflexibility, Edward Stuart at length yielded a reluctant consent to his accompanying him; but expressed some degree of annoyance when the other likewise insisted that four of his men should act as their escort. But the youth was not to be dissuaded from his purpose. 'In an affair of this kind,' he said, 'one cannot exercise too much caution, especially when dealing with crafty knaves like the Campbells, who are rather expert in the use of their weapons when favoured by darkness.'

Here his cousin, waxing impatient to be gone, cut short the thread of his prudential observations. The men were chosen; the others set out on their march; and the youths, followed by the stalwart Gaels, swiftly retraced their steps towards Benderloch.

The lake crossed, a smart walk of two hours' duration brought them to the gates of Lochneil. Agreeably to the wishes of his cousin, Duncan Stuart and his men stationed themselves among the trees shading the avenue; while the young Chief hastened to the terrace, the spot appointed by Edith Campbell for their meeting. Wildly throbbed his heart as he beheld her graceful form fitting among the bushes at the further end. She turned hastily on his approach.

'Edward!'

'Dearest Edith!' and he knelt at her feet.

'And you are firm in your determination to adhere to the Stuarts!' she said, after young Stuart had thanked her again and again for thus affording him a parting interview.

'Yes, dearest; to-night the Fiery Cross summons the Clan to our standard, and the morning dawn sees us march to join the Prince.'

A momentary shade of displeasure rested on the maiden's brow; this yielded to one of sadness, as she replied in a sorrowful tone, 'But a few hours since I beheld the fiery symbol of war borne over mountain and heath, and it grieved me to think on the bloody drama soon to be enacted in this lovely land. O Edward! would to Heaven you had not attached yourself to the fortunes of this misguided Pretender!'

'There spoke the Campbell!' said young Stuart hastily. 'He is no pretender, Edith, but the son of our rightful Sovereign, and heir to the British throne, of which he has been deprived by these cold-blooded German usurpers; and the welfare of my beloved country demands that, on his arrival in his northern dominions, the sword of every true Scotchman should fly from its scabbard.'

'Say not the welfare,' replied Edith. 'Is it by the glare of the Fiery Cross in these peaceful valleys—the slaying of her bravest sons—the anguished cries of bereaved mothers—the wail of fatherless children—and the widow's tears, that the welfare of Scotland is to be increased?'

'When a monarch is about to wage war with a hostile power,' young Stuart impatiently observed, 'he suffers not his thoughts to dwell on the horrors of the battle-field, but rather on the advantages likely to arise from the victory he feels assured of obtaining over his enemies. In like manner, we endeavour to forget the evils of civil warfare in the unquestionable benefits to be derived from the restoration of King James to the throne of his ancestors.'

Edith Campbell shook her head sorrowfully, as she made reply. 'Edward! you have launched your barque on a stormy sea; beware lest you perish while buffeting with its billows! Reflect for one single moment on the madness of the undertaking in which you are about to engage. Unaided by any fresh troops, without which success is next to impossible, Charles Edward has landed at Borrodale. Enthusiasm in his behalf prevails, at present, among those fiery disaffected chiefs on whose devoted loyalty he reposes implicit confidence; but when disaster and defeat overtake them, when disappointment replaces hope, and expected reinforcements fail to arrive—when murmurs of dissatisfaction are heard among his partisans, and jealousies arise in the camp, then reflect on the words of one who is but too well assured that ruin and despair await those prepared to plunge headlong into the troubled sea of rebellion.'

'Sad, indeed, is the picture with which your imagination furnishes you, my Edith,' said the youth; 'yet I share not your forebodings. We Jacobites are true to our ancient oath of fealty to the Stuarts.'

That passionate loyalty which brought Montrose to the gallows, still burns purely bright in the breasts of the descendants of those heroic chiefs whose banners waved in the van at Kilsyth and Inverlochy. Desirous of emulating those brilliant achievements which have rendered the names of our ancestors imperishable, we are eager to go forth to battle, feeling assured of speedy victory when led on to the fight by a Prince who has proved himself possessed of all the noble attributes so requisite to endear a sovereign to his people. Already he has been joined by Earl Morar and the gallant Lochiel; and soon thousands will declare themselves in his favour, among those whose lukewarm natures and calculating policy have induced to swear allegiance to the German Elector, styled the Young Pretender. Would, dearest, you shared the enthusiasm now glowing in my breast, as I picture to myself the speedy realization of our ancient dreams, and hail the happy future awaiting Scotland when once more governed by a Stuart!

At sight of her lover's beaming eyes, Edith's countenance fell; and she said, sorrowfully, 'Since your determination to embark in this hazardous enterprise is unshaken by any arguments of mine, it only remains for me to bid you farewell—for ever!'

So saying, with an averted gaze, she extended to him her hand, which Edward seized and pressed ardently to his lips.

'My own Edith!' he murmured, 'why give utterance to such heart-rending words? Why permit diversity of opinion to separate us? Are we not bound to each other by our mutual love? Then, wherefore should we part? Let the sustaining knowledge of our unchanged affection console us during the short period of our separation, and once — Nay, interrupt me not; I know what you would say; but do not dispel the blissful hopes I entertain of one day calling you mine. Time may heal the unfortunate breach at present existing between our Clans. For your sweet sake, gladly would I extend the hand of friendship to your uncle, were he disposed to accept my advances. Even Black Ulick should cease to be an object of aversion to me were you to require it.'

As young Stuart spoke thus, the figure of a man, muffled in a large cloak, emerged from among the trees at the side of the Castle, and gliding, snake-like, along the terrace, concealed himself behind some bushes in the immediate vicinity of the lovers. Unconscious of danger, the Chief continued—

'Tell me, Edith! is your Hanoverian relation as pointed in his attentions as when I deemed it incumbent on me to punish his insolence?'

Hiding her blushing face on his shoulder, the maiden avowed the constant annoyance to which she was subjected during her cousin's now frequent visits to the Castle.

'The black-visaged scoundrel!' wrathfully exclaimed Edward Stuart. 'By Heaven! should he cross my path in battle, the encounter will prove a bloody one!'

'God, in His mercy, grant that meeting may never take place!' murmured Edith, in a tone of alarm. 'The hatred he bears you is of that deadly nature so much to be dreaded; and, knowing of what wickedness his evil nature is capable, it froze my heart's blood when I discovered he was aware of our secret meeting. O Edward! had you witnessed the terrific expression of his face, while he upbraided me with my attachment to you, and swore to revenge himself for my coldness and rejection of his oft-urged suit!'

As Edith Campbell finished speaking, a slight rustling among the bushes betrayed the agitation of the unseen listener; but the noise was too insignificant to excite any alarm in the breasts of the lovers, and they continued their conversation until the waning moon gave warning that the parting hour had come. Unable to speak the words that would tear them asunder, the youthful pair silently paced the terrace, alternately gazing on each other's faces and the peaceful lake which lay at their feet bathed in silver light. Suddenly a shrill whistle broke in upon the silence of night. Recognising his cousin's signal, the young Chief perceived that further delay was impossible; the heart-breaking word Farewell must now be spoken. Taking Edith by the hand, he pronounced her name in a tone so irresistibly tender that the maiden's fortitude deserted her, and she burst into tears. In that fragrant moment, the love she bore her Edward swept away the frail barriers erected by pride and family prejudice. Weeping unconstrainedly on his neck, she showed her undying attachment, and resolution never to marry should her stern uncle refuse his consent to their union.

Transported with delight, the young Chief pressed her to his heart. This sweet assurance of her affection robbed their parting of half its pain; and, as his arms encircled her lovely form, and her sweet breath fanned his cheek, all else was forgotten in the momentary intoxication occasioned by the enrapturing avowal of her love. Entwined with the golden tresses which swept his shoulder was a simple white rose. At sight of the Stuart badge, Edward's eyes flashed proudly, and he murmured in the maiden's ear, 'Shall my Edith deem me presumptuous, if I ask, as a parting gift, the flower that nestles amidst her clustering locks?' Blushing, the maiden disengaged the rose, and fastened it at the side of his bonnet.

On witnessing this proof of affection, the concealed observer of their interview, unable any longer to endure the jealous rage swelling in his breast, stole forth from among the bushes, and scowling on the unconscious lovers, muttered savagely between his teeth, as he grasped his dagger with convulsive clutch, 'What hinders me from striking that dog of a Stuart dead at your feet, you false-hearted traitress? Nought save the fear that my good dirk might for once prove false, and your upbraidings would drive me mad. But my poniard will drink his life-blood, where his death-agonies will be visible to none save the owl and the raven. Ha! ha! and you deemed Black Ulick safe in Edinburgh? Fool! ever to imagine he would leave you unprotected at Lochnell, while the Appin Stuarts still ranged through the heather. But I must make haste to cut off your lover's retreat. Ay, gaze in his doll's face while you may; 'twill be your last look of him on this side the grave; and, should you chance to meet him on the other, recognition will be rendered easy by the mark your dreaded cousin has put upon his breast.' So saying, he brandished his dagger in the air, and crept stealthily away in the direction from whence he came.

In the meanwhile, Edith, while fixing the rose in her lover's bonnet, observed, with a mournful smile—'See what strange actions love impels one to perform! Who is more hostile than myself to the Stuarts; yet, in obedience to the request of a headstrong Appin youth, whose affection for myself is not sufficiently powerful to prevent him leaguings with traitors, behold me fastening the badge of rebellion in his cap!'

Blessing her for this fond proof of devotion, Edward Stuart pressed on her lips a parting kiss of mingled love and agony. Edith became deadly pale. 'Stay! stay!' she murmured, as he turned to depart. 'I know not wherefore, but a sudden horror overwhelms me. I feel as though this meeting were destined to be our last. Dearest Edward, if you love me, do not go!' She clung trembling to his arm. Her blue eyes sought his face. As she spoke thus, remembrance of the Seer's warning and the spectral light flashed across the mind of the young Chief. A sudden faintness overcame him. Unable to meet her questioning gaze, he averted his eyes. They fell on the swelling heights of Appin. In imagination, he heard the wild strains of the bagpipe, and beheld his brave Highlanders arming at sight of the Fiery Cross. And where was he, destined to lead them on to victory? With this inspiring thought, his former heroism revived—loyal enthusiasm once more reigned supreme. One last pressure on the upturned forehead of the beseeching maiden—a murmured 'God bless and protect you, dearest!' and he was gone.

From the front of the terrace, Edith beheld him rushing madly down the winding path leading to the avenue. Her tearful gaze followed his waving tartans till they disappeared in the gloom; then, leaning her head on her hand, she abandoned herself to sorrowful reflection. Suddenly, the handkerchief shading her pensive countenance is rudely torn from her grasp, and a white rose, dabbled over with blood, waves before her startled vision. Gazing upward, affrighted, her eyes encountered the basilisk orbs of her dreaded cousin. One wild scream of 'Ulick!' broke from her pallid lips.

'Ay, Ulick!' he howled in derision. 'Ulick! whose poniard reeks with a rival's blood!' Brandishing the still dripping weapon before her sight, he burst forth—'Little recked he of the fate awaiting him as he went gaily down by the loch. He wist not Black Ulick was dogging his footsteps, with hate in his heart and the instrument of vengeance gleaming in his hand. Ha! ha! One blow of my dirk sufficed.

A staggering step, a last look on the heavens, and my hated rival lay dead at my feet!

A low anguished wail alone betrayed the maiden's horror on hearing this dreadful recital; and she pressed half unconsciously, as it were, to her lips the rose whose petals were crimsoned with her lover's gore.

Exasperated well nigh to frenzy at sight of her despair, the cowardly assassin threw away his poniard, and, clasping her in his arms, exultingly exclaimed, 'And now, freed for ever from his favoured rival, Black Ulick returns to renew his unwelcome suit! Steeds are in waiting to bear us to my mountain fastness; and ere the setting of to-morrow's sun, its master shall claim thee, my fair one! as his bride.'

Aroused by these appalling words to a sense of her situation, Edith uttered a succession of shrieks, and struggled to free herself from his ruffian grasp. Startled by this unexpected resistance, her fierce kinsman allowed her to slip from his encircling arms. Speedily recovering, however, from his temporary consternation, he was hastening once more to seize upon her trembling form, when a rush of eager feet and the waving of red tartans warned him of danger. He turned to fly—too late—the dirk of Duncan Stuart pressed his throat!

'Wretch!' shouted the youth; 'what wouldst thou do? Thy hated name, uttered in the piteous tones of a woman's voice, reached mine ear; and, fortunately, I have arrived in time to prevent thy meditated violence. But where is Edward?' he suddenly exclaimed, for the first time observing the absence of his friend.

A ferocious gleam shot from the eyes of Black Ulick, as Edith Campbell, to whom young Stuart had addressed his inquiry, tottered towards the speaker, and, placing the reeking poniard in his hand, faltered forth, 'Dead—murdered by my treacherous cousin!'

With a shuddering glance, fraught with horror! on the scowling assassin, Edith, as she uttered these words, sank fainting into the arms of her domestics, whom her cries had brought forth from the Castle. A cry of bitter rage burst from the Appin Highlanders on hearing this terrible announcement. Swiftly half-a-dozen weapons flew from their sheaths, as the furious mountaineers rushed towards their hated enemy. But the death-stroke was not to be dealt by them. That instant the dirk of Duncan Stuart gleamed in the air. Like lightning it descended, and the life-blood of the catiff Campbell dyed the green sward. Spurning the quivering corpse with his feet, the horror-stricken youth, pursued by his followers, sped down the winding path where his cousin had met with his untimely end. There, among the long grass, lay the young Chief, weltering in his blood. Overwhelmed with grief at the harrowing spectacle, the warm-hearted Duncan threw himself sobbing on the inanimate form of his beloved relative. The rude clansmen, scarcely less affected, leaned on their claymores, and sorrowfully gazed on the face of the dead, cursing the hand that dealt the coward blow. Constructing a bier of green boughs, they placed the murdered youth thereon, and, raising it on their shoulders, bore him, by the light of the crescent moon, to his mountain home.

Throughout that dismal night, the phantom taper flickered in Appin's ruined castle; while the sad caronach, borne on the breeze which floated round the gray towers of Lochnell, told that the shadow of death had fallen on the proud home of the Campbells.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. X.

THE 'Lay of Diarmad' is probably one of the oldest—and has, from time immemorial, been one of the most popular—of the Ossianic poems. It is still repeated in the Highlands. Versions of it can be got, even at this day, from men who learned it, not out of books, but as it was committed to their congenial care by that old traditional tutor, who is now about to perish, with the last lingering remnant of his scholars, out of sheer decrepitude and vast old age. By calling the 'Lay of Diarmad' an Ossianic poem, no more can be meant than that it belongs to the Ossianic era; for it scarcely possesses the character of the poems of Ossian, and hardly harmonises with the tone of sentiment which pervades them, or with the manners which their blind old bard has painted. This is especially evident in the conduct of Finn; also, in the absence of all the other heroes, so far as appears from the great hunting. Not one of them, as will be seen, is mentioned by name. Grainn lives in tradition as the faithless wife of Fingal—the Guinevere of ancient Gaelic song; but she does not appear, I think, in any of the finer heroic poems. This 'Lay of Diarmad' is, however, as I have said, extremely popular; and the 'Hunting of the Great Wild Boar' is one of the least likely of any of the Fingalian legends to be soon forgotten. There are good reasons why it should continue to be remembered. The boar's head is the crest of the Argyll branch of the Campbells, and all that great clan trace their origin back to the Sir Lancelot of the Feinné—Diarmad, the son of O'Duibhne—who slew the wild boar. There is a sept of the Campbells still called MacDiarmad. This was probably the name of the whole clan at one time, as they are still styled, both by themselves and others, Slioch Dhiarmad—that is the race of Diarmad. From a letter, written by Mr. Pope, minister of Rea, in Caithness, to the Rev. Mr. Alex. Nicholson, minister of Thurso, 15th November 1763, and published in Appendix No. 3 to the Highland Society's Report on the Ossianic poems, we learn that an old man of the name of Campbell, in that part of the country, could never be prevailed upon to sing the 'Song of Diarmad' without first taking off his bonnet in honour of the ancestral shade. Mr. Pope's simplicity, and his manner of telling a story in his rather peculiar English, are both so charming that it would be almost inexcusable not to give his own words. It is a pity he did not write more letters about the eccentricities of his parishioners. A collection of them, if they resembled this one, would have made a very entertaining volume. Mr. Pope writes as follows:—"There is an old fellow in this parish who very gravely takes off his bonnet as often as he sings "Duan Dearmot." I was extremely fond to try if the case was so, and, getting him to my house, gave him a bottle of ale, and begged the favour of him to sing "Duan Dearmot." After some nicety, he told me that to oblige his parish minister he would do so; but, to my surprise, he took off his bonnet. I caused him to stop and put on his bonnet. He made some excuses. However, as soon as he began, he took off his bonnet. I rose and put it on. He took it off. I put it on. At last he was like to swear most horribly he would sing none unless I allowed him to be uncovered. I gave him his freedom, and so he sung with great spirit. I then asked him the reason. He told me it was out of regard to the memory of that hero. I asked him if he thought that the spirit of that hero was present? He said not; but he thought it well became them who descended from him to honour his memory.' This shows the fast hold which the notion of a descent from the Fenian hero took of the popular mind.

Although Diarmad makes no great figure in MacPherson's 'Ossian,' he is a very conspicuous actor in the prose legends and other traditions of the Highlands. He was the handsomest of the Feinné; an unparalleled lover, on account of an irresistible beauty-spot on his forehead; and a most accomplished swordsman. Oscar and Gaul were more like the ancient heroes, Achilles or Ajax. Diarmad has something of the knight of romance about him—a character which he probably owed, in some measure, to his place at the head of the Campbell family tree. His poem—sometimes called Duan or Heroic Song, sometimes Laoidh (with the dh silent) or Lay, sometimes Bas Dhiarmad, or the Death of Diarmad—is in all the collections of Gaelic poems. That of MacCallum has been principally but not wholly followed in the following translation:—

THE LAY OF DIARMAD; OR, FINGAL'S REVENGE.

Hearken a little, I sing you a song
Of the great and good who are gone—
Of Grainné, and Finn the triumphant,
And the woful fate of MacDoon.

Sweet is Glen-Shee, and the valley beside it,
With the voice of silk and deer;
And pleasant its stream tinged so often,
With blood from the Fenian spear.

Fairest of hills is Ben-Goolbain,
Where the fawn and the doe went to be;
And the hounds bay loudly together,
When they drive the wild deer o'er the lee.

'O Diarmad! my own one!' said Grainné,
'Let the dogs drive the chase o'er the lee;
Come not thou near the proud son of Comal,
Who is wroth with my hero for me.'

'In spite of his anger,' said Diarmad;
'In spite of his wrath and pride,
I will go to the chase now as fearless
As ever I trod by thy side.'

With the bay of the dogs and the shout of the heroes
In the calm of the morning air,
They roused the great boar from his slumber,
And watch'd every pass from his lair.

Up he rose in his wrath when he heard them,
And rush'd round the glen where he stay'd;
He turn'd east, he turn'd west, ere he darted
Foaming with rage from the shade.

From the shade of the rock down he rattled
Past the hounds and huntmen sheer;
His huge bristles pointed like javelins,
And his tusks like the point of a spear.

Then allipp'd they the dogs, and they drove him
Down Lodram's mossy side;
Long strove they to tear him, but could not
While the hunters cheerily cried.

'Son of Doon, dost thou wish to win honour?'
Said Finn in his wrath and pride;
'Slay that boar by thyself, thou gay victor,
Which the heroes so long has defied.'

Diarmad's tough spear was soon chew'd into splinters,
Like reeds on Lego that grow;
But the boar fell beneath his hard sword-blade,
Victorious o'er many a foe.

Then Finn he lay down on the green sward,
And moodily turn'd from the sight;
He grieved that the son of O'Doon had escaped
Without, wound from the furious fight.

'O Diarmad, measure the boar,' he said,
'With thy bare feet, for great is his size.'
He measured the boar with the bristles,
Sixteen good feet where he lies.

'O Diarmad! measure him back again;
He is not so much,' Finn cries.
He measures him back, and a poisonous bristle
Pierces his foot as he tries.

'O Fingal!' said Diarmad, 'vouchsafe me
One draught from thy life-giving shell,
For my strength and my vigour forsake me:—
With one draught, O my king! make me well.'

'Shall I bring thee a draught, thou fair hero!
From the lake, with my life-giving shell,
When the ill in one hour thou hast done me
Outweighs all the good thou canst tell?'

'Eastward and westward I've served thee,
And ne'er did thee ill, till the day
When Grainné, with love-witching magic,
Drew me her captive away.

'Remember the smithy of Luno,
How I in that fray help'd thee well,
When that sword was first won thou now wearest.'
'Thou shalt yet get no drink from my shell.'

'Remember the conflict with Draidgal,
And the strokes on thy shield that fell:—
'Twas I who then succour'd and saved thee.'
'Thou shalt yet get no drink from my shell.'

'Then, thou'rt forgotten the battle of Conhall,
And the fate which that day had assign'd,
With the army of Cairbar before thee,
Had not I and the Feinn been hind.

'Alas! that I saw thee, Ben-Goolbain!
Alas! that I faced thee to-day,
With the strength of my youth streaming from me,
With my life-blood abbing away!

'Hill of my love, O Ben-Goolbain!
Where the deer and the roe went to be;
Farewell! thou wilt never come to me,
Nor e'er shall my steps reach to thee.

'Farewell now to courtship for ever!
O king, what a sorrowful sight
For the maids of the Feinn thus to see me!
Sad would their dreams be this night.'

'Alas! that,' said Finn, 'for a woman,
I've slain my own sister's son—
For an ill woman slain him! Too noble
To be slain for the holiest one.'

'Yesterday, green wert thou, Goolbain!
To-day art thou bloody and red.
Hill of our sorrows, Ben-Goolbain!
Beneath thy gray stones is his bed.'

'Beneath thy gray stones, O Ben-Goolbain!
The brown-hair'd chief is laid;
His blue eyes are sleeping for ever
Under thy green grassy shade.'

'Sad stood the heroes beside thee,
O youth of the noble race!
And dim grew the eyes of each maiden
When the mould went over thy face.'

'And now, like the tree, I stand lonely—
Wither'd, and wasted, and near;
With the rude howling tempest to tear me,
Where the shade of no green bough is near.'

In the Highlands, although the people are sufficiently superstitious, and tell many tales, with witches, ghosts, fairies, and water-kelpies, and many kinds of supernatural beings in them, they never introduce such creatures into their poetry; and hardly even allude, through that channel, to any of the wild and strange beliefs so prevalent among them. I don't know whether this proceeds from a fear of offending the supernatural beings—with regard to whose existence there is indeed very little scepticism—or whether it proceeds from a notion of their unfitness for the purposes of poetry. But the fact is as I have stated. The ballad which is now given is, therefore, not to be regarded as, in its present form, a popular Highland song. The story on which it is founded is certainly popular enough in one district of the Highlands at any rate; and the ballad itself also belongs to the same district. But I am not aware that the legend is known in other parts of the country, and I am quite sure the poem is not. However, I give it here as essentially Highland notwithstanding, since the rock from which it was hewn is Highland, and the hewer Highland too. The story I have often heard. Once, especially, I recollect hearing it, on a stormy spring day, in a little barn, where three men were working not far from a roadside, and within three or four hundred yards of the place where the incident was said to have happened. After a few remarks, in a rustic Highland fashion, on the things of heaven and earth that are undreamed of by philosophy, this tale, in corroboration of something or other that occurred in the course of conversation, was told in a grave and earnest manner by one of the workers, and listened to most respectfully by the others. The narrator used, in his fine old Celtic dialect, almost the equivalent of the following words:—'There was a shipwreck once down there, at Crauch. In the night it was; and there was wind, and there was storm and water; and they did not cease. So the ship was breaking. Then the mate and two sailors put off in a little boat. They were rocked up and down on the water; but they reached the shore at last. The mate and one sailor went in search of house or person; the other sailor was left by himself with the boat. The mate and his companion were not long gone when the night grew something quieter. Then rose the other sailor, and he walked back and forwards near his boat. But the old woman of the streamlet saw him, and she came to the shore. He gave an eye behind, and he saw something black upon the beach. He jumped into his boat. In the shape of a pig, it drew near and near him, yet it could not reach the boat; and so it went away. But soon it came back again;—this time like a wolf. Now it got closer to the boat, but yet it could not get into it; so it, too, was gone. Once more, though, it returned:—like an old woman this time. She came along the shore; she tried to scramble over the gunwale; she tried to reach the sailor; her nails were almost at him, when he said, "O Lord! preserve me!" With a shriek, the old woman leaped past him in a moment, like a big ball of fire, and she sunk, with dreadful roaring, far out in the middle of the sea. I tell this tale as it was told to me. The poem differs little from it in its incidents, though I think it aims at giving something of a moral tone to the legend by bringing it as near as possible—in the midst of solitude, uncertainty, and danger—to a remorseful reflection, through means of a troubled dream, of thoughtless and perhaps evil life.

THE HAUNTED WATER OF DUCHALIRE.

Heavy and slow come the waves of the night,
With a threatening lurch and a reel,
Ere they break with a shock on the spray-spatter'd rock
Like blows on a warrior's steel.
And a dreary moan from the mountain comes down
When the roar of the surges is laid;
Then a rush whirls around, and a terrible sound
By the wind and the water is made;
And, hark! how they breathe, like a thing that has life!
Oh, list what the wild waves say!
'Why alone, all alone, is this mariner thrown,
Like a wail, by the tempest away?'

He sits in the stern of his boat, and he hears
The wan waves that beat, and the wild winds that roar,
And the tempest that scatters the spray like tears,
Where it treads with its merciless feet.
He sits and he groans, as the keel grates the beach
With a harsh and a rasping sound;
And he tries to sleep till the morning steep
In its light the stranger ground.
He tries to sleep, but soon starts and awakes:
For a sound is in the air,
That is not the sound of the wind or the wave,
And it raises his fell of hair.

It is not the tread of a man that he hears,
Nor the sound of a human tongue;
He folds his arms on his breast, and peers
The dim-dark shore along.
Now on the left, and now on the right,
And now it comes before;
Sweet Mercy! there's some vague dark thing
Upon the stormy shore.
Oh, horror! there's a dull, deep sound,
Like breath from a tighten'd throat—
Now on the land, and now on the sea
And now on the rocking boat.

And there's a form, a clouded form,
In a shroud of misty light,
That darker makes the tempest wild,
More terrible the night.
It rests on the gunwale and looks in his face,
And it glares so fierce and fell;
While it breathes through its throat, with that dismal note,
Twixt a groan and an angry yell—
A note of pain and agony; a note to hear with dread;
A wrathful note—a struggling cry,
By fear and fierceness fed!

Then at him it eagerly reach'd at last,
And it growl'd like a beast o'er it's prey—
Till he started back with a shuddering haste,
And the vision pass'd away.
Tenfold more wild the night became,
Tenfold more black the sky,
With fiercer leap the billows sweep,
And the winds breathe a sorrowing sigh.

'Tis not the moaning element,
'Tis not the wild, wild wind,
'Tis not the black, black trouble, pent
In the sky, which moves his mind
'Tis the vision'd form that comes once more
To press, like a weight, on his soul;
'Tis the darkening again on the lonely shore
Of yon dim and dismal dole;
'Tis the sense that he's not alone—alone
With the waste and the howling storm;
'Tis the sense of the ill that rises still,
With its dark and vapoury form;
That's the wind that cries, that's the billow that roars;
But 'tis neither that groans so near.
'Tis the shadowy form of the night and the storm
Come to torture his listening ear.
And downward it glides, as black in the night
As the deep thunder-cloud in the day;
And it stands by his boat, with its gibbering note,
While he strives in his fear to pray.
Then he crouches down in the ebon gloom,
For his sins have choked his prayer;
And above it hangs like a sorrowful doom,
Like a poisonous mist in the air;
Forward and downward and forward it bends,
And it casts its embrace around,
And shuts him out from the tempest about,
Till its roar seems a distant sound!

Away, away, his soul is drawn,
And the darkness is now more dread,
Though the storm seems as hush'd as the shelter'd lawn
Where the hare and the fawn are fed.

Away, away, till he faints, he faints,
And breathes one stifled sigh,
As he calls on God to save his soul
In its parting agony!

Then high and fast away it pass'd,
And lurid light it grew;
Oh deep was the glow on the wave that it cast,
And red was its fiery hue,
As it sunk with a roar far away from the shore,
With a roar and a wailing cry!
It sunk, and he saw it again no more,
In the place where his comrades lie!

The scene of this ballad I remember distinctly, and used to be quite familiar with as a boy. At that time, it seemed to me to possess a sort of peculiar awfulness, especially in the dusk of evening, or in the vague gloaming and deep stillness of a summer night. Then not a sound disturbed the air; not a motion was seen or felt along the earth. A beautiful Highland loch slapt on the smooth stones of the sea-beach, like an enchanted princess waiting for the salute that was to restore her to consciousness and life; and, dim as the far off clouds, and silent as their own shadows, the dark brown hills looked over fields and crofts and gloomy moors down to the little pebbly hollow through which, almost without a murmur, crept a tiny brooklet—the supposed hiding-place of the malignant genius that took the form of an old woman. There was a fascination about the place. I used to feel a thrill run through me as I drew near it in the darkness; nor am I much surprised at the Highland peasant who told me how he was disturbed and profoundly affected there one summer midnight, by what he supposed to be the wild cries of mournful and despairing spirits. In the impressive silence he had heard the soft wailings of the sea-birds on the rocks close by him; and, in the excited state of his imagination at the moment, he had made the very natural mistake, for him at least, which I have mentioned.

THOMAS PATTISON.

LOVE VERSUS FAME.

To look at the portly, ponderous person of Mr. Julian Featherleigh, and to hear the mercantile slang and 'Change technicalities with which that gentleman interlards his conversation, one would laugh at the bare idea of his having once been a votary of the Muses, and a regular contributor to the 'poetry column' of the Blatherford Weekly Chronicle. Yet, such was the case; and to account for this wonderful metamorphosis, is the object of this paper.

But the reader must imagine a far different personage at that romantic period of Mr. Featherleigh's life. At the age of twenty-five and thereabouts, he was a slight, slim, and withal dignified-looking character; whose golden hair fell in clustering curls upon his well-formed shoulders; and whose delicate blue eyes were screened from the impudent glare of day by a pair of rose-coloured spectacles.

He had honoured with sonnets, odes, and all the stanzas, each hoary hill, verdant vale, fountain and waterfall, river and rivulet, pariah church and ruined abbey, in the vicinity of the town of Blatherford; all of which were duly printed in the Weekly Chronicle; and was, in his turn, honoured and respected by all the great men in the neighbourhood, and invited to all the dinners, balls, and soirees, both public and private, within ten miles of the said town. He was the envy of all the young men, because he was the favourite of all the young ladies, who did—but in vain—their utmost to captivate him. All, did we say? No; there was one exception, and a very pretty exception too, who did not seem to care about him in the least; and the worst of it was, that this same young lady was the only one that Mr. Julian Featherleigh wished to be noticed by. And, what was more provoking still to that gentleman, was the discovery he made of a dangerous rival, in the shape of Mr. Dunham Browne the merchant, whose person and state of affairs were, in the opinion of the world of Blatherford, unexceptionable.

One fine morning in June, it suddenly occurred to Mr. Julian Featherleigh that he had better devote his time for the present to more serious thought than is requisite to the 'poet's frenzy.' 'I must be up and doing,' thought he, 'or I shall lose her. While I am dreaming about it, that Mr. Dunham Browne may step in before me and carry off the prize! Can I suffer that? No! I shall go as soon as possible—even to-morrow—and try to win her to myself!'

He spent all that day in composing his appeal to 'the lovely Miss Wilhelmina Wilton,' and practised all the attitudes before his largest looking-glass. Finally, he went to bed, feverish from anxiety, and the numerous dreams he had taken to keep him 'in spirits.' After passing a restless night—during which he dreamed having met Mr. Dunham Browne and the fair Wilhelmina returning from their wedding—he rose as soon as it was light, and having made an elaborate toilette, and rehearsed his performance over again, he, without so much as a thought of breakfast, proceeded, 'with wandering steps and slow,' towards the house wherein resided the object of his affection.

Having arrived at his destination, he gave a very timorous knock at the door, and told the servant who answered it to carry his respects to Miss Wilton, with the solicitation for an interview. The servant came back, and requested Mr. Featherleigh to follow her to the lady's parlour. He did so; but his brain was so completely in a whirl, that when he came back to his senses again he found himself, in an awkward manner, confronting Miss Wilton, whose presence had dawned upon him through those tinted specs of his like a beatific vision.

After the preliminary greetings and common civilities were exchanged, and the usual flow of small talk had subsided, there was a momentous pause. Mr. Julian Featherleigh felt his heart bounding violently within him (and yet he had the temerity to think he had lost it), while his pulse beat seventy-five to the minute. But, summoning all his resolution, he addressed himself to his task, and to the young lady before him, in the following strain:—

'Adorable Miss Wilton!' began he, with an interjectional flourish of his new spotless cambric handkerchief across his eyes, and at the same time dropping upon one knee,—'I can bear the burden of my woes no longer. Know then, fair one! that my heart has been a fugitive and a vagabond ever since I knew you; and to your fair self have I tracked the wanderer. But as the runaway will never more return to me, now that it has found so cosy a nest, I have come to beg yours as a compensation for the damage done to me. It is true, I do not deserve so fair a bargain; but I will endeavour, as much as possible, to balance the scale, by proffering on my knees my life-long services and devotion. I come before thee thy true knight; and lay myself—my happiness—my all, at thy feet for thy disposal!'

The 'adorable Miss Wilton' was not a little taken aback at this sudden outburst of feeling; but, being remarkable alike for her prudence and presence of mind, she soon recovered herself, and began coolly to consider the case. To Mr. Featherleigh and his connexions she had no objection; indeed, she rather liked the idea of triumphing over her competitors, who were so unsuccessful in their endeavours to ensnare the fascinating young poet. But, then, Mr. Featherleigh had nothing in view, save the advancement of his own fame; and mere fame would never bring 'grist to the mill.' No; if Mr. Featherleigh would row her in his boat down the stream of life, he must give up his lofty aspirations, and settle down into a matter of fact commercial man, like Mr. Dunham Browne.

Said she, 'I do consent; but only on condition, that—that you give up writing poetry.'

'O Miss Wilton! you surely do not mean what you say? Why, oh why, do you submit me to this cruel condition?'

'True knights do their ladies' bidding without asking questions,' responded the lady, quietly; 'I will give you till to-morrow to consider my request.'

The gentleman took his leave, in a state of mind difficult to describe. As soon as he had reached his lodgings, he locked himself up, and gave vent to his agony in tears, sighs, and groans. All the rest of that day there was a stern battle within him between Fame and Love. The former conjured up before his mind's eye all the honours and future glory he had hoped for; all hopes of which he had to relinquish if he succumbed to the latter. But the gentle though invincible, tender but all-powerful Love argued that all future fame, honour, and glory would be nought to him if disappointment embittered his life. It was Love versus Fame—or rather the desire of it—and there was an obstinate battle between them both. But Love gained the victory; and the next day saw Julian Featherleigh certainly a sadder, but as certainly a wiser man; and, in a month's time, the readers of the Blatherford Weekly Chronicle saw Mr. Julian Featherleigh's name printed therein for the last time, and coupled with that of Wilhelmina Wilton, in the list of 'Marriages.'

Featherleigh has now settled down into a quiet hard-working man, a good husband, and a kind father. He has almost forgotten that twenty years ago he poured out his spirit in harmonious numbers; and when reminded of those days gone by, thinks it necessary to apologise for the weakness, by laying the blame on those who encouraged him in it, and giving as a further excuse the folly of youth. But although he gave up writing, he by no means ceased reading poetry; and Mr. Featherleigh is at this moment possessed of a magnificent collection of all the poets, from Homer down to Tennyson inclusive. And I am bound to say, that, if you asked Mr. Featherleigh, he would declare that he is happier by far in his present state of life than if he had been possessed of all those 'castles in the air' which he had wasted his time in building twenty years ago, but which, no doubt, would have all dissolved, like empty day-dreams as they were—as hosts of like enthusiastic aspirants have, alas! found out to their cost.

HENRY G. HUNT.

ON WORDSWORTH'S 'LUCY.'

PERFECT truth to Nature is one of Wordsworth's highest characteristics. While Crabbe is cataloguing the scenes of every-day life with stern correctness and faithfulness, omitting no deformity, relieving them with no artistic colouring; while Rogers is syllabbling the 'Pleasures of Memory' in lucid, polished, and scrupulously nice diction, in pictures of mellow lustre and classic beauty; while Coleridge is expounding the harmony of the soul with the material world, and writing brilliant hymns and passionate odes, and poems of lofty imagination and subtle thought; while Southey is weaving his extravagant Hindoo superstitions, which are displeasing from their strangeness, and creating wild fictions which have no centre in, or relation to, human passions, affections, and emotions; while Moore, with his ariel fancy, is delighting us with an oriental romance of piled-up gorgeoussness and dazzling magnificence, rich in Eastern images and ornaments, and scenes of fascinating loveliness, wonderful in truthfulness of description; while Campbell is singing in the cause of Freedom, in verses of dramatic fire and passionate energy, and delineating these scenes in sweet pathetic words, and proclaiming himself the calmest, most correct poet, and finest artist of his day; while Scott is reproducing the ages of chivalry and the institutions of feudalism in powerful descriptions, in fascinating narratives, in graphic delineations, in pictures of Homeric energy and vividness; while Byron is diving into the depths of the soul, and discussing the profoundest questions with satanic scorn, hopeless scepticism, and in Mephistophelean manner; while Shelley is revelling in mystic idealism, and crying out in defiance, in despair, inapture, in agony;—while all these are going on their way, Wordsworth is fulfilling a mission to which not one of them is called, and developing a philosophy as high and true as Coleridge's oneness of the internal and external world—a philosophy which deals with and elevates the commonest actions and occurrences of our life, and which discerns the Divine Spirit in all things. Crabbe is as literal and actual as Wordsworth, but he is more repulsive. Some of his scenes harrow up the soul from their sadness; whereas Wordsworth's fidelity to nature, though accurate and stern as Crabbe's, is generally allied to pathos and tenderness. Not Shelley, with his fine ethereal warblings and his apt spiritual nature, is more sensitive than he; not Wilson, with his feminine softness and tender compassion and gentle sympathies, is more pathetic. Wordsworth exhibits these qualities in treating the humblest subject. He sees the hidden beauty which underlies the world, and it is his highest praise that he has interpreted whatsoever is beautiful and thoughtful in our ordinary life. Through every thread of society, extending from the heart of each man to the other, uniting the whole human race together, are sympathies deep as the infinite soul. It suffices Wordsworth that he finds these sympathies in everyday rustic life, warming our hearts, making holier our relations to our fellows, outdrawing our genialities, elevating the obscure, extracting pathos from our rough manliness, and showing how deep and universal and eternal is the truth under our old regular experience.

I have selected 'Lucy,' as a poem representing the general spirit and homely philosophy of his minor effusions. It consists of only twelve lines; but it is the sound of nature, and touches the deepest emotions of the soul. It is grand in its simplicity, and as sweet and affectionate as Longfellow. It is quiet and serene as the calmness of Longfellow; as musical as his deep melody. Its philosophy is beautiful—the peacefulness and purity of rustic life and solitude, and the priceless virtues of a simple unsophisticated maiden. Hogg has written a fairy tale, full of inexpressible sweetness and wild lyrical fancy; embodying his conception of a perfectly pure maid, who sees visions of unearthly splendour. Her spirituality is intense; but she has no human interest, and is as far removed from relation to human life as Shakspeare's Ariel. Wordsworth's 'Lucy,' on the other hand—though of unearthly sweetness, and dwelling solitary as a single star—is one of ourselves. She is one of those gentle, artless, guileless, sensitive creatures who awaken our affections, who are the happiness of our life, who are above all hypocrisy, and who inspire our better nature. She is beautiful and innocent as childhood; unlike Kilmeny, who is 'Too bright and good

For human nature's daily food.'

Alexander Smith has penned some lines of tender beauty, embalming his strange fancies of a child whom he saw one morning in a garden. The girl haunted his imagination day after day—filling it with unearthly visions and beings of enchanting, transcendent beauty. He could not escape her; she was ever present as a sainted image; and he has sung some sweet stanzas about her, who was 'beautiful as heaven.' But they lack the melting pathos, the touching allusions, the expressiveness, the gentle and deep humanity of 'Lucy.' Gerald Massey has a beautiful poem—'Babe Christobel'—who came and went like a swift messenger from heaven; whose loveliness was a luxury to the soul; but she returned back to the vast eternity ere she flowered into girlhood. But Wordsworth's 'Lucy' is superior to all these. In its quiet, sad music, in its briefly pathetic biography, in its still, mild melancholy, in its condensed sorrow, in the depth of its desolateness, surpassed nowhere, and equalled only in Coleridge's 'Mariner.'

'Alone, alone, all, all alone—
Alone on a wide, wide sea!'

The first stanza opens in a calm, serene atmosphere—a peacefulness as of Nature's shadiest, quietest nooks:—

'She dwelt among the untrodden ways,
Beside the springs of Dove—
A maid whom there were none to praise,
And very few to love.'

That verse embodies the very stillness, innocence, and intense seclusion of the pure and gentle being who is uncorrupted by our busy life; whose home is some green landscape of nature. Ah! what deep, unfathomable calmness! what sweet mildness and holiness! what beautiful expressive quietness! what deep and solemn stillness in and around that dwelling! She is one of nature's gentlest children—lovely in nature's own dress and manners, and free from the artificialism of art and the conventionalities of society. She is not known in the world; but the silent rills, with flowers blossoming on their banks—the sweet warbling birds—the velvet-draped fields—the far-off shining stars—and the silent hills, all know her as a constant wooer, and interpret to her

'All the many sounds of nature.'

The second stanza is beautifully spiritual—the union of the real with the ideal:—

'A violet by the mossy stone,
Half-hidden from the eye;
Fair as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky.'

There is the very spirit of her modesty, purity, and loveliness. No two images could more adequately depict her hidden yet holy life—her retiring, unassuming nature—the solitude of her position.

The last stanza runs thus:—

'She lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be;
But she is in her grave, and oh
The difference to me!'

Nothing could be more true. It is the poet's rendering of the common expression at the loss of a friend—'I shall never be the same again.' Nothing could be more touching. It is the very soul of pathos. Its suggestions are poignant; its loneliness is afflictive and dreary; its grief is keen, for she is gone for evermore

'To the kingdom of Pomehah!
To the land of the Hereafter!'

She is now identified with the never-returning past; and the ever-present now is dire and heavy with sorrow, and the poet sings mournfully,—

'It is not now as it hath been of yore.
Turn whereso'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.'

Yet he, too, has some consolation, for

'Time but holds
His motley in trust, till joy shall lead
To the blest world where parting is unknown.'

S. F. WILLIAMS.

NOTES OF THE RAMBLES OF AN AMATEUR NATURALIST.

I.—OXWICH BAY, GOWER, SOUTH WALES.

ON Shrove Friday, 18—, three of us started from Swansea for a day's naturalising in Gower. The same three have never met together since. One is at present—if he has not joined the Federal army lately—engaged in the investigation of the natural history of the basin of the Ohio; the other is—I know not where.

'When shall we three meet again?'

The memory of that day, I have no doubt, is with us all yet. The results of that day's work are in my note-book; and in my collections there are specimens, with three names appended—ever bringing before me, with fresh appreciation, that day's pleasure.

Reader! you may have experienced great delight in your rambles, amid as beautiful scenes as those we visited on that occasion in South Wales; but, if you are not a student of Nature, a new field of enjoyment has yet to be opened up to you—for, still unknown to you, Nature has in her bosom a world of interest you dream not of. Naturalists are proverbially (I say it with pride) genial-hearted. Nature, it would seem, endows their souls with something of her own kindliness. I was a beginner then; and it was with mingled feelings of wonder and love that I cherished the society of W—, one of the three. Though, poor fellow! he had clinging to him a disease which, for three months of the year, drove him to the verge of madness, when well and in the field, his good humour knew no bounds. He kept up a running volley of puns, anecdotes, and snatches of Hood, Dibdin, &c. in the intervals of our graver work of observation. Work in earnest he did when at it but, after six hours' hard hammering at mountain limestone, or thirty miles over hill and dale in search of plants, no one could sing a song or tell a story better than he, over his one pint of bitter:—

'And blow their eyes,
If ever they tries,
To rob a poor dog of his beer,' was a favourite refrain of his, after a particularly good draught.

It would not be well, perhaps, for people to drink too much beer; but one and all should get in low with Nature. Why is natural history so systematically neglected, as a means of developing the faculties of man's soul?

The scenery in South Wales very much resembles that of the south-west coast of Ayrshire, in Scotland—varied by interchange of hill and dale, well-wooded but not by any means striking. It was our intention to visit first Gower Castle, an old ruin, on which grows the very rare and interesting Draba aizoides, a plant which is found nowhere else in Britain, or, so far as I am aware, even on the Continent. The district is somewhat inaccessible, and so it has escaped extermination—the usual fate of rarities when subjected to the ruthless hands of collectors. We found it, much to our satisfaction, in considerable quantity.

Many interesting questions start up in regard to this singular distribution of such plants as this. Why are they found only in one place? How have they not succeeded in distributing themselves like others? Are they in the last stages of their life-history in the world? Having died out of every other locality, are they living witnesses of the truth of Darwin's hypothesis, of natural selection by the phenomena of struggle gliding for existence? What is their story we know not; yet I cannot help fancying, that if the secrets of the conditions of life are to be made known to man, it will be in connection with such exceptional examples in Nature. Here the orthodox theory of Specific Centres fails, for they lie beyond its pale. When we find plants in Terra del Fuego, which flourish likewise in the European Alps, we doubt altogether the validity of such an interpretation.

To say, again, that they are offspring of particular circumstances, is equally hypothetical. For what are the special conditions which have enabled them to struggle on and maintain their position, or, indeed, have given them birth? We can detect nothing singular in their own constitution. In fact, they are pariahs to every theory, and stand forth in their singularity as if in mockery of all man's searching to discover the great secret of the springs of life in Nature.

Having secured a sufficient quantity of Draba scabres to supply our own herbariums, and also to gladden the hearts of our botanical friends at a distance, we set out for Oxwich Bay.

The country around it is very dreary and uninviting. We heard a great deal of the richness of its bays. At the western end of the bay, there is a salt-water marsh, which supplied us with the beautiful Corvulus denticulatus. This shell, in common with some others, is peculiar to brackish or estuary water. The region which partakes partly of the conditions of the sea and the river, has thus a fauna of its own.

The Scotch naturalist finds himself in a strange region of marine life in the bays of the Bristol Channel. There are many forms found also in Scotland, no doubt; but there are more to which he is an entire stranger. I will have occasion to point that out in various sections in subsequent papers. In regard to the shells, he finds, in species common to both countries, greater vividness in colouring, a greater scarcity of some species, and a greater plenty of others in the south. The dog whelk (Purpureus lapillus) is always beautifully banded there. The Macra subtruncatus, Solen siliqua, common in Scotland, are scarce and small.

At the risk of alarming those readers who may have waded this length with me, I will give a list of some of the more interesting shells we got in Oxwich Bay. They were—Macra stultorum, Natica monilifera, Cyprea Europea, Solen marginatus, Tellina solidula, tenuis, and fabula, Fissurella reticulata, Saxicava rugosa, artica, Chiton fascicularis, Thracia distorta.

The subject of colour in animal and vegetable life is a vexed one. Accidental circumstances of the seabottom often disturb the regular law. Every one is familiar, too, with the different colours of the bog-stream and clean stream trouts. We found here a white variety of Macra stultorum—the usual colour being purplish.

Perhaps a more beautiful little creature does not frequent our shores than the cowry (Cyprea Europea.) Here I saw it for the first time alive, gliding over the floating sea-weed, enshrouded in its beautiful mantle, and trailing after it as we would at first suppose, but really moving upon a golden train, which is therefore called the foot. We looked at the beautiful creature, and W—— suddenly recollected that passage in Tennyson's 'Maud,'—

'Did he stand at the diamond door
Of his house, in a rainbow frill?
Did he push, when he was uncur'd,
A golden foot or a fairy horn
Through this dim water world?'

The Saxicava, as its name implies (saxum a rock, and cavus hollow), burrows in the hard stone of the beach. To get at this creature, the stone has to be broken. How does it succeed, frail creature! to make for itself a house there? Probably in the same way in which every difficult thing is done—by keeping continually at it. The shell is often very shapeless, evidently from the difficulties of its life. The sons and daughters of manual labour are not so fair and delicately-shaped as their neighbours who live in ease. This little creature has a hard life of it. Unfortunately, too, it is yet in ignorance of Darwin's theory.

The Natica monilifera—very like a garden snail in shape—is an unmitigated savage, and practises wholesale slaughter on the cockle and other bivalves. When he meets with one of these, he buries himself with it in the sand. In a leisurely way, he proceeds to drill a hole through one of the umbones with his saw-like tongue; and then, in a truly scientific manner, sucks out the animal. The most careless observer of the empty shells cast up by the tide must have noticed great numbers of them with small perforations. As the cowries used by the Africans for money are drilled by them, so it was imagined by some very gullible individuals, at one time, that the perforated shells of the Pleistocene beds indicated the presence of man during that period!

'What are these, old fellow!' I exclaimed, 'in the small tubes sticking out from the level of the sand?'

'Serpula. But, look here, where the sea covers them!'

I shall not forget how the appearance of the fairy-like animals impressed me. They belong to the Annelida, or worm class. Some of them make their tubes of carbonate of lime and not of sand. A tyro might mistake, on this account, a serpula for a shell. I extract the following description from Rymer Jones's 'History of Animals':—

'If, while the contained animals are alive, they be placed in a vessel of sea-water, few spectacles are more pleasing than that which they exhibit. The mouth of the tube is thus seen first to open by the raising of an exquisitely constructed door, and then the creature cautiously protrudes the anterior part of his body, spreading out at the same time two gorgeous fanlike expansions of a rich scarlet or purple colour, which float elegantly on the surrounding water, and serve as bronchial or breathing organs.'

We had, however, to give up the delight of seeing wonder upon wonder of the shore. Back again to work. The holiday is over.

On our way home, we were cheered along by songs from the 'Illustrious,' as we dubbed him. Like a genuine Scotchman, he forgot not the songs of his native home, and hung up not his harp in silence in the land of the stranger. He gave us 'Jenny's Baw-bee,' 'Jock o' Hazeldean,' 'Tam Glen,' and others, with great gusto, and much to our satisfaction.

It was market-day in Swansea when we returned, and we met many of the Welsh homeward bound, in picturesque groups—the women with long peaked beaver hats, extravagant modifications of dress hats. Curiously enough, they are the descendants of a Flemish colony in Gower, who came there under the auspices of Henry I. They seldom intermarry with the Welsh, preserving in a great measure their peculiarities of speech, dress, and manners. Many of these met us also—the women with red cloaks and gipsy-like straw bonnets. They seem as uncouth and miserable looking as the peasant Welsh.

Manchester.

W. H.

WAYSIDE THOUGHTS.—No. III

BY THE LATE JAMES MACFARLAN.

How often in life do we shrink from imaginary terrors which a little thought would dispel. The gigantic spectre of the Brocken is, after all, only a man's shadow.

LONDON is the Shakspeare of cities. In the streets of that vast metropolis, as in the pages of the great dramatist, will be found every conceivable, every possible variety of human life.

WHEREVER a man carries his devotional feelings, there will a sacred temple spring up around him. His heart will then become an altar from which will rise up to heaven the incense of pure and holy thought.

SHAKSPEARE and Cervantes died on the same day. It is a bold fancy; but one can hardly help thinking how those men, unknown to each other in the flesh, might shake spiritual hands and wing their flight together.

JOHN FOSTER.—The happiest circumstance that ever befell Foster was meeting, in his thirty-seventh year, with a partner who could understand and appreciate him. The sympathy and companionship he had so long yearned after came at last, and that in the most agreeable of all forms—a noble woman's admiration. To her were addressed, in the form of letters, those four splendid essays which are the pillars of his reputation. His life henceforth, till his death, was more that of a man of letters. His writings were well received, but never exactly popular, in the wild, horn-blowing sense of the term. His works never became the 'rage.' He did not throw his readers into a fever, but kept them in a state of pure and thoughtful enjoyment.

THE present is a field of battle; fierce struggles, stern grapplings with circumstance, and a hurry and turmoil which allow us to see little but the opposing power before us. When the battle-smoke has rolled away, when to-day becomes yesterday, we stop to breathe a moment; and not till then do we scan the naked face of that field of fight. Our brother, our companion—whom we recognised not when battling so bravely by our side—arrests us now in his fallen silence. His gashed brow and the broken falchion, yet grasped firmly in his hand, suggest to us how nobly he has fought and died; and, with a calm splendour as of the setting sun, his spirit passes away into the Wal-halla of the past, and lives there as something we can reverence and love, and which will yet inspire us with courage when the contest again closes around us.

GOOD ANGELS.

An angel came down in the still of the night,
And stood by the bed of a sleeping child:
He breathed in his ear; and I knew that the words
Were a whisper of joy—for the cherub smiled.
Then the angel flew back to his home; and I heard,
As the golden gates were wide open thrown,
Ten thousand voices the tidings rehearse—
'O child of earth! thou art all our own!'

An angel came down at the dusky dawn,
Where a youth kept watch on the field of fight;
The hostile camp in the distance loom'd,
And the grass waved green would be red ere night!
But the soldier's heart was of metal true—
God's trust and strength in his blue eye shone;
So the angel went up, and the voices rang forth—
'O child of earth! thou art still our own!'

An angel came down, as the twilight closed,
To a lighted hall, where the wine flow'd free;
And the young man laugh'd as the ribald jest
And the song rose high of the drunkard's glee.
Ah! then fell a shade on that pale pure face,
(As the summer moon veild in a soft mist o'er,)
And tender and low was the seraph's strain—
'O child of earth! thou art ours no more!'

An angel came down on a forest glade
As the stars went out at the flush of day,
Where one, with hot cheek and a blood-stain'd sword,
Through the dewy copse strode in haste away;
For angry words overnight, they had met
As foes this morn who were friends of yore;
And the angel went up with the murmur'd sigh—
'O child of earth! thou art ours no more!'

An angel came down as the moonbeams play'd
'Mong the scatter'd gray stones of the old church-yard
Where the strong man, bowing his anguish'd head,
By a fresh grave knelt on the cold damp sward:
The gentle friend of his youth was at rest,
And the fruits were bless'd her memory bore;
So the angel flew up with a smile, and they sang
'O child of earth! thou art ours once more!'

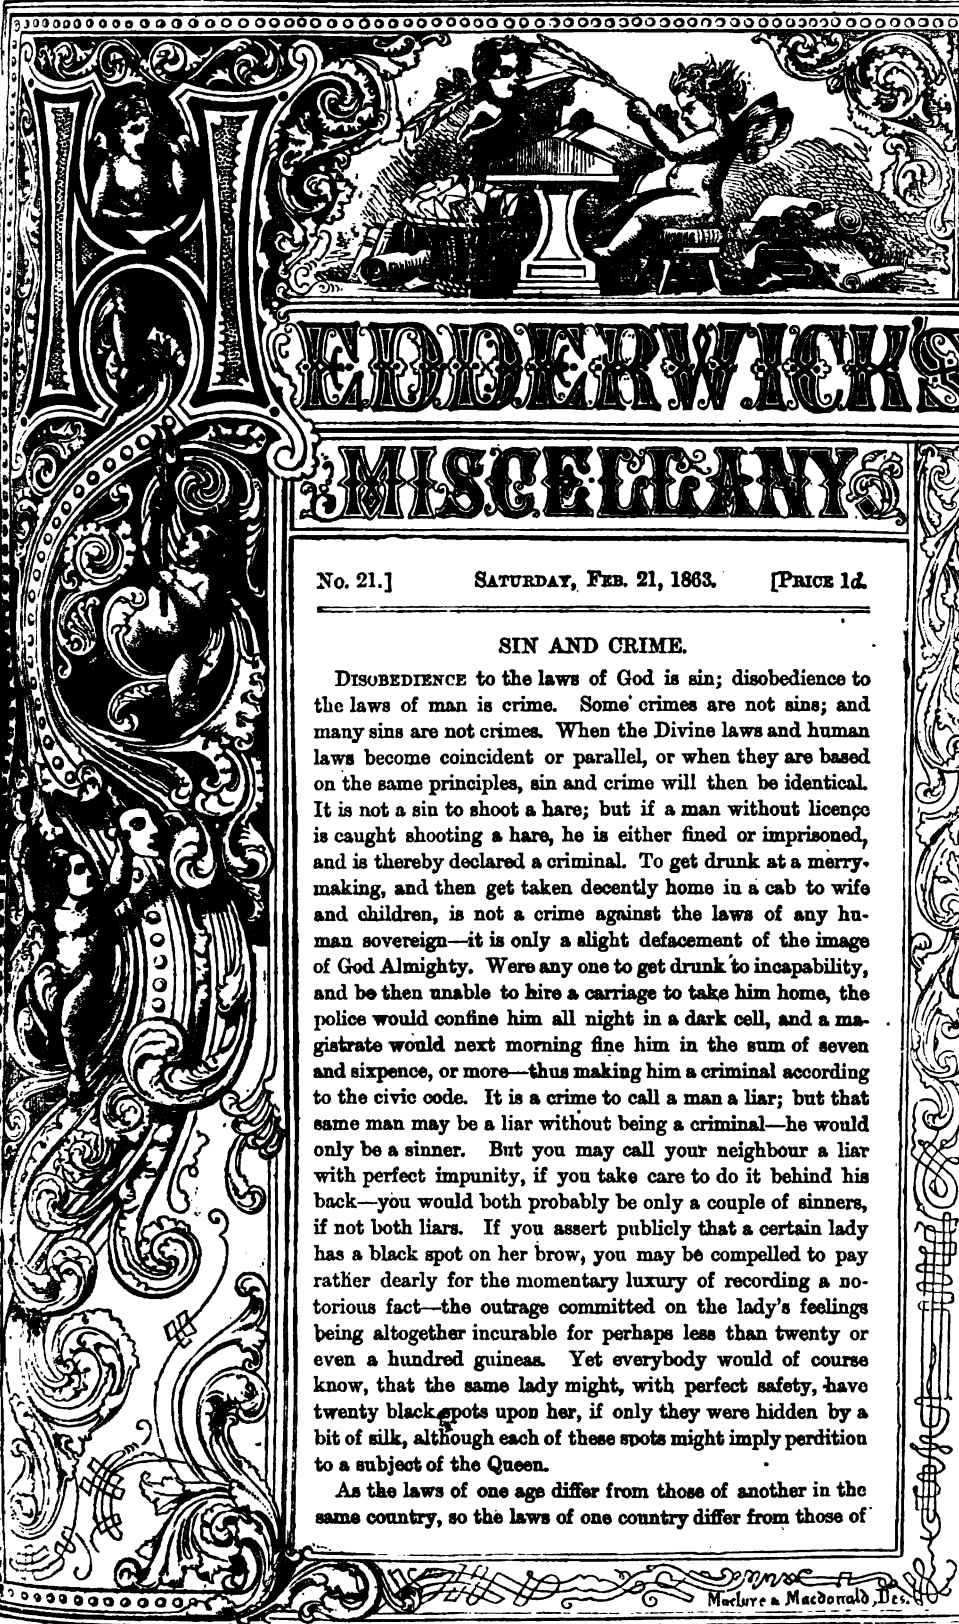

An angel came down to a darken'd room,
Where a father lay pale on his dying bed;
The daughter, sole light of his widow'd home,
In tears heard the blessings he pour'd on her head:
As the angel look'd, the soul broke free,
And he bore it in triumph to God the giver;
Then rang heaven's arch with the welcome shout—
'O child of earth! thou art ours for ever!'

Thus watching and waiting with zeal untired,
Good angels hover round pilgrims here;
And whether in folly's or wisdom's scene,
Be sure that some radiant spirit is near.
And oh, my brother! as first they found thee,
A blossom of hope on life's desert thrown,
May the bright host hail thee at last, in glory—
A child of heaven, and all their own!

JANE C. SIMPSON.

* * The right of translation reserved by the Authors. Contributions addressed to the Editor will receive attention but, as a general rule, he cannot undertake to return MSS considered unsuitable.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet-Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 22 St Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

M

EDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY

No. 21.]

SATURDAY, FEB. 21, 1863.

[PRICE 1d.]

SIN AND CRIME.

DISOBEDIENCE to the laws of God is sin; disobedience to the laws of man is crime. Some crimes are not sins; and many sins are not crimes. When the Divine laws and human laws become coincident or parallel, or when they are based on the same principles, sin and crime will then be identical. It is not a sin to shoot a hare; but if a man without licence is caught shooting a hare, he is either fined or imprisoned, and is thereby declared a criminal. To get drunk at a merry-making, and then get taken decently home in a cab to wife and children, is not a crime against the laws of any human sovereign—it is only a slight defacement of the image of God Almighty. Were any one to get drunk to incapability, and be then unable to hire a carriage to take him home, the police would confine him all night in a dark cell, and a magistrate would next morning fine him in the sum of seven and sixpence, or more—thus making him a criminal according to the civic code. It is a crime to call a man a liar; but that same man may be a liar without being a criminal—he would only be a sinner. But you may call your neighbour a liar with perfect impunity, if you take care to do it behind his back—you would both probably be only a couple of sinners, if not both liars. If you assert publicly that a certain lady has a black spot on her brow, you may be compelled to pay rather dearly for the momentary luxury of recording a notorious fact—the outrage committed on the lady's feelings being altogether incurable for perhaps less than twenty or even a hundred guineas. Yet everybody would of course know, that the same lady might, with perfect safety, have twenty black spots upon her, if only they were hidden by a bit of silk, although each of these spots might imply perdition to a subject of the Queen.

As the laws of one age differ from those of another in the same country, so the laws of one country differ from those of another in the same age. In Spain, at present, the distribution of the Bible is a crime punishable by imprisonment; and just the other day about a dozen men were condemned to the galleys for professing Protestantism. In England it used to be the same; but now, to prevent the distribution of the Bible, or to interfere with any man's religious professions, is, in any gross case, a punishable crime; while, in all cases, it is regarded by the English people as a shame, a sin, and a crime. In Spain, therefore, the profession of Protestantism is both a sin and a crime; in Britain it is neither, but is regarded as a sign of intelligence, and as a guarantee of high virtue. To enunciate with judicious firmness, yet with unequivocal clearness, what one conceives to be truth, whether political, moral, or religious, is, according to the Divine laws, no sin; yet, in France, under the present Napoleonic régime, to do this in the living domain of politics is so dangerous a game that many newspapers have been warned and then guillotined, and their editors fined and imprisoned, for daring to deliver an honest opinion on the tone and tendency of the Imperial policy—the sovereign stomach being apparently too dainty or delicate to digest unmitigated criticism. Thus, in France, at the present time, outspoken criticism is a crime. In Britain, the laws protect all men in the publication and advocacy of their opinions; and the newspapers, in criticising the contents of the Queen's Speech, or the policy of the Government, may indeed commit many sins—such as sins of bad taste and misrepresentation; but in this there is nothing criminal—it is the exercise of a privilege and a right which the whole nation would rise in rebellion to preserve.

Yet, although we assert that sin is disobedience to the laws of God, the definition is not without a certain crust of ambiguity; for, in real life, any one may see that what is sin to one man is to another man not sin, but quite otherwise. Nor is this the case merely in matters of action or personal conduct, but it is the case also in matters of thought—sin being properly of two kinds, namely, material and spiritual, although many individual sins have in themselves both these qualities. If all men were agreed as to what is a law of God and what is not, there would be little, if any, ambiguity about the nature of sin. But this is precisely one of the great difficulties. It is manifest, however, that whatever is discovered to be actually sin, is sin everywhere and always, and is alterable in none of its essentials either by time or place. A lie is a lie in England, France, and indeed everywhere—at midnight as at noon-day, and on Monday as on Sunday. The same is equally true of really virtuous or moral actions. Yet if a virtuous act is everywhere and always virtuous, how comes it that shoeing a horse or grinding corn, which on Saturday are perfectly virtuous and un sinful deeds, are on Sunday regarded in this country as distinct acts of sin, besides being punishable as crimes? It may be said, in reply, that whatever practice essentially hurts and debases the human mind and body, must be sinful or immoral, if not always criminal. Nobody can deny that a certain amount of labour is essential to human comfort and happiness; but it is no less clear and self-evident that, when labour is extended beyond certain limits, it is both hurtful to the body and debasing to the mind. Labour, therefore, which is a good thing in itself, if made continuous or excessive, becomes unquestionably sinful and immoral, whether self-imposed or imposed by another. The man who, by voluntarily working—not only during the day, but also during a large portion of the night—brings on diseases which results in death, acts manifestly in defiance of the laws of Nature, which are the laws of God. His labour, therefore, which, when reasonably limited, was perfectly moral, became immoral or sinful when extended so as to endanger life. But as excessive work debases the mind, the sin of it is intensified many degrees. When overwork is imposed by one man on another, the physical penalty falls upon the servant, and the moral penalty upon the master. The servant is the present sufferer; the master is the present sinner, and may possibly be a sufferer in the future.

Such reasoning may be regarded as extremely simple; but if it has proved, as I think it has, the necessity for limitation and regulation of labour, may also be held as supplying a reason why actions which are entirely sinless in themselves, are regarded as sinful, if performed on Sunday. Up to a certain line, under all circumstances of time and place, labour is not only imperative, but perfectly moral; but all labour beyond that line is immoral. If labour begins at a fixed point in the morning, it should naturally end at another fixed point in the evening, work during the day, and rest during the night, be the laws of Nature. In many occupations, ten hours with one or two breaks, constitute the day; in other occupations, the day is shorter; and in some it is definitely longer. The question as to the right length of the labour-day is a very complicated one. That which has hitherto been too long, is proved by the tendency of all recent speculation and legislation on the subject. In most occupations, the clear dictates of Nature were wont uniformly to be set at defiance. To eat, sleep, and slave, with unquestioning obedience, used to be the dreary creed of labour. When, however, knowledge began to wear fustian, and go abroad in clogs and hob-nailed shoes, man began to discover the brutalities of mere eating, and sleeping, and slaving. So he bethought him that all these three elements of his daily life were open to improvement; that his eating might be somewhat refined and lightened, if not increased; that his sleeping might be sweetened and surrounded by higher visions; that with him also might love lie down at night, and he rise up in the morning; and that his blind, brutish slavery might become intelligent labour, performed little more from love and a little less from fear, derived more from duty and less from legal compulsion; that even his voluntary labour might be shortened, and his life thereby considerably lengthened; and that, in brief, while he laboured to save his body from mortal death, he might also labour to win for his soul that immortal life which is ultimately to be man's eternal glory.

Well, by keeping this scheme of improvement sedulously before the world, the human bee has made a clear advancement. Something has been gained when ideas like these are regnant—that your true king lives not for himself alone, but also for his subjects; that he is only great in the greatness of his people; and likewise, that the true interests of master and servant are identical; that there is something ineffably mean in the man whose sole object is to enlarge his estate in spite of the interests of his servants; and that the end of all work whatsoever, from the making of a pin to the building of a war-ship, is the comfort, the purification, and spiritual enlightenment of human life, and the enthronement of reason, justice, and love, to the supercession of blindness, oppression, and indifference.

But there should each day be a limit to labour, as admitted on all hands; but notwithstanding that some departments legislative enactments regulate the hours, I know, from personal observation, that in other departments employers, especially in the public works, extend the working hours of the day beyond all ideas of justice and mercy. In such cases, legio, which is the trumpet of the divine law as well as of common sense, is bound to proclaim that when employers commit a daily act of sin in thus irrationally extending the labours of the day, for manifestly no other purpose than more speedily to make a little gain. Such conduct is unquestionably a sin, and it is not yet in all cases a violation of any human law. In some cases it is so; and, although I would not advocate any unnecessary interference with labour, I think that in most, if not in all cases, there ought to be a legal limitation of the labour-day; for I hold it to be one of the highest duties of the legislature to step in, and by law regulate and guard the respect between master and servant, so as to prevent one from becoming a mere selfish tyrant, and the other from becoming the worst of all human specimens—the mere slave of his master's inordinate selfishness and ambition. This opinion is not founded on mere sentimental philanthropy, but on some of the saddest phenomena of modern life. So vast and so even in the eyes of dry-eyed statesmen, have the effects on the human system of long labour-hours appeared, that they have not hesitated to interfere; and, by a variety of enactments in several directions, have sought to save humanity from a physical and moral deterioration which were becoming painful to those who had hearts to feel and eyes to see the present state, and reason to calculate the remoter consequences of unlimited and unregulated work. I intend these remarks to apply exclusively to mechanical employment, which are year by year emerging from their natural darkness and barbarism into the sunlight of humaner dispensation. Acts for the regulation of factories and bleachworks—bits of legislation, which were gained as if wrung from the heart's blood of capitalists—suggest examples of practices which were wont to be regarded as venial sins, at length becoming so gross as to be set down in the statute-book as offences against man's ideas of justice, as they always had been against the justice of Heaven.

The arguments which apply to the regulation of the labour-day apply, with equal force, to the regulation of the labour-week. Whether Sunday (or Sabbath, as some prefer to call it) was originally instituted by the direct interposition of God, or was merely the offspring, as some philosophers think, of human legislative wisdom, seems to me of little consequence; for, in either case, I hold it to be equally divine, and as happily adapted to all conditions of country. Whatever approves itself to the enlightened soul of Reason as an imperatively needful rule in the conduct and life of man, is as binding as a rule gained by Revelation can be; and is curiously enough regarded by some as even more binding, from the simple fact that a rule revealed by the light of Reason is, in many cases, more easily comprehended than one based on the light of Revelation can be. Generally, in truth, rules of the former class can alone be comprehended, and rules of the latter class only apprehended—although, happily, the declarations of pure Revelation are never discordant with those of pure Reason. Hence it is that the rational idea of Sunday is as holy and as binding to the soul of enlightened Reason as it is to the soul of Revelation—Reason and Revelation being coincident in regarding the Sunday as an interval of rest to man in the midst of his labour, to be rationally or religiously spent, as the case may be; but always to be regarded as of divine value—never to be abolished, but rather to be improved—and, if possible, to be multiplied, in the form of extra holidays. Hence it is, also, as I have already hinted, that things not in themselves sinful may be rightly regarded as such if repeated on Sunday, which is adopted as the divine line that prevents just, necessary, and sinless labour from becoming unjust, oppressive, and sinful slavery.

